

✓ 88486

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE, DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED 1865

VOLUME 155

JULY 4, 1942, to DECEMBER 26, 1942

88486

THE NATION, Inc.
55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

INDEX TO VOLUME 155

JULY 4, 1942, to DECEMBER 26, 1942

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

- A Art
- Ar Architecture
- C Correspondence
- CH Chart
- Ct Cartoon
- D Drama
- E Editorial Article
- EP Editorial Paragraph
- M Music
- MP Moving Pictures
- P Poetry
- S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages	Pages
1-20 July 4	281-328 October 3
21-40 July 11	329-360 October 10
41-60 July 18	361-396 October 17
61-80 July 25	397-428 October 24
81-100 August 1	429-460 October 31
101-120 August 8	461-492 November 7
121-140 August 15	493-524 November 14
141-160 August 22	525-556 November 21
161-180 August 29	557-600 November 28
181-200 September 5	601-632 December 5
201-220 September 12	633-664 December 12
221-248 September 19	665-696 December 19
249-280 September 26	697-728 December 26

A

A. F. of L. See American federation of labor

Abraham Lincoln battalion protests attack in Daily News. J. Bjoze; C..... 662

Acheson, Dean G. R. Bendiner; S..... 107

Aeronautics. See Aviation

African war. See War, African

Agee, James

Reviews of motion pictures:

In which we serve..... 727

Life begins at 8:30..... 727

Random harvest..... 727

Ravaged earth..... 727

Agencies, governmental. See United States; names of agencies

Agriculture

Economic mobilization means crop planning; E..... 332

Farm block and inflation; E.....163; see also E.....204; E.....283; EP..... 346

Farm bloc disputes the price-stabilization authorities on parity procedure; EP..... 431

Farmers versus the Farm bureau. D. Kramer; S.....28; see also EP.....21; EP.....42; S..... 74

Government obtains Congressional power to sell wheat surplus below parity; farm bloc seeks new price guaranties and subsidies. K. Hutchison; S.....74; see also EP.....21, 42; S..... 28

House committee proposes a farm rubber agency for the use of farm products to produce synthetic rubber. I. F. Stone; S.....85; see also E.....104; EP.....124; EP..... 699

Roosevelt's speech on farm prices and inflation control; E..... 204

Senate appropriations committee vests commodity price control with Secretary of agriculture; further measures provide for upward revision of commodity prices; EP.....42; see also EP.....21; S.....28; S..... 74

Air power. See Aviation

Aitken, Webster. B. H. Haggin; M..... 693

Aleutian islands. See War, Pacific

Alfange, Dean. See American labor party

Aliens

Barred from war work. J. Gelfand; C... 220

Enemy-alien status removed from Italian nationals in this country. F. Kirchwey; S.....401; see also.....476-477; C..... 555

Repeal the exclusion act. R. Nolte; C... 220

Alley, Rewi. See China

Alvarez del Vayo, Julio

Comments on his "World war III?"; 12, 30; see also C.....60; C..... 80

Crisis of confidence concerning North Africa; S..... 615

For a second front now; S..... 45

"Fortress Europe"; S.....682; see also..... 713

Spain's zero hour; S..... 647

To direct Nation's new weekly section on political war; EP..... 143
War and confidence; S..... 165
Ambedkar, Dr. B. R. See India
America. See United States
American booksellers' association
Hears report by W. W. Norton on war-time decline in literary production. M. Marshall; S..... 54
American federation of labor
And J. L. Lewis. J. A. Wechsler; S... 409
Discrimination against Negroes. J. Wechsler; S.....409; 464
see also E.....
Fights NLRB hearings on the Kaiser shipyard case as harmful to war production; EP..... 563
Refuses to enter Anglo-Soviet trade union committee; E.....226; 409 American federation of musicians. See Labor unions
American labor party
Achieves defeat of J. J. Bennett, anti-New deal candidate. R. Bendiner; S... 497
Alfange, D., advances a ten-point creed for a war-time governor; EP..... 399
La Guardia supports D. Alfange for governor; EP..... 331 Nominates D. Alfange for governor of New York state; EP.....161; 166
see also S.....
Union for democratic action backs Alfange for governor; EP..... 363
Angell, Norman
British view on India, a; S.....172; see also..... 145
Anti-semitism. See Jews
Anti-trust laws. See Monopolies
Appeasers, American
Congressman Holland attacks defeatist propaganda of the McCormick-Patterson press; EP..... 142
Argentina
Castillo government suspends papers favorable to the cause of the United nations; EP..... 81
Chamber of deputies votes to break relations with the axis; EP..... 346
Frank, W., attacked in Buenos Aires; EP.....103; see also EP..... 124
Guinazu, R., makes violent anti-American speech at meeting of chamber of deputies; EP..... 81
Nazi activities in, exposed by S. Welles. F. Kirchwey; S..... 365
Political crisis looms as President Ortiz resigns; EP..... 2
Second Argentinian ship sunk by axis submarines; break with Germany appears unlikely under President Castillo; EP..... 2
Argus
German and Italian dictatorships compared, the; S..... 685
German distrust of the Italians; S... 713
German morale and the German press; S. German morale and the North African offensive; S..... 575
Germany in the fourth year of war; S. 542
Goebbels on the fate planned by the allies for German children; S..... 378
Goering promises the German people food from Europe's harvest; S..... 414
Hemingway, E., proposes post-war sterilization of Germans; S.....510; see also C..... 696
Identity of; EP..... 636
Intellectuals versus Goebbels, the; S... 446
Nazi propaganda seeks to split the allies; S..... 478
Waffen S. S.: Germany's elite political police; S.....649; see also EP..... 666
Armaments. See War effort
Armstrong, Thomas R.; WPB appointment arouses Latin American resentment. I. F. Stone; S..... 366
Army, United States. See United States—Army
Arnall, Ellis. See Georgia
Arnold, Thurman. See Department of justice Art
Bacon, P.: pastels, prints, and drawings. C. Greenberg..... 522
Cezanne exhibition. C. Greenberg..... 659
Cornell, Joseph, and L. Vail: objects and bottles. C. Greenberg..... 727
Corot exhibition. C. Greenberg..... 659
Eilshemius: paintings. C. Greenberg..... 659
Flannagan, J. B.: sculpture and drawings. C. Greenberg..... 522
France's turnover artists. M. Lederman; A. Graves, Morris; gouaches. C. Greenberg 554

Lam. Wilfredo: gouaches. C. Greenberg 659
Primitive Painting. C. Greenberg; A.... 350
Tchelitchev, P.: paintings and drawings. C. Greenberg..... 522
Vail, Laurence, and J. Cornell: objects and bottles. C. Greenberg..... 727
Associated press
Department of justice institutes anti-trust suit against; E..... 463
Association of democratic Hungarians. See Hungary
Atlantic charter. See World war—Post-war reconstruction
Austria
Hapsburg hopes. F. Kirchwey; S...401; see also C.....492; 559; EP.....562; E.....606; C..... 662
Automobile workers. See United automobile workers
Autonomous. M. Van Doren; P..... 614
Aviation
Can air power win the war? D. W. Mitchell; S..... 480
Helicopters for victory. H. Hazlitt; S. 129
Our monthly production of warplanes; Ch..... 499
Azad, Maulana Abul. See India
B
B. H. N.
White-collar workers and taxation; C... 280
Babcock, Edward, declares war on the President's anti-inflation measures; EP.... 346
Bacon, Peggy; exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. 522
Balkan states
Toward peace on the Danube. R. Vambergy; S.....293; see also..... 91
See also names of countries
Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. B. H. Haggin; S..... 39
Bard, Ralph K., improves working relations between the navy and the unions. I. F. Stone; S..... 338
Declares America is still losing the war; EP..... 282
Barker, George
For a first birthday; P..... 580
Barksdale, Lena
Selected list of children's books..... 518
Barsky, Edward K.
Seeks funds for anti-fascist refugees in Europe; C..... 524
Baruch, Bernard
His men reported in control of the WPB. I. F. Stone; S..... 366
Rubber report, the. I. F. Stone; S...227, 366; see also EP..... 331
Barzun, Jacques
Unhyphenated America; S..... 194
Basch, Antonin
Rebuilding the Danube basin; S....91; see also..... 293
Bates, Ralph
Mihailovich and the partisans; S...577; see also C..... 662
Reunion on the left: unite the Second and Third internationals; S....441; see also C..... 631
Beam, Harry P., and the Dies committee. C. Van Deverder; S..... 324
Beat the band. J. W. Krutch; D..... 458
Belgium
Degrelle, L. M. J. Joesten; S..... 190
Gold deposited in Bank of France is turned over to the Germans by Marshal Petain; EP..... 494
Belisle, Eugene L.
Church control versus birth control; S.. 568
Bender, George H.
Member of the Tolan manpower committee calls for second front. I. F. Stone; S..... 435
Bendiner, Robert
Dunderhead election; S..... 497
Was Hull right about Vichy? S.....532; see also E.....495; 500; EP.....527, 529; 559; E.....604; 615; C..... 694
Who is the State department?
1. Cordell Hull—The great anachronism 66
2. The old Welles and the new..... 87
3. The assistant secretariat..... 107
4. Why the cow is sacred..... 126
Bendix, Hans
Nordic race, the; Ct..... 413
Bennett, John J., Jr. See New York state
Benois-Mechin, Jean. See France
Berle, Adolf Augustus, Jr. R. Bendiner; S..... 107
Bernal, Arias
Hispanidad; Ct..... 508
Bethlehem steel company. See Steel
Bethlen, Count Stephen, anti-nazi? S. Doktor; C.....120; see also..... 72
Beveridge, Sir William. See Great Britain

- Bird in hand. J. W. Krutch; D..... 458
- Birth control
Versus church control. E. L. Belisle; S 568
- Bjoze, Jack
Abraham Lincoln battalion protests attack in Daily News; C..... 662
- Block, Harry
Mexico's home front; S..... 406
- Boal, Pierre. See United States—State department
- Board of economic stabilization. See War effort
- Board of economic warfare. See War effort
- Bogan, Louise
"Sentimental education" today; S...301; see also C..... 396
- Bolivia
Anti-labor activities of P. Boal, American minister. I. F. Stone; S...703; see also ..... 671
- Books
For children. B. Hutchison; S...547; see also ..... 518
Of 1942 ..... 593
War-time literary production shows sharp decline. M. Marshall; S..... 54
- Borgese, G. A.
Comments on Biddle's order removing enemy-alien restrictions from Italians; C.....555; see also .....401, 476, 477
Comments on "World War III?" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 30
Geopolitical front, the; S..... 206
- Bose, Subhas, in Bangkok; EP..... 300
- Bradley, Major General Follett, sent to Moscow to discuss American air aid to Russia; EP..... 123
- Brahms. B. H. Haggin; M..... 219
- Brazil
Declares war against Germany; other Latin American countries may follow; EP ..... 162
Krock, A., credits its entry into the war to efforts of our State department; EP ..... 183
Vargas imprisons Brazilian refugees who return to aid the war effort; EP..... 346
- Brenner, Leah
Congressional act creates hardships for Americans in Latin America; C..... 428
- Britain. See Great Britain
- Broadcasting. See Radio
- Brooklyn Tablet
Attacks H. Callender's newspaper reports on South America; EP..... 362
Retracts its libelous attacks made against L. Fernsworth in 1939; EP..... 362
- Brooks, C. Wayland. D. Kramer and S. J. Harris; S.....150; see also E..... 252
- Brossolette, Pierre. See France
- Budget, public. See Finance, public
- Bulgaria
Refuses to furnish military aid to Hitler on the Russian front. E. Kovacs; S ..... 72
- Burma road. See Chinese-Japanese war
- Business
Employers flood WLB with minor disputes by refusal to arbitrate with union representatives; EP..... 495
- Inflation
Babcock, E., "declares war" on the President's anti-inflation measures; EP ..... 346
Byrnes, James F., named director of Board of economic stabilization. I. F. Stone; S..... 338
Congress seen ready to grant Roosevelt's request for curbs by October 1st; EP ..... 252
Cut in OPA appropriation will hamstring effective price-ceiling orders; EP .....21; see also EP..... 42
Failure of Congress to heed treasury tax proposals will increase inflationary pressure; EP.....142; EP ..... 163
Farm bloc and the wheat surplus. K. Hutchison; S .....74; see also EP.....21, 42; 28
Farm-bloc politics; E.....283; see also EP.....223, 431, 667
Farm price fixing will not insure stabilization of living costs; E..... 332
Food prices, 1939 and 1942; C..... 204
Henderson resigns from the OPA. I. F. Stone; S...703; see also EP... 698
Is here; E ..... 163
OPA asks cut in railroad freight and passenger rates. K. Hutchison; S... 717
OPA price-control machinery fails; E.....163; see also EP..... 667
President Roosevelt promises measures to curb; EP.....183; see also E... 204
Small business committee criticizes OPA's price regulations for retailers; E ..... 701
Will be increased by administration war-financing program. H. Mager; S.....188; see also C..... 247
New deal for stockholders. M. H. Greenberger; S.....534; see also C..... 662
- Senate small business committee reopens hearings on aid to retailers and distributors; E.....332; see also E.... 701
Smaller war plants corporation named to spread war contracts to "little businessmen"; E.....64; see also C..... 160
Tax victory for corporations. K. Hutchison; S ..... 450
- C
- C. I. O. See Congress of industrial organizations
- Callaghan, Admiral Daniel J., killed in action. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 716
- Callender, Harold
His reports on South America attacked by the Brooklyn Tablet; EP..... 362
- Canada
Post-war trade agreement with the United States; EP ..... 635
- Cant, Gilbert
One war, one command; S.....677; see also EP.....123; E.....297; 475; 650
- Carrier, Constance
Merry-go-round; P ..... 482
- Cartoons
Coronation in Madrid. L. Quintanilla.. 377
Democracy's new allies. L. Quintanilla. 617
Festung Europa. A. Hoffmeister..... 683
"Have either of the patients regained consciousness?" Low ..... 544 Hispanidad. A. Bernal ..... 508
"How much for this lot?" Low ..... 233
"May I walk into your parlor?" Low... 344
News suppression in Germany. E. Peters 171
Nordic race, the. H. Bendix ..... 413
Out of sorrow, joy; out of death, victory. A. Hoffmeister ..... 445 Outlook, the. Low ..... 294
Pincers tactics. Low ..... 710
"Stop those imposters." Low..... 642
Total victory. A. Hoffmeister..... 264
Winterhilfe. A. Hoffmeister..... 349
"Youth, a free United Europe is yours." V. DePauw ..... 299
- Carver, George Washington; memorial for, planned. R. Pilant; C..... 632
- Casey, Joseph, and the Dies committee. C. Van Devander; S..... 324
- Cassavetes, N. J.
Letter on "Whom does the Greek king represent?"; C ..... 40
- Castillo, Ramon S. See Argentina
- Catholic church. See Roman catholic church
- Catroux, General Georges. See Free French
- Causey, James H.
Committee formed to defeat H. Fish in congressional elections; C ..... 100
- Caution, Horace R.
Fighting for white folks? S..... 267
- Censorship
American broadcasts kept off the air by Darlan's control of North African radio; EP ..... 665
British documentary film versus the Hays office; EP ..... 603
Film version of Hemingway's "For whom the bell tolls" censored to please Franco; E.....668; see also..... 722
Office of war information obtains partial victory in informing public about spy trials; EP ..... 41
See also Freedom of the press
- Cézanne; exhibition. C. Greenberg; A..... 659
- Chasan, Will
Can Volstead stage a comeback? S..... 505
Dies committee—whose Trojan horse? S 322
Farley picks a loser in the New York state campaign; S.....166; see also EP..... 161
Our worst congressmen; S.....438; see also E.....431; C..... 663
Chasan, Will, and E. Jack Hoffman, Clare E. W. Chasan and E. Jack; S ..... 131
Interpreting the results. R. Bendiner; S ..... 497
Montana Republicans oppose Senator J. E. Murray; E.....332
O'Daniel, W. Lee. W. Whitman; S.....48; see also EP..... 42
Our worst congressmen. W. Chasan; S.....438; see also E.....431; C.... 663
Results of the primaries; our dangerous indifference; E..... 252
Trendless primaries, the. F. Kirchwey; S ..... 144
Villard, O. G., protests evaluation of congressmen on the basis of their voting records; EP ..... 563
Winrod, Gerald B. W. Chasan and V. Riesel; S ..... 7
- Children
Literature for. B. Hutchison; S...547; see also ..... 518
Truman committee urges expansion of nursery schools to aid working mothers; E ..... 528
- Chile
Cabinet changes and foreign policy; EP 430
Nazi activities in, exposed by S. Welles. F. Kirchwey; S...365; see also EP... 398
- China
Alley, R., retained as secretary of the Chinese industrial cooperatives; EP... 463 Celebrates the anniversary of the treaty of Nanking; EP ..... 163
- Cooperatives; E .....333; see also C.....459; EP.....463; C..... 555
- Gandhi on Indian-Chinese relations.... 411
- Chinese-Japanese war
Arrival of American army fliers in Chungking reported; EP..... 2
British launch drive into Burma; E... 700
China needs planes to follow up land successes against Japanese army; E... 184
Chinese army successes in Chekiang and Kiangsi provinces; E ..... 184
Chinese hold Chekiang and Kiangsi; Japanese driven out of Wenchow; transports and bomber planes are needed; EP.....61; see also EP..... 102
Chinese recapture Linhsien; newly trained Chinese air force active for the first time; EP ..... 2
Chinese recapture Wenchow and occupy a section of the Hangchow-Nanchang railways; EP ..... 162
Have we forgotten China? E..... 605
Japanese threat on Burmese border may cut China off from India; EP..... 562
Koreans under arms in China. S. C. Menefee; S ..... 509
Lin Yu-tang warns that China cannot hold out indefinitely without plane aid; E ..... 700
Need for a campaign in Burma to open supply route into China; E..... 605
Chocolate soldier, the. J. W. Krutch; D... 79
- Church, Roman catholic. See Roman catholic church
- Churchill, Winston. See Great Britain
- Civil rights
Oklahoma criminal-syndicalism prosecutions renewed. E. Z. Green; C..... 524
- Clarke, Howard
U-boats and empty bottles; S..... 715
- Clemens, Cyril
Seeks information about possible meeting of M. Twain and W. Whitman; C... 160
- Cohen, Benjamin V.; appointed chief counsel to Board of economic stabilization. I. F. Stone; S..... 366
- Cohen, Ethel S.
Comments on B. H. Haggin's criticism of the Shostakovich seventh symphony; C.....180; see also .....138, 159; C ..... 280
- Commerce. See Business
- Committee on fair employment practices. See Negroes
- Communications
Telegraph merger bill now before Congress; EP ..... 635
- Communist party
Oklahoma criminal-syndicalism prosecutions renewed. E. Z. Green; C..... 524
Reunion on the left. R. Bates; S...441; see also C..... 631
- Condiffe, J. B.
Agenda for a post-war world; B..... 355
- Congress
And the people. A. Meiklejohn; S..... 469
- Elections
Beat the dunderheads. R. Bendiner; S 347
Brooks, C. Wayland. D. Kramer and S. J. Harris; S..... 150
Efforts to cut the OPA appropriation will have repercussions in the elections; EP ..... 21
Fish, Representative Hamilton. W. Jordy and W. Chasan; S.....415; see also C..... 100
Hoffman, Clare E. W. Chasan and E. Jack; S ..... 131
Interpreting the results. R. Bendiner; S ..... 497
Montana Republicans oppose Senator J. E. Murray; E.....332
O'Daniel, W. Lee. W. Whitman; S.....48; see also EP..... 42
Our worst congressmen. W. Chasan; S.....438; see also E.....431; C.... 663
Results of the primaries; our dangerous indifference; E..... 252
Trendless primaries, the. F. Kirchwey; S ..... 144
Villard, O. G., protests evaluation of congressmen on the basis of their voting records; EP ..... 563
Winrod, Gerald B. W. Chasan and V. Riesel; S ..... 7
- Forced the resignation of L. Henderson. I. F. Stone; S.....703; see also EP..... 698
- Holland, E. J., attacks defeatist propaganda of the McCormick-Patterson newspapers; EP ..... 142
- Last sessions justify charges of incompetence; EP ..... 666, 667
- Moves right. I. F. Stone; S..... 639
- Reactionary Democrats seek union with incoming Republicans in attack on labor legislation; EP ..... 495
- Ready to destroy price-control legislation; fights for repeal of salary ceiling; EP 667

- Congress of industrial organizations
 Convention will hear discussion of labor unity plan; EP.....495; 164
 see also E.....
 Murray proposes United Nations trade union committee; E.....226
 Offers a manpower plan; EP.....699
 Conscientious objectors. See Selective service
 Conscript. See Selective service
 Consumers union Protests reference to it by R. Rovere in his article on J. B. Matthews; C.....396;
 see also .....314
 Contracts, defense. See War effort
 Cooperatives
 Chinese cooperatives; E.....333;
 see also C.....459; EP.....463; C.....555
 Movement grows rapidly in the United States. K. Hutchison; S.....295 Refused radio time by two major networks; E.....363; see also C.....492; EP.....699
 Cope, J. P.
 Dynamite in South Africa; S.....673 Cornell, Joseph, and L. Vail: objects and bottles. C. Greenberg; A.....727
 Corot; exhibit on. C. Greenberg; A.....659
 Cot, Pierre
 Comments on "World War III?" by J.
 Alvarez del Vayo; C.....60
 Crawford, Kenneth G.
 History of a hoax; S.....317
 Cripps, Sir Stafford. See Great Britain
 Criticism
 Constance Rourke in the critics' den. M.
 Marshall; S.....418; see also C.....523
 Music. B. H. Haggin; M.....426, 458, 490
 Open letter on critics and criticism, an.
 J. W. Krutch; S.....95
 Poe as a literary critic. E. Wilson; S.....452
 Woolf, V., as critic. L. Kronenberger;
 S.....382
 Croatia. See Yugoslavia
 Czechoslovakia
 Political parties in exile pass resolution voiding stipulations of the Munich
 pact; EP.....266
 Tuka, B. J. Joesten; S.....190
- D
- Dakar. See War, African
 Damask check, the. J. W. Krutch; D.....598
 Dan, Theodor
 Comments on "World War III?" by J.
 Alvarez del Vayo; S.....14
 Letter on Nation's statement regarding Russian social-democrat party; C.....140;
 see also .....75
 Dance
 "Ballet imperial". B. H. Haggin.....599
 Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. B. H.
 Haggin; S.....39
 Danubian federation. R. Vambery; S.....293;
 see also .....91
 Darlan, Admiral Jean François. See Franco-American relations
 Davila, Charles A.
 Comments on "World War III?" by J.
 Alvarez del Vayo; C.....80
 Davis, Elmer. See Office of war information Defense, national. See War effort de Gaulle, General Charles. See Free French Degrelle, Leon Marie Joseph Ignace. See
 Belgium
 Democratic party
 Farley picks a loser. W. Chasan;
 S.....166; see also EP.....161
 President bungles the New York state gubernatorial campaign; EP.....161;
 see also .....166; EP.....331
 Denmark
 Little freedom left despite German promises. G. Leistikow; S.....412
 Scavenius, E. J. Joesten; S.....190
 De Pauw, Victor
 "Youth, a free United Europe is yours;"
 Ct.....299
 Deutsch, Julius
 Comments on "Hapsburg hopes" by F.
 Kirchwey; C.....492; see also .....401
 Comments on "World War III?" by J.
 Alvarez del Vayo; S.....31
 Dewey, Thomas E. See New York state
 Dies committee
 Again promises to expose nazi "front" groups; E.....285
 Answer to its attacks on loyal Americans.
 M. D. Vincent; C.....459
 Background of a demagogue. W. Whitman; S.....311
 Biddle reports that FBI investigation showed only two government employees of those named by committee deserved dismissal; EP.....184, 223
 Four to three. C. Van Devander;
 S.....324; see also C.....427
 History of a hoax. K. G. Crawford;
 S.....317
 Its "investigators" and "experts." J.
 Wechsler; S.....326
- J. B. Matthews—the informer. R. H.
 Rovere; S.....314; see also C.....396
 Smears the Union for democratic action as a "communist organization"; EP.....2
 Versus D. B. Vaughan. F. Kirchwey;
 S.....44; see also EP.....63
 What Dies is up to. F. Kirchwey; S.....309
 Whose Trojan horse? W. Chasan; S.....322
 Doktor, Stephen
 Comments on "Hitler's quarreling puppets" by E. Kovacs; C.....120;
 see also .....72
 Doriot, Jacques. See France
 Draft, the. See Selective service
 Drama. See Krutch, J. W. (for reviews)
 Dubinsky, David
 1942 and 1944; an analysis of the New York state gubernatorial election; S.....436
 Dubuison, F. Eugene
 Defends Congressman J. E. Rankin; C.....663;
 see also 438; E.....431
 Dulce et decorum est pro Batten, Barton,
 Durstine et Osborne mori. H. Wouk; P.....471
 Dworkin, Martin S.
 World war and color lines; C.....663
 Dye, Howard A.
 Attacks the Darlan deal; C.....694;
 see also .....559
- E
- East, near. See Near east; names of countries Eberstadt, Ferdinand, becomes vice-chairman of the WPB; EP.....249; see also 366;
 607; E.....638
 Eckhardt, Tibor, resigns as leader of the Independent Hungary group; EP.....83
 Eden, Anthony. See Great Britain
 Edman, Irwin
 British humors and American humor; S.....719 Mythology: western imagination in the making; S.....239
 Soliloquy; P.....582
 Egypt. See War, African Eilshemius; paintings. C. Greenberg; A.....659
 Eire. See Ireland
 Emigrés. See Refugees
 England. See Great Britain
 Espionage
 Eight German saboteurs arrested by the FBI and placed on trial; EP.....23;
 see also EP.....41; 103
 European travelogue—1942. A. Mandelbaum;
 S.....259
 European war. See War, European
 Eve of Saint Mark. J. W. Krutch; D.....425
 Everybody's business; articles by K. Hutchison.....33, 74, 114, 237, 295, 373, 450, 513, 573, 652 .....717
 Ewer, Bernard C.
 Comments on C. Van Devander's portrait of H. J. Voorhis; C.....427;
 see also .....324
 Excess profits tax
 High rate offset by lower normal taxes and surtaxes in 1942 law. K. Hutchison; S.....450
- F
- Farley, James. See New York state
 Farm bureau
 Its opposition to the Farm security administration. D. Kramer; S.....28;
 see also EP.....21; EP.....42; S.....74
 Farm security administration Facts behind the congressional battle on the FSA appropriation. D. Kramer;
 S.....28; see also EP.....21;
 EP.....42, S.....74
 Farming. See Agriculture, Business-Inflation
 Fascism and nazism
 Compared. Argus; S.....685 Drive against nazi agents continues with the arrest of G. W. Kunze, conviction of M. Stephan, and other arrests in the Canal Zone; EP.....23
 Eight German spies arrested by the FBI and placed on trial; EP.....23;
 see also EP.....103
 Murder of the Jews; E.....668
 Trojan horse, in South America. M. A.
 Seane; S.....507
 Twenty-eight Americans held for questioning on anti-American statements;
 EP.....82
 Twenty years of, in Italy.....443
 Fernsworth, Lawrence
 Brooklyn Tablet retracts its libelous attacks against him made in 1939; EP.....362
 Fighting French. See Free French
 Films. See Moving pictures; Agee, J.; Haggin, B. H. (for reviews)
 Finance, public
 Cash savings and taxes. K. Hutchison;
 S.....652
 Congress hamstring the treasury's tax program; proposals for a spending tax.
 K. Hutchison; S.....33; see also EP.....142;
 EP.....202; EP.....225;
 EP.....252; EP.....362; EP.....398
- Failure of Congress to heed treasury tax proposals responsible for inflation; E.....163 House ways and means committee further reduces the tax bill and votes down a reform measure for mandatory joint income tax returns; EP.....2;
 see also EP.....42; EP.....142
 Income-tax exemption proposed for army privates; EP.....42
 Roosevelt's speech on adjustment of income-tax rates; E.....204
 Ruml pay-as-you-go plan, the. K. Hutchison; S.....237; see also C.....359
 Senate finance committee rejects treasury proposal to end tax-exempt privilege, and for mandatory joint income tax-returns for married couples; EP.....82
 Tax victory for big business, a. K.
 Hutchison; S.....450
 Taxation and the "new poor". K.
 Hutchison; S.....573
 Treasury's "victory fund drive" in sight of goal; EP.....699
 WLB formula for wage stabilization makes more drastic taxation necessary; EP.....62
 War-financing program through the banks will create greater inflationary pressure. H. Mager; S.....188;
 see also C.....247
 White-collar workers and taxation,
 B. H. N.; C.....280
- Finland
 Hitler seeks further military aid from General Mannerheim. E. Kovacs; S.....72
 Fischer, Louis
 Comments on "On the diplomatic front" by F. Kirchwey.....433;
 see also .....365; 478
 Gandhi's rejected offer; S.....145; see also E.....144; 172; C.....200; C.....248
 India means it; S.....185
 War Americana. S.....510
 What Gandhi wants; S.....121;
 see also EP.....123
 Why Cripps failed in India; S.....230,
 255; see also 224; C.....280;
 C.....359; 501; 538; 619
 Fish, Hamilton. W. Jordy and W. Chasan;
 S.....415
 Nominated in Republican primaries;
 Willkie calls for his defeat in November elections. F. Kirchwey;
 S.....144; see also C.....100
 Fitch, Geraldine T.
 Letter on the Chinese industrial coopera-tives; C.....459; see also E.....333;
 EP.....463; C.....555
 Flandin, Pierre-Etienne, quits Vichy to join Darlan in North Africa. P. Winkler;
 S.....704
 Flannagan, John B.; exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.....522
 Flynn, Errol, accused of statutory rape; EP.....462
 Food. See Agriculture; Rationing
 For a first birthday. G. Barker; P.....580
 "For whom the bell tolls"; censored to please the Spanish dictatorship; E.....668;
 see also .....722
 Foyle, Thomas
 Manpower problem, the; S.....472
- France
 And Martinique.....576; see also EP.....562
 Bank of, turns Belgian gold deposit over to Germans; EP.....494
 Brossolette, P.; quits the Vichy regime;
 EP.....250
 Depots her refugees. M. Mandellaub;
 S.....345; see also EP.....330
 Ersatz life, letter to The Nation.....512 French clergy hostile to the Vichy regime; EP.....251
 French resist the compulsory labor act;
 EP.....250; see also E.....265; EP.....397
 Fresh outburst of unrest; nazis reported to be considering replacement of Laval
 by J. Doriot; EP.....124 Germans seek control of North African colonies; EP.....397
 Her turncoat artists. M. Lederman; A.....169
 Herriot, E.; arrested; EP.....330
 Herriot and Jeanneney protest decree dismissing parliamentary bureaus; EP.....221
 Housekeeping in. A. Pallavicini; S.....10
 How much for this lot? Low, Ct.....233
 How to help the French. A. Huerta; S.....263
 Laval decrees check on unmarried women workers; Havas agency announces workers seek to be sent to Germany in exchange for prisoners; EP.....221
 Laval dismisses J. Benoist-Mechin; discovers plot to supplant him; EP.....282
 Laval expresses hope for a German victory; our State department renews shipments to Vichy-controlled French
 North Africa; EP.....1
 Laval obtains passage of decree permitting him to dismiss civil servants;
 EP.....251
 Navy scuttles the fleet at Toulon; E.....604 Nazis seize F. Largo Caballero for return to Spain; EP.....527

- Plan for post-war "compulsory democracy" 539
 Portrait of P. Laval, J. Joesten; S... 190
 Spanish refugees. See Spain
 Total occupation of, by nazis; EP... 526
 Travelogue—1942. A. Mandelbaum; S... 259
 Vallin, C., quits Vichy; EP... 250
 Vichy seeks French specialists for work in Germany; EP... 282
 Vichy ships cobalt ore to Germany. I. F. Stone; S... 671
 Franco, Francisco. See Spain
 Franco-American relations
 Darlan deal, the:
 America's first Quisling. F. Kirchwey; S... 529
 And American liberals. F. Kirchwey; S... 559; see also C... 694; C... 696
 And the Free French. See Free French
 British fear Darlan's control of potentially dangerous army in North Africa; EP... 633 British reaction; EP... 666; see also Crisis of confidence faces the United Nations. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S... 615
 Darlan controls the North African radio; EP... 665
 Darlan discredited by scuttling of the French fleet; E... 604
 Darlan promotes himself; EP... 633
 Darlan states his purposes and policies; E... 700
 Men behind Darlan, the. P. Winkler; S... 704
 Opposed by General G. Catroux; EP... 634
 Was Hull right about Vichy? R. Bendiner; S... 532; see also E... 495; 500; C... 694
 Will United States intervene to free anti-fascist prisoners in North Africa? EP... 493, 633; see also EP... 665; E... 700
 See also War, African Negotiations with Martinique; EP... 562; see also 576; EP... 603
 State department issues few visas for Jewish refugees trapped in France; EP... 330; see also EP... 183; 345
 State department renews shipments to French North Africa; EP... 1
 State department unsuccessful in getting Laval to remove French warships from Alexandria; EP... 43
 State department will allow 5,000 refugee children to enter this country; EP... 400
 Toward a break with Vichy. F. Kirchwey; S... 65
 Vichy angered by flying fortress attacks on Rouen; EP... 221
 Frank, Waldo
 Attacked by fascist thugs in Buenos Aires; EP... 103; see also EP... 124
 Free French
 Allowed to take no part in North African landing. I. F. Stone; S... 500; see also E... 495
 American attitude toward, in relation to the North African campaign. I. F. Stone; S... 565; see also... 559
 And Hull's Vichy policy. R. Bendiner; S... 532; see also... 529
 Catroux, General Georges, opposes Darlan deal; EP... 634
 Hull names representatives to "consult" with French national committee in London; EP... 42
 United States recognizes De Gaulle and appoints attaches to French national committee in London. F. Kirchwey; S... 65
 Willkie, W., greets General de Gaulle on Free French week; EP... 22
 Free world, first anniversary issue; EP... 283
 Freedom of the press
 And the anti-trust suit against the Associated Press; E... 463
 British censor news of strikes and unrest in India; EP... 251
 British journalists protest political censorship; E... 563
 Franco news correspondent comments on American censorship; EP... 266
 Militant, Trotskyist journal, banned from the mails; EP... 635
 G
 G. E. F. (Ilium). J. Sayre; S... 479
 Gagnier, Charles E.
 Jim Crow in Washington; C... 428
 Gandhi, Mohandas. See India
 Gannon, Reverend Robert I. See Roman catholic church
 Gaulle, General Charles de. See Free French
 Gaule, Lionel
 Comments on "World war III?" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; C... 80 Gelber, Marvin B.
 Comments on L. Fischer's "Why Cripps failed"; C... 359; see also S... 230, 255
 Gelfand, Jack
 Aliens barred from war work; C... 220
 Geopolitical front, The. G. A. Borgese; S... 206
 George, W. P. Michael
 Comments on "A new plan for Spain"; C... 360; see also E... 104
 Georgia
 Arnall, E., defeats E. Talmadge in gubernatorial primary; EP... 223
 Germany
 And a German writer. T. Mann; S... 379
 And allied propaganda. H. Pol; S... 371
 Conditions in the fourth year of war.
 Argus; S... 542
 Distrusts the Italians. Argus; S... 713
 Gallup poll of blood, a. P. Hagen; S... 540
 Goebbels on the fate planned by the allies for German children. Argus; S... 378
 Goering promises the German people food from the harvests of conquered Europe. Argus; S... 414
 Hemingway, E., proposes post-war sterilization of Germans. Argus; S... 510; see also C... 696
 Himmeler, H., obtains more power; E... 265
 Hitler calls for increased military aid from axis allies. E. Kovacs; S... 72
 Hitler on the defensive. F. Kirchwey; S... 334
 Hitler reshuffles his high command; EP... 666
 Hitler's new role... 650
 Hitler's speech strikes a defeatist note; EP... 493; see also... 539
 Intellectuals versus Goebbels, the. Argus; S... 446
 Internal situation and post-war solutions
 Manpower, waning. F. Sternberg; S... 167
 Morale and the North African offensive. Argus; S... 575
 Morale and the press. Argus; S... 618
 Nazism compared with Italian fascism. Argus; S... 685
 News suppression. E. Peters; Ct... 171
 Out of sorrow, joy; out of death, victory. A. Hoffmeister; Ct... 445 Problems of transport and supply. K. Hutchison; S... 114
 Propaganda uses the imperialist bogey to split the allies. Argus; S... 478
 Reaction to the Beveridge plan; EP... 667; see also E... 636; E... 669
 Recent propaganda by Goebbels; EP... 202; see also E... 343
 Russo-German war. See Russo-German war
 Waffen S.S.; Hitler's elite political police. Argus; S... 649; see also EP... 666
 Winterhilfe. A. Hoffmeister; Ct... 349
 See also War, African; War, European; World war
 Gormley, Admiral Robert L. See War, Pacific-Solomon islands
 Gillette bill. See Rubber Giraud, General Henri Honoré. See War, African Gisnet, Arnold
 Comments on J. Negrin's statement on a free Spain; C... 631; see also... 375
 Goebbels, Joseph. See Germany
 Goodman, Ezra
 Hollywood and the war; S... 213
 Government finance. See Finance, public Governmental agencies. See United States; names of agencies
 Graves, Morris; gouaches. C. Greenberg; A... 554
 Great big doorstep, the. J. W. Krutch; D... 659
 Great Britain
 Anglo-American relations
 Briton looks at America, a. K. Martin; S... 640
 Defending the empire? F. Kirchwey; S... 365; 433
 Jim Crow in the A.E.F. J. Julian; S... 610
 People resist attempts by American soldiers in, to introduce color discrimination; EP... 399; see also C... 459
 Stop those imposters. Low; Ct... 642
 Anglo-Indian relations
 All-India, congress expected to ratify Gandhi's civil disobedience campaign; EP... 102
 America can help to solve the Indian problem. F. L. Schuman; C... 180
 British censor news of Indian strikes and unrest; EP... 251
 Churchill's speech. F. Kirchwey; S... 224; see also 230, 255; EP... 251
 Gandhi and the war; E... 63
 Gandhi's rejected offer. L. Fischer; S... 145; see also E... 144; 172; C... 200; C... 248
 India means it. L. Fischer; S... 185
 Letter from Gandhi to Chiang Kai-shek... 411
 Nationalists and the British government seek new working formula; EP... 23
 Solution of the Indian problem, a. B. Russell; C... 200; see also C... 248
 What Gandhi wants. L. Fischer; S... 121; see also EP... 123
 Why Cripps failed. L. Fischer; S... 230, 255; see also 224; C... 280; C... 359; 501; 538, 619
 Anglo-Russian relations
 British labor and the Soviet union. R. Bates; S... 441; see also C... 631
 Churchill in Moscow to discuss aid to Russians; EP... 141
 Churchill reports on his second-front conversations with Stalin; EP... 222
 Citrine reports to the British trade union congress on AFL refusal to enter Anglo-Soviet trade union committee; E... 226
 Beveridge social security report, the; E... 636; see also EP... 667; E... 669
 Cabinet shake-up brings demotion of Cripps, advancement for Eden and Morrison; EP... 561
 Churchill answers parliamentary critics on the fall of Tobruk; E... 4
 Growth of a new left-wing political movement. T. Wintringham; S... 608
 Hoare, S.; addresses his constituents on the "new Europe"; EP... 251
 Poll shows A. Eden most popular to succeed Churchill; Cripps and Morrison also possibilities; EP... 562
 Press on the political aspects of the war
 Reaction to the Darlan deal; EP... 666; see also... 711
 Regulations on hours of labor. K. Hutchison; S... 513; see also EP... 495
 Salary ceilings in wartime. K. Hutchison; S... 573
 Trade union congress resolution refers second-front problems to the military; E... 226
 See also Russo-German war; War, African; War, European; World war
 Greater loyalty hath no man. J. Henle; S... 209
 Greece
 Letter on "Whom does the Greek king represent?" by L. White. N. J. Casavetes; C... 40
 Green, Elizabeth Z.
 Oklahoma criminal-syndicalism prosecutions renewed; C... 524
 Greenberg, Clement
 Bacon, P.; exhibition; A... 522
 Cezanne exhibition; A... 659
 Cornell, Joseph, and L. Vail: objects and bottles; A... 727
 Corot exhibition; A... 659
 Eilshemius; paintings; A... 659
 Flannagan, J. B.; exhibition; A... 522
 Graves, Morris; gouaches; A... 554
 Lam, Wilfredo; gouaches; A... 659
 Primitive painting; A... 350
 Tchelitchev, P.; exhibition; A... 522
 Greenberger, Maurice H.
 New deal for stockholders; S... 534; see also C... 662
 Gross, Murray
 Need for a second political party; C... 631
 Grossmann, Kurt R.
 Refugees: burden or asset? S... 708
 Grundy, J. Owen
 Urges letters of gratitude to Senator Norris; C... 600
 Guadalcanal. See War, Pacific
 Guinazu, Ruiz. See Argentina
 H
 Hagen, Paul
 Executions in Germany; S... 540
 Haggin, B. H.
 Articles on music:
 Aitken, Webster... 693
 Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo... 39
 Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"... 728
 Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet"... 426, 458, 490; see also... 554
 Brahms... 219
 Composers in the Soviet Union; S... 159
 Music critics... 426, 458, 490
 New opera company performs "Boris Godunov"... 599
 New opera company's performance of "Macbeth"... 693
 New opera company's performance of "Vie parisienne"... 599
 Schnabel recital... 599
 Shostakovich's seventh symphony 138, 159; see also C... 180; C... 280
 "Survey" courses for students 728; see also... 546
 Szigeti recital of Mozart and Beethoven... 554
 Toscanini and the Viennese tradition. 307
 Toscanini performance of "Romeo and Juliet" not to be broadcast... 554
 Music, recorded... 20, 58, 98, 119, 159, 178, 198, 219, 246, 279, 307, 458, 522, 599, 660, 693
 Outstanding releases of 1941... 630
 See also Book reviews

- Halsey, Admiral William F. See War, Pacific-Solomon islands
- Hapsburg, Otto
To form "Free Austrian" legion. F. Kirchwey; S.....401; see also C.....492; 559; EP.....562; E.....606; C.....662
- Harding, T. Swann
Comments on the Darlan deal; C.....696; see also.....559
- Harris, Sydney Justin, and D. Kramer
Brooks, C. Wayland; S.....150
- Hauser, Ernest A., and the rubber pool; EP. 331
- Hawaii
And its 150,000 Japanese. A. Horlings; S.....69; see also EP.....62; C.....120; C.....140
- Hayes, Carlton J. H.
Protests The Nation's editorial, "A new plan for Spain"; C.....360; see also E.....104
- Hazlitt, Henry
Helicopters for victory; S.....129
- Heimann, Eduard
Religion and democracy; C.....491
- Hello out there. J. W. Krutch; D.....357
- Hemingway, Ernest
Film version of "For whom the bell tolls" censored to please the Franco dictatorship; E.....668; see also.....722 Proposes post-war sterilization of Germans. Argus; S.....510; see also C.....696
- Hemingway, Martha Gellhorn
Explains E. Hemingway's statement on sterilization of Germans; C.....696; see also.....510
- Henderson, Leon. See Business-Inflation
- Henle, James
Greater loyalty hath no man; S.....209
- Herriot, Edouard. See France
- Higgins industries. See War effort-Contracts
- Hillman, Sidney, heads CIO movement for labor unity; EP.....495
- Himmler, Heinrich. See Germany
- Hitler, Adolph. See Germany
- Hoare, Sir Samuel. See Great Britain
- Hoffman, Clare E. W. Chasan and E. Jack; S.....131; see also E.....252
- Hoffmeister, A.
Festung Europa; Ct.....683
Out of sorrow joy; out of death, victory; Ct.....445
Total victory; Ct.....264
Winterhilfe; Ct.....349
- Holcomb, Guy, dropped from the WPB; EP.....250
- Holland
Mussert, A. J. Joesten; S.....190
- Holland Elmer J., attacks defeatist propaganda of the McCormick-Patterson newspapers; EP.....142; see also 348; EP.....363
- Hollywood. See Moving pictures
- Horlings, Albert
Hawaii's 150,000 Japanese; S.....69; see also EP.....62; C.....120; C.....140
- Housekeeping in France. A. Pallavicini; S. 10
- Huerta, Antonio
How to help France; S.....263
- Huestis, Charles Herbert
Letter on the radio ban against the co-operatives; C.....492; see also E.....363; EP.....699
- Hull, Cordell. See United States-State department
- Humphries, Rolfe
Swallow pamphlets, the; S.....176
- Hungary
Eckhardt, T., resigns as leader of the Independent Hungary group; reorganization in progress to gain support of the Association of democratic Hungarians; EP.....83
Relations with Rumania at breaking point over Transylvanian question. E. Kovacs; S.....72; see also C.....120 Reluctant to send more troops to the Russian front. E. Kovacs; S.....72; see also C.....120
- Hutchison, Betsy
Literature for children; S.....547
- Hutchison, Keith
Cash savings and taxes; S.....652
Congress hamstringing the treasury's tax program; proposals for a tax on spending developed; S.....33; see also EP.....142; EP.....202; EP.....225; EP.....252; EP.....362; EP.....398
Co-ops on the march; S.....295
Forty-hour week and the manpower problem; S.....513; see also EP.....462; EP.....495
Farm bloc and the wheat surplus, the; S.....74; see also EP.....21, 42; S.....28
Nazi and United Nations problems of transport and supply; S.....114
Next step in the scrap campaign; S.....373
Railroad profits threatened by rate cuts and union demand for wage increases; S.....717
- Ruml pay-as-you-go plan, the; S.....237; see also C.....359
- Salary ceiling and the "new poor", the; S.....573
- Tax victory for business, a; S.....450
- ### I
- I wuz robbed. G. Highet; S.....581
- Iberian bloc; Spain and Portugal sign pact to keep both countries out of war; EP.....698
- Ickes, Harold L.
Battle of oil, the; S.....86
- Ige, Thomas H.
Comments on "Hawaii's 150,000 Japanese" by A. Horlings; C.....120; see also 69; EP.....62
- In the wind.....14, 34, 53, 75, see also C.....140, 94, 115, 133, 152, 173, 193, 214, 238, 270, 296, 342, 374, 417, 451, 474, 514, 545, 574, 614, 653, 679, 718
- In which we serve. J. Agee; MP.....727; see also EP.....603
- Independent Hungary. See Hungary
- India
All-India congress expected to ratify Gandhi's civil disobedience campaign for independence; EP.....102
Ambedkar, Dr. B. R., appointed minister of labor; EP.....23
America can help to solve the Indian problem. F. L. Schuman; C.....180
Azad's position. L. Fischer; S.....230, 255; see also.....501, 619
Bose, S., in Bangkok; EP.....300
British censor news of strikes and unrest; EP.....251
Churchill's speech on Anglo-Indian relations. F. Kirchwey; S.....224; see also.....230, 255; EP.....251
Communist party legalized; opposes civil disobedience campaign as harmful to anti-axis front; EP.....102
Gandhi and the war; E.....63; see also CT.....544
Gandhi's rejected offer. L. Fischer; S.....145; see also E.....144; 172; C.....200; C.....248
Have either of the patients regained consciousness? Low; Ct.....544
Japanese Burma army reported moving on Bengal; EP.....102
Jinnah's position. L. Fischer; S.....185, 230; see also Ct.....544
Khan, Sir Firoz Noon, appointed minister of defense; EP.....23
Letter from Gandhi to Chiang Kai-shek.....411
Means it. L. Fischer; S.....185
Nationalists and the British government seek a new working formula; Gandhi declares that Anglo-American forces are necessary to defend India; EP.....23
Nehru. L. Fischer; S.....121; see also.....501, 538, 619
Rajagopalachari, C. R. L. Fischer; S.....230; see also.....538
Solution of the Indian problem, a. B. Russell; C.....200; see also 145; E.....144; 172; C.....248
What Gandhi wants. L. Fischer; S.....121; see also EP.....123
Why Cripps failed. L. Fischer; S.....230, 255; see also 224; C.....280; C.....359; 501; 538; 619
- Industry. See Business
- Inflation. See Business
- Ingersoll, Ralph
His deferment from army service opposed by appeasers; EP.....22
- Ireland
Friend or enemy? R. W. Pence; C.....427
- Italians in the United States
Enemy-alien status removed from Italian nationals in this country. F. Kirchwey; S.....401; see also.....476, 477; C.....555
- Italy
Churchill predicts Italian cities will feel brunt of allied air power; EP.....602
Distrusted by the Germans. Argus; S.....713
Fascism compared with German nazism. Argus; S.....685
Free Italian legion, a. R. Pacciardi; S.....299
Italian casualties on the Russian front; EP.....446
Italian people and the war, the. M. T. Maestro; C.....100; see also C.....160
Reported occupied by 300,000 German troops; EP.....602
Twenty years of fascism.....443
- ### J
- Jack, Esther, and W. Chasan
Hoffman, Clare E., of Michigan; S.....131
- Janie. J. W. Krutch; D.....278
- Japan
And the Soviet Union. See Japanese-Soviet relations
- Cabinet shakeup; foreign minister Tojo resigns; EP.....202
- Prisoner of the Japanese. J. B. Powell; S.....335
- See also Chinese-Japanese war; War, Pacific
- Japanese-American war. See War, Pacific
- Japanese-Soviet relations
Japanese cabinet shakeup may presage attack on Siberia; EP.....202
Japanese mass troops in northern Manchuria and along Soviet Outer Mongolian borders; EP.....62
Will there be war? D. W. Mitchell; S.....106
- Jeanneney, Jules. See France
- Jeffers, William M. See Rubber
- Jews
Anti-semitism a factor in Congress's opposition to President's request for emergency tariff powers; EP.....602
France orders deportation of thousands; EP.....330; see also EP.....183; 345
Murder of a people; E.....668
Prisoners in North Africa may be released by American army; EP.....493, 633; see also EP.....665; E.....700
Refugees: burden or asset? K. R. Grossmann; S.....708
State department grants visas to 5,000 refugee children in France; EP.....400
World Jewish congress reports million killed by the nazis; EP.....4
- Jinnah, Mohammed Ali. See India
- Joesten, Joachim
Gallery of Quislings, a; S.....190
- Jones, Jesse H., seeks to regain control of purchase of critical materials abroad. I. F. Stone; S.....671
- Jordy, William H.
Magazines are loud, the; S.....235
- Jordy, William H., and W. Chasan
Representative Hamilton Fish; S.....415
- Journalism. See Newspapers
- Jugoslavia. See Yugoslavia
- Julian, Joseph
Jim Crow in the A.E.F.; S.....610; see also EP.....399; C.....459
- Justice, department of
Arnold, T. offers patents bill intended to ease action against patent monopolists; EP.....103
Attacked for its anti-trust suit against the Associated press; E.....463 Investigation shows Dies committee charges against 1119 government employees to be unfounded; EP.....184, 223
- ### K
- Kaiser, Henry
Life with. B. Taper; S.....644
N.L.R.B. begins hearings on charge of illegal closed-shop agreements with A.F. of L. unions; EP.....563
See also War Effort
- Khan, Sir Firoz Noon. See India
- Kingdon, Frank
Endorses J. I. Bennett for New York governor; EP.....363
- Kiralfy, Alexander
Defense will lose the Near east; S.....6; see also E.....4
- Kirchwey, Freda
Are we fighting to defend the empire? S.....433
Boom launched to name W. Willkie as New York gubernatorial candidate; S.....3
Churchill's speech on Anglo-Indian relations; S.....224; see also.....230, 255; EP.....251
Darlan: America's first Quisling; S.....529
Darlan and American liberals; S.....559; see also C.....694; S.....696
Dies tells almost all; S.....44; see also EP.....63
Egypt: the taste of defeat; the need for a Western European front; S.....25
Franco changes the guard; the new cabinet changes; S.....205
Hapsburg hopes; S.....401; see also C.....492; 559; EP.....562; E.....606; C.....662
Hitler on the defensive; S.....334
Life's open letter to the people of Britain; S.....365; see also.....433; 478
Norris, George W.; S.....702
On the diplomatic front; S.....365
President's advisers, the; S.....84
Roosevelt will lose popular leadership to Willkie unless he speaks more boldly on the war; S.....670
Stalingrad and Dieppe; S.....254
Strategy of reprisal, the; S.....466
Toward a break with Vichy; S.....65
Trendless primaries, the; S.....144
Western front-talk and reality; S.....105
What Dies is up to; S.....309
- Kluttz, Jerry
Pity the federal employee; S.....643
- Korea
Our ally. S. C. Menefee; S.....509

- Kough, Blachford
Defends the Darlan deal; C.....694;
see also ..... 559
- Kovacs, Eugen
Hitler's quarreling puppets; S.....72;
see also C..... 120
- Kramer, Dale
Farmers vs. the Farm bureau; S.....28;
see also EP.....21; EP.....42; S..... 74
- Kramer, Dale, and S. J. Harris
Brooks, C. Wayland, of Illinois; S..... 150
- Kraus, H. Felix
Protests formation of an Austrian legion under Otto; C.....662; see also 401;
C.....492; 559; EP.....562; E..... 606
- Krell, Eddie
Defends the Darlan deal; C.....696;
see also ..... 559
- Krock, Arthur
Attributes Brazil's declaration of war to efforts of our State department;
EP ..... 183
- Kronenberger, Louis
Peacock, Thomas Love; S..... 134
Woolf, Virginia, as critic; S..... 382
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
Open letter on critics and criticism, an;
S ..... 95
- Reviews of plays:
Beat the band..... 458
Bird in hand..... 458
Chocolate soldier, the..... 79
Damask cheek, the..... 598
Eve of Saint Mark..... 425
Great big doorstep, the..... 659
Hello out there..... 357
Janie..... 278
Laugh, town, laugh..... 18
Let freedom sing..... 425
Magic..... 357
Merry widow, the..... 79
Morning star..... 278
Mr. Sycamore..... 598
Pirate, the..... 659
Skin of our teeth, the..... 629
Star and garter..... 18
Stars on ice..... 58
Strip for action..... 425
Vickie..... 307
Without love..... 553
Yankee point..... 629
Holiday check-list..... 692
- Kunze, Gerhard Wilhelm, Bund leader, arrested in Mexico; EP..... 23
- L
- L.B.S.
British reaction to American Negro troops; C.....459; see also EP.....399; 610
- Labor
Casualties since December 7th; Ch.... 676
Forty-hour week and the manpower problem, the. K. Hutchison; S.....513;
see also EP.....462; EP..... 495
Lacks representation on the WPB; E..... 104 Men and machines idle as a result of shortages of essential materials;
EP.....82; see also EP..... 142
National association of manufacturers charges increase in strikes; WLB and Roosevelt refute their statement;
EP ..... 331
Pity the federal employee. J. Klutz;
S ..... 643
Unemployment rises among New York garment workers as government contracts go to southern non-union shops;
EP ..... 24
- Wages
Affected by President's stabilization order; E..... 332
Auto union will cancel no-strike agreement if salary ceiling is repealed;
EP ..... 667
Congress clique urges repeal of salary ceiling; EP..... 667
Little steel workers seek pay increase,
E ..... 43
Order limiting salaries to $25,000 fails to curb unearned income; EP..... 462
Railway workers seek pay increase. K.
Hutchison; S..... 717
Salary ceiling and the "new poor," the.
K. Hutchison; S..... 573
Should they be frozen? E.....43;
see also EP..... 62
WLB upholds principle of equal pay for equal work for men and women;
EP ..... 635
Women in war industries; Ch..... 268
- Labor party, American. See American labor party
- Labor relations board. See National labor relations board
- Labor unions
A.F. of L. fights NLRB hearings on the Kaiser shipyard case as harmful to war production; EP..... 563
And Admiral E. S. Land; EP..... 430
- And the manpower problem. T. Foyle;
S ..... 472
- Behind the delay in A.F.L.-C.I.O. negotiations for labor unity; E.....164;
see also EP..... 495
- Discrimination against Negroes in the
A.F. of L. J. Wechsler; S.....409;
see also E..... 464
- Discrimination against Negroes in the railway brotherhoods. S. La Follette;
S ..... 675
- Lewis and the A.F. of L. J. A. Wechs-
ler; S ..... 409
- Mr. Petrillo's hopeless war. C. Williams; S.....291; see also EP..... 103
- Murray charges employers are flooding the WLB with minor disputes by refusal to arbitrate with union representatives; EP ..... 495
- Proposal for a United nations trade union committee; E ..... 226
- La Follette, Suzanne
Discrimination against Negroes in railway employment; S ..... 675
- Is there a rubber shortage? S..... 111
- Lam, Wilfredo; gouaches. C. Greenberg; A..... 659
- Land, Admiral Emory S.
"Explains" his speech on shooting organizers; EP ..... 430
Should be removed if charges of Maritime commission collusion with private interests in purchase of vessels is proved;
EP ..... 463
- Lang, Paul Henry
On music critics. B. H. Haggin;
M ..... 426, 458, 490
- Largo Caballero, Francisco, seized by nazis; to be returned to Franco; EP..... 527
- Latin America
Brazil declares war on Germany; other
Latin American countries may follow;
EP ..... 162
Her Trojan horse. M. A. Seoane; S..... 507
Hispanidad. A. Bernal; Ct..... 507
- Latin American council of the Free world association formed to seek severance of ties between Argentina, Chile, and the axis; EP..... 398
- Reaction to Roosevelt's announcement that we will help restore Spain's cultural monuments; EP.....182; see also EP..... 181
- Reports on, by H. Callender, attacked by Brooklyn Tablet; EP..... 362
- Welles, S., exposes nazi activities in Argentina and Chile. F. Kirchwey; S..... 365
See also names of countries
- Laugh, town, laugh. J. W. Krutch; D..... 18
- Laugier, Henri
Article III of the Atlantic charter;
S.....650; see also ..... 677
- Comments on "World war III?" by J.
Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 13
- Laval, Pierre. See France
- Leahy, Admiral William Daniel, named Roosevelt's chief of staff. F. Kirchwey; S..... 84
- Lederman, Minna
France's turncoat artists; A..... 169
- Lee, Joshua
Tacks prohibition rider to teen-age draft bill; EP.....430; see also ..... 505
- Leistikow, Gunnar
German pressure on Scandinavia; S..... 412
- Invasion of Europe via Norway; S..... 93
- Lend-lease act. See United States—And the war
- Let freedom sing. J. W. Krutch; D..... 425
- Lewis, John L.
And the A.F. of L. J. A. Wechsler;
S ..... 409
- Libbey, Frederick S., dismissed from War production board; EP.....162; see also EP..... 182
- Liberties, civil. See Civil rights
- Libya. See War, African
- Lieff, Peter
Comments on "New deal for stockholders" by M. H. Greenberger; C.....662;
see also ..... 534
- Life
Its open letter to the people of Britain.
F. Kirchwey; S.....365, 433; 478
- Life begins at 8:30. J. Agee; MP..... 727
- Lin Yu-tang
Warns that China cannot hold out indefinitely without adequate plane aid;
E ..... 700
- Literature
France's turncoat writers. M. Leder-
man; S ..... 169
- G. E. F. (Ilium). J. Sayre; S..... 479
- M., W., F. at 10. L. Trilling; S..... 546
- On rereading the modern classics. J.
O'Brien; S..... 579
- Open letter on critics and criticism, an.
J. W. Krutch; S..... 95
- Peacock, Thomas Love. L. Kronenber-ger; S..... 134
- Poe as a literary critic. E. Wilson;
S ..... 452
- Tacitus now. L. Trilling; S..... 153
- Woolf, V., as critic. L. Kronenberger;
S ..... 382
- Livesay, J. F. B.
Comments on "The facts about a second front" by D. W. Mitchell; C.....247;
see also ..... 186
- Living age; publishers arrested as unregistered agents of Japan. R. H. Rovere;
S ..... 234
- London Tribune
Editorial on the Darlan deal..... 711
- Long, Breckinridge. R. Bendiner; S..... 107
- Lore, Ludwig, death; EP..... 43
- Louis-Conn fight, the; EP..... 283
- Low, cartoons
"Have either of the patients regained consciousness?"..... 544
"How much for this lot?"..... 233
"May I walk into your parlour?"..... 344
Outlook, the..... 294
Pincers tactics..... 710
"Stop those imposters"..... 642
- Lowenstein, Rosette S.
Attacks the Darlan deal; C.....694;
see also ..... 559
- M
- M. W. F. at 10. L. Trilling; S.....546;
see also ..... 728
- Maas, Melvin J. See War, Pacific
- Macbeth. Haggin B. H.; M..... 693
- Madagascar
British forces advance on capital; EP... 222
- Magazines
Competition causes streamlining of America's leading magazines. W. H. Jordy;
S ..... 235
See also names of magazines
- Mager, Harold
War and cheap money; S.....188; see also C..... 247
Workers in uniform; S..... 341
- Magic, J. W. Krutch; D..... 357
- Mandelbaum, Arthur
European travelogue—1942; S..... 259
- Mandellaub, Max
Road to Lublin, the; S..... 345
- Mangabeira, Octavio
Comments on "World war III?" by J.
Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 32
- Mann, Thomas
Order of the day; S..... 379
- Mannerheim, Baron Carl Gustaf. See Finland
- Manpower. See War effort
- Marcus, J. Anthony
Letter on "Nelson's fourth try"; C.....160;
see also E..... 64
- Maritime commission
Accused of collusion with private interests in purchase of vessels; EP..... 463
- Cancels Higgins corporation's ship contracts; EP.....63; 82
- Marshall, Margaret
Norton, W. W., reports to the American booksellers' association on the war-time decline in literary production; S.... 54
- Martin, Flahavhan
Post-war worriers; C..... 247
- Martin, Kingsley
Briton's notes on America, a; S..... 640
- Talking of India; S.....538; see also .....224, 230, 255
- Martintique
Continues to broadcast pro-Axis propaganda; EP..... 603
- Robert, Admiral G., states policy toward Vichy.....576; see also EP..... 562
- Mason, Noah Morgan, and the Dies committee. C. Van Devander; S..... 324
- Massachusetts
Church control versus birth control. E.
L. Belisle; S..... 568
- Matthews, J. B.—the informer. R. H. Ro-vere; S.....314; see also C..... 396
- McCormick, Robert Rutherford, and the Chicago Tribune. G. Williams; S.....348;
see also EP.....142; EP..... 363
- McDonald, James G.
Criticizes The Nation's position on American dealings with Darlan; C.....600;
see also .....529; 532; 559
- McNutt, Paul V. See War effort—Manpower
- Mead, James M. See New York state
- Mead, Margaret
When do Americans fight? S..... 368
- Medicine
Cooperative medical group forced to disband under pressure of American medical association; EP..... 495
- Mediterranean sea. See War, European
- Meiklejohn, Alexander
Congress and the people; S..... 469
- Menefee, Selden C.
Our Korean allies; S..... 509
- Merry-go-round. C. Carrier; P..... 482
- Merry widow, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 79
- Mexico
Home front and national unity, the.
H. Block; S..... 406
- Wallace's speech on United States-Mexican relations; EP..... 251
- Michelson, Elmer
Japanese girl's reaction to internment, a;
C ..... 427

Mihailovich, General Draja. See Yugoslavia
Militant, barred from mails; EP..... 635
 Military training. See Selective service
 Mirkovich, Nicholas
   Nedich, Serbia's Quisling; C..... 631
   Removal of enemy-alien restrictions from Italians also affects Yugoslavs under Italian rule since the first world war;
   C.....555; see also.....401, 476, 477
 Mitchell, Donald W.
   After Stalingrad; S..... 339
   Campaigns in Egypt and on the Don; chances for a second front, the; S..... 46
   Can we win with planes? S..... 480
   Deadlock in the Pacific; the need for a unified command; S..... 566
   Facts about a second front, the S.....186;
   see also C..... 247
   Japan's second front; S..... 106
   Navy at its best, the; S..... 716 North African offensive—"the end of the beginning"; S..... 536
   Shipyards versus U-boats; S.....148; see also Ch..... 149
   Solomons campaign, the S..... 229
   War in Russia takes a turn toward victory for the United Nations; S..... 651
   What our services have learned since
   Pearl Harbor; S..... 404
 Molek, Ivan
   Comments on M. T. Maestro's letter regarding present attitude of the Italian people; C.....160; see also C..... 100 Money
   War and cheap money. H. Mager;
   S.....188; see also C..... 247
 Monopolies
   And the steel shortage; E..... 124
   Oil, rubber, chemical, and alcohol trusts oppose House committee bill for a farm rubber agency to produce synthetic rubber. I. F. Stone; S.....85; see also
   E.....104; EP..... 124
   Pressure being exerted on the Senate patents committee to ease its investigation of patent monopolies; EP..... 103 Standard oil and synthetic rubber "know-how." I. F. Stone; S..... 227
 Morning star. J. W. Krutch; D..... 278
 Morrison, Herbert. See Great Britain
 Moving pictures
   Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. B. H.
   Haggin S..... 39
   "For whom the bell tolls" censored to please the Franco dictatorship; E..... 668;
   see also..... 722
   France's collaborationist stars. M. Leder-
   man; S..... 169
   Hays office censors British documentary film for profanity; EP..... 603
   Hollywood and the war. E. Goodman;
   S..... 213
   Nazi film on Dieppe raid received coldly
   in Lisbon and Zurich; EP..... 224
   On film criticism. J. Agee; S..... 727
   Reviews. See Agee, J.
 Mr. Sycamore. J. W. Krutch; D..... 598
 Muñoz Grande, General Augustin. See Spain
 Murray, Philip. See Congress of industrial organizations
 Murray, James E.
   New dealer opposed for reelection to Senate by Montana Republicans; supported by labor; E..... 332
 Murrow, Edward
   Evaluates the appointment of Darlan in North Africa; EP.....527; see
   also.....529, 532
 Music (articles by B. H. Haggin)
   Aiken, Webster..... 693
   Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo..... 39
   Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"..... 728
   Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet".....426,
   458, 490; see also..... 554
   Brahms..... 219
   Composers in the Soviet union..... 159
   Music critics.....426, 458,
   490
   New opera company performs "Boris Godunov"..... 599
   New opera company performs "Macbeth"..... 693
   New opera company performs "Vie parisienne"..... 599
   Recorded. See Haggin, B. H.
   Schnabel recital..... 599
   Shostakovich's seventh symphony.....138,
   159; see also C.....180; C..... 280
   "Survey" courses for students.....728;
   see also..... 546
   Szigeti recital of Mozart and Beethoven..... 554
   Toscanini and the Viennese tradition... 307
   Toscanini performance of "Romeo and Juliet" not to be broadcast..... 554
 Mussert, Adrian. See Holland
 Mussolini, Benito. See Italy
 Muste, A. J.
   Pacifists being trained for civilian postwar reconstruction work; C..... 492 Mythology; western imagination in the making. I. Edman; S..... 239

N

N. L. R. B. See National labor relations board
 Nadj, Konstantin. See Yugoslavia
Nation, The
   Announces increase in size..... 697
   New weekly section on political war;
   EP.....143; 263
   Sponsors dinner for Senator Norris. F.
   Kirchwey; S..... 702
 National association of manufacturers charges increase in strikes; denials issued by
 WLB and Roosevelt; EP..... 331
 Attacks Wallace's "century of the common man" speech. I. F. Stone; S..... 639
 National defense. See War effort
 National labor relations board
   Opens hearings in Kaiser shipyard case;
   EP..... 563
 Naumoff, Benjamin
   Letter on the radio ban against the cooperatives; C.....492; see also E.....363;
   EP..... 699
 Nazism. See Fascism and nazism; Germany
 Near East
   Will be lost through defensive tactics. A.
   Kiraify; S.....6; see also E..... 4
 Nedich, General Milan. See Yugoslavia
 Negrin, Juan
   Axis radio reports him in North Africa aiding American army; EP..... 698
   Free Spain; S.....375; see also C..... 631
 Negroes
   Discrimination against, in railways, employment. S. La Follette; S..... 675 Fighting for white folks? H. R. Cayton; S..... 267
   Jim Crow in the A.E.F. J. Julian;
   S.....610; see also EP.....399; C..... 459
   Jim Crow in Washington. C. Gagnier;
   C..... 428
   Memorial planned for Dr. G. W. Carver.
   P. Pilant; C..... 632
   Missouri pays for segregation. S. R.
   Redmond; C..... 428
   Poll tax and filibuster. J. L. Reynolds;
   S.....410; see also EP.....463;
   E.....528; EP..... 666
   Poll-tax bill killed by Senate vote on cloture; EP..... 561
   Randolph, A.P., asks end of discrimination against, by A.F. of L. unions J.
   A. Wechsler; S.....409; see also E..... 464
   Randolph charges lack of government action to check discrimination; asks that Committee on fair employment practices be restored to independent status;
   EP..... 604
   Survey Graphic publishes special issue on status of; EP..... 563
   Waller, O., executed in Virginia; E..... 24
   World war and color lines. M. S.
   Dworkin; C..... 663
 Nehru, Jawaharlal. See India
 Nelson, Donald. See War effort—War production board
 New Guinea. See War, Pacific
 New opera company
   "Boris Godunov." B. H. Haggin; M... 599
   "Macbeth." B. H. Haggin; M..... 693
   "Vie parisienne." B. H. Haggin; M... 599
 New York state
   Alfange, D., advances a ten-point creed for a war-time governor; EP..... 399
   American labor party achieves defeat of J. J. Bennett, anti-New Deal candidate. R. Bendiner; S..... 497
   American labor party nominates D. Al-fange for governor; EP.....161;
   see also..... 166
   Bennett, J. J. endorsed by F. Kingdon for governor; Union for democratic action backs D. Alfange; EP..... 363 Committee formed to defeat H. Fish in congressional elections. J. H. Causey;
   C..... 100
   Dewey, T. E., receives Republican gubernatorial nomination; EP.....161; see
   also..... 166
   Elections—1942 and 1944. D. Dubinsky;
   S..... 436
   Farley picks a loser. W. Chasan;
   S.....166; see also EP..... 161
   I. a Guardia supports D. Alfange for governor; EP..... 331
   Mead, J. M., enters gubernatorial race; anti-New dealers campaign for either
   Dewey or Bennett; E..... 83
   Move to nominate W. Willkie as gubernatorial candidate. F. Kirchwey; S... 3
   President Roosevelt endorses J. J. Bennett for governor; EP..... 331
   Roosevelt hedges the gubernatorial primary campaign; Mead defeated by Bennett; EP.....161; see also..... 166
 Newspapers
   Anti-trust suit against the Associated press; E..... 463
   Appeasers fight draft deferment of R.
   Ingersoll; EP..... 22

British, on the political aspects of the
 war..... 648
 German morale and the German press.
 Argus; S..... 618
 Congressman Holland attacks defeatist propaganda of the McCormick-Patterson press; EP.....142; see also
 348; EP..... 363
 War department publicity staff reduced as result of unfounded story of air marker plot; EP..... 143
 Niehuhr, Reinhold
   Comments on "World war III?" by J.
   Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 32
 Nolte, Rosa
   Repeat the exclusion act; C..... 220
 Norris, George W.
   Defeated for reelection to the senate.
   R. Bendiner; S..... 497
   His career in Congress. F. Kirchwey;
   S..... 702
   Should receive letters of gratitude from American voters. J. O. Grundy; C... 600
 Norton, W. W.
   Reports to the American booksellers' association on war-time decline in literary production. M. Marshall; S..... 54
 Norway
   Intensification of terror may be Hitler's first move toward annexation. G.
   Leistikow; S..... 412
   Invasion via. G. Leistikow; S..... 93
   Nazi garrisons reported in jittery state, fearing allied invasion; EP..... 361
   Nazis institute reign of terror in the Trondheim district following acts of sabotage; EP..... 361
   Quisling, V. J. Joesten; S..... 190
 Novels. See Books

O

OPA. See Business—Inflation
 Objectors, conscientious. See Selective service O'Brien, Justin
   On rereading the modern classics; S.... 579 O'Daniel, W. Lee. W. Whitman; S.....48;
 see also EP.....42; E..... 252
 Office of price administration. See Business—
 Inflation
 Office of strategic services
   Personnel and aims. I. F. Stone;
   S.....565; see also..... 297
 Office of war information
   Davis, E., obtains partial victory in informing public of progress on spy trials; EP..... 41
   Davis, E., reports to American people on our aid to the allies and June production schedules; EP.....123; see also..... 297
 Oil
   Impending scarcity, the; E..... 364
   Meeting the oil shortage. H. L. Ickes;
   S.....86; see also EP..... 603
   Russian lives and oil patents. I. F.
   Stone; S.....261; see also E..... 284
   Standard, and the rubber "know-hows."
   I. F. Stone; S..... 227
 One morning the world woke up. O.
 Williams; P..... 116
 Order of the day. T. Mann; S..... 379
 Ortiz, Roberto M. See Argentina

P

PM
   Appeasers fight draft deferment of R.
   Ingersoll; EP..... 22
 Pacciardi, Randolph
   Free Italian legion, a; S..... 299
 Paintings. See Art
 Pallavicini, Amo
   Housekeeping in France; S..... 10
 Pascoe, Colonel Samuel
   Attacks the Darlan deal; C.....694; see
   also..... 559
 Pavelich, Ante. See Yugoslavia
 Peacock, Thomas Love. L. Kronenberger;
 S..... 134
 Pegler, Westbrook
   Sees Mrs. Roosevelt's London trip as part of plan to plot the overthrow of the American system; EP..... 462 Pence, R. W.
   Ireland—friend or enemy? C..... 427
 Pepper-Geyer bill. See Poll tax
 Perkins, Milo. See War effort—Board of economic warfare
 Peters, Eric
   News suppression in Germany; Ct..... 171
 Petrillo, James Caesar. See Labor unions Peyrouton, Marcel, behind Darlan. P. Winkler; S..... 705
 Philadelphia Record
   Commended for its reports on the rubber problem; EP..... 331
 Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.
 Pilant, Richard
   Memorial for Dr. G. W. Carver; C.... 632

- Pirate, the J. W. Krutch; D..... 659
 Plays. See Krutch, J. W. (for reviews)
 Poems
 Autonomous. M. Van Doren..... 614
 Dulce et decorum est pro Batten, Barton,
 Durstine et Osborne mori. H. Wouk... 471
 For a first birthday. G. Barker..... 580
 Merry-go-round. C. Carrier; P..... 482
 One morning the world woke up. O.
 Williams..... 116
 Soliloquy. I. Edman..... 582
 Poetry
 Swallow pamphlets, the. R. Humphries;
 S..... 176
 Pol, Heinz
 What to tell Germany; S..... 371
 Poland
 Nazis slaughter Jews; E..... 668
 Political war
 Aims of the new Nation section
 EP.....143; 263
 American progressives—your hour..... 475
 Argentine deputies vote to sever relations with the axis; EP..... 346
 Article III of the Atlantic charter. H.
 Laugier; S.....650; see also..... 677 Babcock, E., opens war on the anti-inflation measures; EP..... 346
 Biddle's order on Italian aliens. C.
 Sforza; S.....476; see also 401; 477;
 C..... 555
 Bose, S., in Bangkok; EP..... 300
 British press on political aspects of the
 war..... 648
 Compulsory democracy in France..... 539
 Coronation in Madrid. L. Quintanilla;
 Ct..... 377
 Czecho-Slovak parties pass resolution voiding the stipulations of the Munich
 pact; EP..... 266
 Darlan deal, the; a crisis of confidence.
 J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 615 Darlanism and Britain (article from the London Tribune)..... 711
 Democracy's new allies. L. Quintanilla;
 Ct..... 617
 European youth congress; E..... 298
 Festung Europa. A. Hoffmeister; Ct..... 683
 "Fortress Europe." J. Alvarez del
 Vayo; S.....682; see also..... 713 Franco news correspondent allowed to enter United States despite his anti-
 American dispatches; EP..... 266
 Free Italian legion, a. R. Pacciardi; S..... 299
 Free Spain. J. Negrin; S.....375; see
 also C..... 631
 Gallup poll of blood in Germany, a. P.
 Hagen; S..... 540
 Gandhi to Chiang Kai-shek..... 411
 German and Italian dictatorships compared, the. Argus; S..... 685
 German distrust of the Italians. Argus;
 S..... 713
 German morale and the German press.
 Argus; S..... 618
 German morale and the North African offensive. Argus; S..... 575
 Goebbels' latest propaganda line; E..... 343
 Goebbels' propaganda on the fate of German children planned by the allies;
 E..... 378
 Goering promises the German people food from Europe's harvest. Argus; S..... 414 Hemingway, E., proposes post-war sterilization of Germans. Argus; S.....510;
 see also C..... 696
 Hitler's new role..... 650
 Hitler's speech..... 539
 How to help France. A. Huerta; S..... 263
 Intellectuals versus Goebbels, the. Argus;
 S..... 446
 Italian casualties on the Russian front;
 EP..... 446
 Life in Germany in the fourth year of war. Argus; S..... 542
 Martinique and Vichy..... 576
 Mihailovich and the partisans. R. Bates;
 S.....577; see also C..... 662
 More power to Himmler; E..... 265
 Nazi propaganda on allied aid to Russia..... 265
 Nazi propaganda seeks to split the allies.
 Argus; S..... 478
 Need for an Inter-allied political council.....475; see also E.....297;
 New "Fourth international", the..... 685
 Nordic race, the. Bendix; Ct..... 413
 Our Korean allies. S. C. Menefee; S..... 509
 Political value of German emigration... 616
 Poor de Gaulle..... 542
 Pressure on Scandinavia. G. Leistikow;
 S..... 412
 Radio falange; E..... 714
 Radio squadrons for the United Nations armies of invasion. A. Reuther; S..... 444 Road to Lublin, the. M. Mandellaub;
 S..... 345
 South American Trojan horse. M. A.
 Seoane; S..... 507
 Spain and North Africa..... 511
 Spain's "neutrality"..... 576
 Spain's zero hour? J. A. del Vayo; S..... 647 Spanish refugees in France refuse to work for the nazis; EP..... 414
 Switzerland is not neutral; E..... 377
 Total victory. A. Hoffmeister; Ct..... 264
 Turkey's "active neutrality." E..... 344
 Twenty years of fascism in Italy..... 443 Waffen S.S.; Germany's elite political police. Argus; S.....649; see also
 EP..... 666
 War, Americana. L. Fischer..... 510
 Willkie, W., political warrior; EP..... 378
 Poll tax
 And filibuster. J. L. Reynolds; S.....410;
 see also EP.....463; E.....528; EP..... 666
 And the execution of O. Waller; E..... 24
 Bill killed by Senate vote on cloture;
 EP..... 561
 Portugal
 Signs pact with Spain to keep both countries out of war; EP..... 698 Powell, J. B.; editor of China weekly review returns from Far east; EP..... 202 Prisoner of the Japanese; S..... 335
 Press. See Newspapers
 Press, freedom of. See Freedom of the press
 Prices. See Business
 Profits. See Business Prohibition
 Can Volstead stage a comeback? W.
 Chasan; S..... 505
 Rider tacked to teen-age draft bill; EP... 430
 Propaganda
 Hollywood and the war. E. Goodman;
 S..... 213
 How to talk to Hitler's Europe. G. Sal-vemini; S..... 50
 Nazi film on Dieppe raid received coldly
 in Lisbon and Zurich; EP..... 224
 Our short-wave broadcasts to foreign countries. S. J. Rundt; S..... 210
 Radio falange; E..... 714
 See also Political war
 Pruitt, Ida
 Facts on the Chinese industrial coopera-tives; C.....555; see also E.....333
 C.....459; EP..... 463
 Public finance. See Finance, public Pucheu, Pierre, quits Vichy to join Darlan in North Africa. P. Winkler; S..... 704
 Q
 Queipo de Llano, General. See Spain
 Quintanilla, Louis
 Coronation in Madrid; Ct..... 377
 Democracy's new allies; Ct..... 617
 Quisling, Vidkun. See Norway
 R
 Radio
 Columbia and National commercial rights prevent broadcast of Toscanini performance of "Romeo and Juliet." B. H.
 Haggin; M..... 554
 Cooperative league refused radio time by two major networks; E.....363; see also C.....492; EP..... 699
 Darlan controls, in North Africa; EP... 665
 How to talk to Hitler's Europe. G.
 Salvemini; S..... 50
 Mr. Petrillo's hopeless war. C. Wilnams; S.....291; see also EP..... 103
 Our short-wave broadcasts to foreign countries. S. J. Rundt; S..... 210
 Spanish broadcasts; E..... 714
 Squadrons for the United Nations armies of invasion. A. Reuther; S..... 444
 What to tell Germany. H. Pol; S..... 371
 Railroads
 Discrimination against Negroes in railway employment. S. La Follette; S... 675 Profits threatened by rate cuts and union demand for wage increases. K. Hutcherson; S..... 717
 Rajagopalachari, Chakravarti R. See India
 Randolph, A. Philip. See Negroes
 Random harvest. J. Agee; MP..... 727
 Rationing
 Congress's failure to appropriate sufficient funds accounts for lack of general rationing system; EP..... 667
 Failure to apply promptly results in acute shortages of meat, dairy products, and canned goods; EP..... 667
 Nation-wide gasoline curb; EP.....603;
 see also 86; E..... 364
 Should be applied to foods as soon as shortages are anticipated; E..... 637
 Wickard, C. R., named food administrator for entire country; E..... 637
 Ravaged earth. J. Agee; MP..... 727
 Recorded music. See Haggin, B. H.
 Redmond, S. R.
 Missouri segregation; C..... 428
 Refugees
 Burden or asset? K. R. Grossmann; S... 708
 French deport thousands of Jews; American state department issues few visas;
 EP.....330; see also EP.....183; 345
 Funds sought to obtain transportation for,
 to this hemisphere. E. K. Barsky; C... 524 German, should think now about postwar solution for Germany..... 616 Largo Caballero, F., seized in France for return to Spain; EP..... 527
 Many may be released from North African labor battalions by American offensive; EP.....493; see also EP.....633;
 EP.....665; E..... 700
 Rojo, General V., Spanish refugee in Argentina, urges formation of Spanish loyalist legion to fight in North Africa;
 EP..... 527
 Spanish, refuse to work for Hitler; EP... 414
 State department grants visas to 5,000 children in France; EP..... 400
 Vichy to hand Spanish over to Hitler or Franco; EP..... 143
 Reid, Frank C.
 Defends the Darlan deal; C.....694;
 see also..... 559
 Religion and democracy. E. Hiemann; C... 491
 Republican party
 Boom launched to name W. Willkie as
 New York gubernatorial candidate. F.
 Kirchwey; S..... 3
 Dewey, T. E., nominated as candidate for governor of New York state; EP..... 161 National committeemen rally to Willkie as vote-getter; W. W. Schroeder, anti-Willkie candidate for chairman, is defeated by H. E. Spangler; EP..... 634
 Return of Heinrich Fromm, the. F. Seyd;
 S..... 289
 Reunion on the left. R. Bates; S.....441;
 see also C..... 631
 Reuther, Alix
 Radio squadrons for the United Nations armies of invasion; S..... 444
 Reynolds, J. Lacey
 Poll tax and filibuster; S.....410; see also EP.....463; E..... 528
 Riesel, Victor, and W. Chasan
 Winrod, Gerald B.; S..... 7
 Rights, civil. See Civil rights
 Robert, Admiral Georges. See Martinique
 Rock, John M.
 Attacks the Darlan deal; C.....696; see
 also..... 559
 Rodman, Selden
 Comments on B. H. Haggin's discussion of the Shostakovich seventh symphony;
 C.....280; see also S.....138; 159;
 C..... 180
 Rojo, General Vincente. See Spain—Refugees
 Roman catholic church
 Church control versus birth control. E.
 L. Belisle; S..... 568
 French clergy hostile to the Vichy regime; EP..... 251
 Reverend R. J. Gannon repudiates his pre-Pearl Harbor isolationism and calls for fullest prosecution of the war; EP... 362 Rommel, Field Marshal Erwin. See War —African Roosevelt, Eleanor
 Accused by W. Pegler of visiting England to plot the overthrow of the American system; EP..... 462
 Roosevelt, Franklin Delano Administration
 And the Willkie mission. I. F. Stone;
 S..... 403
 Announces plan to restore Spain's cultural monuments; EP.....181; 182
 Bungles the New York state gubernatorial campaign; EP.....161; see also
 166; EP..... 331
 Criticizes Congress for investigating matters which are not for layman.
 I. F. Stone; S..... 338
 Criticizes officials for defeatist speeches.
 I. F. Stone; S..... 338
 Leahy, Admiral W. D., named President's chief of staff. F. Kirchwey;
 S..... 84
 One year after Pearl Harbor. I. F.
 Stone; S..... 639
 Possible cabinet shift, a; EP..... 601 President's advisers, the; F. Kirchwey; S..... 84
 Promises action to prevent inflation;
 EP.....183; see also E.....204;
 EP..... 252
 Tour of war plants. I. F. Stone; S... 338
 Will lose popular leadership to Willkie unless he speaks more boldly on the war. F. Kirchwey; S..... 670
 Rosinski, Herbert
 How Africa changed the war; S..... 612
 Rovere, Richard H.
 J. B. Matthews—the informer; S.....314;
 see also C..... 396
 Smyth, J. H., arrested as agent of Japan; S..... 234
 Rubber
 And Standard oil. I. F. Stone; S... 366
 Baruch report on synthetic rubber. I. F.
 Stone; S.....227, 366; see also EP... 331

- House committee proposes a farm rubber agency for the use of farm products to produce synthetic rubber. I. F. Stone; S....85; see also E....104; EP.....124; EP.....699
- Is there a shortage? S. La Follette; S....111
- Jeffers, W. M., named WPB rubber administrator; EP.....249; see also E....401
- Jeffers and the Soviet rubber processes; EP.....331; see also EP.....699
- Our needs and supplies; Ch.....112
- Russian offer to make their synthetic rubber formula available rejected by our officials. I. F. Stone; S.....227
- Rumania
- Relations with Hungary at breaking point over Transylvanian question. E. Kovacs; S.....72
- Ruml, Beardsley. See Finance, public
- Rundt, Stefan J.
- What our short-wave broadcasts to foreign countries should say; S....210; see also.....50
- Russell, Bertrand
- Solution of the Indian problem, a; C....200; see also EP....144; 145; 172; C.....248
- Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Russo-German war
- African campaign may prove helpful to the Russians. D. W. Mitchell; S....651
- After Stalingrad. D. W. Mitchell; S....339
- Battle for the Caucasus, the. D. Mitchell; S.....46
- Battle of Stalingrad takes a grave turn; Russians open their own second front at Rzhev; EP.....182
- Churchill, W., in Moscow; prospect of military aid to Russians in Caucasus; EP.....141
- Drains nazi man-power; Hitler calls for increased military aid from his allies. E. Kovacs; S....72; see also.....167
- Epic of Stalingrad, the. F. Kirchwey; S.....254
- Fall of Rostov jeopardizes cause of the United Nations; EP.....81
- German drive gravely endangers Stalingrad; EP.....162
- Germans appear hopeful of transferring troops from Stalingrad to the Caucasus front; EP.....361
- Germans held at Grozny; occupy Novorossisk; EP.....201
- Germans within a hundred miles of the Grozny oil fields; EP.....162
- Hitler's 1942 campaign fails to put Russia out of the war; EP.....162
- Intensity of Stalingrad battle abates; nazis may be hoping to stabilize the Volga front; EP.....361
- Japanese troop concentrations in northern Manchuria and on the borders of Outer Mongolia suggest possible Japanese attack on Siberia; EP.....62
- Moscow partially responsible for American over-optimism about the Russian struggle; Caucasus offensive offers the opportunity for opening of a western front; EP.....41
- Moving Russia's industry to the east. A. R. Williams; S.....570
- Nazi attacks at Stalingrad slacken; Germans thrust toward Ordzhonikidze in the Caucasus; EP.....461
- Nazis drive deep wedge in Timoshenko's southern lines; EP.....41
- Nazis take Maikop oil fields and drive on Grozny; Russians hold at Stalingrad and launch counter-drive at Voronezh; EP.....123
- Outlook, the. Low; Ct.....294
- Pincers tactics. Low; Ct.....710
- Reaches stage favorable to the United Nations. D. W. Mitchell; S.....651
- Red army opens third offensive in the middle Don area; EP.....698
- Russian offensive may trap nazi army before Stalingrad; EP.....561
- Russian planes bomb eastern Germany; EP.....201
- Russians retreat in orderly fashion as nazis drive on Stalingrad; EP.....61
- Stalingrad defenders still hold; Germans advance west of the city; EP.....201
- Stalingrad fight upsets the nazi timetable; EP.....222
- Will Japan attack the Soviet Union? D. W. Mitchell; S.....106
- See also World war.—Second front
- S
- S. K. Private
- What are you fighting for, soldier? C....220
- Sabotage. See Espionage
- Sachs, Curt
- Music and music critics. B. H. Haggin; M.....490
- Salaries. See Labor—Wages
- Salvemini, Gaetano
- Biddle's order on Italian aliens; S....477; see also 401; 476; C....555
- How to talk to Hitler's Europe; S....50; see also.....210
- Saturday Evening Post, streamlined. W. H. Jordy; S.....235
- Sayre, Joel
- G. E. F. (Ilium); S.....479
- Scavenius, Eric. See Denmark
- Schnabel; recital. B. H. Haggin; M.....599
- Schroeder, Werner W. See Republican party
- Schuman, Frederick L.
- America can help to solve the Indian problem; C.....180
- Scott, Admiral Norman, killed in action. D. W. Mitchell; S.....716
- Selective service
- And prohibition. W. Chasan; S....505; see also EP.....430
- And the industrial man-power crisis; E....286; see also E.....400
- Appeasers fight draft deferment of R. Ingersoll; EP.....22
- Changes in draft classifications; E....5
- Confusion in our draft policy; the necessity for balancing military and production man-power needs; E.....203
- Essential war workers drafted despite theoretical exemption; EP.....252
- Income-tax exemption proposed for army privates; EP.....42
- Pacifists being trained for civilian post-war reconstruction work. A. J. Muste; C.....492
- Placed under the control of manpower coordinator, P. V. McNutt; E.....637
- Should writers be exempted from the draft? M. Marshall; S.....54
- Teen-age draft bill crippled by riders; EP.....430, 431
- Truman committee offers a manpower program; E.....528
- What are you fighting for, soldier? Pvt. S. K.; C.....220
- See also United States—Army
- Seoane, Manuel A.
- South American Trojan horse; S.....507
- Serbia. See Yugoslavia
- Seyd, Felizia
- Return of Heinrich Fromm, the; S....289
- Sforza, Carlo
- Biddle's order on Italian aliens; S....476; see also 401; 477; C.....555
- Comments on "World war III?" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....13
- Shaw, Gardiner Howland. R. Bendiner; S....107
- Shipley, William S. named to Smaller war plants corporation. J. A. Marcus; C....160; see also E.....64
- Shostakovich's seventh symphony. B. H. Haggin; M.....138, 159; see also C....180; C.....280
- Siberia. See Japanese-Soviet relations
- Sikorsky, Igor, urges increased use of helicopters for aerial warfare. H. Hazlitt; S.....129
- Silver
- Bill introduced for outright repeal of the silver purchase act; EP.....282; see also EP.....666
- Singh, Anup
- Answers B. Russell on India; C....248; see also C.....200
- Skin of our teeth, the. J. W. Krutch; D....629
- Skoropadsky, Paul, Hitler's puppet. J. Joesten; S.....190
- Smaller war plants corporation. See War effort—Contracts
- Smyth, Joseph Hilton, arrested as unregistered foreign agent. R. H. Rovere; S.....234
- Social security
- Beveridge plan, the; E.....636; see also E.....669
- Soliloquy. I. Edman; P.....582
- Solomon islands. See War, Pacific
- Somervell, General Brehon Burke
- Versus small business. I. F. Stone; S....403
- Soong, Dr. T. V. See World war—Post-war reconstruction
- South, the
- Award of government contracts to southern garment operators creates a labor shortage; EP.....24
- Southern senators battle efforts to bring anti-poll-tax bill to a vote; EP....463; see also 410; E....528; EP.....561
- South Africa
- Political situation. J. P. Cope; S.....673
- South America. See Latin America
- Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Spain
- And North Africa. 511; see also EP....634
- And the Darlan deal. F. Kirchwey; S.....559
- Coronation in Madrid. L. Quintanilla; Ct.....377
- For a free republic. J. Negrin; S....375; see also C.....631
- Franco admits active opposition within the country, but defends superiority of totalitarian system; EP.....62; see also EP.....634
- Franco changes the guard; the new cabinet. F. Kirchwey; S.....205
- Franco in Hollywood; "For whom the bell tolls" censored to please Spain's dictator; E....668; see also.....722
- Franco places General Queipo de Llano under "forced residence" in newest clash between the army and the phalanx; EP.....23
- How much of an ally is Franco? EP....634
- London foreign office and American state department reported working on plan for Spanish provisional government with aim of restoring the monarchy; E....104; see also C.....360
- Maintains her "neutrality".....576
- May figure in Hitler's plans to close the Straits of Gibraltar; EP.....525
- Muñoz Grande, General A., commander of Spanish forces in Russia, hailed on return; EP.....698
- Radio falange; E.....714
- Refugees
- American army in North Africa may free prisoners; EP.....493, 633; see also EP.....665; E.....700
- Largo Caballero, F., delivered to Franco; EP.....527
- Refuse to work for Germany; EP.....414
- Rojo, General V., in Argentina, urges formation of Spanish loyalist legion to fight in North Africa; EP.....527
- Vichy reported ready to turn Spanish over to Hitler or Franco; EP.....143
- Signs pact with Portugal to keep both countries out of war; military chiefs accompany Spanish delegation; EP....698
- Travelogue—1942. A. Mandelbaum; S....259
- United States to help restore cultural monuments and encourage Spanish tourist trade; EP.....181, 182
- Zero hour, the? J. A. del Vayo; S....647
- Spangler, Harrison E. See Republican party
- Spry, Graham
- British reply to Louis Fischer, a; S....501; see also.....230, 255; 619
- Stace, W. T.
- Letter on L. Fischer's series on India; C.....280; see also S....121, 145, 185, 230, 255
- Stalingrad. See Russo-German war
- Standard oil company
- And synthetic rubber "know-hows." I. F. Stone; S.....227, 366
- Star and garter. J. W. Krutch; D.....18
- Starnes, Joseph, and the Dies committee. C. Van Devander; S.....324
- Stars on ice. J. W. Krutch; D.....58
- Steel
- Bethlehem steel company abandons Sparrow's Point and Los Angeles plant projects despite crucial steel shortage; E.....124
- Big steel ties up flow of raw materials to smaller companies; EP.....142
- Improper allocation of, results in severe shortages and cancellation of urgent ship contracts; EP.....63, 82
- Independent operators unable to obtain plant amortization certificates from WPB committees despite steel shortage; E.....124
- Little steel workers demand wage increase; E.....43
- Next step in the scrap campaign. K. Hutchison; S.....373
- Shortage affects employment in war industries; EP.....142
- Stephan, Max, convicted of treason for aid to German flier escaped from Canada; EP.....23
- Sternberg, Fritz
- Germany's waning manpower; S.....167
- Stimson, Henry L., and the Louis-Conn fight; EP.....283
- Endorses Otto for Austrian legion; E.....606; see also 401; C.....492, 559; EP.....562; C.....662
- Stix, Walter H.
- Defends the Darlan deal; C.....694; see also.....532
- Stone, I. F.
- Anti-labor activities of P. Boal, American minister to Bolivia; S.....703; see also.....671
- Anti-Wallace plot, the; S.....671
- Baruch report on synthetic rubber; S....227, 366; see also EP.....331
- Bill for total war, a; S.....531; see also EP.....603
- Brass-hat production; S.....607; see also EP.....603; E.....638
- Fighting the Fighting French; S....500, 565; see also E.....495; 559
- General Somervell versus the smaller war plants; S.....403
- It's not a laissez-faire war; S.....467

- Loss of L. Henderson, the; S.....703;
see also EP.....698
One year after Pearl Harbor; S.....639
People's war—or monopoly's? S.....85;
see also E.....104; E.....124
Praise for R. Bard; S.....338
President's tour of war plants, the; S.....338
Roosevelt criticizes officials for defeatist speeches; S.....338
Roosevelt versus Congressional investigating committees; S.....338
Russian lives and oil patents; S.....261;
see also E.....284
Washington and the North African offensive; S.....500
Washington's forbidden topic: the second front; S.....435;
see also .....287
Willkie and F. D. R.; S.....403
- Straight, Michael
Comments on "World war III?" by J.
Alvarez del Vayo; S.....12
- Strikes
Auto union will cancel no-strike agreement if salary ceiling is repealed;
EP.....667
Increase in, charged by NAM; EP.....331
Strip for action. J. W. Krutch; D.....425
- Supreme court, United States
Refuses civil court standing to eight nazi saboteurs; EP.....103
- Survey Graphic; special issue on status of Negroes; EP.....563
- Sweden
Hitler increases his pressure. G. Leistikow; S.....412
Uneasy over possibility of European invasion via Norway. G. Leistikow; S.....93
- Switzerland
Is not neutral; E.....377
Travelogue—1942. A. Mandelbaum; S.....259
Szigeti, Joseph; recital of Mozart and Beethoven. B. H. Haggin; M.....554
- T
- Tacitus now. L. Trilling; S.....153
Talmadge, Eugene. See Georgia
Taper, Bernard
Life with Kaiser; S.....644
- Tariff
Post-war economic agreement between Canada and the United States; EP...635
President's request for emergency powers to suspend provisions of, meets delay in Congress; EP.....602
- Taxation. See Finance, public
Tchelitchew, Pavel; exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.....522
- Tenor, Theodore A.
Second front at Dakar; C.....427
- Thailand
Thai patriots abroad lose their nationality. M. C. Chetna; C.....100
- Theater. See Krutch, J. W. (for reviews)
Thomas, John Parnell, and the Dies committee. C. Van Devander; S.....324
- Tobruk. See War, African
Tojo, Hideki. See Japan
Tolan committee. See War effort
Toscanini and the Viennese tradition. B. H.
Haggin; M.....307
- Totalitarian states. See Fascism and nazism;
Germany; Italy; Japan
- Trade. See Business
Trade agreements
Canadian-American post-war economic agreement signed; EP.....635
- Trilling, Lionel
M. W. F. at 10; S.....546;
see also .....728
Tacitus now; S.....153
- Truman committee. See War effort—Contracts
- Tuka, Bela. See Czecho-Slovakia
- Turkey
Activity of the German embassy; E....344
Continues her "active neutrality"; E....344
"May I walk into your parlour?" Low;
C.....344
- U
- U.S.S.R. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Unemployment. See Labor
Unhyphenated America. J. Barzun; S.....194
Union for democratic action
Asks F. Kingdon to take a leave of absence following his endorsement of Bennett for New York governor; adopts resolution favoring Alfange;
EP.....363
Issues pamphlet on the Chicago Tribune;
EP.....363
Smeared as a "communist organization"
by the Dies committee; EP.....2
Sponsors dinner for Senator Norris. F.
Kirchwey; S.....702
- Union of soviet socialist republics
And Great Britain. See Anglo-Soviet relations
And Japan. See Japanese-Soviet relations
And the United States. See United States—And the Soviet Union Russia's industrial development; how factories have been moved to the rear.
A. R. Williams; S.....570
Russo-German war. See Russo-German
war
Shostakovich's seventh symphony. B.
H. Haggin; S.....138, 159;
see also C.....180; C.....280
Stalin letter to Associated Press demands that Allies live up to obligations;
EP.....329
- Unions, labor. See Labor unions
United automobile workers
Threaten to cancel no-strike agreement if salary ceiling is repealed; EP.....667
- United States
And China
Anglo-American extra-territorial privileges come to an end. F. Kirchwey; S.....365;
see also EP.....163
Lin Yu-tang warns that China cannot hold out indefinitely without plane aid; E.....700
Pressure of United China relief on Chinese cooperatives seen harmful;
E.....333;
see also C.....459; EP.....463; C.....555
And France. See Franco-American relations
And India
We can help to solve the Indian problem. F. L. Schuman; C.....180
And Japan. See War, Pacific
And Mexico
Wallace's speech on United States-
Mexican relations; EP.....251
And Spain
African war behind American appeasement efforts; EP.....182
How much of an ally is Franco;
EP.....634; see also .....500;
559
New cabinet changes will not improve
Spanish-American relations. F.
Kirchwey; S.....205
President's letter to Franco guarantees respect for Spanish neutrality.....511 President Roosevelt announces plan to restore Spain's cultural monuments; EP.....182
State department reported to have prepared plan for Spanish provisional government with aim of restoring monarchy; E.....104;
see also C.....360
United States must break with fascist
Spain; EP.....62
And the Soviet Union
Bradley, Major General F., arrives in Moscow to discuss American air aid to Russia; EP.....123
Capital thoughts on a second front.
I. F. Stone; S.....287
Japanese occupation of Aleutian islands raises the problem of new supply routes to Russia; EP.....62
Russian lives and oil patents. I. F.
Stone; S.....261; see also E.....284
Russian offer to make their synthetic-rubber formula available rejected by United States officials. I. F. Stone;
S.....227
Test for the rubber administrator lies in his handling of aid for Russia;
EP.....331
And the war
American Fourth of July; EP.....1 Bard, R. A., declares America is still losing; EP.....282
Casualties in the armed forces and in the labor force; Ch.....676 Laissez faire thinking responsible for planlessness in war production. I. F.
Stone; S.....467
Lend-lease shipments for the North
African offensive; EP.....527
Losses of merchant vessels; Ch.....149
Office of war mobilization bill is a proposal for total war. I. F. Stone;
S.....531
One year after Pearl Harbor. I. F.
Stone; S.....639
Our policy of drifting endangers postwar world reconstruction. I. F.
Stone; S.....565; see also .....559
Plans for a ten-million man army may indicate American attitude of "America first"—after which the Allies can be helped; EP.....362 President's report on lend-lease aid to the allies; E.....253;
see also S.....261
What our services have learned since
Pearl Harbor. D. W. Mitchell;
S.....404
- When do Americans fight? M. Mead;
S.....368
See also War, African; War, Pacific;
World war
- Army
And civilian manpower; E.....400
Are we to have a ten-million man army? EP.....362
Casualties; Ch.....676
Jim Crow in the A.E.F. J. Julian;
S.....610; see also EP.....399; C.....459
Manpower proposals indicate plans to fight alone. I. F. Stone; S.....435
Teen-age draft bill crippled by riders;
EP.....431
What it has learned since Pearl Harbor. D. W. Mitchell; S.....404
See also Selective service
- Briton's notes on America, a. K. Martin; S.....640
Congress. See Congress
Constitutional crisis. A. Meiklejohn;
S.....469
- Navy
At its best. D. W. Mitchell; S.....716
What it has learned since Pearl Harbor. D. W. Mitchell; S.....404
See also War, Pacific
Our Beveridge plan; E.....669;
see also E.....636; EP.....667
- State department
I. Cordell Hull—The great anachronism. R. Bendiner; S.....66
II. Old Welles and the new, the;
S.....87
III. Assistant secretariat, the; S.....107
IV. Why the cow is sacred; S.....126
Anti-labor activities of P. Boal, American minister to Bolivia. I. F.
Stone; S.....703; see also .....671
Darlan deal, the. See Franco-American relations
Grants visa to Franco news correspondent despite his anti-American dispatches; EP.....266
Grants visas to 5,000 refugee children in France; EP.....400
Hull's speech on our war aims. F.
Kirchwey; S.....84
Its attitude toward Latin America.
F. Kirchwey; S.....365
Krock, A., credits efforts of department for Brazil's entry into the war; EP.....183 May back "Free Austrian" legion headed by Otto. F. Kirchwey;
S.....401;
see also C.....492; EP.....562; 559;
E.....606; C.....662
Some officials would leave Franco in control and establish monarchy in Italy. I. F. Stone; S.....500
Stalls Russia on aviation gas and oil processes. I. F. Stone; S.....261;
see also E.....284
United States supreme court. See Supreme court, United States
- V
- Vail, Laurence, and J. Cornell: Objects and bottles. C. Greenberg; A.....727
Vallin, Charles, quits the Vichy regime;
EP.....250
- Vambery, Rustem
Comments on "World war III?" by J.
Alvarez del Vayo; S.....12
Toward peace on the Danube; S.....293;
see also .....91
- Van Devander, Charles
Dies committee—four to three; S.....324;
see also C.....427
- Van Doren, Mark
Autonomous; P.....614
- Vaughan, David B.
Sues M. Dies for libel. F. Kirchwey;
S.....44; see also EP.....63
- Vayo, Julio Alvarez del. See Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
- Vichy. See France
Vickie. J. W. Krutch; D.....307
Villard, Oswald Garrison
Protests evaluation of congressmen on the basis of their voting records;
EP.....563
- Vincent, Merle D.
Answer to the Dies committee, an; C.....459
- Virginia
Waller, O., executed; E.....24
- Visas. See Refugees
Voorhis, H. Jerry, and the Dies committee.
C. Van Devander; S.....324;
see also C.....427
- W
- WLB. See War Labor Board
Wages. See Labor
Walker, George R.
Comments on H. Mager's "War and cheap money"; C.....247;
see also .....188

- Wallace, Henry Agard
Anti-Wallace plot, the. I. F. Stone; S ..... 671
His "century of the common man" speech attacked by the NAM. I. F. Stone; S ..... 639 Speech on United States-Mexican relations; EP ..... 251
- Waller, Odell
Executed in Virginia; E ..... 24
- War, African American attitude toward the Fighting French. I. F. Stone; S ..... 559
see also .....
American campaign should become a major front. I. F. Stone; S ..... 500
And German morale. Argus; S ..... 575
And Spain's position ..... 511;
see also EP ..... 634
Anglo-American offensive opens, the; E ..... 495
Anglo-American offensive marks the "end of the beginning." D. W. Mitchell; S ..... 536 Battle in Tunis-Bizerte area proves formidable; EP ..... 561;
see also EP ..... 634
Behind American appeasement efforts toward Spain; EP ..... 182
British open drive to crush Rommel; EP ..... 429
British step up air attacks on Rommel's lines in Egypt; EP ..... 461
British throw Rommel back to his starting point; EP ..... 201
British win El Agheila; allies won air superiority; EP ..... 666 Crisis of confidence. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S ..... 615
Dakar won without bloodshed through Darlan deal; EP ..... 561 Defense will lose Egypt. A. Kiralfy; S ..... 6;
see also E ..... 4
Democracy's new allies. L. Quintanilla; Ct ..... 617
Formation of Spanish loyalist legion to aid allies urged; EP ..... 527
German reinforcements arriving in Tunis; may signal a new blow elsewhere; EP ..... 525
Giraud, General H. H. recognized as responsible for civil and military affairs in French North Africa; E ..... 495
How Africa changed the war. H. Ronsinski; S ..... 612
Importance of the Middle eastern campaign, the. D. Mitchell; S ..... 46
May prove helpful to the Russians. D. W. Mitchell; S ..... 651
Nazis spread rumors of possible Allied attack on Dakar in order to obtain control of French colonies themselves; EP ..... 397
Our offensive can liberate anti-fascist refugees of trans-Saharan railway labor battalions; EP ..... 493;
see also EP ..... 633; EP ..... 665; E ..... 700
Rommel abandons six Italian divisions in his Egypt retreat; EP ..... 493
Rommel receives limited reinforcements; Hitler gives priority to the eastern front; EP ..... 61
Stalingrad diverts German aircraft from Egyptian front; EP ..... 201
Taste of defeat. F. Kirchwey; S ..... 25
See also Franco-American relations
- War effort
Armament production faces slow-down because of steel, aluminum, and copper shortage; EP ..... 102
Bethlehem steel company abandons Sparrow's Point and Los Angeles plant projects despite crucial steel shortage; E ..... 124
Big steel's responsibility for bottle-neck in arms production; EP ..... 142
Board of economic warfare
Byrnes, J. F., appointed director. I. F. Stone; S ..... 338
Cohen, B. V., appointed chief counsel. I. F. Stone; S ..... 366
Established by presidential order to fight inflation; E ..... 332
Jones, J. H., attacks the expenditures of the board; answered by Wallace and M. Perkins. I. F. Stone; S ..... 671
Brass-hat production; the struggle between military and civilian agencies for production control. I. F. Stone; S ..... 607;
see also EP ..... 603; E ..... 638
Building "hull 440" at the Kaiser yard. B. Taper; S ..... 644
Casualties in the labor force; Ch ..... 676
Conscription. See Selective service
- Contracts
Nelson, D. M., names Smaller war plants corporation to spread war contracts to "little businessmen"; E ..... 64;
see also EC ..... 104; C ..... 160; 701
- Somervell, General B. B., vs. the smaller war plants. I. F. Stone; S ..... 403
- Truman committee urged to investigate cancellation of Higgins ship contract; EP ..... 63, 82
- Unemployment rises among New York garment workers as government contracts go to southern operators; EP ..... 24
- Dollar-a-year men are loyal to their corporations. J. Henle; S ..... 209
- Helicopters for victory. H. Hazlitt; S ..... 129
- Laissez faire thinking responsible for planlessness; Tolan committee report. I. F. Stone; S ..... 467
- Manpower
Americans can't be "frozen." T. Foyle; S ..... 472
And selective service; E ..... 203; EP ..... 252; E ..... 286; E ..... 400; E ..... 528; E ..... 400
And the forty-hour week. K. Hutchison; S ..... 513;
see also EP ..... 462; EP ..... 495
C.I.O. offers a plan; EP ..... 699
Crisis, the; E ..... 286
House committee on defense migration finds no need for legislation on compulsory labor placement; EP ..... 252
How to ration it; E ..... 400
Labor conscription. H. Mager; S ..... 341
McNutt, Paul V., becomes coordinator of civilian and military; E ..... 637
Need for a program to overcome vital shortages; E ..... 203
Pity the federal employee. J. Kluttz; S ..... 643
Planning versus laissez faire. I. F. Stone; S ..... 467
Regulation freezing men to jobs appears imminent; E ..... 332
Roosevelt's speech indicates a stiffening attitude toward the problem; EP ..... 362
Truman committee offers a program; E ..... 528
- Men and machines idle as a result of shortages of essential materials; EP ..... 82
Monopoly and the steel shortage; E ..... 124
Monthly production of warplanes; Ch ..... 499
Nelson reports June production lag still showing in July; threatens to "get tough"; EP ..... 162;
see also EP ..... 182
- Office of price administration. See Business—Inflation
- Office of war information reports to American people on our aid to the allies; EP ..... 123
- Office of war mobilization bill proposes consolidation of war agencies into a single organization. I. F. Stone; S ..... 531;
see also EP ..... 603
- Oil shortage and the question of rationing. H. L. Ickes; S ..... 86;
see also E ..... 364; EP ..... 603
- Pepper-Tolan-Kilgore war mobilization bill should be passed; EP ..... 603;
see also ..... 531
- President's tour of production centers, the. I. F. Stone; S ..... 338
- Pressure being exerted on Senate patents committee to ease its investigation of patent monopolies impeding defense production; EP ..... 103
- Price control. See Business
- Production and losses of American merchant vessels; Ch ..... 149
- Rationing. See Rationing
- Rubber. See Rubber
- Scrap
Campaign hindered by dispute between government agencies. EP ..... 399
Next step in the scrap campaign. K. Hutchison; S ..... 373
- Strikes. See Strikes
- Taxes. See Finance, public
- Useless cargoes. H. Clarke; S ..... 715
- War production board
"Baruch men" reported in control. I. F. Stone; S ..... 366
Blames army and navy for wastage of critical defense materials; EP ..... 102
Dollar-a-year steel men tie up flow of raw materials to smaller companies; EP ..... 142 Eberstadt, Ferdinand, is boomed by army as successor to Nelson. I. F. Stone; S ..... 607;
see also 366; 607; E ..... 638
Fails to involve small businessmen in the war production program; E ..... 104
Favors steel monopoly by refusing plant amortization certificates to independent operators; E ..... 124
Has no labor representation in its setup; E ..... 104
Holcomb, G., dropped from staff; EP ..... 250
Jeffers, W. M., named rubber administrator; EP ..... 249
- Libbey, F. S., dismissed for criticism of big steel operators; EP ..... 162;
see also EP ..... 182
- Men with private interests in the industries under their jurisdiction impede our all-out effort; E ..... 104
- Nelson is responsible for lack of aid to small business plants; E ..... 701;
see also E ..... 64; E ..... 104; C ..... 160
- Nelson seeks to regain production powers he gave to the army. I. F. Stone; S ..... 607;
see also EP ..... 603; E ..... 638
- Personnel changes leave the board in the hands of big business; EP ..... 249
- Shakeup in the iron and steel division; EP ..... 182; see also EP ..... 162
- Wilson, C. E.; his powers; EP ..... 249;
see also 366; 607; E ..... 638
- Women in war industries; Ch ..... 268
- War, European
Churchill sees it ended before Pacific war; EP ..... 602
"Fortress Europe." J. Alvarez del Vayo; S ..... 682; see also Ct ..... 683, 713
Hitler eyes Spain and the Straits of Gibraltar; EP ..... 525
Murder of the Jews; E ..... 668
Nazi film on Dieppe raid received coldly in Lisbon and Zurich; EP ..... 224
New "Fourth internationale." the ..... 685
RAF steps up raids over Western Europe; Nazis fear air offensive as preliminary to opening of a second front; EP ..... 101
Rebuilding the Danube basin. A. Basch; S ..... 91; see also ..... 293
Russian bombers raid eastern Germany; EP ..... 201
Second front. See World war—Second front
- Total victory. A. Hoffmeister; Ct ..... 264
- War at sea: shipyards vs. U-boats. D. W. Mitchell; S ..... 148; see also Ch ..... 149
See also Yugoslavia
- War labor board
Adopts formula for the national stabilization of wages; EP ..... 62;
see also E ..... 43
Flooded with minor disputes as employers refuse to arbitrate with union representatives; EP ..... 495
To pass on steel workers' demand for pay increase; E ..... 43
- War, Pacific
Aleutian islands
Americans occupy Andreanof islands; EP ..... 330
Japanese extend their hold; our air force hampered by bad weather; EP ..... 22
Japanese occupation of western islands threatens our supply route to Siberia; EP ..... 62
All-out aerial offensive against Japanese cities urged; E ..... 184
And the problem of united leadership; E ..... 432; see also EP ..... 494
Churchill promises English aid to help finish off Japan; EP ..... 602
Criticism by Representative Maas; EP ..... 526
Japan's second front. D. W. Mitchell; S ..... 106
Navy issues full report on the losses at Pearl Harbor; EP ..... 635
- New Guinea
Allied gains may result in Japanese abandoning campaign for Port Moresby; EP ..... 330
Allies move against Buna; EP ..... 494
Campaign complemented by that of Solomons; EP ..... 494
Japanese advance on Port Moresby; EP ..... 222
One year of war. D. W. Mitchell; S ..... 566
Shipping requirements necessary to defeat the Japanese. P. M. Zeis; S ..... 26
- Solomon islands
American marines gain foothold in Tulagi area; EP ..... 141
American positions improved; Japanese suffer heavy losses; EP ..... 494
Americans score in the air and on the sea; EP ..... 183
Analysis of the campaign. D. W. Mitchell; S ..... 229
Campaign complemented by that of New Guinea; EP ..... 494
Halsey, Admiral W. F., replaces Admiral Ghormley in naval leadership; E ..... 432
Japanese attack near the Stewart islands is beaten back; EP ..... 461
Japanese attacks on Guadalcanal airport beaten off; EP ..... 222
Japanese harass American positions at Tulagi and Guadalcanal; EP ..... 330 Japanese increase attacking force at Guadalcanal; EP ..... 398

- Navy routs Japanese fleet northeast of Guadalcanal; EP..... 461
- Navy wins second round of the battle for the Solomons; EP..... 526
- Our navy at its best in fifth sea battle. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 716
- Stalemate sets in. A. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 566
- What our services have learned since Pearl Harbor. D. W. Mitchell; S..... 404
- Will Hawaii's 150,000 Japanese remain loyal to the United States? A. Horlings; S.....69; see also EP....62; C....120; C.... 140
- Warne, Colston
Protests R. Rovere's reference to Consumers Union in his article on J. B. Matthews; C....396; see also..... 314
- Washington letter; articles by I. F. Stone; 85, 227, 261, 287, 338, 366, 403, 435, 467, 500, 531, 565, 607, 639, 671... 703
- Wechsler, James
Dies committee's "investigations," the; S..... 326
- Lewis and the A.F. of L.; S..... 409
- Randolph, A. P., asks end of discrimination against Negroes by A.F. of L. unions; S.....409; see also E..... 464
- Weinstein, Jerome
Proposes tax on spending. K. Hutchison; S.....33; see also EP..... 202
- Welles, Sumner. See Latin America; United States—State department
- When do Americans fight? M. Mead; S... 368
- White, Leigh
Replies to criticism by N. J. Cassavetes of his article "Whom does the Greek king represent?"; C..... 40
- Whitman, Willson
Dies—Background of a demagogue; S... 311
- Senator W. Lee O'Daniel of Texas; S.....48; see also EP....42; E..... 252
- Wickard, Claude R. See Rationing
- Williams, Albert Rhys
Country that moved, the; S..... 570
- Williams, Charles
Mr. Petrillo's hopeless war; S.....291; see also EP..... 103
- Williams, Greer
I worked for McCormick; S.....348; see also EP..... 363
- Williams, Oscar
One morning the world woke up; P.... 116
- Willkie, Wendell L.
And the 1944 presidential election. I. F. Stone; S..... 403
- Asks for clear statement of war aims in Toronto speech; EP..... 602
- Calls for the defeat of H. Fish in the November elections. F. Kirchwey; S..... 144
- Greets General de Gaulle on Free French week; EP..... 22
- His camp victorious at Republican meeting to elect a national chairman; EP... 634
- His radio report to the nation; EP.... 429
- Move to nominate him as gubernatorial candidate in New York. F. Kirchwey; S..... 3
- Political warrior; EP..... 378
- Pricks American complacency. F. Kirchwey; S..... 365
- Urges opening of second front in Europe; EP..... 281
- Will gain popular leadership unless the President speaks more boldly on the war. F. Kirchwey; S..... 670
- Wilner Seymour J.
Comments on K. Hutchison's "There ain't no Santa!"; C.....359; see also..... 237
- Wilson Charles E., becomes vice-chairman of the WPB; EP.....249; see also 366; 607; E..... 638
- Wilson, Edmund
Protests inaccurate quotation of his letter by W. Burnett in "This is my best"; C..... 556
- Poe as a literary critic; S..... 452
- Winkler, Paul
Men behind Darlan, the; S..... 704
- Winrod, Gerald B. W. Chasan and V. Riesel; S..... 7
- Wintringham, Tom
Left builds a new political movement in Britain; S..... 608
- Wireless. See Radio
- Without love. J. W. Krutch; D..... 553
- Woolf, Virginia, as critic. L. Kronenberger; S..... 382
- World war
American progressives—your hour.475; see also E.....297; 677
- And political censorship in Britain and America; E..... 563
- Are we fighting to defend the Empire? F. Kirchwey; S.....365, 433; see also..... 478
- Brazil declares war against Germany; EP..... 162
- Can we win with planes? D. W. Mitchell; S..... 480
- Churchill predicts long, hard war; says Italy will feel the brunt of our air power; EP..... 602
- Churchill sees European war ended first; promises aid thereafter to America against Japan; EP..... 602
- Compacency of the United Nations. F. Kirchwey; S..... 365
- Confidence in the United Nations impaired by politics of the North African campaign. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S... 615
- Defense will lose the Near east. A. Kiralfy; S....6; see also E..... 4
- Democracy's new allies. L. Quintanilla; Ct..... 617
- Free Italian legion, a. R. Pacciardi; S..... 299
- Gandhi on India's position..... 411
- Geopolitical front, the. G. A. Borgese; S..... 206
- Hitler eyes Spain and the Straits of Gibraltar; EP..... 525
- Hitler's speech strikes a defeatist note; EP.....493; see also..... 539
- How Africa changed the war. H. Rosinski; S..... 612
- Nazi and United nations problems of transport and supply. K. Hutchison; S..... 114
- Need for Allied political and military unity with leaders who have the trust of the people. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 165
- Need for an inter-allied political council....475; see also E.....297; 677
- New order, the; numbers of persons killed by the occupation forces; Ch... 52
- No neutrals today; E..... 377
- One war, one command. G. Cant; S.....677; see also EP....123; E.....297; 475; 650
- People's war—or monopoly's? I. F. Stone; S.....85; see also E.....104; E..... 124
- Post-war reconstruction
American trial balloons and the four freedoms. I. F. Stone; S..... 565
- Article III of the Atlantic charter. H. Laugier; S.....650; see also..... 677
- Comments on "World war III?" by J. Alvarez del Vayo.....12; 30; see also C.....60; C..... 80
- Concentrate on winning the war. F. Martin; C..... 247
- Rebuilding the Danube basin. A. Basch; S.....91; see also..... 293
- Soong, Dr. T. V., urges real machinery for collective security; EP..... 527
- United States should begin to store supplies for the European countries which fight Hitler. G. Salvemini; S..... 50
- What about Germany?..... 616
- Willkie demands statement of war aims in Toronto speech; EP..... 602
- Prisoners and reprisals. F. Kirchwey; S..... 466
- Radio squadrons for the United Nations armies. A. Reuther; S..... 444
- Second front
And Ireland. R. W. Pence; C..... 427
- At Dakar. T. A. Tenor; C..... 427
- British again warn the French to evacuate coastal areas; EP..... 281
- British trade union congress resolution refers second-front problems to the military; E..... 226
- Can we create one? D. W. Mitchell; S.....186; see also C..... 247
- Churchill reveals differences with Stalin on question of ocean transport; EP..... 222
- Churchill's visit to Moscow may pre-empt offensive in Western Europe; EP..... 141
- Fall of Rostov increases agitation for a second front; EP..... 81
- Fear by nazis as RAF steps up raids over Western Europe; EP..... 101
- For a second front now. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 45
- Invasion via Norway. G. Leistikow; S..... 93
- Nazi propaganda on allied aid to Russia..... 265
- Need for, and a united command. F. Kirchwey; S.....25; 105
- Our army manpower plans appear to indicate postponement of offensive. I. F. Stone; S..... 435
- People of Europe await the attack in the West. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 165
- Russian-British disagreement on the interpretation of the Anglo-American second-front statement; EP..... 250
- Ships and new fronts. P. M. Zeis; S... 26
- Slowing of Stalingrad fighting should be a signal for stronger action in the west; EP..... 361
- Stalin letter to Associated Press charges failure of Allies to give effective aid; EP..... 329
- Stalingrad and Dieppe. F. Kirchwey; S..... 254
- What Washington thinks. I. F. Stone; S.....287; see also..... 500
- Willkie's statement supported by London Times; EP..... 281
- Shipyards versus U-boats. D. W. Mitchell; S.....148; see also Ch..... 149
- U-boats and empty bottles. H. Clarke; S..... 715
- United Nations in offensive action on all fronts; EP..... 601
- United Nations prepare for global offensive; EP..... 561
- Willkie demands statement of war aims in Toronto speech; EP..... 602
- See also War, African; War, European; War, Pacific
- Wouk, Herman
Dulce et decorum est pro Batten, Barton, Durstine et Osborne mori; P... 471
- Y
- Yankee point. J. W. Krutch; D..... 629
- Youth
"A free United Europe is yours." V. DePauw; Ct..... 299
- European youth congress; E..... 298
- Yugoslavia
Army of General Mihailovitch continues large scale operations against axis forces; nazis send punitive expeditions against civilians; EP..... 101
- Croatian peasants join guerilla bands to fight nazi occupation troops. E. Kovacs; S..... 72
- Mihailovich and the partisans. R. Bates; S.....577; see also C..... 662
- Nadj, K., leader of partisans, is veteran of the Spanish war. E. K. Barsky; C..... 524
- Nedich, Serbia's Quisling. N. Mirkovich; C..... 631
- Pavelich, A., Croatian Quisling. J. Joesten; S..... 190
- Z
- Zeis, Paul Maxwell
Ships and new fronts; S..... 26
- Zheleznov, Mikhail
Comments on "Mihailovich and the partisans" by R. Bates; C.....662; see also..... 577

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

- B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

- Abraham Lincoln and the fifth column. G. F. Milton; B..... 550
- Adams, John Cranford
Globe playhouse, the: Its design and equipment; AN..... 198
- Admiral Sims and the modern American navy. E. E. Morison; B..... 423
- Agar, Herbert
Time for greatness, a; B..... 351
- Age of enterprise, the. T. C. Cochran and W. Miller; B..... 518
- Agenda for a post-war world. J. B. Condliffe; B..... 355
- All night long. E. Caldwell; B..... 720
- All the trumpets sounded. W. G. Hardy; AN..... 98
- American anthology, an. Edited by T. Boggs B..... 725
- American harvest: Twenty years of creative writing in the United States. Edited by A. Tate and J. P. Bishop; B..... 592
- American primitive painting. J. Lipman; B..... 350
- American unity and Asia. P. Buck; B..... 155
- And now tomorrow. R. Field; AN..... 18
- Annals of the New York stage. G. C. D. Odell. Volume XIII; B..... 304
- Anthology of Canadian poetry (English). Compiled by R. Gustafson; AN..... 245

- Anthology of magazine verse, 1938-1942.
 Edited by A. F. Pater; B..... 725
 Arms and the people. A. Stevens; B..... 244
 Art of Jacob Epstein, the. R. Black; B..... 626
 As William James said: Extracts from the published writings of William James;
 B..... 35
 Assignment in Brittany. H. MacInnes; AN... 57
 Assignment to Berlin. H. W. Flannery; B... 78
 Attack: A study of blitzkrieg tactics. Major
 F. O. Miksche. Introduction by T.
 Wintringham; B..... 76
 Ayer, A. J.; R..... 722

B

- Baker, Robert L.
 Oil, blood, and sand: Stakes and strategy in the Middle East; AN..... 245
 Baldwin, Hanson W.
 Strategy for victory: A program to defeat the dictators; B..... 15
 Barzun, Jacques; R..... 35, 690
 Basso, Hamilton
 Sun in Capricorn; AN..... 278
 Bates, Ralph; R..... 78, 175, 215, 241, 386, see also C..... 600, 420, 516, 587
 Bauer, Betty
 White queen, the; B..... 243
 Beasts of the earth, the. G. M. Karst; B..... 135
 Beatty, Richmond Croom
 James Russell Lowell; AN..... 521
 Behind the Urals. J. Scott; B..... 54
 Bemelmans, Ludwig
 I love you, I love you, I love you; AN... 245
 Bendiner, Robert
 Riddle of the State department, the; B... 195
 Bendiner, Robert; R..... 16, 347
 Benét, Stephen Vincent
 Selected works. Two volumes; B..... 217
 Bennett, James Gordon, biography. O. Carlson; B..... 657
 Best American short stories, 1942, the. Edited by M. Foley; AN..... 457
 Best poems of 1941, the. Edited by T.
 Moulty; B..... 725
 Biddle, Francis
 Mr. Justice Holmes; B..... 686
 Billinger, Karl; R..... 656
 Bingham, Alfred M.
 Techniques of democracy, the; B..... 627
 Black book of Poland, the. Issued by the Polish ministry of information; B..... 456
 Black, Robert
 Art of Jacob Epstein, the; B..... 626
 Blackmur, R. P.
 Second world, the; B..... 353
 Bogdan, Louise; R..... 156, 301, see also C... 396
 Bohdan; Hetman of Ukraine. G. Vernadsky; AN..... 521
 Room or bust. B. Moody; B..... 97
 Borgese, G. A.; R..... 206
 Borst, Beatrice
 Nearer the earth; B..... 243
 Bowen, Elizabeth
 Bowen's court; B..... 156
 Bowen's court. E. Bowen; B..... 156
 Boyle, Kay
 Primer for combat; B..... 689
 Braatoy, Bjarne; R..... 56
 Brazil under Vargas. K. Lowenstein; B.... 393
 Brennan, Joseph Gerard
 Thomas Mann's world; B..... 582
 Bridge, Ann
 Frontier passage; AN..... 457
 Brindze, Ruth
 Stretching your dollar in wartime; AN... 198
 Brinnin, John Malcolm
 Garden is political, the; B..... 97
 Brodie, Bernard
 Layman's guide to naval strategy, a; B... 455
 Brown, Cecil
 Parody on his "Suez to Singapore." G.
 Hight; S..... 581
 Brown, Cecil
 Suez to Singapore; B..... 482
 Brown, Slater
 Burning wheel, the; AN..... 521
 Buck, Pearl
 American unity and Asia; B..... 155
 Burman, Ben Lucien
 Miracle on the Congo: Report from the Free French front; B..... 37
 Burning wheel, the. S. Brown; AN..... 521

C

- Calas, Nicolas
 Confound the wise; B..... 242
 Caldwell, Erskine
 All night long; B..... 720
 Canada, today and tomorrow. W. H. Chamberlin; B..... 551
 Cant, Gilbert; R..... 724
 Carlson, Oliver
 Man who made news, the; James Gordon Bennett; B..... 657
 Carr, Edward Hallett
 Conditions of peace; B..... 56

- Carroll, Wallace
 We're in this with Russia; B..... 516
 Carter, Lieutenant Hodding, and Colonel R.
 E. Dupuy
 Civilian defense of the United States;
 B..... 244
 Casey, Robert J.
 Torpedo junction: With the Pacific fleet from Pearl harbor to Midway; B..... 724
 Chamberlin, William Henry
 Canada, today and tomorrow; B..... 551
 Cheney, Brainard
 River rogue; AN..... 246
 Chevalier, Elizabeth Pickett
 Drivin' woman; AN..... 57
 Chidester, Ann
 Young Pandora; AN..... 178
 China after five years of war. Prepared under the auspices of the Ministry of information of the republic of China; B... 305
 City lawyer: The autobiography of a law practice. A. G. Hays; B..... 77
 Civilian defense of the United States.
 Colonel R. E. Dupuy and Lieutenant
 H. Carter; B..... 244
 Cochran, Thomas C., and W. Miller
 Age of enterprise, the; B..... 518
 Cole, G. D. H.
 Europe, Russia, and the future; B... 386;
 see also C..... 600
 Coming battle of Germany, the. W. B. Ziff;
 B..... 175
 Coming of the civil war, the. A. Craven;
 AN..... 159
 Coming showdown, the. C. Dreher; B..... 97
 Conditions of peace. E. H. Carr; B..... 56
 Confound the wise. N. Calas; B..... 242
 Connolly, Jean; R..... 689
 Corey, Lewis; R..... 136, 484, 658
 Corwin, Edward S.; R..... 624
 Craven, Avery
 Coming of the civil war, the; AN..... 159
 Currier & Ives: Printmakers to the American people. H. T. Peters; B..... 589

D

- Dabney, Virginius; R..... 550
 Dacey Hamilton. D. Van Doren; AN..... 245
 Dark kingdom, the. K. Patchen; B..... 17
 Davenport, Marcia
 Valley of decision, the; AN..... 692
 Davies, Raymond Arthur, and A. J. Steiger Soviet Asia: Democracy's first line of defence; B..... 272
 Davis, Clyde Brion
 Follow the leader; AN..... 178
 Davis, Forrest, and E. K. Lindley
 How war came: An American white paper; from the fall of France to Pearl Harbor; B..... 273
 Days of Ofelia, the. G. Diamant; AN..... 245
 De Camp, L. Sprague, and F. Pratt
 Land of unreason; AN..... 57
 Deep valley. D. Tothoroh; AN..... 57
 Democracy: The threatened foundations. R.
 Lennard; AN..... 18
 Democratic manifesto, a. E. Reves; B..... 304
 Desert war. R. Hill; AN..... 159
 Deutsch, Babette; R..... 97
 Dewey, John
 German philosophy and politics; B..... 722
 Diamant, Gertrude
 Days of Ofelia, the; AN..... 245
 Dickinson, Lieutenant Clarence E.
 Flying guns, the; B..... 724
 Dollar cotton. J. Faulkner; AN..... 278
 Dollar gold piece, the. V. Swain; AN..... 458
 Dorrance, Ward
 Sundowners, the; AN..... 178
 Dreher, Carl
 Coming showdown, the; B..... 97
 Drivin' woman. E. P. Chevalier; AN..... 57
 Drucker, Peter F.
 Future of industrial man, the; B..... 454
 Drums of morning, the. P. Van D. Stern;
 AN..... 178
 Duel for Europe. J. Scott; B..... 516
 Duffield, Marcus; R..... 272, 485
 Duffus, R. L.
 Victory on West hill; AN..... 57
 Dupuy, Colonel R. Ernest, and Lieutenant H.
 Carter
 Civilian defense of the United States;
 B..... 244
 Dynamics of industrial democracy, the. C.
 S. Golden and H. J. Ruttenberg; B... 484

E

- East of farewell. H. Hunt; AN..... 457
 Eastern Europe and the United States. J.
 Hanc; B..... 691
 Edman, Irwin; R..... 239, 719
 Eleven poems on the same theme. R. P.
 Warren; B..... 277
 Epic of Latin American literature, the. A.
 Torres-Rioseco; B..... 724

- Essays in criticism and research. G. Til-lottson; B..... 157
 Europe, Russia, and the future. G. D. H.
 Cole; B..... 386; see also C..... 600

F

- Fair is our land. Edited by S. Chamberlain.
 Introduction by D. Moffat; AN..... 489
 Faulkner, John
 Dollar cotton; AN..... 278
 Federalism and freedom. Sir George Young;
 B..... 355
 Fenton, Frank
 Place in the sun, a; AN..... 178
 Ferrero, Guglielmo
 Principles of power, the; B..... 240
 Field, Rachel
 And now tomorrow; AN..... 18
 Fiesta in November. Stories from Latin America selected and edited by A.
 Flores and D. Poore, with an introduction by K. A. Porter; B..... 196
 Filler, Louis; R..... 518, 657
 Flannery, Harry W.
 Assignment to Berlin; B..... 78
 Flying guns, the. Lieutenant C. E. Dickin-
 son; B..... 724
 Follow the leader. C. B. Davis; AN..... 178
 Forward the nation. D. C. Peattie; AN..... 98
 Foundations and the future of international law, the. P. H. Winfield; AN..... 18
 Four years of nazi torture. E. Winkler; B... 135
 Freeman, Douglas Southall
 Lee's lieutenants: A study in command.
 Volume one: Manassas to Malvern hill;
 B..... 687
 Fried, Hans Ernest
 Guilt of the German army, the; B..... 420
 Frontier passage. A. Bridge; AN..... 457
 Frost, Elizabeth Hollister
 This side of land; AN..... 457
 Frost, Frances
 Village of glass; AN..... 57
 Future of industrial man, the. P. F.
 Drucker; B..... 454

G

- G. B. S.: A full length portrait. H. Pearson; B..... 385
 Garcia Villa, Jose
 Have come, am here; B..... 394
 Garden is political, the. J. M. Brinnin; B... 97
 Geismar, Maxwell
 Writers in crisis; B..... 154
 Generation of materialism, a, 1871-1900. C.
 J. H. Hayes; B..... 136
 Gentle Annie. M. Kantor; AN..... 18
 Geopolitics: The struggle for space and power.
 R. Strausz-Hupé; B..... 206
 German philosophy and politics. J. Dewey;
 B..... 722
 Gibson, Hugh, and H. Hoover
 Problems of lasting peace, the; B..... 36
 Gift of tongues, the; M. Schlauch; B..... 422
 Glimpses of world history. J. Nehru; B..... 117
 Global war: An atlas of world strategy.
 E. A. Mower and M. Rajchman; B.... 175
 Globe playhouse, the: Its design and equipment. J. C. Adams; AN..... 198
 Goethe and the Greeks. H. Trevelyan; AN... 245
 Golden, Clinton S., and H. J. Ruttenberg Dynamics of industrial democracy, the;
 B..... 484
 Gottschalk, Louis
 Lafayette and the close of the American revolution; B..... 38
 Graf, Herbert
 Opera and its future in America, the;
 B..... 79, 357
 Gramophone shop encyclopedia of recorded music. Revised by G. C. Leslie; B... 458
 Gray, James H.; R..... 551
 Gray, Wood
 Hidden civil war, the: The story of the copperheads; B..... 550
 Green, Julian
 Memories of happy days; B..... 549
 Greenberg, Clement; R..... 350, 388, 589
 Gross, Bertram M.; R..... 97
 Guilt of the German army, the. H. E.
 Fried; B..... 420

H

- Haggin, B. H.; R..... 79, 357 458
 Haines, Helen E.
 What's in a novel; AN..... 489
 Hale, Nancy
 Prodigal women, the; AN..... 457
 Halper, Albert
 Little people, the; AN..... 457
 Hamilton, Edith
 Mythology; B..... 239
 Hanc, Josef
 Eastern Europe and the United States;
 B..... 691

- Handbook of civilian protection. Prepared by the civilian defense council, College of the City of New York; B..... 244
- Hardy, W. G.
All the trumpets sounded; AN..... 98
- Hargrove, Marion
See here, Private Hargrove; AN..... 245
- Harris, Squadron Leader Murray
Lifelines of victory; B..... 241
- Have come, am here. J. Garcia Villa; B..... 394
- Hayes, Carlton J. H.
Generation of materialism, a, 1871-1900; B..... 136
- Hays, Arthur Garfield; R..... 686
- Hays, Arthur Garfield
City lawyer: The autobiography of a law practice; B..... 77
- Hazlitt, Henry
New constitution now, a; B..... 624
- Herring, Hubert; R..... 393
- Heym, Stefan
Hostages; B..... 517
- Hidden civil war, the: The story of the copperheads. W. Gray; B..... 550
- High stakes. C. Riess; AN..... 98
- Hight, Gilbert
I wuz robbed; S..... 581; see also B..... 482
- Hill, Russell
Desert war; AN..... 159
- Hillyer, Robert
My heart for hostage; AN..... 521
- History of Quakerism, the. E. Russell; B..... 158
- Hofrichter, Ruth
Three poets and reality; B..... 218
- Holmes, Oliver Wendell, biography. F. Biddle; B..... 686
- Hoover, Herbert, and H. Gibson
Problems of lasting peace, the; B..... 36
- Horney, Karen
Self-analysis; B..... 215
- Hostages. S. Heym; B..... 517
- Hour before the dawn, the. W. S. Maugham; AN..... 18
- How war came: An American white paper: from the fall of France to Pearl Harbor. F. Davis and E. K. Lindley; B..... 273
- Hughes, Langston
Shakespeare in Harlem; AN..... 119
- Hugo, Victor, biography. M. Josephson; B..... 584
- Humphries, Rolfe; R..... 218
- Hunt, Howard
East of farewell; AN..... 457
- Hutchison, Betsy; R..... 135
- Hutchison, Keith; R..... 197, 352, 482 see also ..... 581, 687
- I
- I came out of the eighteenth century. J. A. Rice; B..... 726
- I love you, I love you, I love you. L. Bemelmans; AN..... 245
- I remember, I remember. A. Maurois.
Translated by D. and J. Lindley; B..... 390
- Illustrious dunderheads, the. Edited by R. Stout; B..... 347
- India without fable: A 1942 survey. K. Mitchell; B..... 302
- Indians of South America. P. Radin; AN..... 521
- J
- James Russell Lowell. R. C. Beatty; AN..... 521
- James, William
Extracts from the published writings of; B..... 35
- Jameson, Storm
Then we shall hear singing; AN..... 457
- Jane's all the world's aircraft, 1941. Compiled and edited by L. Bridgman; B..... 352
- Jane's fighting ships, 1941. Edited by F. E. McMurtrie; B..... 352
- Japan rides the tiger. W. Price; B..... 116
- Joel, George; R..... 77
- John Wollman: American Quaker. J. Whitney; B..... 158
- Johnston, Stanley
Queen of the flat-tops; B..... 485
- Jones, Frank; R..... 217, 242, 488, 725
- Jones, Frank; R..... 217, 242, 277, 488, 725
- Josephson, Matthew
Victor Hugo: A realistic biography of the great romantic; B..... 584
- K
- Kandel, Aben
Stones begin to dance, the; AN..... 245
- Kantor, MacKinlay
Gentle Annie; AN..... 18
- Karst, George M.
Beasts of the earth, the; B..... 135
- Kazin, Alfred
Letter on M. Marshall's review of "The roots of American culture" by C. Rourke; C..... 523; see also R..... 418
- Kazin, Alfred
On native grounds; B..... 483
- Khmelnitsky, Bohdan; biography. G. Vernadsky; AN..... 521
- Kingdon, Frank; R..... 304, 351
- Kiplinger, W. M.
Washington is like that; B..... 16
- Klee, Paul; paintings, watercolors. Edited by K. Nierendorf. Introduction by J. J. Sweeney; B..... 455
- Kournakoff, Captain Sergei N.
Russia's fighting forces; B..... 15
- Kronenberger, Louis; R..... 157, 592
- Krutch, Joseph Wood; R..... 304, 385, 654
- L
- Last train from Berlin. H. K. Smith; B..... 215
- Lafayette, Marquis de, biography. L. Gottschalk; B..... 38
- Lafayette and the close of the American revolution. L. Gottschalk; B..... 38
- Land of unreason. F. Pratt and L. S. de Camp; AN..... 57
- Langer, Susanne, K.
Philosophy in a new key: A study in the symbolism of reason, rite, and art; B..... 486
- La quintrala. M. Petit. Translated by L. Vargas Vila; AN..... 692
- Lasky, Melvin J.
Comments on L. Bogan's review of "Sentimental education" by G. Flaubert; C..... 396; see also R..... 301
- Layman's guide to naval strategy, a. B. Brodie; B..... 455
- Lee, Jennie
This great journey; B..... 197
- Leech, Margaret; R..... 420, 454, 550
- Lee's lieutenants: A study in command. Volume one: Manassas to Malvern hill. D. S. Freeman; S..... 687
- Lehrman, Hal; R..... 37
- Lemaître, Georges; R..... 584
- Lennard, Reginald
Democracy: The threatened foundations; AN..... 18
- Lifelines of victory. Squadron Leader M. Harris; B..... 241
- Lincoln, Abraham, and the fifth column. G. F. Milton; B..... 550
- Lincoln and his party in the secession crisis. D. M. Potter; B..... 454
- Lindley, Ernest K., and F. Davis
How war came: An American white paper; from the fall of France to Pearl Harbor; B..... 273
- Lipman, Jean
American primitive painting; B..... 350
- Liston, Hans. D. Thompson; B..... 690
- Little people, the. A. Halper; AN..... 457
- Lochner, Louis P.
What about Germany? B..... 587
- Loewenstein, Karl
Brazil under Vargas; B..... 393
- Love against hate. K. Menninger; B..... 654
- Lowell, James Russell, biography. R. C. Beatty; AN..... 521
- Lunt, Paul S., and W. L. Warner
Status system of a modern community, the; AN..... 489
- M
- Macardle, Dorothy
Uninvited, the; AN..... 119
- MacInnes, Helen
Assignment in Brittany; AN..... 57
- Maestro, M. T.
Letter on G. Salvemini's review of "Agent in Italy"; C..... 100; see also C..... 160
- Man who made news, the; James Gordon Bennett. O. Carlson; B..... 657
- Mann, Thomas, biography. J. C. Brennan; B..... 582
- Order of the day; B..... 582
- Manoff, Arnold
Telegram from heaven; B..... 243
- Marling hall. A. Thirkell; B..... 655
- Marshall, Margaret; R..... 154, 418; see also C..... 523, 515, 720
- Maugham, W. Somerset
Hour before the dawn, the; AN..... 18
- Maurois, André
I remember, I remember; B..... 390
- McInnis, Edgar W.
Unguarded frontier, the: A history of American-Canadian relations; B..... 551
- Means, Philip Ainsworth
Newport tower. Introduction by V. Stefansson; AN..... 57
- Memories of happy days. J. Green; B..... 549
- Menninger, Karl
Love against hate; B..... 654
- Michie, Allan A.
Retreat to victory; B..... 241
- Miksche, Major F. O.
Attack: A study of blitzkrieg tactics. Introduction by T. Wintringham; B..... 76
- Milano, Paolo; R..... 174
- Miller, William, and T. C. Cochran
Age of enterprise, the; B..... 518
- Milton, George Fort
Abraham Lincoln and the fifth column; B..... 550
- Miracle on the Congo: Report from the Free French front. B. L. Burman; B..... 37
- Mitchell, Donald W.; R..... 15, 244, 423, 455
- Mitchell, Kate
India without fable: A 1942 survey; B..... 302
- Moody, Blair
Boom or bust; B..... 97
- Moore, Frederick
With Japan's leaders; B..... 116
- Moore, Marianne; R..... 394
- Morby, Edwin S.; R..... 724
- Morison, Elting E.
Admiral Sims and the modern American navy; B..... 423
- Morris, Charles
Paths of life: Preface to a world religion; B..... 486
- Motherwell, Hiram; R..... 456
- Mower, Edgar Ansel, and M. Rajchman
Global war: An atlas of world strategy; B..... 175
- Mr. Justice Holmes. F. Biddle; B..... 686
- Myers, John Myers
Out on any limb; AN..... 57
- My heart for hostage. R. Hillyer; AN..... 521
- My world—and welcome to it. J. Thurber; B..... 515
- Mythology. E. Hamilton; B..... 239
- N
- Nature of literature, the: Its relation to science, language and human experience. T. C. Pollock; B..... 422
- Nearer the earth. B. Borst; B..... 243
- Needleman, Morris H., and W. B. Otis
Survey-history of English literature, a; B..... 546; see also ..... 728
- Nehru, Jawaharlal
Glimpses of world history; B..... 117
- New constitution now, a. H. Hazlitt; B..... 624
- New dictionary of quotations on historical principles from ancient and modern sources, a. H. L. Mencken; B..... 390
- New order in Poland, the. S. Segal; B..... 96
- Newman, Joseph; R..... 116
- Newport tower. P. A. Means. Introduction by V. Stefansson; AN..... 57
- Newsman's holiday: Nieman essays—first series; B..... 550
- Niebuhr, Reinhold; R..... 36, 117, 240, 454, 582, 627
- Night shift. M. Wolff; AN..... 692
- Nin, Anais
Winter of artifice; B..... 276
- No retreat. A. Rauschnig; B..... 135
- Note books of night. E. Wilson; B..... 625
- O
- O'Brien, Justin; R..... 390, 549
- Odell, George C. D.
Annals of the New York stage. Volume XIII; B..... 304
- Oechsner, Frederick, with the United Press staff
This is the enemy; B..... 587
- Oil, blood, and sand: Stakes and strategy in the Middle East. R. L. Baker; AN..... 245
- On native grounds. A. Kazin; B..... 483
- One man's meat. E. B. White; B..... 118
- Only the stars are neutral. Q. Reynolds; B..... 54
- Opera and its future in America, the. H. Graf; B..... 79, 357
- Order of the day. T. Mann; B..... 582
- Orrick, James; R..... 422
- Other horseman, the. P. Wyllie; AN..... 18
- Otis, William Bradley, and M. H. Needleman
Survey-history of English literature, a; B..... 546; see also ..... 728
- Out on any limb. J. M. Myers; AN..... 57
- P
- Parkes, H. B.
Pragmatic test, the: Essays on the history of ideas; B..... 35
- Parts of a world. W. Stevens; B..... 488
- Patchen, Kenneth
Dark kingdom, the; B..... 17
- Patents for Hitler. G. Reimann; B..... 658
- Paths of life: Preface to a world religion. C. Morris; B..... 486
- Paul Klee: Paintings, watercolors, 1913 to 1939. Edited by K. Nierendorf. Introduction by J. J. Sweeney; B..... 455
- Pearson, Hesketh
G. B. S.: A full length portrait; B..... 385
- Peattie, Donald Culross
Forward the nation; AN..... 98

- Peters, Harry T.
Currier & Ives: Printmakers to the American people; B..... 589
- Petit, Magdalena
La quintrala. Translated by L. Vargas Vila; AN..... 692
- Philosophy in a new key: A study in the symbolism of reason, rite, and art. S. K. Langer; B..... 486
- Place in the sun, a. F. Fenton; AN..... 178
- Plato's Republic. Translated with introduction and notes by F. M. Cornford; B. 690
- Plume rouge, J. U. Terrell; AN..... 98
- Poliakov, Alexander
Russians don't surrender; B..... 15
- Pollock, Thomas Clark
Nature of literature, the: Its relation to science, language and human experience; B..... 422
- Port of New Orleans, the. H. Sinclair; AN..... 489
- Potter, David M.
Lincoln and his party in the secession crisis; B..... 454
- Powell, Dawn
Time to be born, a; B..... 243
- Pragmatic test, the: Essays on the history of ideas. H. B. Parkes; B..... 35
- Pratt, Fletcher, and L. S. de Camp
Land of unreason; AN..... 57
- Price, Willard
Japan rides the tiger; B..... 116
- Primer for combat. K. Boyle; B..... 689
- Princeton verse between two wars: An anthology. Edited by A. Tate; B..... 137
- Principles of power, the. G. Ferrero; B..... 240
- Problems of lasting peace, the. H. Hoover and H. Gibson; B..... 36
- Problems of post-war reconstruction. Edited by H. P. Jordan; B..... 355
- Prodigal women, the. N. Hale; AN..... 457
- Q
- Queen of the flat-tops. S. Johnston; B.... 485
- R
- Radin, Paul
Indians of South America; AN..... 521
- Rajchman, Marthe, and E. A. Mowrer
Global war: An atlas of world strategy; B..... 175
- Rauschning, Anna
No retreat; B..... 135
- Real Italians, the: A study in European psychology. C. Sforza; B..... 271
- Reimann, Guenter
Patents for Hitler; B..... 658
- Reprisal, E. Vance; AN..... 692
- Republic of Plato, the. Translated with introduction and notes by F. M. Cornford; B..... 690
- Retreat to victory. A. A. Michie; B..... 241
- Reves, Emery
Democratic manifesto, a; B..... 304
- Reynolds, Quentin
Only the stars are neutral; B..... 54
- Rice, John Andrew
I came out of the eighteenth century; B..... 726
- Rice, Philip Blair; R..... 486
- Riddle of the State department, the. R. Bendiner; B..... 195
- Riess, Curt
High stakes; AN..... 98
- Self-betrayed, the: Glory and doom of the German generals; B..... 587
- River rogue. B. Cheney; AN..... 246
- Robber bridegroom, the. E. Welty; B..... 686
- Roots of American culture, the. C. Rourke; B....418; see also C..... 523
- Rosenfeld, Paul; R..... 276
- Rourke, Constance
Roots of American culture, the; B..418; see also C..... 523
- Russell, Elbert
History of Quakerism, the; B..... 158
- Russia's fighting forces. S. N. Kournakoff; B..... 15
- Russians don't surrender. A. Poliakov; B. 15
- Ruttenberg, Harold J., and C. S. Golden Dynamics of industrial democracy, the; B..... 484
- S
- Salvemini, Gaetano; R..... 271
- Sampson, Harriet; R..... 726
- Sandburg, Carl
Storm over the land: A profile of the civil war; B..... 420
- Schlauch, Margaret
Gift of tongues, the; B..... 422
- Schuman, Frederick L.; R..... 195, 273
- Schwarzchild, Leopold
World in trance: From Versailles to Pearl Harbor. Translated by N. Guterman; B..... 656
- Scott, John
Behind the Urals; B..... 54
- Duel for Europe; B..... 516
- Scott, John; R..... 15, 272
- Second world, the. R. P. Blackmur; B..... 353
- See here, Private Hargrove. M. Hargrove; AN..... 245
- Seed beneath the snow, the. I. Silone; B. 174
- Segal, Simon
New order in Poland, the; B..... 96
- Seghers, Anna
Seventh cross, the; B..... 388
- Selected works of Stephen Vincent Benét. Two volumes; B..... 217
- Self-analysis. K. Horney; B..... 215
- Self-betrayed, the: Glory and doom of the German generals. C. Riess; B..... 587
- Sentimental education. G. Flaubert; B..301; see also C..... 396
- Seventh cross, the. A. Seghers; B..... 388
- Sewell, H. S.; R..... 76
- Seyd, Felizia; R..... 690
- Sforza, Carlo
Real Italians, the: A study in European psychology; B..... 271
- Shakespeare in Harlem. L. Hughes; AN... 119
- Shaw, George Bernard, biography. H. Pearson; B..... 385
- Shepard, Odell; R..... 158
- Silone, Ignazio
Seed beneath the snow, the; B..... 174
- Sims, Admiral William Sowden, biography. E. E. Morison; B..... 423
- Sinclair, Harold
Port of New Orleans, the; AN..... 489
- Slonim, Marc; R..... 54
- Smith, Howard K.
Last train from Berlin; B..... 215
- Soviet Asia: Democracy's first line of defense. R. A. Davies and A. J. Steiger; B..... 272
- Standish, Robert
Three bamboos, the; B..... 591
- Status system of a modern community, the. W. L. Warner and P. S. Lunt; AN... 489
- Steiger, Andrew J., and R. A. Davies
Soviet Asia: Democracy's first line of defense; B..... 272
- Stern, Philip Van Doran
Drums of morning, the; AN..... 178
- Sternberg, Fritz
Comments on R. Bates's review of "Europe, Russia, and the future" by G. D. H. Cole; C.....600; see also R..... 386
- Stevens, Alden
Arms and the people; B..... 244
- Stevens, Wallace
Parts of a world; B..... 488
- Stewart, Maxwell S.; R..... 305
- Stones begin to dance, the. A. Kandel; AN..... 245
- Storm over the land: A profile of the civil war. C. Sandburg; B..... 420
- Strategy for victory: A program to defeat the dictators. H. W. Baldwin; B.... 15
- Strauss, Harold; R..... 355
- Strausz-Hupé, Robert
Geopolitics: The struggle for space and power; B..... 206
- Street, James
Tap roots; AN..... 57
- Stretching your dollar in wartime. R. Brinze; AN..... 198
- Suez to Singapore. C. Brown; B....482; see also ..... 581
- Sun in Capricorn. H. Basso; AN..... 278
- Sundowners, the. W. Dorrance; AN..... 178
- Survey-history of English literature, a. W. B. Otis and M. H. Needleman; B....546; see also ..... 728
- Swain, Virginia
Dollar gold piece, the; AN..... 458
- T
- Tap roots. J. Street; AN..... 57
- Taylor, George E.; R.....155; 302, 591
- Taylor, Kressmann
Until that day; AN..... 489
- Techniques of democracy, the. A. M. Bingham; B..... 627
- Telegram from heaven. A. Manoff; B..... 243
- Terrell, John Upton
Plume rouge; AN..... 98
- Then we shall hear singing. S. Jameson; AN..... 457
- They were expendable. W. L. White; B... 272
- Thirkell, Angela
Marling hall; B..... 655
- This great journey. J. Lee; B..... 197
- This is the enemy. F. Oechsner with the United Press staff; B..... 587
- This side of land. E. H. Frost; AN..... 457
- Thomas Mann's world. J. G. Brennan; B. 582
- Thompson, Dorothy
Listen, Hans; B..... 690
- Three bamboos, the. R. Standish; B..... 591
- Three poets and reality. R. Hofrichter; B. 218
- Thurber, James
My world—and welcome to it; B..... 515
- Tillotson, Geoffrey
Essays in criticism and research; B.... 157
- Time and the town: A Provincetown chronicle. M. H. Vorse; B..... 76
- Time for greatness, a. H. Agar; B..... 351
- Time to be born, a. D. Powell; B..... 243
- Torpedo junction: With the Pacific fleet from Pearl Harbor to Midway. R. J. Casey; B..... 724
- Torres-Riosco, Arturo
Epic of Latin American literature, the; B..... 724
- Totheroh, Dan
Deep valley; AN..... 57
- Treasury of British humor, a. Edited by M. Bishop; B..... 719
- Trevelyan, Humphry
Goethe and the Greeks; AN..... 245
- Trilling, Diana; R.....118, 196, 243, 517, 655
- Trilling, Lionel; R.....215, 483, 546, see also .....728, 646
- Truth about Soviet Russia, the. S. and B. Webb; B..... 516
- U
- Unguarded frontier, the: A history of American-Canadian relations. E. W. McNinis; B..... 551
- Uninvited, the. D. Macardle; AN..... 119
- Until that day. K. Taylor; AN..... 489
- V
- Valley of decision, the. M. Davenport; AN... 692
- Vamberg, Rustem; R.....96, 691
- Vance, Ethel
Reprisal; AN..... 692
- Van Doren, Dorothy
Dacey Hamilton; AN..... 245
- Vernadsky, George
Bohdan: Hetman of Ukraine; AN..... 521
- Victor Hugo: A realistic biography of the great romantic. M. Josephson; B.... 584
- Victory on West hill. R. L. Duffus; AN... 57
- Village of glass. F. Frost; AN..... 57
- Vorse, Mary Heaton
Time and the town: A Provincetown chronicle; B..... 76
- W
- Warner, W. Lloyd, and P. S. Lunt
Status system of a modern community, the; AN..... 489
- Warren, Robert Penn
Eleven poems on the same theme; B.... 277
- Warren, Robert Penn; R.....17, 137, 625
- Washington is like that. W. M. Kiplinger; B..... 16
- Welty, Eudora
Robber bridegroom, the; B..... 686
- We're in this with Russia. W. Carroll; B. 516
- Webb, Sidney and Beatrice
Truth about Soviet Russia, the; B.... 516
- What about Germany? L. P. Lochner; B.... 587
- What's in a novel. H. E. Haines; AN..... 489
- White, E. B.
One man's meat; B..... 118
- White, W. L.
They were expendable; B..... 272
- White queen, the. B. Bauer; B..... 243
- Whitney, Janet
John Woolman: American Quaker; B.... 158
- Williams, Oscar; R..... 353
- Willson, George; R..... 76
- Wilson, Edmund
Note books of night; B..... 625
- Winfield, P. H.
Foundations and the future of international law, the; AN..... 18
- Winkler, Ernst
Four years of nazi torture; B..... 135
- Winter of artifice. A. Nin. Copper engravings by I. Hugo; B..... 276
- With Japan's leaders. F. Moore; B..... 116
- Wolff, Maritta
Night shift; AN..... 692
- Woodward, W. E.; R..... 38
- Woolman, John, biography. J. Whitney; B. 158
- World in trance: From Versailles to Pearl Harbor. L. Schwarzchild. Translated by N. Guterman; B..... 656
- Writers in crisis. M. Geismar; B..... 154
- Wylie, Philip
Other horseman, the; AN..... 18
- Y
- Young, Sir George
Federalism and freedom; B..... 355
- Young Pandora. A. Chidester; AN..... 178
- Z
- Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R.....390, 455, 626
- Ziff, William B.
Coming battle of Germany, the; B.... 175

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 4, 1942

NUMBER 1

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

The Willkie Boom by Freda Kirchwey

Challenge to Churchill

The New Draft Policy

ARTICLES

Defense Will Lose the Near East by Alexander Kiralfy

Keep Them Out! IV. The Reverend Gerald B. Winrod
by Will Chasan and Victor Riesel

Housekeeping in France by Amo Pallavicini

Thoughts on "World War III?" by Rustem Vambery, Michael Straight, Henri Laugier, Carlo Sforza, and Theodor Dan

In the Wind

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

How Russians Fight by John Scott

Mitchell on Baldwin by Donald W. Mitchell

New Deal Washington by Robert Bendiner

Poems by Kenneth Patchen by Robert Penn Warren

In Brief

Drama Note by Joseph Wood Krutch

Records by B. H. Haggin

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor

RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

IT TAKES AN OCCASIONAL ANNIVERSARY TO drive home the swiftness with which history is being written in these days of war and change. Three years ago Americans spent a noisy Fourth of July on the beaches and the highways. The only kind of independence that seemed to matter was independence from what was contemptuously called "foreign entanglements." We were sorry, even indignant, about the fate of Prague, but only "fanatics" saw in its tragedy a forecast of what was to come. The Fourth in 1940 was grimmer. Paris had fallen, and London's capitulation looked like a matter of weeks. But we were still independent; it was not our fight. Last Fourth Moscow seemed doomed, and the breath of the dragon was hot enough to be felt even across those 3,000 miles of ocean on which isolationists predicated our independence. Still Senator Wheeler could say, "Now we can just let Joe Stalin and the other dictators fight it out." This Fourth all that is ages in the past. Our beaches have become landing places for Nazi saboteurs, our highways are almost empty, and our fighting men are scattered from Melbourne to Belfast. In a year America has come to understand that only through the interdependence of all nations can there be independence for any.

✱

PIERRE LAVAL HAS OPENLY EXPRESSED HIS hopes for a German victory and his conviction that France must integrate itself in the Nazi New Order or see its civilization disappear. Marshal Pétain, as we have noted previously, has put his complete confidence in Laval on record. Our State Department, however, still appears to have confidence in Pétain, although Secretary Hull last week restated his belief that Laval was intent on delivering France to Hitler. Nevertheless, we are resuming supplies to French North Africa, we continue official relations with a government headed by a man whom our Secretary of State acknowledges to be a German puppet, and our cold shoulder is still turned toward the Free French who are fighting and dying on our side. Is there some method in this madness? We fail to see it unless there is lurking within the State Department the same fear that Laval expressed in his speech—the fear that German defeat will mean a Europe overrun by bolshevism. Men beset by such a horrid vision of the future might argue that it would be wise to maintain a reactionary government in France as a bulwark against the spread of this disease, even though it was a government in league with our enemies. Yet such a policy would be the most cynical betrayal of the people to whom we have repeatedly promised deliverance. They know where Vichy stands, and the vast majority of them are working to prevent it from realizing its aims. Nor has their resistance been ineffective. Laval himself acknowledged that when he said to the people of France: "I can do nothing without you." But how are we to encourage the French to refuse their support to Laval while we countenance the government of which he is the chief?

★

THE CHINESE STRUCK BACK SAVAGELY AT the Japanese last week. Linhsien, an important Japanese base in northern Honan, was recaptured in a brilliant counter-stroke that ended a Japanese offensive in that area. Japanese casualties are estimated at 5,500 in this one section alone over a thirteen-day period. Another Japanese army is reported to be isolated near Liuho, 110 miles north of Hankow. The most encouraging development of all was the appearance of the newly trained Chinese air force, which beat off, for the first time, an air raid on the Hunan rail center of Hengyang, and a few days later sank two Japanese gunboats in the Yangtze eighty-five miles below Hankow. Good news also was the reported arrival of a group of American army fliers in Chungking. Offsetting the good news is confirmation from Chungking of Japanese claims of having seized Lishui and Kweiki, the last two important air bases in the Chekiang-Kiangsi area available for attacks on Japan. However, the main Japanese column pushing westward in this drive has been bogged down at Shangjao for nearly two weeks, and Chinese resistance seems stronger than at any time in recent months.

★

THE SINKING OF A SECOND ARGENTINE SHIP and the resignation of President Ortiz combined to create a political near crisis in Buenos Aires last week. Popular resentment against the second sinking, which came only a few days after the controversy over the first had been settled, forced Acting President Castillo to forward an unusually stern protest to Berlin. The Chamber of Deputies adopted a resolution insisting that Foreign Minister Guinázú appear before it on July 2 to explain why diplomatic relations with the Axis have not been broken. A powerful movement is under way to reject President Ortiz's resignation as a rebuke to Castillo. Anti-Axis feeling in Argentina has been accentuated by German threats of "reprisals" against Brazil for the alleged mistreatment of German nationals. In view of this situation there is a possibility that Castillo may make one of his apparent concessions by dropping his discredited pro-Axis Foreign Minister, Enrique Ruiz Guinázú, and seek a successor more palatable to the United States. A break with the Axis seems unlikely, however, as long as Castillo is President.

★

BY ELIMINATING MANDATORY JOINT TAX returns in a last-minute action the House Ways and Means Committee not only knocked off another $420,000,000 from a much-depleted tax bill but killed a reform which the Treasury had long hoped to see enacted. The present system of optional separate returns clearly violates the principles of progressive taxation, since in cases where income is more or less evenly divided between husband and wife it makes possible a considerable reduction in the total burden on the family. This is particularly so in the "community-property" states, where half the income of either partner is automatically credited to the other. Consequently a married California millionaire whose wife has no actual income of her own pays a much smaller tax than the New Yorker in exactly the same position. The eight community-property states naturally want to keep their favored position, and it was largely opposition from this quarter that killed mandatory joint returns. On the other hand it is fair to acknowledge that while serving one important principle the Treasury reform clashed with another—the right of a married woman to separate control of her own property or income. On these grounds it was strongly attacked by many women's organizations. The opposition also made much of the argument that joint returns would lead to an epidemic of divorces. Inasmuch as joint returns have long been the rule in Britain, where the divorce rate compares very favorably with our own, this line of attack seems unworthy of the cause in which it was used. What is more to the point is the fact that Britain has found it necessary to increase the earned-income exemption for married women in order to provide them with a greater incentive to take jobs in offices and factories.

★

IF YOU HAPPEN TO THINK THAT YOUR Representative has bungled his job, say nothing about it. Should you ignore this advice and insist that your Congressman be held to account for his record, the least you can do, in the name of prudence, is to be sure that his name is not Martin Dies, Joseph Starnes, Noah M. Mason, or J. Parnell Thomas. Because these four Representatives hold themselves above reproach. They believe that they are not merely Congressmen but Congress itself and that any attack on them is an assault on the parliamentary system. Some Americans think that these gentlemen are mistaken, that they are not an institution at all but four small-time politicians whom poll taxes and public negligence have brought a long way. But whether they are four hacks or the Spirit of Magna Charta, the point is that Messrs. Dies, Starnes, Mason, and Thomas possess the magic property of Congressional immunity. This gift entitles them to brand you a Communist, a saboteur, or a cannibal without having to answer for it, and they will do just that if you so much as suggest that they are ripe for retirement. Only last week, in their collective capacity as the Dies committee majority and without a trace of an investigation, they formally pronounced the Union for Democratic Action "part of the interlocking directorate of the Communist movement," though at the last count the Union had exactly as many Communists as the National Association of Manufacturers and a standing rule against admitting any more. The Union's criticism of Dies, Starnes, Mason, and other obstructionists, said Dies, Starnes, and Mason, was an attempt "to obliterate the Congress of the United States and Nazify the country." Perhaps this will teach the U. D. A. not to advocate the defeat of men who may slander without risk.

The Willkie Boom

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE Willkie boom is not a product of politics; it is a product of the war. It was launched by Vote for Freedom, an offshoot of Fight for Freedom, organized to keep isolationists and appeasers out of office in the November elections and to support trustworthy exponents of a vigorous democratic war and peace policy. It was taken up by a new non-party group, the Draft Willkie Committee, formed for that specific fight. It has won the support of some—but not enough—Republicans, particularly the "Willkie before Philadelphia" contingent. And various independents of both parties have signed up.

The boom has found strength in strange quarters. Who would have thought, two years ago, to find the Tamiment conference, traditionally the scene of rather solemn left-wing discussions of economic and political problems, converted into a Willkie rally? Who would have expected a labor leader like David Dubinsky, who no doubt denounced John L. Lewis for supporting Willkie in 1940, doing the same thing himself in 1942? In the Willkie-for-Governor ranks are to be found New Dealers of early vintage. Men and women are backing Willkie today precisely because they backed Roosevelt in 1940 and are pro-Roosevelt still. I suspect the Willkie boom may even have found some measure of encouragement deep in the heart of the Administration.

The election in New York this fall has acquired some of the aspects of a war-time by-election in England. We have in this country no truce to freeze candidates and obliterate issues. But we have party machines which pursue a political business-as-usual policy and offer the patriotic voter no valid choice.

Tom Dewey is so completely a hedger and equivocator that it is impossible to label him. He is whatever the political circumstances of the moment seem to suggest. Perhaps he can best be described as an out-and-out, unqualified Deweyite. He hasn't had much time to waste on world affairs because the position of Dewey in the Republican Party had to be established by a great concentration of effort. He has done the job well; Willkie is titular leader of the Republican Party, but Dewey controls the machine. Dewey will be nominated for governor unless a miracle intervenes; it is too late now to unseat him by the slow and laborious methods he used in securing his hold on the party apparatus.

Dewey as Governor of New York would be a powerful contender for the Presidential nomination in 1944; he would have overcome the obstacles of youth and political unpreparedness that tripped him up at Philadelphia in 1940. It is not even outside the range of a good imagination that he might be elected President. Stranger things have happened—as, for example, in 1920. Apart from this threat, however, which at least is two fateful years distant, we face the imminent certainty that the election of Dewey as Governor of New York would obliterate the influence Willkie still exercises in the party councils and weaken his position in the country.

Only the miracle of a thundering public demand will give Willkie the Republican nomination. But Philadelphia witnessed something like that miracle, and Willkie's friends have hope.

Their hopes are not limited to the Republican convention, however. They know their chances there are slim. The Draft Willkie movement is no one-front war; on the contrary it is an all-out defiance of the Old Guard and is based on the belief that Wendell Willkie will run as an independent if he fails to get his party's nomination. His supporters believe this with such determination that one suspects some solid basis for their faith. If they are right, the political drama becomes pure fantasy. When the national leader of a major party deserts the party to run for a state office against its chosen candidate, something like revolution is in the air.

Willkie, running as an independent, would certainly get a good chunk of the Republican vote, that part of it that cares more for defeating Hitler than for perpetuating the control of the machine. He would split the party, even though a majority might stick to regularity and Tom Dewey. Willkie, as an independent, would get a large proportion of the Democratic vote—a far larger proportion than if he were to win the Republican nomination. Many Democrats would support him rather than John J. Bennett, Jr., the unknown Attorney General who looms as the all-but-certain Democratic nominee. If Mead or Poletti should be named, New Deal Democrats would probably stick to the party; but neither one has more than an off chance. Direct intervention from the White House in behalf of one of the two might help; but it might not. In any case it is not expected. Farley called on the President and then plumped for Bennett. If Bennett is nominated, Willkie can split the Democratic Party, too, though less fatally than the Republican.

But the real loss the Democrats face is the Labor Party vote. The Labor Party holds the balance of voting power in the state; it may easily decide the election. Already it has repudiated Bennett, and if no liberal candidate is nominated, it will probably swing its support to Willkie, whether he runs on the Republican ticket or as an independent. If he runs, the state election will attain the tension and importance of a national campaign, and that is what it will be. No campaign can be a local party fight this year—as the politicians are about to find out.

Many liberals and labor people will shy off from supporting Willkie. They remember 1940 more vividly than they anticipate 1944. They know that Willkie is not a converted New Dealer; no doubt he still cherishes his faith in "free enterprise," at least in times of peace. They say: "Of course his position on the war is good, and on civil liberties, and race questions, and even on labor. But, after all, it's not up to us to tell the Republicans whom to nominate. And anyhow we don't want to help push them toward power in 1944." They feel detached, spectators of a game they aren't called upon to play. But many others look upon the election of Willkie as a contribution to the war and the peace. These people are war-time opportunists. They say: "We have no organization or leaders on the left to put into the field against Dewey and Bennett. Let's admit that and not parade our impotence as if it were a virtue. Let's back Willkie in order to defeat the Old Guard in both parties—the political Colonel Blimps who would dilute our fighting strength and sell out the peace. We can drop Willkie later on if he doesn't give us what we want. The war is today. Electing Willkie is a war measure."

---

Too late for extended comment in this issue comes word of the total number of Jews killed by the Nazis. A report presented in London at a session of the World Jewish Congress puts the figure at 1,000,000—almost twice the number of Jews who lived in Germany when Hitler came to power. Some 6,500,000 more Jews have been deported or driven into exile. Race discrimination which began with minor legal restrictions flowered logically into mass extermination. We recoil with almost physical pain from stories of the death of innocent hostages in the civil war consuming Europe today. Let us never forget that the Jews of Europe are hostages for all of us.

Challenge to Churchill

MR. CHURCHILL has returned home to face the first motion of no confidence ever directed against his government. At previous moments of crisis—after the fall of Singapore, for instance—the Prime Minister has jumped ahead of his critics by asking for a vote of confidence. This time a mixed group of Parliamentary back benchers, under Tory leadership but including Labor and Liberal elements, have forestalled him by giving notice of a resolution expressing "no confidence in the central direction of the war." Other groups, avoiding such an outright challenge, have tabled motions urging changes in the government machinery, such as the separation of the offices of Prime Minister and Defense Minister and the institution of a unified command.

These Parliamentary moves followed the fall of Tobruk, but it now seems possible that by the time the debate takes place the government will have to face the loss of Egypt. The momentum of victory is carrying General Rommel forward at a furious pace, and the disorganized British Eighth Army is being given no opportunity to make a stand. Within a few days a last battle for Alexandria and Cairo may be in progress amid the tangled waterways of the Nile Delta, accompanied by an uprising of the many Axis sympathizers in Egypt. The outlook is extremely black, for if Egypt is overrun, the whole stretch of Middle Eastern territory from Suez to Teheran will be in jeopardy. Hitler will be within smelling distance of oil and in a position to put the screws on Turkey to bring it into his camp. Even without fresh victories in Russia this summer, the economic situation of the Axis will be immensely strengthened and Germany's morale will receive a boost sufficient to carry it through a fourth winter of war.

Against such a grim prospect Churchill can only set the fruits of his Washington visit, which, as displayed in the official joint communiqué, do not appear to be very rare and refreshing. The President and the Prime Minister were able to note promising developments in the production field but were constrained to add that transportation continues to provide a major problem. They promised forthcoming operations to divert Nazi strength from Russia, and they concluded by voicing the conviction that the over-all picture was more favorable than at the time of their previous meetings.

This cautious and vague statement is hardly likely to satisfy Mr. Churchill's Parliamentary critics, who can feel with some reason that they are voicing a rising tide of discontent among the people. This was exemplified by the victory at the Maldon by-election of a member of the independent Nine-Point Group described by Tom Wintringham in last week's Nation. Nevertheless, the chances are that Mr. Churchill and his government will weather the present storm if only because there is no alternative in sight. Sir Stafford Cripps, who is sometimes mentioned in this connection, has a considerable popular following, but it is extremely unlikely that he would be able to command a majority in Parliament. The more moderate critics of Mr. Churchill, therefore, are hoping that his leadership will be continued but that he will consent to turn over the Defense Ministry to other hands. This would enable him to give more attention to the government as a whole and to take up the task of eradicating that bureaucratic dry-rot which may prove on inquiry to have had a major share in recent British defeats.

The New Draft Policy

FOR the first time since the passage of the original Burke-Wadsworth selective-service bill in the summer of 1940, draft procedures have undergone a fundamental reorganization. As a result of provisions written into the bill giving financial aid to the dependents of fighting men, the Selective Service Administration last week requested the local boards to shift the draft classification from the familiar Classes I, II, III, and IV into four new categories which would include, in turn, single men without dependents, single men with dependents, married men without children, and married men with children. This is a basic change because it takes away from the local draft board the necessity for probing deeply into a married man's financial status before deciding whether he should be deferred. It makes family relationship rather than dependency the determining factor with respect to deferment.

There is undoubtedly much to be said in favor of the change. In the past many draft boards have deferred all married men, but others have taken them unless dependency could be established beyond question. This lack of uniformity in policy has been the cause of some bitterness and much needless anxiety on the part of men and women with established families. It is probable that if the change in policy had not been made mandatory many local draft boards would have regarded the new allotments for dependents as a green light for the immediate reclassification and induction of large numbers of married men. The new provisions should also be helpful in checking the withdrawal of married women from jobs because of fear that their employment will affect their husbands' draft status, and in encouraging married women to seek jobs in war industries, where they are badly needed.

The revised policy does not, however, meet the basic problem of keeping skilled agricultural and industrial workers where they can make the maximum contribution to the war effort. Local draft boards still must decide which men, in their opinion, are subject to deferment as "necessary men" in their civilian jobs; and in most cases local boards have been very reluctant—despite pressure from Washington—to grant deferment on occupational grounds. The new regulations may make this situation worse by increasing the pressure for the induction of single men, regardless of their occupations.

Under the law local boards cannot be forced to induct men merely to meet their quotas. The Selective Service Act specifically says that "quotas of men to be inducted . . . shall be determined for each state . . . on the basis of the actual number of men in the several states . . . who are liable for . . . service but who are not deferred after classification." But the average draft board is probably unaware of this provision of the law; and being under constant pressure to meet quota requirements may be tempted to reclassify men previously deferred for occupational reasons. General Hershey's order to the local draft boards specifically stated that new categories had no effect upon occupational classifications, but it is doubtful whether this warning will be sufficient to prevent a rather general reclassification of single men in essential industries. The horizon of local boards has far too often been limited to the town or area in which they work. They have been particularly unsympathetic in the case of workers who have left their home districts to take war jobs in some distant city.

The War Man-Power Board has sought to meet the problem by a directive, issued last week, instructing local boards to consult the United States Employment Service before classifying draft registrants skilled in critical occupations. But as industrial needs increase, it is evident that more drastic steps will be necessary if we are to make the maximum use of the skills of our population. Many men possessing skills badly needed in the war effort are not now engaged in war industries. Unless prompt action is taken, the single men in this group are likely to be inducted en masse within the next few months. To avoid this some sort of a "work-or-fight" order such as was adopted in the last war might well be issued.

There are, of course, many other imperfections in the selective-service machinery that have not been removed by the new procedures. The burden on the unpaid, understaffed, overworked draft boards has, if anything, been increased by the new orders. The least that should be done to ease the task of these men, who have sacrificed all their spare time for the country, is to provide them with clerical assistance. It is desirable also that there should be a general strengthening of federal influence over the local draft boards in the interest of uniformity and as a means of obtaining a broader view of national man-power policies.

[I. F. Stone is on vacation, and for the next three weeks his regular Washington articles will not appear.]

Defense Will Lose the Near East

BY ALEXANDER KIRALFY

VIEWED in proper perspective, Tobruk with its aftermath, the Nazi-Fascist invasion of Egypt, was neither a defeat of Britain's Eighth Army nor a reflection on its leadership and equipment. It was the inevitable result of the system of war adopted by the United Nations. Had the positions been reversed, with Marshal Rommel holding Tobruk and being attacked under similar circumstances by General Ritchie, Tobruk would still have fallen. The campaign thus far has been a repetition of the old story of the ineffectiveness of the defense against a carefully prepared attack. It is an example of what is bound to occur whenever the Allies' philosophy of winning a war tomorrow comes into contact with the Axis theory of winning a war today. Our methods are understandably based upon our late preparations and the desire to avoid more Dunkirks. The dilemma, however, is ours, not the enemy's, and he may be expected to take advantage of it at every opportunity.

The first principle upon which the Nazi-Fascists are acting is that Egypt is a primary front, whereas to the United Nations it appears to be a secondary front. According to our theory of war, the Russian is the primary front, and it is planned to create a second primary front, for instance in France, first to relieve the enemy pressure upon the Soviet armies, and then to cooperate with them in a drive into Germany. With this theory there can be no quarrel. If it can be worked out without decisive hindrance from the enemy, then obviously Egypt and a number of other regions will automatically fall into the category of secondary fronts.

The Axis powers, however, have created a number of fronts which they consider primary because they have dedicated them to the task of destroying the Allied primary fronts, actual and potential. The Egyptian front can easily become such a front, if it is not already one.

Marshal Rommel's drive appears to be part of a pincers movement which, together with the Axis drives farther north, is intended to outflank the Soviet armies from the south, sever their communications with the Indian Ocean sea lanes, and expel the Allies from the Near and Middle East. A concurrent drive to cut our lifelines to Murmansk would not only weaken Russian resistance but enable the Nazis to withdraw troops from the Soviet front to counter our attempt to establish a second primary front in Western Europe.

Since the initiative in such operations rests with Hitler, one cannot for the moment be certain whether this grand strategic movement is fully under way, or whether the present drives are an attempt to lower the Russian guard and expose the Leningrad-Moscow front. Berlin has the alternative of trying to crush the Red armies now or of continuing its push into the Near East.

In their attacks upon Malta, the Germans, in addition to observing their principle of having a number of primary fronts, employed a peculiar type of diversion which is significant in that it might be applied to Cyprus, a British island off the coasts of Syria and Turkey, and to other points. It consisted in bombing Malta so heavily as to suggest that an actual invasion might be expected. During the raids the defensive air force was compelled to remain close to the island, and British warships necessarily kept away. In the meantime, enemy troopships and transports were crossing from Italy to Africa in large numbers. This suggests that in such strategic positions a proportion of the defensive aircraft should watch for Axis shipping even when their station is under attack.

Other principles of war applicable to the present operation are directly derived from the defects inherent in any defensive system. Defense involves waiting, and during this time many opportunities are open to the attacker. Thus the Nazis have on a number of occasions adopted a pendulum-like method of operating. This consists of a number of partial moves culminating in an unexpected all-out dash. The latter can be successful if the defenders believe it to be just another partial movement. An Italian advance into Egypt stopped in mid-September, 1940; a Nazi-led thrust died out in the middle of 1941; and the extent of the present invasion may depend as much upon the entire scheme of German strategy as upon the sufficiency of the defenses of Egypt.

The last Axis advance upon that country took place over a year ago, the intervening period having been punctuated by a limited British invasion of Libya. During this time-gap the Germans were able to consign more powerful equipment to their Afrika Korps. The German Mark IV tank and the highly mobile eighty-eight-millimeter all-purpose gun appear to have been grim and decisive novelties on the Libyan-Egyptian front. The same time-gap may have permitted the enemy to devise means of overcoming difficulties of climate and terrain and of solving the attendant communications problems.

If it is not wise to rely too strongly upon such obstacles to continued invasion as distance, desert heat, and lack of watering facilities, it is also undesirable to minimize the importance of interrupting hostile communications across the Mediterranean. London has reported that on some occasions these have been severed for a week or more at a stretch, and that at other times Axis shipping had been reduced by one-half. Inasmuch as a full year elapsed between the halting of the last Axis offensive in Africa and the beginning of the present movement, great stores must have been accumulated in the Italian colonies. The greater the length of coastline that the enemy is able to conquer, the more protection he can furnish his shipping, and the farther United Nations airmen must fly to strike at important Axis bases.

Yet another principle that should be taken into account in the Egyptian operations is the distinction between the Axis and United Nations concept of neutrality, in this case as applicable to Turkey. There can be little question that the Nazis will move into Turkey when it suits them. An open plain funnels out before them to Istanbul, which is highly susceptible to aerial assault. This being the case, the importance of the Dardanelles diminishes considerably. As it is, the fortifications are already threatened in the rear by German positions in Thrace. In the Dodecanese Islands the enemy is within a stone's throw of Asia Minor, and the rumblings of the twenty-four-inch Nazi guns reported to be in action against Sevastopol are undoubtedly echoing in Turkey, to which country the Soviet naval base is no insignificant key. In the meantime Asia Minor acts as a shield for the Nazis' southwestern flank, and beyond, in Syria and Iraq, two other British armies are tied down and unable adequately to bolster the defenses of Egypt.

Unless some diversion can be created in this region, Britain's Eighth Army must remain exposed to all the pitfalls of a defensive campaign. Its leaders are facing no small task. The swelling ranks of the United States army and our ever-mounting production are compelling the Nazis to take drastic steps in an effort to make our strength innocuous by the expedient of seizing all possible territory from which we can bring our pressure to bear. And the more effective the bombings of Colognes and Bremens, the more will Berlin turn to Southeastern Europe for factory sites. All factors combine to indicate the Near and Middle East as a proximate Axis objective, and to this whole region Egypt is an important key.

Keep Them Out!

IV. THE REVEREND GERALD B. WINROD

BY WILL CHASAN AND VICTOR RIESEL

ON JUNE 5, 1940, the stenographer in a Wichita, Kansas, courtroom recorded an unusual proceeding. Mrs. Gerald B. Winrod, suing the Reverend Gerald B. Winrod for separate maintenance, testified that she could no longer tolerate his pro-Nazi views. Her husband, she told the court, "was preaching the gospel but filling it with Nazi propaganda against the United States." He was teaching their children that "everything Hitler did was right and that everything England and France did was wrong." He had unnerved her by asserting that he was to become "dictator of the country after the revolution," and that if any trouble developed he would take her to a hideout in Wyoming. He had made the threat of trouble seem ominous enough, she testified, by talking of the government's "closing in" on him and of conspiracies to capture him. He had kept their windows shut and their shades drawn, and had moved about the house with a gun in his hand. Finally, concerned for her safety and that of her three children, Mrs. Winrod said, she had fled to the sanctuary of a Wichita hotel.

Is the Reverend Gerald B. Winrod a fascist? The paunchy, Bible-thumping revivalist who plans to be a candidate for the United States Senate this fall says a "blacker lie was never spawned in the diseased brain of a red propagandist." His wife, he intimated darkly, had somehow fallen under the influence of international Jewry, which had circulated the charge of fascism to prevent him from obtaining the Republican Senatorial nomination in 1938. "The destroyers," he wrote in a recent open letter to Kansas Republicans, "knew that I possessed inside information concerning their plot of world revolution. They knew . . . I was informed regarding the true nature of the international Communist conspiracy to wipe Christianity from the earth. They knew, also, they could never hope to control me by the power of gold, or otherwise."

Winrod, who was the inspiration for Sinclair Lewis's Buzz Windrip, unearthed his international Jewish conspiracy shortly after Hitler came to power. His magazine, the Defender, which he began to publish during the Fundamentalists' war against the evolutionists, became stridently anti-Semitic and announced that Jewish conspirators were plotting to overthrow our government. Later he was to reveal that President Roosevelt's name really is Rosenfelt, and that the New Deal therefore represents not only a political but a "biological" problem. He was also to charge that the kidnapping of the Lindbergh baby was part of a Jewish-Communist plot. In January, 1935, after a visit to Germany made at the invitation of Dr. Otto H. S. Vollbehr, a propagandist for the Reich, he informed a meeting of his followers that his experience abroad had convinced him that Jews were responsible for all the ills of the world. Since then he has deluged the Bible Belt, in which he has concentrated his activities, with vast quantities of anti-Semitic propaganda, typical of which is a statement that Jew-Communists are getting Negroes to do their dirty work by promising that after the revolution Negroes will have all the white women they want. More significant politically, perhaps, is his frequently repeated accusation that "international Jewish communism is basically responsible for the present chaotic state of affairs." "The invasion of communism into the Orient two decades ago," he says, "sired the damnably vicious spirit of aggression that produced the tragedy of Pearl Harbor."

Now in his middle forties, Winrod was born in Wichita, where he was educated at the local grammar school. His father, a Fundamentalist preacher who is reported to have had the distinction of serving drinks in the first saloon invaded by Carrie Nation, then apprenticed him to an itinerant evangelist. Aside from a correspondence-school course in journalism, this concluded Winrod's education. He worked for a while as a clerk in a public-utilities company at Eldorado, Kansas, before he plunged into his career as a tent evangelist and rabble rouser. Along with William Jennings Bryan, he zealously campaigned against evolutionist teaching in the schools, threatening his opponents with lightning bolts and other manifestations of the wrath of God. When interest in the monkey battles ebbed, Winrod turned to Catholic-baiting, which was popular in Kansas during the Klan ascendancy. His experiences on the stump made him an effective orator of the somber, finger-pointing school, and his attacks on evolutionism and Catholicism endeared him to Bible Belt bigots.

Winrod's fascist activities, his wife's testimony indicated, date from his German visit; so do his Senatorial ambitions. On his return he told the Defender staff somewhat pontifically, "I am now absolutely sure of going to the United States Senate. When there I will make it my sounding board." Three years later, in 1938, he almost made good his boast. To "serve God and my generation"—Winrod usually implies that God is an active partner in all his ventures—he entered a four-cornered race for the Republican Senatorial nomination and immediately assumed the lead. Republican leaders, many of whom saw no possibility of heading off the "Jayhawk Nazi," became thoroughly frightened. William Allen White privately expressed the belief that Winrod's strongest opponent, Clyde Reed, a former governor who had actively opposed the Klan, had no chance of victory and warned that Kansas was "threatened by an outbreak of Nazi hysteria." Shortly before the primary Robert S. Allen reported in the Philadelphia Record that Winrod was an "easy three-to-two bet as the winner."

Winrod finally was beaten by a last-minute campaign directed by White, the Reverend L. M. Birkhead, a number of other churchmen, and the Wichita Allied Printing Trades Council. His opponents were badly hampered until the closing weeks of the primary race by the reluctance of John D. M. Hamilton, then National Chairman of the Republican Party, and other prominent Republican spokesmen to declare themselves for Reed. Hamilton, who dislikes Reed because the latter had elbowed him out of a nomination for governor, finally was induced to issue a statement against Winrod. But despite Hamilton's statement and one from Alf Landon, and the fact that Kansas was flooded with quotations from Winrod's pro-Nazi, anti-Semitic, and anti-Catholic writings—he once described the Roman Catholic church as the "harlot woman of the Bible" and said of Jim Farley, "being a ring-kissing Catholic, his first allegiance is to the temporal ruler of the Vatican, a certain Mr. Pius"—he polled 53,000 votes. This was not altogether surprising in a state which for a while was dominated by the Klan and in 1930 almost elected Dr. Brinkley, the goat-gland quack, to the governorship.

An aspect of Winrod's campaign which puzzled Kansas newspapermen was that it had very substantial and unexplained financial support. His finances had been the subject of general suspicion since his return from Germany. One reporter wrote, "Prior to a European trip in 1935, during which he visited Germany, Rev. Winrod had worked and lived on a modest scale. Upon his return he began blossoming out." It was estimated that Winrod was spending $5,000 a week, an unprecedented sum in Kansas politics, and probably more than the combined expenditures of his three opponents. Politicians familiar with the frugality of the average Kansan scoffed at his claim that he was being financed by dollar-bill contributions from his followers and the profits of his publishing house. Some believed he was being aided by reactionary business elements; others attributed his affluence to German support.

Another noteworthy aspect of the 1938 campaign was Winrod's lamb-like disavowal of racial or religious bigotry. He appealed to Republican voters with anti-New Deal broadsides, asked for the repeal of "experimental legislation," and, in the Bryan tradition, demanded the "restoration of the right to create money to Congress so that duly elected representatives of the people shall control the flow of currency." But he refrained from praising the accomplishments of the Third Reich, which he had commended to the Defender's more than 100,000 readers as the only regime that "has ever dared to try and completely extricate itself from the control of international Jewry." He represented himself as a pious, peace-loving Christian and democrat who had been greatly maligned.

Actually he has disseminated more genuine fascist propaganda than any other American pro-Nazi. The Defender has been an American version of the Stürmer; in addition, he has published two other magazines, both now defunct, and hundreds of pamphlets, and has delivered thousands of speeches, all embodying the Goebbels doctrine. He justified Germany's invasion of Czechoslovakia by saying that "Czecho-Slovakia was red and virtually a military base for Soviet Russia." He similarly justified Japan's aggression against China as a fight against the "red menace," and called the Spanish civil war the result of "Jewish fierceness." After his German visit he diligently spread the story that religious freedom had not been impaired by the Nazis, and that "no synagogues have been closed in Germany since Hitler came to power nor have the religious liberties of the Jewish people been jeopardized." Echoing the Stürmer, Winrod has charged that the Jews, whom he usually alludes to as the "Hidden Hand," got us into the last war and into this one through their control of the press and radio, that they drove Russia into communism, slaughtered millions of Christians, and dominated the French Popular Front government, and that the international Jewish banking fraternity controls the New Deal hierarchy and the Churchill Cabinet. He characterizes liberalism as a "cancer, a disease eating into the flesh of American life." In a weird pamphlet entitled The NRA in Prophecy and a Discussion of Beast Worship, he charged that the NRA was the mark of the beast—"Satan's messiah." In the same pamphlet he wrote, "I am reliably informed that there are places in Russia where in order to get work, food, and a tax rate that is endurable one must have the Hammer and Sickle tattooed on his flesh."

Winrod's activities have been closely integrated with those of other members of America's fascist network. This was especially obvious during the foreign-policy debate, when he delivered numerous speeches against aid to England, circulated anti-war petitions, and quoted most of the known American fascists in the Defender. The list of those whom he has published and praised in the Defender reads like a who's who of American fascism. It includes Father Coughlin, Gerald L. K. Smith, Colonel Sanctuary, James True, ex-Congressman Jacob Thorkelson, R. E. Edmondson, Lawrence Dennis, and a score of others. He has been praised in turn by most of them; Smith recently placed him on his list of outstanding Americans, and Edmondson once named him on a fascist roll of honor. Winrod has made extensive use of World Service, a German propaganda agency.

Most of Winrod's own publications are a bizarre mixture of fundamentalism and fascism. The Defender prints along with its anti-Semitic screeds articles which denounce the cigarette as an instrument of Satan and demand a new prohibition amendment. A typical one begins, "Should Christians play cards? That is the burning question before all Christians today." The answer is No. Winrod does an extensive mail-order business in religious publications and articles. He issues a catalogue which advertises everything from pencils to neckties, all with appropriate religious inscriptions, and has published a booklet called "What Is Wrong with the Movies?"—a nothing-is-held-back exposé of sin in Hollywood.

Gerald B. Winrod

Winrod's chief backing comes from a group of thirty to forty influential Fundamentalist preachers, who accept his leadership, invite him to address their congregations, and write for the Defender. One of them, the Reverend George D. Blomgren of Chicago, accompanied Winrod to Germany. Another, Dr. W. D. Herrstrom of Akron, once replied to the charge that pamphlets written by him were being sold in the Aryan Bookstore, a Nazi agency in Los Angeles, with the observation that it was "as important to evangelize Nazi Gentiles as it is to evangelize Communist Jews." The Reverend Harry H. Hodge of Beaumont, Texas, a close friend of Congressman Martin Dies, is also a Winrod associate. There is excellent reason to believe that in the summer of 1937 Hodge was instrumental in having Dies call off an investigation of Winrod. As a matter of fact, a Dies committee investigator visited Newton, Kansas, where the Defender is printed, but was mysteriously recalled.

Winrod's Fundamentalist followers provide him with an excellent political base, and those familiar with the Kansas electorate regard his political activities with misgivings. No one concedes him a chance of victory over Senator Capper, who is a Kansas institution and an old-line Borah isolationist, but it is felt that if he becomes a candidate, as now seems likely, he may poll 75,000 votes. Pearl Harbor has wrought no change in his views. His circular letter to Kansas Republicans rehashes his old diatribes against the Jews, blames the war on the Communists, and refers to the New Deal as if it were some colossal sin. That he is a crackpot pure and simple does not alter the fact that his insistent propaganda has won thousands of supporters. Unless he is watched, he may some day be shouting his ugly opinions from the floor of the Senate.

Housekeeping in France

BY AMO PALLAVICINI

FOUR weeks ago I arrived in this country from France. While my memory is still fresh, I should like to describe my daily life there, which was that of the average French housewife.

It is the last day of the month, and rationing cards must be renewed for the coming month. A quick glance at the newspaper to see when people whose names begin with P, the first letter of our last name, are to be called. Our turn comes tomorrow; the office is open from eight in the morning until noon.

I make sure to get up early. The morning air is cold, and the night's stars still glow faintly. As I reach the Town Hall of the little place in the south of France where we have been living for several months, the church clock is striking seven. Even at this early hour there are ten people awaiting their turn. You never arrive early enough! Young women and old stand patiently in line, all of them bundled in sweaters and knitted cap-mufflers which cover the head and shoulders. The little old woman just ahead of me is not wearing shoes. Instead, she has wrapped her feet in rags held on by strings carefully tied around her legs. She tells me she made a written demand for shoes three months ago but has received no reply.

At nine o'clock my turn comes. The fat man at the desk doesn't seem to be in very good humor.

"How many people in the family? Your identity cards, please."

I hand him the cards with my ration book. "Five, sir," I answer; "three children, my husband, and I."

Each person has a ration book and, in addition, special coupons renewable each month which entitle him to bread, meat, oils and fats, cheese, milk, soap. The ration book itself contains coupons for monthly allotments of sugar, coffee, noodles, rice, chocolate—the last two items issued only to babies and growing children. Each book is marked with a number and letter indicating the classification of the owner—for example, adult, worker, child, baby. The classification determines the quantity and kind of food allotted.

The clerk takes my five sheets marked Bread and painstakingly inscribes on each names and numbers corresponding to those on my five ration books, a procedure repeated for meat, cheese, and the rest.

By the time I reach the grocery with my precious coupons a line of fifty has already formed. If I take my place at the end of it, not only shall I surely miss my turn at the butcher's but by the time I reach the bakery not an ounce of bread will be left. I quickly decide:

about face and off to the butcher's. After a half-hour's wait I manage to get my allowance of meat (the meat ration is two ounces per person twice a week). Veal again! For two months we've had nothing but veal. Have I the right to buy any delicatessen? The butcher says that my number will come up in three days and that if I'm lucky I may be able to get a slice of ham for my two-year-old daughter. But he warns me to arrive by seven in the morning or no ham will be left.

Back to the grocery store. Fifteen people are still ahead of me. By the time I get inside there is little left—some carrots in a basket, on the counter a few cabbages, and in a corner four leeks. I have brought an empty bottle—you must have a bottle for liquids and a bag or piece of paper for wrapping your noodles, sugar, and the like.

"Your turn, madame. I haven't very much for you today." This is the grocer's formula. Hopefully I hand him my bottle and ask for some cooking oil.

"No more oil or sugar until the fifteenth, madame."

For the past eight days I haven't had a single drop of oil or an ounce of butter in the house. I'll have to cook in water. My booty at the grocer's is meager indeed; I've managed to buy six carrots, a leek, and a little cabbage. As I go out the door the grocer advises me to get there early tomorrow morning, because he is expecting some vegetables.

With my half-empty shopping bag I go home, planning our dinner and supper on the way. "Let me see, I still have some potatoes in the cellar, and with the slices of tomatoes I strung together and dried last fall, I can make a sauce. Two potatoes for each of us. That will be the plat de résistance. There's no fruit in the house, so I had better pull up some salad from the garden. But I have no oil. Well, I'll make a dressing without oil—without vinegar too. And what shall we have this evening? I'll add some carrots, the cabbage, and the leek to the water I cooked the potatoes in. Perhaps I can put in some lettuce leaves and a handful of noodles. That will make our evening soup." By the time I reach the house, the menu is decided on.

It's cold in the house, and the children are half frozen even though fully dressed for outdoors. But we can't make a fire. Our coal ration is 660 pounds for the whole winter and wood is scarce. We light the fire only in the evening and only in the room we use from five until eight. It's never really warm there, but once the stove is going we can bear to take off the coats, berets, scarves, and gloves we've been wearing all day.

As most French mothers have no one with whom to leave the children while shopping, children stay in bed, securely tied for safety, and are at least warm during the long morning hours when their mothers are in queues.

Now, about my midday dinner. First of all, everything must be peeled, sliced, and ready for the evening soup before the gas is turned on. Gas is furnished for only two and a half hours a day—half an hour in the morning, an hour at noon, and an hour in the evening. I peel the potatoes, add water, and set them on the stove. On top of this pot I must put another for the tomatoes. The steam from the potatoes will heat the sauce at the same time, and I shall then have a free burner for the laundry. On another burner I put the evening soup.

Today is Monday, wash day. Last night I soaked the clothes in tepid water to which I added "soap powder," a chemical compound that actually contains very little soap. The clothes can't be washed with regular soap, for the soap ration is barely enough to keep us clean. This afternoon I shall wash the clothes with the doubtful "soap powder." Usually I add a little wood ashes to the water, wrapped in an old rag. After the water has boiled, the clothes go in, and the ashes manage to bleach them in an hour.

In the evenings I usually busy myself trying to darn the children's clothes. The word "darn" is a euphemism because darning cotton, needles, buttons, and elastic are no longer to be had. And anyone who doesn't happen to have some left over from earlier days must resign herself to torn clothes. Every scrap of material is precious. Each button or bit of elastic is jealously guarded. This evening I rip two of my old sweaters to make a pull-over for one of my three daughters. The colors don't match well, but that doesn't matter as long as the sweater keeps her warm. The other day I finished making a pair of children's stockings out of an old scarf.

Shoes are another problem. To obtain a pair of shoes you must go to the Town Hall and make a written request for a shoe-purchase card. You must be able to show that you have no other shoes at home and that those you are wearing are completely worn through. You make your request, fill out a detailed form, and then one fine day the answer comes—"Application rejected."

The problem of repairs is equally serious. Shoemakers find it impossible to obtain thread, leather, or nails. Most women and many men are wearing shoes with soles and heels of wood and uppers of canvas trimmed with a bit of leather. Almost all the children wear wooden shoes.

Tuesday comes, and, shopping bag in hand, I go down to the corner and wait for the street car. Today we're going into Marseilles to celebrate Jean's birthday. A quick look at my shopping bag to make sure that I've forgotten nothing: coupons for bread, meat, butter, cheese, and a little wooden box containing a few lumps of sugar. I've also put in some presents for Jean. Not pre-war presents to be sure; I've pulled up some turnips, radishes, and four magnificent heads of lettuce. He will be pleased with the gifts, for in the city the food problem is even more acute than it is in the country.

I'm the last to arrive. Madame D. is there with her daughter. The pretty brunette in the corner has just arrived from Cannes. My Paris neighbor, who has been living here for some time, is just as gay as ever. There are half a dozen men at the party.

The major topic of discussion is food. What else is there to talk about? We exchange menus—and also the names of dressmakers who provide their own thread. My Paris neighbor describes how to cook eggplant with very little oil. Madame D. tells me you can find dried bananas at one of the stores. They're delicious and nourishing, and you don't have to be on the store's list of regular purchasers to get them. Poor Madame D. was rash enough to use up all her provisions, thinking she could soon leave the country. But still her visa does not come. One of the men, who is said to be well informed, says: "These gentlemen [the Germans] are badly in need of leather and have been slaughtering a large number of cattle, which explains why my butcher can offer nothing but veal." And it appears that in Cannes people have only rutabaga to eat.

"Everyone come to the table," says our hostess.

We rush to seat ourselves. Silence settles down over the table. Everyone takes a quick glance at the casserole and begins to calculate how big a serving he will receive. The courses are served in the casseroles in which they were cooked; not a drop of oil or sauce can be wasted. Each one furtively compares his serving with that of his neighbor. Hunger does strange things to men and women. You are ashamed, but you will continue to make those secret calculations, those furtive comparisons. Wine has been rationed at a liter a week per person, so we content ourselves with water. When the plates are carried back to the kitchen one might think that they had never been used. Not a speck of food or sauce remains on them.

Then comes the sorest point of the evening, the moment when the men take out their cigarettes. Only the men are entitled to a tobacco rationing coupon. It provides four cigarettes a day. Everyone saves stubs, and not only his own; if a visitor should by chance leave a stub in the ash tray it is quickly retrieved and stored away in the "stub box." With the stubs of four cigarettes you can eke out a fifth smoke.

Even in the midst of these hardships we retain our sense of humor. The evening in town was amusing, and waiting in queues in our own village I've often laughed at a "good one" told with all the savor of a singing Marseillais accent. And now and then, too, I've detected a glimmer of hope among my neighbors that the Germans will soon be worn out and that then they will be driven out of France.

Thoughts on "World War III?"

[The article by J. Alvarez del Vayo, World War III?, published in The Nation of June 20, raised questions of great importance both in waging the war to a democratic victory and in achieving a people's peace. The Nation asked a number of persons of various nationalities, expert in the field of international relations, to contribute comments on the main points covered in Mr. del Vayo's article. They were asked specifically (1) whether they believed that the new agreements with the Soviet Union provided a basis on which the democratic forces in the United Nations could work toward the establishment of a democratic peace; (2) whether they believed that a new and more thoroughgoing system of collective security should be developed to replace the League of Nations and if so, what form it should take; (3) whether they thought that a Socialist reconstruction of Europe was necessary to insure a durable peace; (4) whether they believed that Article III of the Atlantic Charter should be amended so as to make it possible to prevent the establishment or continuance of fascist governments; and (5) by what means they thought the interests of the peoples themselves could be expressed in the future world organization. Some of the comments received appear below. Others will be published in subsequent issues of The Nation.]

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Dean emeritus of the Law School of the Royal University of Budapest; at present chairman of the American Federation of Democratic Hungarians

EVERY honest democrat should welcome Mr. del Vayo's well-considered suggestions. He will realize, too, the difficulties which they imply. Mr. del Vayo's parallel between the Congress of Vienna and the Paris Peace Conference seems to me somewhat inaccurate. Napoleon's warriors, after all, carried the ideas of the revolution in their knapsacks, and the Holy Alliance served as a Maginot Line against liberty until the July and March revolutions cracked it. This is probably why the British preferred the Reform Act to the Holy Alliance. After World War I it was merely German megalomania which the treaties were supposed to keep in check.

Clemenceau, in a whimsical mood, once said that war was much too serious a business to be left to the military, but apparently peace was not serious enough or it would not have been left to military-minded civilians. The conflict between military and civilian authority has to be faced in every war that is fought against an aggressor in order to maintain the status quo, of which reactionaries are always the strongest supporters. Some of them still do not realize that Hitler's objective is not the protection of their property. Even less are they aware of the hopelessness of defending liberty and the democratic way of life without "a drive toward social security and economic democracy."

In spite of this I do not quite share Mr. del Vayo's pessimism, because in the long run the people are always stronger than any international conspiracy of appeasers and reactionaries. "Men," as Count Sforza has recently so well put it, "die only for ideas—for moral ideas."

MICHAEL STRAIGHT

Washington editor of the New Republic

OF COURSE I agree with Mr. del Vayo's analysis of the dangers present in this war, and with his insistence on the necessity of organized political action for liberal ends. I would be still more specific: everyone who agrees with Mr. del Vayo has the immediate duty of joining some such organization as Free World and spreading its ideas, and at the same time of undertaking community action in the November elections to rid Congress of the potential betrayers of the next peace.

Three points raised by Mr. del Vayo might be re-emphasized. First, it is necessary to clarify the relationship between popular movements and governments. Mr. del Vayo fears the Foreign Offices; but, after all, the British and the American governments are good governments, and, more important, they are allied with the governments, not of Metternich and Talleyrand, but of Litvinov and T. V. Soong. Our duty is first to strengthen the interrelations of these governments, which still are weak, then to maintain for these governments a freedom of action that will enable them to create the future.

Second, in Mr. del Vayo's skepticism about our ability in war time to dispossess the forces of reaction I sense a defensive attitude toward the war. I am sure the Foreign Secretary of the government which first showed to the world that war could be a time of glorious democratic development is not so burdened. Why does our thinking here still tend to be defensive? War itself is working for us when it demands the conscription of wealth and the full utilization of resources, if only we can understand the process. Because conservatism opposes world organization and liberalism leads the fight for it, we need to develop to the utmost this domestic struggle, insisting that war is only an example of a nation working at full blast, and that any nation which wishes to continue at full blast must retain and develop the kind of controls which war creates.

Third, Mr. del Vayo writes of the Third World War. But who is to be the aggressor in this war? From what causes is it to arise? We need to be very clear about what war is likely to follow this war.

Mr. del Vayo suggests that the next war may arise from a return to power politics. I doubt this. Because the foundations of world organization are already in existence, there are even in this war elements of civil war. These foundations cannot be destroyed by a political settlement, however bad. So it follows that the next world war, if we permit it to come, will not be an imperialist war, but a civil war. I doubt that Germany will play a primary role in this war. It will be a war between Russia and ourselves to determine which of our two systems will become the basis of world society.

Four score and seven years passed between Philadelphia and Gettysburg. For the next hundred years our object will be to unite the world without a world civil war. We shall succeed only if we simultaneously create a world allegiance among all peoples and destroy the primary basis of civil war, which is social conflict. That we shall do only if our government retains permanently the functions and powers which it now possesses.

HENRI LAUGIER

Former director of the French Foreign Office; at present general secretary of France Forever

THE article by J. Alvarez del Vayo is of capital importance because it invites the United Nations to "reflect." The coalition needs greatly to reflect, not only to win the war, but to organize the world after the peace.

1. The third point of the Atlantic Charter cannot serve as a basis for the peace. It is the duty of the democracies concerned to establish in the countries which they will have conquered or liberated, democratic governments founded on popular sovereignty; it is equally their duty to set the people on the road to liberty by placing their economic, financial, and military resources at the service of these young governments.

2. A peace based on balance of power would be absurd. Only those who still cling to the hateful remnants of the past can think of such a peace. The new peace must create a spirit of "world citizenship." The sovereignty of the states must be subordinated to the well-being of morally and materially powerful international organizations.

3. Given the present development of science, techniques, and thinking, narrow nationalisms, shut in by the physical delimitations of their frontiers, are an offense to the mind. I am certain that the reconstruction of Europe can be founded only on forms which respect the value of manual and intellectual labor and which free all workers from the bonds imposed on them by powerful economic systems.

4. The problem of the relations between the democracies and the Soviet Union after victory is won is assuredly a grave one, rich in promise but charged with dangers. My feeling is this: if, after the destruction of Nazism, the democracies have faith in their own cause, if they show themselves to be constructive and resolutely face the future, if a mystique of a conquering, universal democracy is created—then the pacts between Soviet Russia and the democracies concluded during the war have every chance of developing and drawing the whole world toward a fertile cooperation in the future. On the other hand, if on the morrow of victory the democracies return to their conservatism and show themselves hesitant or hostile to broad social experiments, black days are in prospect for them.

CARLO SFORZA

Former Foreign Minister of Italy

SINCE I believe that general discussions of this sort are at present more suitable for Americans than for foreigners I shall limit myself to a few facts and recollections.

I do not believe that any political party as such can assure peace and progress to Europe. History is made by men, not by formulas. Can we forget the pitiful show made by the German Socialists when they came to power? At the end of 1918, however, Wilson demonstrated that a man possessed of a religious idea may exercise a powerful influence on the world. Why, then, did he partially fail? Because having gone to France as a prophet, he there accepted the role of diplomat, specifically when he compromised with the Japanese on Shantung. He thought that since he had created, in the League of Nations, the remedy for the ills which led to the war, any injustices and blunders in the peace could be corrected later on. History is, of course, interwoven with blunders and remedies. But the normal, indolent course was too dangerous to follow just after millions of men had died—many of them for an idea—in the trenches from the North Sea to the Piave. And after this war such a course would be even more dangerous.

The history of Europe before 1931 is not designed to create a feeling of optimism concerning its leaders. When public opinion in England and, to a lesser degree, in France revolted against the policy of complicity with Mussolini in the Ethiopian crisis, Anthony Eden and Delbos replaced Sir Samuel Hoare and Laval. But shortly thereafter an even more dangerous crisis arose—the Spanish civil war. And Eden and Delbos committed, passively if not actively, the same errors for which they had denounced their predecessors. Is it possible that the disease of the democracies is the same that has afflicted all great European dynasties and families, which after a few generations lose their possibilities of leadership?

As for the League of Nations, even as it was it might have saved the peace of the world. It was the men who should have used it loyally as an instrument of peace, not the League itself, that failed. The League of tomorrow needs two things, both of which are much simpler than an "international police force." First, it must give up unanimity in favor of a majority quorum. Second, it must return to the basic idea stated in the first draft of the League Covenant, namely, that only those states may be members which are governed according to the freely expressed will of their citizens. Wilson's first error, under pressure of the "realists," was to drop this provision from the final draft. Such a clause in the Covenant would have prevented Fascism in Italy.

The Italian people would have overthrown Fascism at the start of the Ethiopian adventure if the honest backing of the League had been given them. The responsibility for their failure to do so rests with the "official" foreign foes of Mussolini, who were in reality his secret supporters. This strange phenomenon has not yet quite disappeared. For that reason the United Nations may, with regard to Italy, face new disillusionment, further loss of prestige and precious time.

THEODOR DAN

Russian Socialist leader, formerly a member of the Executive Committee of the Second International

MY FRIEND del Vayo is right: the destiny of the future peace depends upon the social forces that shape that peace.

Peace will not last if, after the present war, human society is again ruled by social forces that place the preservation of property and profit over the interests of men, and the principle of competition among individuals, groups, classes, races, and nations over the principle of human solidarity. Under such conditions it would be impossible to find forms of organization that would enable diplomacy, the new League of Nations, and the police force at its disposal to act as agents of peace and freedom.

The present war has tied with unbreakable bonds the countries of the world, and it has revealed so clearly the connection between their form of government and the menace of war that talk about "non-intervention" cannot be taken in earnest. As a matter of fact, "non-intervention" has always been a delusive phrase. The only thing that has mattered is the question how and for what purpose to "intervene." Brute force is not always needed for this; the German and Austrian Socialist revolutions of 1918-19 were not strangled by military intervention but by economic pressure. With them the new-born democracy was strangled, too; the way for Hitler was paved; and war became inevitable.

Fascism in all its varieties cannot be uprooted from European soil without a European revolution, and today even more than in 1918-19 this revolution can be only a Socialist revolution. Will this European revolution be smothered by military force or economic pressure, or will the tremendous military and economic resources of the victors help it? Not the academic question of the "right of intervention in internal affairs" but the how and the purpose of intervention, a question vital for freedom and peace, will become pressing as the military collapse of Hitler draws nearer. The way this problem is solved will decide whether the peace will inaugurate a long epoch of progress or whether we shall have only a short respite before the outbreak of World War III.

In the Wind

SEVERAL DRAFT BOARDS in Virginia and other Southern states have been classifying Indians as Negroes. After inquiries were made, the War Department was asked for a ruling not only on Indians but also on men of mixed Negro-white origin. Indians, it said, should be classified as whites. In cases where there is doubt as to whether white or Negro blood prevails, an investigation of the selectee's associates is to be made. He will then be classified in the group to which most of his friends belong.

ACCORDING TO the Socialist Call, one of the liberal Congressmen was prepared to introduce a bill to repeal the restrictions on Chinese immigration. He was prevailed upon to withhold it by certain State Department officials, who asserted that the Chinese government felt that it was unwise to raise the issue now in view of increasing race sentiment in this country. A short time later Ambassador Hu Shih was asked about his government's attitude toward the bill. He said that he had never heard of it.

THE LONDON TABLET, leading Catholic paper in Britain, approved the appointment of Professor Carlton Hays to the Madrid embassy and interpreted it as evidence that the United States was trying to please Franco. It went on to say: "Crude attempts to present the war as not primarily a struggle against the aggressive, nationalistic Germans, but as a war in which all countries are more or less divided into fascists and anti-fascists, is all too popular among American writers, but it finds no reflection in American foreign policy."

FRANCO'S PROPAGANDA BUREAU in this country, the Spanish Library of Information, has been expanding its activities. A new daily release publishes only news emphasizing Spain's ties with Britain and this country.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

How Russians Fight

RUSSIA'S FIGHTING FORCES. By Captain Sergei N. Kournakoff. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

RUSSIANS DON'T SURRENDER. By Alexander Poliakov. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

THE two books under review approach the subject of Russia's armies from completely different points of view. Captain Kournakoff's book is an academic history of the fighting forces of Russia, supplemented by a studious analysis of the operations of the Soviet-German campaign in 1941. Alexander Poliakov, on the other hand, gives a stirring, hour-by-hour account of the activities of a Red Army unit in action in July, 1941, as seen by a participant.

Captain Kournakoff's main thesis is that Germany lost the war in July, 1941, because of a series of blunders on the part of the German High Command and the Red Army's strength, fortitude, and equipment. The author analyzes these factors in detail. His figures on the quantity and quality of Soviet material are based on Soviet publications. They seem as accurate as any estimates I knew of in Moscow and are probably more complete than any published to date under one cover in this country.

The Captain's outline of the history of Russia's armed forces, which goes back to medieval battles against Teutonic knights, has interest for students of military history but not much excitement for the layman. His play-by-play account of the Soviet-German war, based on the daily communiqués, is enlightening to anyone who tries to follow the operations of the present war. In a number of places, however, he gives no sources for his rather glib assertions—for example, on page 210, where he writes that "allowing for all kinds of mistakes and inaccuracies there is no doubt that the Russians are inflicting at least twice as many losses in men as they suffer themselves."

Throughout his book Captain Kournakoff adheres rigidly to the "party line." He suffers, moreover, from a narrow military point of view, and his book falls somewhat short of a 100 per cent orthodox characterization of Russia's fighting forces. Certain phases of the Red Army's history and activity considered important in Moscow are not mentioned. For example, Stalin, as quoted in the Red Star for February 22, 1940, characterize the Red Army as "... the army of the world proletarian revolution, the army of the oppressed and exploited peoples of the whole world. . . ." The captain interprets the Russian armies in terms of Russia's military history and the Red Army's present leadership, equipment, and personnel. The revolutionary character of the Red Army, which Stalin emphasizes, is hardly mentioned.

Captain Kournakoff, as he himself relates, comes from an old family of Russian military men. He served in the White Army against the Bolsheviks during the civil war, and for the past twenty-one years has been a resident of the United States. Although he has unquestionably been a careful student of Soviet military publications, the fact that he has neither been in Russia nor had any direct contact with the Red Army for more than two decades limits the value of his work.

"Russians Don't Surrender" is a much more forceful book than Captain Kournakoff's, though it is hardly fair to make a comparison. The author, a correspondent for the Red Star, was attached to an unidentified unit, probably a division, which, passed by the advanced German army spearheads during the first days of the war, spent nearly a month—from June 27 until July 22, 1941—behind the German lines. According to all the traditions of modern war a unit thus surrounded, left dozens of miles behind the front, surrenders. Russians, however, do not surrender. The division had some munitions, a little food, and an indomitable will to destroy as many Germans as possible while behind the enemy lines, fight its way back eastward, and rejoin the main forces of the Red Army. The men suffered terrible privations. Poliakov himself, though a correspondent, took part in the fighting and was wounded three times. For three and four days running the men had no food, no water; they were shelled by enemy artillery, bombed by enemy planes.

The local peasantry, embittered by the German atrocities, gave every support to Poliakov's division. Village boys of eight and ten would go whistling up to a pool where German officers were bathing and while one or two boys cheerfully scrubbed the backs of the officers, others stole their dispatch cases from under their clothes on the bank and disappeared into the woods to give the valuable papers to the commanders of Poliakov's unit. The division not only fought its way back to the main Russian forces, but burned German supply dumps, misdirected enemy mechanized units, captured tanks, trucks, armored cars, and artillery, and destroyed whole units of the German army.

Poliakov does not mention the history or tradition of Russia's fighting forces. It is not necessary. He recounts only what he saw, and what he and his comrades did. It is an incredible story told in such a matter-of-fact manner that I frequently found myself under the impression I was reading a fairy tale. I had to thumb back over old newspapers to see that both the German and the Russian communiqués during the summer of 1941 had spoken of whole Red armies which, though left behind Hitler's mechanized units, did not surrender, but fought with what the Germans referred to as "insane Oriental bravery."

JOHN SCOTT

Mitchell on Baldwin

STRATEGY FOR VICTORY: A PROGRAM TO DEFEAT THE DICTATORS. By Hanson W. Baldwin. W. W. Norton and Company. $1.75.

FOR a nation at war the only important problem is how to win. "Strategy for Victory," by Hanson W. Baldwin, well-known military critic of the New York Times, is perhaps the best of several recent books on this subject. The author has the good sense to stay away from partial and easy answers, and he does not, like Colonel Kernan, try to fit his book to the popular mood or overlook pertinent facts which might interfere with his conclusions. Nor is he a pleader for any special type of warfare. Add to these qualifications the fact that Mr. Baldwin is probably the best-informed military critic in the United States today, and the result is a volume that is thorough, objective, well-balanced, and to the point.

The book starts with an analysis of the present military situation of the United Nations. The vital fields of the war which they must hold in order to win are defined as Britain, the Caucasus, and the Middle East in the western theater of war; and Siberia, India and China, Hawaii, and the Alaska-Aleutians line in the Pacific. To these he would doubtless add the Atlantic lifelines. He does not find the physical possession of Australia any great advantage as it is at best a distant and insufficient base for use in a campaign against Japan. However, the holding of all of these territories is essential to our ultimate victory since the Axis has already made such immense gains that any further losses might be fatal. We can win, but only if we cease repeating the mistakes that Britain made before us.

These mistakes are rather definite. Internal divisions and pressure groups may be as fatal a handicap as weak organization and lack of responsibility where responsibility is needed. Mr. Baldwin justly condemns a public-relations policy which has kept from the American people essential war facts already known to the Axis and a propaganda that has wet-nursed the public by emphasizing minor successes and glossing over serious blunders and reverses. Public relations should be based on a policy of telling all the truth possible and should be more intelligently directed. He has no sympathy with pressure groups and no excuses for the clearly avoidable blunders of our Washington bureaucracy. Nor can he detect a well-thought-out plan for concentrating our power in vital areas in the present spraying of armed strength all over the map.

The use of army, navy, and air forces for taking a genuine offensive is well described. Present army plans are entirely inadequate to give us a victory on the continent of Europe without continued Russian resistance. The torpedo and bomb have replaced the gun as the dominating weapon in naval war, but the superiority of land-based over carrier aviation does not make as much of an impression on Mr. Baldwin as it does on Major de Seversky. Mr. Baldwin does not feel, for example, that the possibility of carrier raids on Japan or a sea-air offensive through the Japanese mandates is eliminated by the presence of enemy air bases.

By their very nature, such studies as "Strategy for Victory," written as they must be several months before publication, are open to criticism. The strategic situation in the Pacific, for example, has changed in several particulars since the book went to the printer. One surprising omission is the total lack of any mention of the plan prepared by the Joint Board of the War and Navy Departments in the fall of 1941, which, as a result of a departmental leak, was published in part in the Chicago Tribune three days before Pearl Harbor. The authenticity of this plan has never been denied, and subsequent happenings have tended to confirm its genuineness. It should therefore receive very careful consideration in any discussion of basic war strategy. A misspelling of the name Cyprus on page 139 offers evidence of somewhat careless proofreading.

Some newspaper reporters have described Hanson Baldwin as "nerveless." It would be more accurate to say that he has strong emotions—at times he writes feelingly, almost passionately—but that they do not in the least affect his cool, realistic mind. Save for an underestimation of the Soviet Union and an inability to foresee the full weakness of Italy in the Greek campaign—in both errors he had plenty of company—his analyses and predictions have come remarkably close to the truth. The Hanson Baldwin fans, of which this reviewer is one, will not discover a great deal that is new in "Strategy for Victory." It does offer an impersonal, hard-headed approach to the problem of winning the war.

DONALD W. MITCHELL

New Deal Washington

WASHINGTON IS LIKE THAT. By W. M. Kiplinger. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

WITH the aid of forty assistants, Mr. Kiplinger has turned out a useful and much-needed volume. In 502 highly readable pages the machinery of New Deal Washington is removed for the average citizen from a plane of suspicious theory to a level of concrete problem-and-solution. Rich in personal and chatty detail yet retaining the crispness of the Kiplinger letters, this combination guide and political handbook tells exactly how Nelson and Henderson go about the business of ordering war production, how farming has already become the most highly centralized industry in America, how each of the alphabetical agencies functions and through what kind of personnel, how lobbying has become a respectable and vital part of the American government, what Congressmen do when they're not going through the motions on the floor, how Supreme Court decisions are prepared, and a host of other pertinent facts ranging in scope from the raising of campaign funds to the regulation of prostitution in the capital. There is an optimistic chapter on the progress toward a fairer deal for Negroes in the federal structure and a well-intentioned, if theoretically dubious, discussion of Jews in government. Many chapters deal with Washington as a municipality and the daily lives of its citizens, and the book is generously sprinkled with thumbnail sketches (not too acute) of government, labor, farm, business, and society leaders.

Mr. Kiplinger's thesaurus is journalistic rather than ideological, but its rambling content is unified by two prime convictions, contradictory on the surface though not in fact. The first is that centralization of control over the national economy, call it state socialism or merely government planning, is here to stay and has in fact already gone a long way. Mr. Kiplinger sees the farm program, for example, as an accomplished "social revolution," furnishing "a general pattern for efforts to bring about an integration of other industries in the future." He expresses neither favor nor disfavor; he merely reports. But his reporting is hopeful, and he looks forward to "the greatest building era in history after the war." What makes him optimistic is the prospect that the economic planning of the coming new order will be a joint project of government and private minds. Thus along with an increasing degree of centralized control he sees a trend toward a purer democracy, to be exercised through legitimate pressure groups and private cooperators, with Congress presumably acting as an arbiter, weighing the objectives of one pressure group against another. To further this working relationship between citizen and government he counsels a greater popular intimacy with the problems of administration and a greater degree of participation in politics. "Shrinking from politics," he writes, "is really a shirking. The reason people shrink is that they regard politics as something dark and mysterious." His book is intended to resolve the mysteries, and as far as the mechanics of government go—which is far enough for one book—it fulfils that purpose admirably.

ROBERT BENDINER

Poems by Kenneth Patchen

THE DARK KINGDOM. By Kenneth Patchen. Harriss and Givens. $2.25.

HERE is proof, if proof is needed, that Mr. Patchen is a poet. But he is also a seer, and there seems to be some danger that the seer will eat up the poet. It is possible that the seer has already taken a chunk out of the poet. What is left is, however, interesting enough. There is a wealth of exciting images and sharp phrases, sometimes splendid, sometimes horrible, always violent and apocalyptic ("Three naked girls hung by their hair/From the pole of the roof," "His tail was a spool of snakes," "My skeleton boy picks roses/in the infinite river of my walking," "Like the thinking/Of a mad man in a woolen cell," "The sick who sauce their doings with God"). The world of these images is only a nightmarish refraction of our world, and it is hard to see exactly how it is related to our ordinary world. No two poets establish this relationship between the ordinary world and the world of poetry in precisely the same way, but it seems that the poet is under some obligation to indicate the nature of the process by which the world of non-poetry becomes the world of poetry. The trouble is not that Mr. Patchen disregards the obligation, but that he accepts it too impatiently and desperately. He is not content bit by bit to lead us to discover his world. Instead, he affirms his world too vehemently, too whole-heartedly. The seer cannot wait on the slow process of poetic exploration. And this means that though there is poetry in this book there are few poems with a recognizable structure.

It would be interesting to try to define the vision which the seer seems to be too impatient to define fully in poetic terms for us. Provisionally, one might surmise that Mr. Patchen is struck by the contrast between the "horror" and the "beauty" of life at the level of nature, and is led to affirm the possibility of reconciliation upon another level. But that affirmation of the seer is, at present, vague and, it seems, too easy. Perhaps the affirmation needs more of the documentation which the poet in Mr. Patchen might provide.

ROBERT PENN WARREN

[Coming soon in The Nation: A review by Reinhold Niebuhr of "The Problems of Lasting Peace," by Herbert Hoover and Hugh Gibson.]

RESORT

QUISISANA CAMPS

At Center Lovell, in Maine's Pine Woods in the White Mountain Region
SITUATED ON LAKE KEZAR, The Most Beautiful Lake in U. S. A.
QUAINT • RESTFUL • ROMANTIC

Cheerful individual cottages with bath, fireplaces, electricity. Main Lodge rooms with or without private bath. Food of highest quality, wholesome, tempting. Golf, tennis, boating, swimming, natural sand beach. Excellent fishing: Salmon, Black Bass. No car is necessary to come to Quisisana Camps. Convenient train or bus transportation. We meet all trains and buses. Non-Sectarian. Ownership-Management.

Weekly Rates from $38 American Plan — Lower Rates during June to July 15
WRITE FOR BOOKLET QUISISANA CAMPS, CENTER LOVELL, MAINE

AMUSEMENTS

CHERYL CRAWFORD presents

George Gershwin and DuBose Heyward's

PORGY AND BESS

"Go see 'Porgy and Bess' if you go see nothing else."

—Kronenberger, PM

PRICES:

Evs. . . . $2.75 to 55¢

Mats. . . . $2.20 to 55¢.

Air-Cooled MAJESTIC THEA., W. 44 St. Evs. Incl., Sun. Mats. Wed. &amp; Sat.

EDITORIAL INTEGRITY . . .

A Publication's Most Precious Asset

The strength of any publication is in the last analysis a matter of character. And to the 30,000 people who read The Nation each week, the integrity of its editorial content is a matter of fact, not of speculation. This faith in The Nation's determination to present a true account of controversial issues typifies journalism's most valuable contribution to public relations activities—a background which inspires belief in advertising copy. For details, phone ALgonquin 4-3311 or write

THE NATION

55 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.

Don't Miss An Issue!

To Keep THE NATION coming regularly
just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $_____.

☐ One Year $5

☐ Two Years $8

☐ Three Years $11

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER

to new subscribers only

☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name.....

Street.....

City.....

State.....

Extra postage per year: Foreign and Canadian, $1.00

7-4-42

IN BRIEF

THE HOUR BEFORE THE DAWN.

By W. Somerset Maugham. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

The twilight hour of Mr. Maugham's professional life is dark indeed. His latest novel, written with his chin up, his tongue in his cheek, and his eye on Hollywood, lacks the old cynicism, but it lacks, too, the old craftsmanship. However, in a stock story of how the war affects the lives of a typical English county family there is a point worth comment, that Mr. Maugham has a single refugee in the book, a young Austrian girl who turns out to be a Nazi spy and betrays the family and country that gave her refuge. It seems strange to have to remind the author of "Of H-m-n B-nd-ge" that to kindle suspicion of refugees in the minds of his large audience is scarcely cricket.

GENTLE ANNIE. By MacKinlay Kantor. Coward-McCann. $2.

Want to read a Western? If you do, this is a first-rate one, with no pretensions to be anything but what it is—an exciting, two-listed, two-gunned yarn to sell to the movies. Mr. Kantor seems to be that rarest of all creatures, a person who can appear in his shirt-sleeves without needing to assure you that he has a coat in the closet. Recommended reading for a cheerful hour of escape.

THE OTHER HORSEMAN. By Philip Wylie. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

America wasn't at war when Mr. Wylie wrote this story of an American boy who comes home from war-torn England to find his family and his entire town fiercely isolationist. When written it was propaganda, but six months after Pearl Harbor Mr. Wylie's novel reads like history; it is published in the hope that like all history it has a lesson for the present. Mr. Wylie's anger produces a well-intentioned anatomy of reaction rather than good fiction.

AND NOW TOMORROW. By Rachel Field. Macmillan. $2.50.

Rachel Field's last novel ran in McCall's. It is as good an example as you'll find of the talent it takes to write bad fiction for a wide public—the right blend of sentimentality and sincerity, the proper veneer of educated prose over stock situations and hollow characters. The story is made to formula: there's a heroine, of good family but diminishing means, who loves unwisely, becomes deaf, loses her fiancé to her sister, regains her hearing, and marries the doctor who cures her. It is faintly interesting that "And Now Tomorrow" includes a labor situation; the world in which we live seems to require that even the women's magazines cast an occasional sympathetic but well-bred glance at the other side of the tracks.

THE FOUNDATIONS AND THE FUTURE OF INTERNATIONAL LAW. By P. H. Winfield. DEMOCRACY: THE THREATENED FOUNDATIONS. By Reginald Leonard. The Macmillan Company. $1.25 each.

These two recent titles in the Current Problems Series, edited by Ernest Barker, compress authoritative information and timely interpretation into small compass.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

The Globe Playhouse: Its Design and Equipment. By John Cranford Adams. Harvard. $5.

Parity, Parity, Parity. By John D. Black. The Harvard Committee on Research in the Social Sciences. $2.

Shooting the Russian War. Written and Photographed by Margaret Bourke-White. Simon and Schuster. $2.75.

Education for Citizen Responsibilities: The Roles of Anthropology, Economics, Geography, History, Philosophy, Political Science, Psychology, Sociology. Edited by Franklin L. Burdette. Princeton. $1.50.

The Judicial Function in Federal Administrative Agencies. By Joseph P. Chamberlain, Noel T. Dowling, and Paul R. Hays. The Commonwealth Fund. $3.

Fair Is Our Land. Designed and Edited by Samuel Chamberlain. Introduction by Donald Moffat. Hastings House. $5.

The Pocket Entertainer. Compiled and with an Introduction by Shirley Cunningham. Pocket Books. 25 cents.

Assignment to Berlin. By Harry W. Flannery. Knopf. $3.

The Post-War Industrialization of China. By H. D. Fong. National Planning Association. 50 cents.

Pan American Progress. By Philip Leonard Green. Hastings House. $2.

What's in a Novel. By Helen E. Haines. Columbia. $2.75.

The Indian Problem. By Viscount Halifax. Oxford. 15 cents

Three Poets and Reality: Study of a German, an Austrian, and a Swiss Contemporary Lyricist. By Ruth J. Hofrichter. Yale. $2.

Youth in the CCC. By Kenneth Holland and Frank Ernest Hill. American Council on Education. $2.25.

Dialogue with Death. By Arthur Koestler. Macmillan. $2.

Colloquial Japanese. By William Montgomery McGovern. Dutton. $1.85.

Sonnets to Orpheus. By Rainer Maria Rilke. Norton. $2.50.

Refugees at Work. Compiled by Sophia M. Robison with a prefatory note by Eleanor Roosevelt. King's Crown Press. $1.50.

A First Russian Reader. By Anna H. Semeonoff. Dutton. $1.95.

A New Russian Grammar in Two Parts. By Anna H. Semeonoff. Dutton. $1.95.

Lincoln Among His Friends. By Rufus Rockwell Wilson. Caxton. $5.

DRAMA

WITH his variety entertainment entitled "Laugh, Town, Laugh" (Alvin Theater) Ed Wynn helps "bring back vaudeville." More sensationally, "Star and Garter" (Music Box Theater) brings back burlesque—which hasn't been dead so long but which died violently at the hands of the Lord High Executioner Moss. At $4.40 per seat burlesque is physically a good deal cleaner and brighter than it used to be but otherwise just about as dirty.

Ed Wynn's show has a number of good acts in addition to the featured performers—Jane Froman, a kind of female crooner if that is what you call them, and the Latin American dancer Carmen Amaya. It also has Wynn himself as master of ceremonies, but it is very economically produced and despite a good deal of talent somehow manages to add up to no more than a rather mild if perfectly decorous entertainment. "Star and Garter," on the other hand, is quite another matter. Michael Todd, the producer, has laid about him with a lavish hand to achieve one of the gaudiest and most generally splendidous orgies seen here in some time. He has also employed Bobby Clark to cavort while Gypsy Rose Lee poses or struts, and my guess is that though not everybody is going to like it, the show will be a big hit. I must confess that such aphrodisiac exhibits have always seemed to me a bit in the nature of Barmecide feasts, but the girls are unusually handsome and most artfully displayed. The minimal costumes (credited to Irene Sharaff) are especially original and display a kind of satiric wit which is quite delightful. It is, however, unfortunate that Miss Sharaff didn't write the words too. The Bunny, an elaborate, skilful, and childishly naughty "production number" has a good tune and comes off very well indeed. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RESORTS

31 WAYS TO HAVE FUN

For a vacation of action or relaxation Chester's offers an unbeatable value. Big parade of all-star attractions, including 4 fast clay courts, private lake and swimming pool, 2 badminton courts, handball, bicycling, 25 other outdoor and indoor sports. Gala evenings, featuring a brilliant theatre group. Gastronomical treats in three magnificent performances a day. Unusually reasonable rates.

Write, wire or phone your reservations
N. Y. Office: TEL. LO-5-5857

WOODBOURNE, N.Y. Tel. WOODBOURNE 1150

CHESTERS ZUNBAR

ADELPHIC WIDEWAY IN THE MOUNTAINS

For convenience and conviviality—Come to FOREST HOUSE

Near enough for easy travel—far enough for peace and relaxation, FOREST HOUSE offers every vacation advantage. 2 Splendid lakes. Best of accommodations, food, sports.

50 Miles from N.Y.C.
Phone MAHOPAC 689

FOREST HOUSE
Lake Mahopac, New York

Live YOUR HOLIDAY AT CAMP MILFORD
KENT, CONN.

On beautiful Spectacle Lake—2½ hrs. from N.Y. The ideal vacation spot—famous for its gay informality and rustic charm.

Every Social and Athletic Activity
Write for booklet
MICKEY MICHAELS, Dir.
11 W. 42 St., N. Y.
Penn. 6-7842

JULY AUGUST RATE $34.50

GLENMERE

- Easy to Reach—Hard to Forget
- In the Ramapo—Commuting Distance
- 1800 Acre Estate—51 Miles from N. Y. C.
- Superb Accommodations and Cuisine
- Private Lake; Golf Course; All Sports

SPECIAL RATES
By the MONTH, SEASON or YEAR

Glenmere

CHESTER, NEW YORK
Phone CHESTER 200
N. Y. C. Phone • REctor 2-5047

CRANE LAKE LODGE
WEST STOCKBRIDGE, MASS.

Informal Adult Camp
RUTH & MURRAY CAPLAN

- Private Lake • Tennis • All Sports
- Orchestra and Social Staff
- Excellent Golf and Riding nearby
- Convenient Rail Connections
- Special Rates for Season Guests and Children
- American-Jewish Cuisine Booklet N.Y.

3 MILES TO BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER
N. Y. C. Office: 225 West 34th St., CH 4-6205

BERKSHIRES

RESORTS

ALLABEN ACRES
ALLABEN, N.Y.

Exhilarating sports with a background of cool mountain air... picture postcard scenery. Piquant entertainment and Sidney Bechet's music for inspired dancing. Yummy menus too... plus "shiny new-penny" bungalows.

JULY 4th WEEK-END
TWO FUN-FULL DAYS - $13.
N. Y. OR 23 W 42nd St. PE 6-3063

SWIMMING • TENNIS • BADMINTON • HANDBALL • BOATING • ARCHERY • SAILING • BASEBALL • RIDING • FISHING • RECORDINGS • SIDNEY BECHET'S BAND • SPARKLING REVUES

★ STAR LAKE CAMP ★
IN THE GLORIOUS ADIRONDACKS

Between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground, 1,800 feet elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Canoeing, Swimming, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Interesting one-day trips arranged. Delicious wholesome meals. Rate $27.50 weekly. New Bungalows, semi-private baths for couples—$30.00 per person. Dietary laws observed.

Send for Booklet—New York Office
116 NASSAU ST., Room 802a, CO 7-2667
Sundays, Evenings, Holidays—PR 4-1390
Auto service from and to New York every Saturday and Sunday

FOR THE TIME OF YOUR LIFE

Here's that well-balanced vacation you are looking for! Gorgeous Plum Point, only 55 miles from New York, with its 70 restful, green acres touching the Hudson. Recreational activities to exercise and relax your muscles. Dancing and entertainment. Heaping courses of appetizing foods. Splendid rooms with sleep-inviting beds. What are you waiting for?

plum point
ATTRACTIVE RATES FREE BOOKLET
New Windsor, N.Y. Newburgh 4270

CAMP COLEBROOK
Colebrook Elver, Conn.
formerly an exclusive Country Club

- Private lake surrounded by 800 acres of pines and hemlocks
- Artistic bungalows facing lake
- Tennis, handball, ping-pong • Croquet green, archery • Social activities • dancing.

JULY RATE — $30 - $35
Phone Worth 2-3458 Evenings or Winstad 237-4

HATHAWAY LODGE

Formerly the palatial 592 acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, most with open fireplaces and private porches. Tennis, Handball, Swimming Pool, Horseback Riding; also Golf nearby. Marvelous food.

SPECIAL 4th OF JULY WEEK-END RATES
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Tel. Tannersville 299 • N.Y.C. Tel. Murray Hill 2-2424

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake

- A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.
- All Sports — Open All Year

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

ADDITIONAL RESORT ADVERTISING ON INSIDE BACK COVER

RESORTS

MOST for your Vacation Dollar

famous for GOLF

Once you've had your vacation you cannot 'turn back the clock' and wish you had gone elsewhere. Choose your vacation carefully. Compare COPAKE'S Vacation Facilities, famous for 20 Years.

Write for Giant Photo Folder.
N. Y., 152 W. 42nd St. - Tel. CH. 4-1668

COPAKE
COUNTRY CLUB
CRARYVILLE, N. Y. IN THE BERKSHIRES

CAMP UNITY
Fun on the 4th

An all-star week every week... all sports, dancing and novelty entertainment by our popular Broadway staff!

FRANKIE NEWTON
And His Minor Jive Boys
HEADLINES GALA PROGRAMS

Handball Concerts Swimming
Tennis Revues Boating
Horsehoses Swell Food Baseball
RATES: $24-$25 week • $4.50 day
MAKE RESERVATIONS NOW!
N. Y. Office: 1 Union Square, AL 4-8024

CAMP UNITY
WINGDALE, N. Y. OFF. UNION SQ. N. Y. C. AL 4-8024

LOCUST GROVE FARM

A "smallish" informal place overlooking miles of scenic hills. All sports, nearby lake, barn dances, good company. Just 55 miles from New York.

- OPEN ALL YEAR •

Limited Accommodation — Low Rates
George A. Podorski : Locust Grove Farm
SYLVAN LAKE, HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.
Phone 42 F 31

CAMP ANNISQUAM
Gloucester, Mass.
ABRAM RESNICK
Director

This Adult Camp...
in safe little sheltered cove near picturesque Gloucester. Salt water swimming, sailing, boating and fishing on premises. Dancing, tennis, trips and all sports. Six hours by train from New York.

Write for booklet and rates

VALCOUR LODGE
On Lake Champlain Valcour, N. Y.
7 miles south of Plattsburg
Modernly Equipped Bungalows

ALL SPORTS EXCELLENT FOOD DRESS INFORMAL
Write for Illustrated Folder (N)

WALTELL HOUSE on FRANKEL FARM
MT. BETHEL PENNSYLVANIA

The Only Modern Farm Hotel combined with a Children's Day Camp. All sports. Your hostess: Ella Frankel

For booklet, Write or Phone
Bangor 62T3. N. Y. C. phone: MU 2-8970

Tall Pines
High in the Dutchess County hills 80 miles from N. Y. ... Land and water sports... a design for leisure. ... The beauty of summer beckons.

July Fourth Week-End • $4 to $5 per day
Pleasant Valley, Dutchess Co., N. Y. Phone 2741

RECORDS

THE additional May records that I have been expecting from Victor have not yet arrived; but I have received Victor's June set of its abridged version of "The Barber of Seville" (Set 898, $8.93), which is offered as something more than a mere collection of some of the favorite arias and a few of the duets and other concerted numbers. The version is called a "recordramatization"—the point of the title being that what has been recorded constitutes an abridged drama which is complete and continuous as far as it goes—which, in other words, is not dramatically discontinuous at any point because of anything that is omitted at that point. "The aim was to preserve all of Rossini's great solos, duets, and other ensemble pieces, as well as several of his most delightful recitatives. In addition, the problem was . . . to make, as far as possible, only those cuts which would impair neither the continuity of text nor a sensible presentation of the action." And there is also the statement that this is a recording of the production that Charles L. Wagner sent out on tour, which offered an abridgement that one would suppose was a dramatically continuous whole.

Since the claim is made I am bound to note that we get on side 11 the amusing "Peace and joy be with you" entrance of the Count disguised as Don Alonzo, and on side 12 the consternation-producing entrance of Basilio, but not the material that leads from the first entrance to the second and that is responsible for the consternation. And side 6 begins with Basilio's "You speak very well," omitting the statement of Bartolo which Basilio is commenting on. From this I suspect that the recording cuts the Wagner abridgement further; but having noted the discontinuities because of the importance that Victor sets on dramatic continuity, I will add that this continuity is essential in an abridgement for a stage performance, but not in a series of recorded excerpts which are going to be listened to with a printed text carrying the listener from one excerpt to the next. More important than the discontinuities I have mentioned, then, are the difficulties created by the fact that side 11 begins with Bartolo's solo recitative "Ma vedi il mio destino," whereas the text for this side omits this and begins with the Count's "Peace and joy," and that the text gives all the material leading from the "peace and joy" passage to Basilio's entrance without indicating that this material is omitted on the record; and the difficulties created throughout by the way the text is arranged and inserted. What the set calls for is an alternation of (1) summary of what is omitted, to the point where something begins on the record, and (2) words that are sung, to the point where something is omitted—and all this printed in a booklet that can be held and followed easily. Instead the set gives a complete synopsis of the story first, then the isolated texts of the passages on the records, so that one is obliged to refer back to the synopsis to discover the context of a particular passage; and the sheets on which all this is printed are inserted in the album between the pockets containing the records—which would have point if what is on a sheet corresponded to what is on a record, but which is worse than pointless without this correspondence, since if one is playing the records on a machine without a record-changer one has to hold the heavy album filled with records and to keep flipping back and forth, first from the sheet with the text of the last record to the pockets of this record and the next, then back to the sheet with the text of the next record, then back to the synopsis to see where this occurs in the story, then back to the text.

These, fortunately, are defects which can easily be remedied, and which in any case affect what is less important than the music that is on the records and the way it is performed and recorded. This music is charming, amusing, at times delightful; it is conducted with appropriate lightness and sharpness by Bamboschek; some of it is well sung; and the recorded sound on a Scott 23 with either the light, wide-range Brush PL-25 pickup or the heavy, limited-range Astatic Tru-tan is very good—one difference being that Reggiani's soprano is agreeable with the Brush but cold and piercing with the Astatic, and another that the surfaces are a little gritty with the Brush and quiet with the Astatic. Reggiani's singing is in other ways—agility, accuracy, style—good; and Ramirez is an excellent Figaro. But Landi's tenor is unpleasant when he sings loud or fast or both; and in quiet passages his distortion of phrases is that of the Italian tenor at his worst (for the phrasing of the Italian tenor at his best listen to Schipa's Victor record of "Ecco ridente" and "Se il nome"). Garney has a beautiful bass, but not the voice nor the style that can make Basilio's "Calumnia" aria effective or convincing. The others are acceptable in what they are called on to do.

Two groups are working to provide army camps, naval bases, and marine stations with records. Records for Our Fighting Men Inc. intends to collect old, unused records for sale to the record companies as scrap, and to use the proceeds for new records. Armed Forces Master Records Inc. is asking not for old scrap, but for good records—records of good music and in good condition. And inasmuch as the buyer of records nowadays has to surrender or pay for old records when he buys new ones, because the retail dealer has to obtain old ones to turn in to the manufacturer if he wants new ones, I would take scrap records to the dealer and give good records to Armed Forces Master Records Inc.

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

ALEXANDER KIRALFY, an authority on military and naval strategy, has contributed to Asia, The Nation, and official publications of the United States army and navy. He is the author of "Victory in the Pacific: How We Must Defeat Japan."

WILL CHASAN has written frequently for The Nation on political and labor developments.

VICTOR RIESEL is on the staff of the New York Post.

AMO PALLAVICINI is a Frenchwoman recently arrived in the United States.

JOHN SCOTT, former Moscow correspondent of the London News-Chronicle, is the author of "Behind the Urals: An American Worker in Russia's City of Steel."

DONALD W. MITCHELL, a close student of naval and military policy in the United States, is The Nation's regular military analyst.

ROBERT PENN WARREN was until recently on the staff of the Southern Review. He has just published a new book of verse entitled "Eleven Poems on the Same Theme."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 11, 1942

NUMBER 2

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

21

EDITORIALS

Odell Waller

24

Taste of Defeat by Freda Kirchwey

25

ARTICLES

Ships and New Fronts by Paul Maxwell Zeis

26

Farmers vs. the Farm Bureau by Dale Kramer

28

Thoughts on "World War III?" by G. A. Borgese, Julius Deutsch, Reinhold Niebuhr, and Octavio Mangabeira

30

Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison

33

In the Wind

34

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Bugbear of Pragmatism by Jacques Barzun

35

Mr. Hoover on Peace by Reinhold Niebuhr

36

The Free French in Africa by Hal Lehrman

37

Lafayette by W. E. Woodward

38

Music by B. H. Haggin

39

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

40

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON    MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

CONGRESSMEN OF ALL PARTIES APPEAR TO be worried about their political fates in the coming elections, and their nervousness is manifesting itself in strange ways. It has led some of them, for instance, to challenge the right of citizens to examine and comment on the speaking and voting records of their representatives. More normal are the attempts to sidetrack supposedly unpopular issues, the efforts to propitiate organized groups, and the heightened interest in patronage. We should like to suggest that, far from smoothing its path to reelection, Congress as a whole is encouraging a movement "to turn the rascals out" which will result in sweeping changes on Capitol Hill. The temper of the electorate is absolutely against politics as usual. People are not interested in being let down gently in the matter of war sacrifices if as a result the war effort is hampered. They would like to have from their Congressmen more courageous leadership and less querulous straddling. They are not likely to overlook such matters as the Congressional record on inflation control, which has combined timidity and delay with downright obstruction. Price control was postponed for many months and when finally authorized was left with a yawning gap owing to Congressional subservience to the farm bloc. Now an attempt is being made to hamstring the Office of Price Administration by cutting down its appropriation from the $161,000,000 requested by the Bureau of the Budget to $75,000,000. If the Senate confirms this action by the House, Leon Henderson will be left to fight inflation with one arm tied behind him. It will be impossible to police effectively the price-ceiling orders, and the majority of defense districts are likely to be deprived of rent protection. Congress should understand that any upward revision in the cost of living will sit very badly with the voters.

✱

ANOTHER ACTION BY THE HOUSE CALLING for a lot of explanation is its blocking of the Department of Agriculture appropriation as amended by the Senate. Two points are at issue: the authorization of the sale of government-held farm commodities at below parity prices, and the appropriation of $222,800,000 for the Farm Security Administration. Faced by a surplus of wheat beyond all possible needs, the government wants to sell part of its stocks for feed at prices which will encourage the production of more meat and eggs. Both of these are commodities the demand for which threatens to outrun supplies. Many farmers and farm organizations support this move, but it is strenuously opposed by the Farm Bureau, which, representing mainly the large farmers, is determined to maintain the parity principle at all costs. This organization has also lobbied constantly against the Farm Security Administration, for reasons discussed by Dale Kramer in an article on page 28. The House has followed the Farm Bureau line, while the Senate has supported the Administration, although its amendment failed to restore to the bill the full appropriation asked for the FSA. Now there is a deadlock which has left the Department of Agriculture without funds to operate in the year which started on July 1. Replying to a letter signed by leaders of seven farm, labor, and religious organizations on July 3, the President strongly condemned the "pressure-group tactics" blocking the sale of government surplus grain and indorsed the Senate's proposals for the FSA appropriation as important to the war program.

✱

THE STRANGE, UNHAPPY POLICY OF THE United States toward our fighting allies, the Free French, is symbolized in the observance of Free French week, which begins this Wednesday. This is a popular celebration—as it should be. The people of the United States have a keen emotional regard for the courage and devotion to freedom which have led Frenchmen to leave their country and fight on every sea and continent for its liberation from the tyranny of Hitler. But Free French week will go unnoticed by our government. The celebration will open with an exchange of greetings between Wendell Willkie, speaking in New York, and General Charles de Gaulle in London. While our President keeps a discreet silence—the silence of appeasement—the honors are done by Mr. Willkie, who has somehow managed to become a sort of unofficial President who can do the things and say the things that Mr. Roosevelt would like to do and say but dare not. Though we admire his stand, we begrudge Mr. Willkie the role of spokesman for freedom; it should belong to the man we elected President.

✱

OUR NAVAL FORCES IN THE NORTHWESTERN Pacific celebrated July 4 by successful submarine attacks against Japanese destroyers, three of which were sunk while a fourth was left burning. These vessels were discovered in the westernmost Aleutians, where at least three islands have been occupied by Japanese forces of unknown strength. Added to previous losses inflicted by our airmen, the sinking of these warships makes the total bill paid by the enemy for his excursion into Alaskan waters a fairly heavy one. Nevertheless, behind a curtain of fog which seldom lifts sufficiently for our air reconnaissance to observe their activities, the Japanese appear to be extending their hold in this desolate but strategically important region. Whether they are planning to pursue their island-creeping technique with a view to an eventual attack on Dutch Harbor and the Alaskan mainland, or whether their primary purpose is to establish bases for interrupting communications between the United States and the Russian Far Eastern provinces, it is impossible to say. But in either event Japanese occupation of the outer Aleutians is a menace which ought to be ended at the earliest possible moment. Air attacks, limited as they are by adverse weather conditions, are unlikely to be sufficient to accomplish the job, but it was the only form of activity reported by the army and navy until the Independence Day submarine foray. Consequently, there has been a tendency in some quarters to suggest that our service chiefs were not taking the Aleutian invasion seriously enough. We find this difficult to believe, but we hope that plans for expelling the Japanese will not prove long in maturing.

✱

BY THE TIME THIS ISSUE OF THE NATION appears, a New York draft board will have decided whether Ralph Ingersoll, editor of PM, is of more value to the country than Private Ingersoll of the United States army. When the board decided in the first instance that he belonged in the armed forces, Mr. Ingersoll—who volunteered in the last war a year before he was subject to the draft—quietly reported for induction, declined to appeal, and asked his employer, Marshall Field, not to appeal on his behalf. Despite this request, and we believe with good reason, Mr. Field did appeal, contending that the editor was waging an important battle on the home front—a fight for better morale, a fight against disrupters, intellectual saboteurs, and other war-time luxuries. But this kind of warfare breeds bitter enemies, and the appeal in Ingersoll's behalf has given his favorite targets an opportunity they could not fail to snatch. "He allows his country's call to go unanswered," says McCormick's Chicago Tribune, which has now to compete with Field's Chicago Sun. "Dodging the draft," says Cissie Patterson's inflammatory Washington Times-Herald. "So far as I know," says the brave Representative Rankin, hiding under the cover of Congressional immunity, "he is as patriotic as any man who ever dodged the draft—by proxy." And Coughlinite defenders of fascism, with fine irony, picket his offices. Do these mean-spirited little people demand that Ingersoll be drafted because they think he would make a great soldier, do they consider service in the United States army a punishment, or do they just want to get rid of a man who knows them for what they are and has had the courage to expose them?

HITLER BOASTED IN "MEIN KAMPF" THAT it would be a "simple matter" for him to produce unrest in the United States. "We shall soon have storm troopers in America . . . we shall have men whom degenerate Yankeedom will not be able to challenge." Yet in the six months that the Third Reich and "degenerate Yankeedom" have been at war Hitler and his agents have not accomplished a single large-scale act of sabotage against the American production that means their ruin; and when, for lack of inside talent, they were reduced to the desperate device of landing two contingents of Nazi wreckers with their supplies on the beaches of Long Island and Florida, these supermen were challenged so quickly that they had hardly had time to fill up on good American food before they were arrested and headed toward trial and swift judgment. As Francis Biddle pointed out the other day in his report on the campaign against sabotage, espionage, and sedition, we should not derive a false sense of security from the cheerful record of the first six months; but we can't help crowing a bit over the fact that the Nazis have had about as much success here as they had in Russia in recruiting a native fifth column of saboteurs; otherwise they would not be forced to attempt fantastic landings on our coasts.

✱

IN GENERAL THE LAST FORTNIGHT HAS been unhealthy for German agents in this hemisphere. Max Stephan, German-born, was convicted of treason in Detroit for assisting a Nazi prisoner of war, Hans Peter Krug, who had escaped from Canada and had been lavishly befriended by Stephan. Gerhard Wilhelm Kunze, Bund leader, who is wanted in Connecticut on charges of espionage, was arrested in Mexico after he had failed in an attempt to escape in a fishing boat. He has already been sent back to Hartford. And from the Canal Zone comes news of the arrest of twenty persons whose subversive activities included the supplying of fuel and information to Nazi submarines operating in the Caribbean. They are no doubt directly connected with many of the sinkings of the past weeks. The central figure in this story, which is, as usual, more sensational than fiction, is a business man of British Honduras who was also trying to escape by sea, presumably to board a Nazi submarine, when navy patrol planes captured his boat.

✱

BOTH THE INDIAN NATIONALISTS AND THE British government appear to be feeling their way toward a reduction in the gap that separates them, and as a result there has been some easing of political tension in India. A reorganization of the Viceroy's council has made possible increased Indian participation in the government on the lines proposed during the abortive Cripps mission. Sir Firoz Noon Khan, a moderate Moslem, has been appointed Minister of Defense, and Dr. B. R. Ambedkar has been named Minister of Labor, thus giving the 60,000,000 "untouchables" of whom the latter is the leader a representative on the council for the first time. With the enlargement of the council non-official Indian members enjoy a clear majority. At the same time two Indians have been appointed to sit with the War Cabinet in London; this puts India in the same position on that body as the Dominions. While Britain has been making these concessions, Gandhi, in his usual frank way, has announced a change of views. He now believes that "foreign troops are necessary for a defense of India" and is therefore prepared to welcome the Anglo-American forces provided they leave as soon as the crisis is over. However, the Mahatma's statements are always subject to interpretation, and the gloss he himself offers on this occasion leaves much unclear. For instance, he thinks that the military forces protecting India should not exercise any authority over the people of India—a proposition which, to put it mildly, seems to offer insuperable administrative difficulties. Nor will practical Western minds be attracted by the suggestion that India express its philosophy of non-violence by sending ambassadors to Rome, Berlin, and Tokyo, "not to beg peace but to show them [the Axis powers] the futility of war."

✱

FRANCO'S ORDER PUTTING GENERAL QUEIPO de Llano under "forced residence" in Malaga could be dismissed as one more incident in the latent struggle between the army and the Phalanx if the past behavior of the General did not contribute a special flavor to this latest clash. As an officer Queipo's record in the Spanish war was neither better nor worse than Franco's, though he could at least boast of having won Seville and Cadiz at the very beginning and so of rendering a great service to the rebellion. But he injured his considerable military prestige by his ungoverned passion for oratory. Every night in broadcasts to Spain and Latin America he expounded his remarkable views on the war and the world at large—views which, it was generally believed, found their source in the excellent sherry of which Queipo was a connoisseur. Nevertheless, he held his high post of military boss of southern Spain until the end of the war. The peace did not agree with him. He was the first officer of his rank to take an open stand against the hegemony of the Phalanx, and Franco, in order to get rid of him, sent him to Italy on a special military mission. But on his return to Spain he came into constant friction with the group around Serrano Suñer, and his nationalist feeling hardened against the increasing, humiliating submission to Hitler's half-visible army of occupation. If he really went so far as to take part in an embryonic conspiracy, it would not be for the first time. He revolted against the monarchy at the end of the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera; he revolted against the republic with Franco. Each time he revolted on the winning side; but for all that, his latest rebellion could easily be exaggerated, and we hope the State Department and the British Foreign Office will not be carried away by the illusion that they have at last found their Man.

★

ABOUT 40 PER CENT OF THIS COUNTRY'S garment industry is located in New York City, not more than 5 per cent in the South. Yet when the War Production Board allocated contracts for army uniforms, the South got more than 40 per cent of the work and New York got less than 5. The explanation lies in the supposed saving on labor costs, the result of lower Southern wages, but in its zeal for economy the WPB has managed to upset the labor situation in both places. Lack of army contracts and war-time restrictions on civilian production have already cost 84,000 New York workers their jobs; the unions estimate that between 100,000 and 150,000 more will soon be unemployed. While the New York workers are idle, the Southern employers face a labor shortage. They must hire workers off the farms, where they are desperately needed, and spend valuable time teaching them the trade. While the New York shops are idle, the Southern operators, some of whom did not even have factories when they accepted contracts, are diverting critical materials from war production to build plants and machinery. Senseless and wasteful as all this is now, it is likely to have even worse consequences after the war, for both the plant capacity and the labor supply of the garment industry will far exceed the probable demand. The leaders of the needle-trade unions deserve a hearing on their request for an immediate reallocation of contracts.

Odell Waller

TO MANY persons Odell Waller was just a man who had committed murder under somewhat extenuating circumstances. For such persons Waller's death, as the New York Times suggests, marks the "end of a chapter." A crime was committed and the appropriate penalty was exacted. But for thousands of other persons Odell Waller was a symbol of the faults which lie deeply imbedded in American democracy. The fact that Waller was both poor and a Negro made his case symbolic of the struggle of the under-dog in our society and—more especially—of racial discrimination. For this group his death does not mark the end of a chapter. Instead, it obstructs the solution of some of our most grievous social problems. It causes division in our ranks at a moment when unity is essential.

When, as a result of technicalities, all legal recourse was blocked, we hoped to see the sentence against Waller commuted on purely humanitarian grounds, and we think Governor Darden made a grave mistake in sending him to his death. There was at least some reason to believe that the share-cropper killed his landlord in self-defense, and there was even better reason to question the fairness of the trial. He was convicted by a jury made up, in accordance with Virginia practice, only of poll-tax payers; as a consequence Negroes and share-croppers were automatically—though not legally—excluded, and it had been argued that Waller was therefore judged not by a jury of his peers but by men drawn from a higher economic level. As a matter of fact, all but two members of the jury were landowning farmers like the man he killed. Although the Supreme Court had refused, on purely technical grounds, to review the case, it was widely felt, especially among Negroes, that the Waller conviction was a bad case of class justice. This feeling linked the trial to the disturbing problem of the morale of America's 13,000,000 Negro citizens.

Negroes have heard the President define our war aim as freedom and democracy for all without regard to race, color, or creed. They have heard, within the past fortnight, an appeal for loyalty from Federal Security Administrator McNutt. Yet almost every day they read in their papers of some new indignity imposed on a member of their race by white men. Negro soldiers are beaten up in the South because they happen to offend some white person. Despite the President's Fair Employment Order, Negroes are barred from decent jobs not only in the war industries but in the government itself. They are barred from restaurants, hotels, and the better residential sections of most cities. In some instances, as in the case of the Red Cross blood bank, offense seems deliberately intended. And even where the bars are beginning to be let down, as in the navy, Negroes are often warned that the change is a result of war-time necessity and is not permanent.

With Japan making a bold bid for the solidarity of the colored races against "white imperialism," one would think that as a matter of essential strategy, if for no better reason, official Washington would be making every effort to strengthen Negro morale. McNutt's speech for the Negro Labor Victory Committee in Harlem indicates that at least some officials are deeply concerned over the situation. But the time has passed when Negroes are likely to be impressed by speeches or promises. They see that the government still discriminates against them in federal jobs, in the army, the navy, and the Marine Corps. And they attach great importance to cases like that of Waller.

As McNutt pointed out in his Harlem speech, we are today fighting two wars—one abroad, the other at home. When Odell Waller died we lost a battle on the home front.

Taste of Defeat

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

IN WASHINGTON last week the atmosphere was tense—as it must have been in every capital from Moscow to Cairo. One American official expressed a bitterness that sounded like defeatism in commenting on the lack of capacity in the Allied war councils. He even mentioned the Waller case as one count in his indictment. But most of the people I talked to were grim rather than discouraged. They seemed to believe that the taste of defeat would rouse democratic energies and create more rather than less fighting spirit. American officials seemed calmer than the two or three Europeans I ran into. These latter live with the sense of Nazi power always in their minds. They read into the news from Egypt and London and Moscow the defeats their countries have suffered, the fatal weaknesses their governments—even they themselves—revealed in hours of decision. Americans are calm not only out of innocence. Their self-confidence has behind it power and the sense of power. But it may lack realism.

One European diplomat said of both the British and the Americans: "They seem to treat each defeat as if it were a single episode. It is explained or deplored and then dismissed as something past that mustn't happen again. They don't see these things as part of a sequence—a mounting accumulation—new ground lost to an enemy that so far has held all but a few miles of the thousands conquered. They don't seem to sense the cumulative effect of the whole series of defeats on those still fighting, on the conquered who must revolt, on the neutrals who must side with us."

Everyone seemed to assume a Western European front was necessary but would be delayed by the struggle in Egypt. One or two Americans spoke of a second front as if the announced decision to open it was in itself an accomplishment—something done. One diplomat from a conquered country expressed the utmost skepticism about it. He said Russia was facing the greatest danger it had yet encountered and could only be saved by a powerful diversion in the West. In place of that he expected talk, promises—and delay.

Much of the talk centered on Churchill's visit and his speech, then in progress, before the House of Commons. It was assumed by everyone I met that the Prime Minister would survive the test but would be weakened by it. "What can they do? There's nobody to replace him," was a frequent comment. Neither Cripps nor Eden seemed to be a possible successor to Churchill. Eden's unbroken record of weakness in time of crisis is held against him, despite his recent success in negotiating the agreement with Russia; Cripps is looked upon as able, stubborn, of fine moral fiber, but weak in Parliament and incapable of winning the confidence of the military.

There was some talk—but vague—of the need for a united high command, some suggestion that it should be headed by an American. What had we done to merit such responsibility and power? Nobody knew. Our virtue seemed to be that we had been less badly defeated than our allies and that the greatest potential strength lay in America. It was generally admitted that both China and Russia had been subordinated—for no conceivable reason apart from pride or prejudice—in the Allied councils. And it was agreed that this is bad strategy.

So much for Washington. I pass on these comments only because they indicate the state of mind I sensed in one of the blackest weeks since 1939—though no one even suggested the possibility of ultimate defeat.

Since my return, the situation has improved in Egypt and worsened in Russia. Sevastopol was counted lost last week. Today that heroic defeat has taken its place in the spreading eastward drive of the Nazi armies. There will be no Tobruks along the way, but the Red Army is yielding ground and German wedges have been driven through its lines to the Don River and the crucial railway connecting Moscow and Rostov. Resistance continues to be terrific. But as this page is being written it is clear that the great German offensive is at last under way. Whether the Russians single-handed can stop the Nazi machine is a question that hangs like a cloud over the Allied councils. Whatever may ultimately be done about a second front, the bitter fact is that no diversion is in sight at this hour when it is so desperately needed.

Meanwhile, the pressure in Egypt has been relieved, at least for the moment. The British counter-attack may have broken the momentum of Rommel's drive. But it is too early to feel confident. Auchinleck has drawn reinforcements into Egypt from Syria and other Middle Eastern countries, weakening defenses already hardly adequate. Meanwhile the Germans are said to be moving mechanized troops through the Balkans into Greece. Whether these forces will be sent to bolster Rommel's position or are being assembled in preparation for a drive through Syria to Iraq and Iran is still uncertain. A serious weakening of Allied defenses in those countries might easily provoke an attack.

Whatever may be the outcome of the momentous battles now under way in Russia and in the eastern Mediterranean, one thing is certain: a single, comprehensive pattern of conquest is taking shape in which the Axis forces are combining to put pressure on all fronts at once and prevent the beleaguered armies of the United Nations from gaining the offensive anywhere. At some point—in Russia, in Egypt, in the West—that pattern must be smashed. Somewhere the Allies must seize the initiative. Until that happens we cannot expect any relief from the bad news that crowds our newspapers.

Ships and New Fronts

BY PAUL MAXWELL ZEIS

THREE hundred ships torpedoed close to our shores have made America acutely aware of the shipping crisis. The great tanker traffic to our Eastern ports has virtually ceased; imports of coffee, bananas, cocoa, and other products have been sharply curtailed; supplies for our allies have begun to pile up on the docks awaiting shipment. The output of our yards has increased rapidly, but we are still losing ships more rapidly than we are building them. The amount of merchant shipping at the disposal of the United Nations today is little if any larger than the 45,000,000 dead-weight tons controlled by the Allies in 1918. This tonnage scarcely met our needs in what was primarily a North Atlantic war. Now we need fleets of merchant vessels in every ocean. Yet even if we withdrew virtually every ship from the Pacific and Indian oceans, we should hardly have enough for effective prosecution of the war in Europe.

During the summer of 1918, with shipping being utilized at its maximum efficiency, about 18,000,000 dead-weight tons were used to supply the Allies with essential imports. Britain alone required a minimum of 9,000,000 tons. Essential service for the coasting trade, the colonies, and neutrals required another 10,000,000 tons. About one-fifth of all Allied ships were assigned to military or naval service. Some of these vessels served as naval auxiliaries; others were engaged in transporting and supplying the armies in the field. Most of the remaining tonnage was undergoing repairs made necessary by enemy attack or obsolescence. Under the rigid rationing system prescribed, British imports fell 50 per cent below pre-war amounts.

Britain's shipping requirements in this war are certainly far greater than in 1918. It imports as much food now and considerably more raw materials. Its industrial plant today is larger and is more completely engaged in the production of war supplies. One factor increasing Britain's need for ships has been the enormous expansion in the use of petroleum and its products. Britain has no oil and must import enough to satisfy the tremendous demands of its navy, much of its merchant shipping, and a considerable portion of its industrial plant. The use of gasoline for planes, tanks, and other military equipment is many times that of 1918. Whereas Britain's bare import requirements totaled 35,000,000 tons during the last war, its minimum annual requirements today must be at least 45,000,000 and possibly 50,000,000 tons.

Not only does a vastly increased amount of goods have to be transported, but port facilities today are strained in a manner undreamed of twenty-five years ago. The danger of enemy air attack has destroyed much of the usefulness of England's Channel ports and impaired the effectiveness of those on the North Sea. The remaining ports can operate only during daylight. The cumulative effect of these difficulties is to diminish the number of voyages which each vessel can make.

Even more significant is the elimination of short-haul voyages, the necessity of bringing all supplies from countries several thousand miles away. In normal times Britain received nearly one-third of its imports from Europe, and this was largely true even in 1918. The Nazi conquest of the Continent has of course eliminated all possibility of obtaining food, lumber, ore, or other products from sources close at hand. Finally, the virtual severing of Britain's life line through the Mediterranean has required the rerouting of all shipping from India and the East around the Cape of Good Hope, and reduced by at least one-third the effective carrying capacity of this shipping. In these circumstances the minimum tonnage necessary to satisfy Britain's requirements is probably nearly 15,000,000 dead-weight tons.

The submarine is perhaps even more effective in this war than it was twenty-five years ago. The Germans now have free use of French ports, while the Allies are denied access to the southern Irish bases which were so valuable in anti-submarine work during the last war. It is no longer possible as in 1918 to establish a semi-blockade of the enemy's submarines by laying mine fields across the English Channel and the North Sea. Improvements in design have enabled submarines to operate with success even on this side of the Atlantic, and heavy Allied naval requirements in the Mediterranean and the Pacific have reduced materially the number of anti-submarine craft available in the North Atlantic and along our own coasts. While we shall probably be able to prevent losses at the catastrophic rate of 1917, it is unlikely that with the naval units available we shall be able to reduce sinkings much below the 250,000 gross tons a month incurred during most of 1918. Since Dunkirk there have been relatively few months when shipping losses dropped much below this figure. Many factors not now foreseen may effect a change in the rate, but on the basis of what has happened it would be unwise to expect British and Canadian shipyards to do more than replace the ships that are sunk in the Atlantic.

Net additions to the Allied fleet and replacements for Pacific sinkings must come from American production.

As new shipping becomes available, some of it will surely be earmarked for supplying the Soviet Union. A glance at the map reveals the tremendous difficulties involved. The shortest route from New York to the Arctic ports is approximately 5,000 miles, through waters which may be impassable for much of the year. The long route around Africa is nearly 15,000 miles. Ships on this route cannot hope to complete more than three voyages a year. A third route across the Pacific to Vladivostok has been closed by Japan's entry into the war. To send two ships a day to Russia, certainly not a vast amount of help, will require the continuous service of at least 200 ships.

If the war is to be won, it seems certain that a second front must be established in Western Europe to take the pressure off the Russians in the east. The assembling of an American expeditionary force in Britain clearly foreshadows an invasion of the Continent. The establishment and maintenance of this front will require a vast amount of shipping, an amount for which no reliable measure is furnished by the shipping requirements of the French, American, and British forces in the last war. The troops at the front then were supported by French factories and farms, but now they will have to obtain the bulk of their supplies from overseas. In 1918 shipping experts estimated that between 7,000,000 and 10,000,000 tons of shipping would be necessary to transport and maintain an American army of 2,000,000 men in France without aid from that country. In this era of mechanized warfare the estimate would have to be raised.

The problem is further complicated by the destitution of the conquered peoples. The Nazis have already drained away from Western Europe nearly all the reserves of food, clothing, and materials. If they are driven from France, or Norway, or Italy, they will certainly destroy everything of value before they leave. The invading Allies will face the immediate problem of supplying the minimum requirements of food, clothing, and fuel for millions of people. How much tonnage might be needed for this purpose is a matter of conjecture, but certainly the establishment of a second front in Western Europe will ultimately require millions of tons of shipping in excess of that which entered the ports of continental Europe during the last war.

Moreover, in at least two other regions of the world—the Middle East and the Orient—great Allied armies must be maintained or established. In both areas the paucity of industrial plants in the immediate vicinity makes it necessary for the vast bulk of military supplies to come by sea over routes many thousands of miles long. Under strong protection the British have been able to get a few convoys through the Mediterranean, but losses both to shipping and to the naval escort vessels have been severe. Even the ships circumnavigating Africa have risked destruction by German submarines operating presumably from some point on the west coast of Africa, and this route has become far more perilous now that Japanese surface raiders are able to penetrate the Indian Ocean. Lack of shipping has been the most important factor restricting the striking power of the British Middle Eastern armies. To strengthen these armies it seems almost imperative to reopen the Mediterranean sea route. But this can only be achieved by the opening of a western front either in Europe or in French North Africa, which in turn will create vast new demands for ships. In whatever direction Allied strategists turn, the difficulty is always the same—there just are not enough ships.

In the Pacific the crisis is even more severe. It is estimated that Japan has used about 500,000 troops in its conquests of recent months. Pitted against a greatly inferior enemy, its forces were operating in waters relatively close to Japan itself or to well-established Japanese bases. In retaking the ground lost to Japan the United Nations will be confronted with a problem of quite different magnitude. Whether Japan is finally defeated in the East Indies, in China, in Russia, or in Japan proper is immaterial for the purposes of the present discussion. In any case it is obvious that tremendous naval and air forces and powerful expeditionary armies will be required. Considering Japan's great strategic advantages it is conservative to estimate that 2,000,000 well-equipped troops will be needed to destroy its fighting power. These soldiers may come from Australia, India, China, or Russia, as well as from Britain and America, but most of their equipment will have to come from America. Ships will have to make round trips of nearly 20,000 miles while constantly running the risk of destruction by Japanese submarines or surface units. It is no exaggeration to say that the maintenance of supplies to these armies may require more than 2,000 ships. In fact, ultimate shipping requirements in the Pacific will probably exceed those in the Atlantic. Distances across the Pacific are so much greater that it takes two or three ships to transport the same amount of cargo in a year that can be carried by one Atlantic vessel.

The one bright spot in the picture is the tremendous increase of construction in American yards. The present construction program of the Maritime Commission is for 2,900 vessels totaling about 31,000,000 dead-weight tons. This is nearly twice the projected program of the Shipping Board in the last war. And this time ships are actually being completed in time to be of use. Few of the vessels contracted for by the Shipping Board after our entry into the war in 1917 were completed in time to be put in service before the Armistice. Our shipbuilding program aided the Allies only in the sense that they were able to reduce imports below the safety point in 1918 on the assumption that excess tonnage would be available in 1919.

The last three years have witnessed a phenomenal increase in the number of yards and ways available for the construction of merchant shipping. Production has increased from a little more than 100,000 tons a year in 1938 to 700,000 tons a month at the present time. Ships are now being launched at the rate of about two a day, and before the end of this year it is hoped that they will be completed at a rate of three or four a day. On the basis of progress already achieved it seems probable that the program of 786 ships of 8,000,000 tons to be produced this year can be fulfilled. In subsequent years production of 10,000,000 or even 15,000,000 tons of shipping a year can be attained. Ultimately American construction will more than compensate for ship sinkings and create a constantly increasing reservoir of essential shipping for use in the war effort.

But the increased output of American yards can do little to alleviate our shipping shortage this summer and fall. Our military strategists will be plagued with transportation difficulties throughout this critical year. Developments in Europe and Africa may compel the establishment of a western front regardless of risk. By careful planning and rigid rationing of tonnage we may find the necessary shipping. We cannot do so, however, without placing serious restrictions on our effort in the Middle East and the Orient.

In brief review, the present Allied tonnage of some 45,000,000 dead-weight tons is just sufficient to furnish essential neutral services, to supply auxiliaries for existing navies, to ferry supplies to Britain, and to maintain relatively small forces in the Middle East and the Orient. Invasion of Western Europe or North Africa with large armies and the maintenance of really strong forces in the Middle East might well require a 50 per cent increase of present tonnage. Any great war effort in the Orient would require another 50 per cent increase. For really adequate conduct of the war the United Nations need two ships for every one they now possess. The hope for victory rests with the American shipbuilding program.

Farmers vs. the Farm Bureau

BY DALE KRAMER

BEHIND the battle in Congress over appropriations for the Farm Security Administration is a struggle which conceivably may change the direction of American agriculture. It has been smoldering for a long time. On the surface it appears to be a difference between the top third of the farmers, who take the cream of agricultural income, and the rest, who divide the blue milk. But the effort of the New Deal to assist the bottom group and the alliance between the spokesmen for the well-to-do farmers and the lobbyists for big business have added far-reaching political implications.

Of immediate importance is the effect that an adequate appropriation for the FSA will have on the Food for Victory program recently outlined by Secretary of Agriculture Wickard. The department's chief economist, H. R. Tolley, summed up the situation briefly in testimony before the Joint Committee on Reduction of Non-Essential Federal Expenditures, headed by Senator Byrd of Virginia:

Low-income farmers usually do not have the capital or the credit for machinery or the ability to use labor effectively. They have not used their labor effectively, by and large, in past years, and there is a great reservoir of partly employed farm labor that is going to be, we believe, very needed in 1942 and in 1943, and as long as this [war] keeps on, to produce the food that is needed by the people of our country, by our allies abroad, and by our armed forces.

More specifically, the Farmers' Union, second largest farm organization and the most progressive of the major groups, estimates that in 1943 half a million low-income farmers, if given FSA help, can supply an army of 2,400,000 men with milk, cheese, and eggs for a year, and with potatoes, pork, and butter for six months.

The attack on the FSA by the economy forces in Congress, like that on the CCC and NYA, was anticipated. Many diatribes against assistance to marginal farmers were delivered before the Byrd committee. When Southern politicians learned that FSA clients had enfranchised themselves by paying poll taxes out of their loans, their protests became even more violent. It developed that FSA officials were aware of this use of the loans. As soon as the Southern Senators—Glass of Virginia, McKellar of Tennessee, George of Georgia, and Byrd—had recovered from this shock, they put C. B. Baldwin, FSA administrator, through a sharp cross-examination. Baldwin, supported by Senator La Follette, fought back, justifying the payment of poll taxes out of FSA loans on the ground that it helped to rehabilitate farmers by giving them a feeling of greater responsibility as citizens.

The debate became so acrimonious at one point that Senator Glass threatened to bar Baldwin from Virginia, despite the fact that Virginia is the FSA administrator's home state.

The Senate finally voted the appropriation, though it cut $70,000,000 from the sum requested by the President. The House balked, and in recent weeks liberal farm groups, labor organizations, and religious bodies have been trying to break the deadlock.

From the long-range point of view the most important development of the battle has been the appearance of leaders of the Farm Bureau, the most powerful member of the farm bloc, against the appropriation. The Bureau's president, Edward A. O'Neal, an Alabama planter, not only opposed the FSA but showed his organization's growing animosity toward the New Deal's whole agricultural program, speaking with some bitterness of both ex-Secretary Wallace and Secretary Wickard. On the other hand, representatives of the department placed in the record some facts showing the Bureau's misuse of its government connections. The undercover struggle thus brought partly into the open is the more interesting because the Department of Agriculture created and nourished the Farm Bureau.

During World War I county farm bureaus were established by the department in rural areas to help increase production. County agents distributed literature on scientific farming and gave personal attention to knotty problems. Later home demonstrators advised farm women on better methods of canning, chicken-raising, and the other tasks of the farm wife. Boys and girls were organized in 4-H Clubs which became schools of scientific farming. In time the county farm bureaus were consolidated into state groups, and in 1920 the American Farm Bureau Federation was established as an independent organization. In the years that followed, Republican administrations recognized the advantage of an organization which, as the Farm Bureau's first national president boasted, helped to keep down "unrest" among farmers.

Other government-financed services were tied in. The county agent's office housed the local Farm Bureau; the agent solicited Farm Bureau dues, sent out Farm Bureau letters in franked envelopes, and put Farm Bureau news in the local newspapers under his name. The 4-H Clubs were brought under the auspices of the Farm Bureau, and the government-paid home demonstrator organized her meetings under the Farm Bureau banner. Some state legislatures were induced to grant financial aid; in Iowa, for example, each county must furnish a sum double the total of all Farm Bureau dues. To swell the treasury small-town business men were enlisted as members. Naturally, leaders of other farm organizations found it difficult to compete against such ample funds and were infuriated. The late Milo Reno, a prominent officer of the Farmers' Union and a leader of the farm risings in the latter days of the Hoover Administration, early warned department officials. "You are creating a Frankenstein monster," he said, "and some day it will destroy you."

Certain unsavory operations of the Farm Bureau leaders during the 1920's, revealed in the Muscle Shoals investigation, caused Senator George W. Norris to declare that "the time will come when . . . American farmers will realize by whom they are being deceived," but the department passed over the unpleasantness. In his investigation Norris discovered that Farm Bureau leaders had sold their organization lock, stock, and barrel to the American Cyanamid Company and others who opposed government operation of the fertilizer project—though under government operation farmers would have obtained cheaper fertilizer. Evidence read into the record showed that Farm Bureau officials had also sold their educational facilities—along with the services of the government-paid county agents, home demonstrators, and 4-H Club leaders—to other big-business groups. Among the purchasers were the Asphalt Institute, the National Lumbermen's Association, the Copper and Brass Research Association, and several utilities. Farm Bureau officers made a proposal to the American Ship-owners' Association to propagandize for ship subsidies in return for a fee of $94,000, but it was rejected, as was an offer to assist the chain stores. The investigation showed that men posed as Farm Bureau speakers when in reality they were paid representatives of big-business groups, and that propaganda was inserted into so-called educational moving pictures. The smaller government employees and volunteer workers were unaware that they served the selfish ends of national Farm Bureau leaders.

The New Deal agricultural leadership is not entirely without responsibility for the present situation. Early in 1933, after more than three years of depression, disillusioned farmers had left the Farm Bureau by the hundreds of thousands. The AAA gave the organization new life by permitting the tremendous stream of benefit checks to flow partly through the Farm Bureau machinery. The county agent became a more powerful figure in rural areas than ever. In Alabama, O'Neal's home state, blanks were franked out which, when signed by the recipients, authorized the Farm Bureau to deduct dues from the benefit checks. It was government mail and the AAA worksheet was mentioned; the hint could not escape the farmer. An investigation conducted recently by the department, some of the results of which were inserted into the records of the Byrd committee, showed that in the South, particularly in Alabama, government-paid officials still assisted in membership drives, letters of an organizational nature were franked out, and Farm Bureau officers often sat at the side of the government representative who handed out the benefit checks, to cash the checks and deduct Farm Bureau dues. H. L. Mitchell, general secretary of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union, in a comprehensive survey revealed that a great many tenants and farm workers are Farm Bureau members without their consent and even without their knowledge, since landlords "set off" their dues from wages and crop shares.

The conflict between the Farm Bureau and the department developed partly because the wealthier commercial farmers who dominate the Bureau have no desire to see their poorer neighbors come into competition with them, partly because these leaders are conservatives who have always worked closely with the large corporations. Whether or not the policy of selling the organization's apparatus directly to interested parties for propaganda purposes has been discontinued is impossible to say, but a new investigation like the one once conducted by Senator Norris should be worth a Senate committee's time. Some of the worst offenders, it is true, have left the Farm Bureau pay roll. But they have gone directly to one or another of the big-business groups they formerly served secretly, and they retain influence in Farm Bureau councils.

The department is finding, like Dr. Frankenstein, that its "monster" has unexpected vitality. In some states statutory action will be necessary to separate the Farm Bureau from the department's extension service. Efforts to enact such legislation by enemies of the Farm Bureau in Minnesota and Iowa have failed. Many of the extension leaders, some holding posts in state agricultural colleges, others protected by civil service, are conservative and want to see the Farm Bureau retain its power. But if the department enforces its rule against the use of government funds or employees in organizational work, the Farm Bureau will suffer greatly.

The chief beneficiary of such a policy is likely to be the Farmers' Union. The Grange, which though generally conservative is opposed to government assistance to the Farm Bureau, will be aided to some extent, but it is less aggressive than the Union. In some states—Wisconsin, the Dakotas, Montana, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and Oklahoma—the Farmers' Union is already more powerful than the Bureau, and it is gaining elsewhere. Its president, James G. Patton of Colorado, is young and aggressive; most of the narrow-minded, breast-beating leaders typical of old farm movements have been shaken out. Patton has established close working relations with the C. I. O., the A. F. of L., and the railroad brotherhoods. The Southern Tenant Farmers' Union has under consideration a plan to join the Farmers' Union in a body. Meanwhile, the Farm Bureau national leadership has suffered an added blow in the defection of the Ohio and Vermont units, whose representatives differed sharply with O'Neal at the FSA hearings. It appears probable—unless John L. Lewis's farm drive proves too disruptive—that a progressive organization which can speak for a majority of the farmers is at last on the way.

Thoughts on "World War III?"

[In The Nation of June 20 J. Alvarez del Vayo raised questions of such importance for the achievement of a democratic victory and a people's peace that the editors asked a number of persons of various nationalities, experts in the field of international relations, to contribute to a discussion of the main points of his article. Some of the comments received were printed last week, others appear below, and the rest will appear in subsequent issues.]

G. A. BORGESSE

Professor of Italian Literature at the University of Chicago and author of "Goliath: The March of Fascism"

I DO not think that the new pact between Russia and Britain or Russia's understanding with the United States offers a basis on which the democratic forces in the United Nations can work toward the establishment of a people's peace in Europe and the world. Needless to say, the agreements of Stalin with the Tory gentlemen are infinitely more palatable than his pact of 1933 with the Nazi gangsters. Russia, however, not only has endorsed the principle of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other states—a principle which, as Mr. del Vayo points out, includes the germs of a Metternich peace—but has also, in the treaty with England, insistently separated the European sector from the global war and, what is worse, admitted the possibility of a period of twenty years or more during which the balance of power should rule the world. Now this is exactly the "cooling off" period in which the egg would be preserved for the Metternich-Talleyrand peace to hatch.

The heavy pressure, military and political, to which Russia is subjected may explain the deal. It does not make of it the base for a new world.

I do not think that disarmament and the creation of a new League of Nations with broader powers backed by an international police force would be a strong enough alternative to a peace based on the balance of power. I do think that a different and more thoroughgoing system of collective security should be substituted for the League.

The form of the new system, whatever the transitional stages may be—though let them be as brief and purposive as possible—should be world federation under a collective supreme power.

I think, with Mr. del Vayo, that only a socialist reconstruction of Europe can provide the basis for a durable peace. I also think that socialism—whatever the temporary and local qualifications of its meaning—is a universal way of life and that a socialist peace in Europe cannot be durable unless Europe is a part of a peaceful and progressively socialist world.

I do not approve of Article 3 of the Atlantic Charter, which makes possible the continued existence of fascist states after the war. Nor do I approve of the clause "with due respect for their existing obligations," which leaves, in Article 4 of the Atlantic Charter, a large loophole for economic imperialism. Nor do I approve of the clause in Article 8 "pending the establishment of a wider and permanent system of general security," which, however involuntarily, includes the germs of the "cooling-off" period and of a Metternich-Talleyrand—or neo-clerico-fascist—New Order.

I do not think that the interests of the people can make themselves felt at the next peace conference, or in the international machinery that already is being set up, through the intervention of the existing political parties or through the creation of new ones, which would have little opportunity for adequate development or for effective intercommunication in the various sectors and continents of the world at war. Nor do I think it desirable, and I hope it can be avoided, that "ultimate control be taken out of the hands of the old-line diplomats" by the explosion of bloody, destructive, and uncoordinated revolutions.

It was clear immediately after Munich that a different way should be attempted. A group of people offered a mode of action which they called "The City of Man." It was described in The Nation as a "realistic Utopia." The concept was that a few people, as responsible intellectually as they were free of commitments to established parties and of ambition for direct political power, should examine systematically but promptly the most decisive issues, thus providing the masses with inspiration and the leaders—in so far as they need it—with the content for their leadership.

With that name, or with whatever other name may seem preferable, with that group or another, and with other people—not too many—added to the initial group, I believe more firmly than ever that such an approach is the only way to obtain results in thought and action before it is too late. This is a concrete proposal for the friends of The Nation and for Mr. del Vayo to consider. His admirable article should not remain unproductive.

JULIUS DEUTSCH

Former Minister of War of Austria; General in the Spanish Republican army

THE old diplomacy which del Vayo describes so sarcastically cannot rid itself of the old concepts regarding an international order. But we live in an era of upheaval that yearns for new forms. The balance of power, the traditional requisite of diplomacy, would—if it were to be reestablished—be again upset, as always, and this disturbance would lead to new wars. To prevent this the new order in the world must no longer be built upon the sovereign power of individual states but upon the sovereign power of a superstate organization. The individual states would then have less power but more rights. The task we should have to perform would, in this event, not be the establishment of a balance of power, but the securing for each state of as many rights as are essential for its existence and further development—a balance of rights, in short, rather than a balance of power.

Within the limitations of a short article this thought can only be touched upon, but perhaps I shall succeed in making myself understood if I describe in broad outline the international organization of states I have in mind.

The post-war international federation of states should be controlled by an international parliament. Thus there would no longer be career diplomats; in their stead, direct representatives of the people would participate in leading positions. Thus the question whether fascist states should be permitted to take part in an international federation would solve itself. Their participation would in practice be impossible since the exercise of political rights by the citizen is a prerequisite of the international parliament. Whether members of the international parliament should be elected by the citizens of a country or appointed by its national parliament is a question of secondary importance.

An international federation of states without sufficient authority would be still-born, as was the League of Nations after the Versailles treaty. At least the following prerogatives should be considered within the sphere of the federation:

1. International police authority (the armed services).
2. Control of national currencies by a federation bank.
3. International economic regulations (trade and commerce).
4. International control of means of transportation on land, by sea, and in the air.
5. International judiciary.
6. International education.

This enumeration is, of course, not complete; it is merely designed to point to some of the more important possibilities. Once an international superstate has been formed, the sphere of its authority is bound to develop.

On one point no concessions must be made if future wars are to be averted: policing is the business of the federation; the individual states are and must remain disarmed. A period of transition will of course be unavoidable, for without immediate and complete disarmament of the vanquished dictator states there can be no real peace. Disarmament of the dictator states is a problem that is quite capable of solution—technically as well as politically. Just one example: if these states were deprived of the right to develop aviation—including aviation for commercial and transportation purposes, too—they would have no opportunity to rearm in a field decisive for modern warfare.

It is self-evident that an international order along such lines presupposes a certain homogeneity in the political life of the nations, although it need be by no means uniform. But even far-reaching social assimilations would come to pass more or less swiftly. The states will have to gain control over the vital production centers lest the producers some day set themselves up as masters of the nations' destinies. In other words, to destroy the economic springs of fascism—in Germany, heavy industry and the big landowners—is for democracy no less than a question of life or death.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Professor of Applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary

MR. DEL VAYO is quite right in his apprehensions about the hazards we face in establishing a decent peace. Complacency in regard to the war might still cause victory to elude us; and complacency about the possibilities of a durable peace might prove equally disastrous. The democratic forces are on the whole weak and disorganized. Who, for instance, can believe that British labor will be the dominant force in a post-war Britain?

There are, however, some hopeful elements in the situation. It can hardly be denied that Britain has learned the lesson that it cannot maintain order on the Continent merely by manipulating a precarious balance of power between Continental nations. It is probable, though not certain, that we have learned the necessity of participating responsibly in building a community of nations. We may, of course, succumb once more to a psychosis of fear, disillusionment, and withdrawal from the world. But it is not likely. These lessons, which nations learn by bitter experience, are not merely the acquisition of the radical and labor forces. While it is certainly true that a triumph of reaction in the field of domestic politics would seriously imperil creative international arrangements, it is not true that a decent peace depends altogether upon the victory in the domestic struggle of the traditional radical and labor forces. The fact is that an understanding, or lack of it, of what the international situation requires has cut across the traditional party lines in a remarkable way in recent years. I should think that the British political situation offers better hopes for the future than the weakness of the Labor Party would seem to justify.

Mr. del Vayo seems to me to be in error in fearing that the world may revert to the traditional balance-of-power politics. I should regard the peril of a new imperialism as much greater than the danger of an old balance of power. The four great powers—Russia, China, Britain, and America—are bound to dominate the peace in the event of an Axis defeat. The new understanding with Russia increases the chances of war-time arrangements becoming the basis for mutual commitments after the war. There is bound to be some balance of power in a post-war world, in the sense that politics is never freed from the necessity of seeking an equilibrium of social forces. The question is whether the balance of power will be organized or unorganized. I think the prospects are that it will be organized, and that the danger we must guard against will be a too imperialistic organization.

However, the understanding at which we have arrived with Russia is likely to prevent the domination of the post-war world by a purely Anglo-Saxon imperialism, and that is a gain. Mr. del Vayo's excellent analysis does not offer any positive suggestions about the method of world organization. On that task the democratic forces are all equally vague and weak. We know that a balance of power won't do, and we are equally certain that the old League of Nations is inadequate. What shall take its place? Regional and hemispheric federations? World federation? Federation of the democracies only?

Whatever the end toward which we must strive, we must undoubtedly begin with new constitutional commitments by the four great powers, seek to include other powers in these commitments as much as possible, beginning with the other United Nations, and strive and hope for the extension of responsibilities to all nations in time, so that imperialistic corruption of a new world order will be avoided.

OCTAVIO MANGABEIRA

Former Foreign Minister of Brazil

I LIVED in Europe before the war and during the first nine months of the war—until the fall of France. I have the impression that the great mistake of the democracies has been the tolerance, even the goodwill, with which they cooperated in the development of the dictatorships.

It is clear, as the facts have proved, that dictatorship and democracy cannot coexist. One nation is devoted to pacific and civilized activities. Another nation, sometimes its neighbor, is prepared and educated for fighting. It is not extraordinary if the second nation one day takes advantage of its education and preparation for war to attack the first.

The choice is not between democracy and totalitarianism. The choice is between civilization and crime. Civilization cannot exist where there are not some fundamental liberties, no matter what the name of the political system. On the other hand, there are no effective liberties in the absence of adequate conditions of economic life. Democracy without a social and economic organization corresponding to democratic ideals is not democracy; it is fraud.

Mr. del Vayo is absolutely right when he warns against the methods of the old diplomacy working for the forces which have so injured democratic institutions. Nowadays the only way to secure intervention by the people in the great decisions is to have their real representatives in the government, because only the actions of governments are effective: every day governments become stronger, and every day they draw closer to one another. Therefore the kind of men in power is of the highest importance.

Nobody can defend intervention by one nation in the internal life of another nation. But everybody must recognize that it will be imperative to create an international organization and to endow it with the material force necessary to implement it—otherwise it would be as platonic as the League of Nations. This organization must assure, not the same regime for all peoples, which would be nonsense, but civilization in the world, that is, a minimum of liberty and economic security, the only basis for an enduring peace.

The theory that the people of each nation should choose its form of government is perfect if the people indeed make the choice. But if the form that the government takes is imposed by a tyrant, as history shows it often has been, then application of the theory will result in the consecration of tyranny.

The Atlantic Charter has interpreted the facts and the circumstances of a given historical moment. However, for the world of the future which will arise from the victory of the United Nations there is something to be added to it from some of the speeches of the President of the United States.

The treaty between England and Russia, supplemented by the understandings between the United States and the Soviet Union, offers a wide basis for the reconstruction of the world through the readjustment both of communism and of democracy.

I don't believe in communism because I don't believe in a way of life based on pure materialism. But I do believe that a just and honest socialization, on the basis of real fraternity, is the only means by which democracy can survive and peace endure.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

A Tax on Spending

CONGRESS has done singularly little so far to implement the President's seven-point program for the prevention of inflation. On the one hand, it is hamstringing the Office of Price Administration by cutting down its appropriation and refusing to grant it funds for subsidizing producers squeezed between rising costs and the price ceiling; on the other, it appears to be yielding to the demands of the farm lobby that government-held grain be not released below parity prices. Still worse is the emasculation of the Treasury's tax program at the hands of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Heaven knows Mr. Morgenthau's proposals were over-modest in relation to the vast total of government expenditure scheduled for 1942-43 and to the volume of purchasing power unmatched by goods which is a constant threat to all efforts at price control. But the Ways and Means Committee in its tentative report has lopped $2.8 billion off the Treasury request for an additional $8.7 billion. It has left estate tax rates at present levels and scaled down sharply the income-tax and excise increases suggested by the Treasury. The one significant addition it has proposed is a 5 per cent excise tax on freight transportation, which, since freight is an important item in most costs, is likely to play hob with the whole price-ceiling system.

In easing individual and corporation income taxes the Ways and Means Committee was responding to the pressure of the business lobbies. It turned a deaf ear, however, to the cherished money-raising plan of these same interests—the sales tax. At one time it seemed as if there might be a Congressional majority for this levy, but rumblings from back home convinced many Representatives that it was bad medicine for an election year. Nevertheless, this alleged solution to the fiscal problem is still being assiduously urged by a large part of the press as the only way to tap the pool of war-generated surplus income. We may have been saved from a sales tax this year, but it will inevitably be brought forward again in 1943 unless meanwhile some alternative has been found.

One possibility that is now exciting a good deal of interest in Washington is a tax on spending which would avoid the unfair incidence of the sales tax and at the same time restrict purchasing power to a total corresponding to the volume of goods available. Among the several variations of this proposal is a scheme developed by Jerome Weinstein, a well-known New York tax attorney, who has kindly given me permission to quote from a memorandum he has prepared.

The essence of the Weinstein plan is "a progressive tax on the exercise of purchasing power in excess of a specified exempt amount during the fixed period." Two factors would determine the amount of exempt purchases allowable: the estimated annual expenditure on absolute necessities and the estimated volume of civilian goods available. Probably this amount would be in the neighborhood of $400 annually for each adult, who at intervals of two or three months would be issued a book of coupons entitling him to make purchases up to the face amount of such coupons. In the event that the coupons were exhausted before the end of the period to which they were applicable, extra ones could be obtained on payment of a premium or tax which would be progressively increased in order to act as a deterrent on the exercise of surplus purchasing power. For instance, the tax on extra coupons bought within a year might be 20 per cent on the first $200, 35 per cent on the next $200, and so on; but it would probably prove desirable to impose an absolute limit on the total purchasable by any one person within a fixed period.

Mr. Weinstein does not propose that these coupons should be used in connection with all forms of expenditure but only for goods and services for which potential total demand is likely to exceed potential total supply at ceiling prices. This would mean primarily food and clothes, while such items as rent, insurance, electricity, and most services would be exempt, at least until such time as labor shortages or other factors made restriction of their consumption desirable. As Mr. Weinstein points out, by rationing spending itself his plan would probably obviate the future necessity of setting up rationing schemes for many individual items. At the same time the scheme is flexible enough to deal with temporary commodity situations. For instance, in the event of a local glut of eggs, the regional administrator of the plan could exempt their purchase from the requirement of coupons for a limited period.

This scheme is only incidentally a revenue measure. Its main object is to achieve a balance between purchasing power and available goods. Considered as a brake on inflation, the plan has considerable advantage over a general sales tax. To quote Mr. Weinstein:

A general sales tax makes no distinction between the use of minimum essential purchasing power, which should be exempt, and the use of surplus purchasing power. The payment of a general sales tax, the amount of which is necessarily limited by its application to the lowest income groups, cannot effectively restrict purchases by higher income groups, to whom the payment of a 5 per cent sales tax would not be a deterrent. Furthermore, and by reason of its uniform and equal application to all sales, a general sales tax cannot operate progressively as a deterrent on the use of surplus purchasing power.

Considerations of space forbid a detailed exposition of Mr. Weinstein's proposals for effective operation of his scheme. It is not without its administrative difficulties, but I do not think these would be any greater, if as great, as those involved in the collection of a sales tax. In any event the plan is one which deserves public discussion and the closest examination by the tax experts.

In the Wind

MARTIN DIES dined with a friend the other day and pondered over the growing popularity of the Russians in this country. "They're putting up a great fight," he said, "and everybody over here is for them. Maybe the committee had better lay off the Communists and get to work on the Germans."

ONE OF THE MOST intricate of the plans for post-war reconstruction now in circulation was drafted by Ely Culbertson, the bridge expert.

GEORGE SOKOLSKY is ghost-writing many of Thomas E. Dewey's campaign speeches.

JACOB THORKELSON, the first open fascist to be elected to Congress, won in 1938 largely because Senator Wheeler refused to support his own party's candidate. Thorkelson is running again this year, but Wheeler is actively opposing him and backing Wellington Rankin, Jeannette Rankin's brother.

THE REVEREND GERALD WINROD of Kansas, who was running for the United States Senate, has suddenly withdrawn his candidacy. His reasons are not known.

COMPANIES WHICH BROADCAST from army camps or navy stations have in the past refrained from using the prestige of the services for advertising purposes. The policy was breached in a recent broadcast by General Motors from the army air base at Patterson Field in Ohio. The G. M. advertising copy, a letter signed by C. E. Wilson, president of the corporation, was read by the commanding officer at the field.

A RADICAL who in the past has had many run-ins with the government recently registered in the forty-four-to-sixty-five draft group. On the line where he was asked to name someone who would always know where he could be located, he wrote, "the FBI."

AN OFFICIAL of a Norwegian town planned to join the local Quisling organization, and his intentions somehow became known to the people. When he left his house one morning he found a path of evergreen boughs leading from his doorstep to a cemetery nearby.

[The $5 prize for the best item received in June goes to J. L. of New York for his story about Representative Barry of Queens, published June 13.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Bugbear of Pragmatism

THE PRAGMATIC TEST: ESSAYS ON THE HISTORY OF IDEAS. By H. B. Parkes. The Colt Press. $3.

AS WILLIAM JAMES SAID: EXTRACTS FROM THE PUBLISHED WRITINGS OF WILLIAM JAMES. The Vanguard Press. $2.75.

IS THERE a pragmatist under your bed? If you are not too frightened to find out, I think you may discover the person you see whenever you look into a mirror. For pragmatism is very precisely what William James, its reputed inventor, called it: a new name for some old ways of thinking. Nevertheless, pragmatism continues to be the bête noire of every critic, poet, and historian whose own mission requires a dragon to make him a St. George. One hero crushes pragmatism under the accusation of materialism; another slays it as Puritan morality in disguise; a third proves that it justifies big business and the swank of success; still others call it a license to believe anything, a low form of cunning, or, worst of all, a fad that started fascism.

This is a William James year, marking as it does the centenary of his birth, and it would be desirable if by means of the many publications the date will call forth the old spook of pragmatic horror could be laid. But this is too much to hope for when even a learned and brilliant critic such as H. B. Parkes sees only half of the whole. He tells us, in a book fittingly called "The Pragmatic Test" and devoted to some of the major figures in our recent intellectual past, that he tests ideas by their working in practice. Ideas presumably affect conduct; conduct has concrete consequences; and therefore concrete consequences enable us to pass one kind of judgment on ideas. Moreover, in the essay on James himself Mr. Parkes clearly sees and clearly says that James's statement of pragmatism is a correct description of scientific procedure. A scientific idea is true when it adequately accounts for the facts, when it "works," not as a plausible explanation merely, but in the working out called proof. For in science no one has yet accused "success" of being contemptible and gross.

But where Mr. Parkes and others, less competent, boggle at pragmatism is in its application to thought in general, to art, ethics, and religion. With seeming finality Mr. Parkes says: "... there is a vast difference between proving a scientific theory by making experiments in a laboratory and proving the existence of God by observing the cheerful faces of those who believe in Him." As he puts it, of course, the case is open and shut. We are too familiar with the lure of superstition and self-deception to say anything but "Fie!" when we detect their presence in others. But I think Mr. Parkes conceals an unwarranted assumption in his dramatic contrast; it is the same assumption that made Mr. Van Wyck Brooks assert many years ago that James's taste in art must be crude. It is, indeed, the invariable assumption of anti-pragmatists, and it is this: the belief that the pragmatic test has the same meaning no matter who applies it, no matter what it applies to, and no matter how it is applied. To go back to Mr. Parkes's example, it assumes that under pragmatism if Humphrey Clinker was made cheerful by eighteenth-century Methodism, then Methodism is proved absolutely true for all mankind and all time.

"But," the anti-pragmatist will say, "who then can guarantee the truth of a religion, a moral code, or an aesthetic doctrine?" To which the rejoinder is: Choose your witnesses and do it with care. If St. Thomas is made cheerful by a given creed, he furnishes the very kind of proof we require. And there is no law against being your own St. Thomas if you have the will and the intellectual equipment. But let no one be misled by the word "cheerful," which, if used pragmatically, must imply a real, and not a deceptive, satisfaction. A fastidious pragmatist will not be cheerful in this sense until the most exacting demands of logic, consistency, and beauty, which are practicality, have been fulfilled. The higher and more complex the demands you make upon a truth, the more pragmatic your behavior. If this implies relativism, as it does, it is a guaranty that no limited or inferred truth will be palmed off as all inclusive. In some matters, as Pascal pointed out, man must take a chance, he is "embarked." To which the pragmatist adds, "I have no confidence in certainty."

But that is not all. The anti-pragmatist carps also at the origin supposedly assigned to ideas by the pragmatic philosopher. The "anti" says that something he calls mind or reason, and holds to be independent of another entity called will, is the true source of true ideas. Unless it is so, he maintains, the contemplative life has no meaning but merges with the practical life. Yet all good things, he is sure, come from "disinterested" motives. Of course! This part of the argument rests on a quibble: disinterested does not mean uninterested. Commonplaces mislead us: when we say we listen to music "for its own sake" we mean no such thing. We listen to music for our own sake; but this again can mean two things. It can mean that we are looking for some clear external benefit, as when we trade on our musical knowledge in order to feel superior or to teach the violin, and it can also mean an imponderable inward benefit: we listen to music because we like it. The contemplative life, in other words, is good not in the air but good for us. Now, whether we have a will to achieve it or simply have a mind to is a matter of wording. To detach mind from will, idea from feeling, "benefit" from "contemplation" is to make an abstract distinction of very limited value. It becomes one of unlimited danger when it leads the anti-pragmatist to assert that we do things not for the satisfaction of our interests or the fulfilment of our ideals but for the thing itself and the ideal itself.

The causes of this long misunderstanding of James are deeply rooted in our linguistic habits no less than in our moral poses. But a more remediable cause lies in the rigid way intellectual history is written. Mr. Parkes frequently avoids this fault, but just as frequently falls into it, particularly in his earlier essays, where he describes by means of single notions such complex events as Puritanism or Emerson's thought, or Jonathan Edwards's career. The practice involves a reduction, and a reduction which generally takes the form: "X's whole life amounts only to the error Q." One would like to know in virtue of what finally established truth every previous thinker has "failed" or sacrificed his soul to error. It is easy to match modern "confusion" with the simplicity of truisms like Aristotle's "the good man is the standard of good and evil," but this is hardly more than the old trick of comparing a chaotic present with an artificially tidied-up past.

A second historical mistake consists in lumping together James, Dewey, and Bergson as "the anti-intellectualists." The cases are separate. James must be studied by himself, and, needless to say, the place to study him is in his own text. Mr. Parkes, I feel sure, has been as careful with James as with all the other subjects of his essays, but I am astonished to find him citing the "Psychology" as quintessential James. That work is not a plateau but a crest dividing two doctrines—the scientific materialism of its period and James's rejection of it. And the final chapter on Necessary Truths refutes most of the stock arguments against the later "Pragmatism."

As an introduction to the James canon, Elizabeth Perkins Aldrich has edited a varied and entertaining collection of sayings grouped by subject and attractively printed. The volume is made still more valuable by the addition of a dozen hitherto unpublished drawings by James himself. In these pages, and with slight effort, the general reader can get a truer notion of the man and his thought than can be found in the professionals' handbooks. The variety and depth of his perceptions, the fineness of his moral and aesthetic fiber, the subtlety of his mind, and the elasticity of his prose will, it is hoped, blot out the fantastic but common image of an inartistic but powerful Yankee thinker, a philosophical P. T. Barnum, who might have come to some good if he had been born outside America and received "proper training."

As to the ultimate value of James's thought, if anyone must do less than judge for himself on the basis of the written word, he had better rely on Professor Whitehead, who said that James, like Descartes, was the founder of a new philosophical epoch.

JACQUES BARZUN

Mr. Hoover on Peace

THE PROBLEMS OF LASTING PEACE. By Herbert Hoover and Hugh Gibson. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

A BOOK on the problems of peace and reconstruction by a former President and his chief confidant on international affairs might well be, as the publishers claim this book is, "a lasting landmark in the literature" on that subject. It might be, but it isn't.

The two authors have had some valuable experience, and they point to it again and again as the source of their wisdom. But experience alone does not generate wisdom. In this case the wisdom is compounded of experience and dogma, and in consequence it is not very illuminating. The dogma which informs the book is that of classical liberalism; the authors apply it rigorously to domestic politics and, with some lapses into inconsistency, to international affairs. When they use the term the "fifth freedom," they mean, they say, the right "to engage in enterprise so long as each does not injure his fellow-man. And that requires law to prevent abuses." They seem to think that their willingness to grant the necessity of law to prevent abuses prevents their system from being "laissez faire or capitalistic exploitation." At any rate the fear of government control dominates their thought. According to them, "the attempt by Blum to mix larger doses of totalitarian economics into free economy contributed to the demoralization of the country." Of the United States they say that, "impatient with recovery from world depression by the hard way, it became infected with managed economy in 1933." This statement occurs in a historical analysis, and the authors generously forgo further consideration of our plight under the New Deal with the remark that "whether managed economy in the United States had extended over the line where recovery by voluntary and cooperative action of free enterprise was stifled and liberty infringed is not a part of this discussion."

Applying their laissez faire doctrines to international affairs, they would outlaw "governmental buying and selling, unstable currencies, special agreements such as reciprocal and preferential agreements, quotas, monopolies, cartels, and tariffs." They believe that "if there is to be a restoration of a real volume of international trade, there must be assurance of ultimate removal of all government buying and selling in foreign markets, except for possible storage of raw materials for international stabilization." They would stabilize currency by returning to "gold convertibility," which has been the "world's solution for 6,000 years."

Their whole plan for world peace is characterized on the one hand by a rigorous adherence to classical liberal doctrine in international as well as in domestic affairs and on the other by rather obvious and inconsistent departures from their principles. One departure is prompted by old-fashioned Republican prejudices. Having included tariffs among the hindrances to world peace, they recant their consistency, observing that "tariffs have occupied an exaggerated importance in public discussion," that "they are, through centuries of universal use, deeply imbedded in the economy of nations," and that they must therefore be dealt with more gently than other barriers.

Most of their other departures from their formula are prompted by the fact that they know too much about the necessities of international relations to be able to maintain their thesis without deviation. Thus though they have outlawed government buying and selling, they conclude "that the governments of the world must bear the burden of shipping, credit, and the distribution of supplies. And they will have to bear these burdens for the enemy as well as for liberated countries." Presumably this kind of government action is to be confined to a very brief period after the war.

It is not easy to say how far the authors depart from their fear of government control when they envisage plans of world organization. For when they come to that problem they adopt the method of an impartial presentation of the various plans of organization without committing themselves to any, though they do say that "some organization of force methods to preserve peace will be necessary for some years to come." They are inclined to believe that "the victorious powers will, with military means, jointly dominate the world for so long as their interests do not clash. They will need to do so at least during a period for political and economic recuperation." Thus a program for a "lasting peace" envisages no more than joint military domination by the victorious powers "so long as their interests do not clash." This illuminating conclusion illustrates the difficulties encountered by two confused authors who are driven in one direction by their experience and in another by the resolutely held dogma that "the least possible government is the best possible government."

It ought to be mentioned that Hoover and Gibson are on the side of the angels when dealing with the problem of a vanquished foe. They believe that "there can be no lasting peace in Europe with a dismembered Germany," and they have some very sane advice on the necessity of relieving distress in the defeated countries as soon as the war is over. They abhor post-war blockades.

The first half of the book analyzes the history of past centuries as a preliminary to the presentation of positive proposals for peace in the second half and is a curiously textbookish production. Seven forces in world affairs are isolated and listed as follows: (1) ideologies, (2) economic pressures, (3) nationalism, (4) militarism, (5) imperialism, (6) the complex of fear, hate, and revenge, (7) the will to peace. In analyzing recent epochs of Western history, the authors ask how each of these forces acted in each particular period. It is all rather artificial and not very illuminating. One is reminded of school pageants of years ago in which various symbolic characters appeared in turn with no more dialogue than the announcement, "I am the spirit of hate" or "I am the spirit of good-will." Such pageants had about the same relation to real drama as these abstractions have to history.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The Free French in Africa

MIRACLE ON THE CONGO: REPORT FROM THE FREE FRENCH FRONT. By Ben Lucien Burman. The John Day Company. $1.75.

BEN BURMAN didn't believe Pétain was France. Away from Hollywood he kept hearing about Vichy, Montoire, and collaboration till he had had enough. A quiet man, still shaken from wounds received at Soissons, he wanted a gun and a chance to fight for the real France. The Free French persuaded him to take a typewriter instead.

Mr. Burman discovered Free French Africa for the American press. His news dispatches and magazine pieces put a spotlight on the dark jungle where France was being reborn. Home again after nine months spent between Brazzaville and Beirut, he rounded up and trimmed his African stories into this book. The result is an honest, loyal testament to the brave men who have transformed the black continent into a fortress for the democracies. In its compact, lucid analysis of the factors which led to the Bordeaux armistice, its indictment and proof of Vichy villainy, its catalogue of Free French contributions to Allied victory, and its assault on the injustice of non-recognition, "Miracle on the Congo" strikes a hard blow for a cause which deserves more friends.

There are some faults of style and a few dubious opinions. Too many pages, packed with tom-toms, crocodiles, and tropical mystery, read like a Grade B scenario. Trustworthy observers returning from France do not confirm the assertion, unfortunately, that De Gaulle has 80 to 95 per cent of the French people behind him. Nor is every man in the Free French movement as pure and white a knight as we are asked to believe. Hangers-on and opportunists have afflicted every creed in history, and it is no slur on the Cross of Lorraine to note their presence here too. But these are errors of enthusiasm. The book, in the main, is good and true.

Congo fact puts Mississippi fiction in the shade. The author of "Steamboat Round the Bend" and "Blow for a Landing" left off novel-writing to explore a land where quinine is "a sort of hors d'œuvre" and terrible armies of man-eating red ants march like Prussians in mile-long parade. In Brazzaville he interviewed General de Gaulle and learned that Pétain's first words upon joining the Reynaud government, almost a month before the end, were, "We must capitulate." He voyaged north through equatorial forests and desert wastes to lonely Free French outposts in the Chad where camel patrols stood guard against Axis Libya. In Syria he beat the Allied forces of occupation into Beirut, traveling by car over the mine-strewn Damascus road, after watching Free and Vichy Frenchmen die in fratricidal battle. In burning Transjordan his host was the legendary Glubb

An Important New Book by

*Carl J.
Friedrich*

Professor of Government, Harvard University

THE NEW BELIEF IN THE COMMON MAN

For the world now in birth, Dr. Friedrich has created a new faith founded upon a realistic view of the common man's capacity for self-government. A masterly vindication of the democratic idea.

$3.00

LITTLE, BROWN & CO., BOSTON

Pacha—Major John Bagot Glubb of Pembury Village in Kent—a new, pocket-sized Lawrence who has recruited the wild Bedouins into a disciplined, democratic Arab Legion.

Despite the drama of his later adventures east of Suez, the best of Mr. Burman's story is in the opening chapters, which give the book its name. In Equatorial Africa he saw a nation go back to war. This was the miracle—that men who refused to accept the defeat of France were able, in the deadly heat, disease, and desolation of the Congo, to reconstruct an army and reclaim a territory four times as large as their fallen homeland 4,000 miles away.

HAL LEHRMAN

RESORTS

In the Heart of
The Adirondacks

SCARROON MANOR
HOTEL on SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.

9 HOLE GOLF COURSE
ON PREMISES

9 Clay Tennis Courts
8 Handball Courts

Complete Social
& Sport Staffs

Earl Carpenter
& His Orchestra

QUISISANA CAMPS

At Center Lovell, in Maine's Pine Woods in the White Mountain Region
SITUATED ON LAKE KEZAR, The Most Beautiful Lake in U. S. A.
QUAINT • RESTFUL • ROMANTIC

Cheerful individual cottages with bath, fireplaces, electricity. Main Lodge rooms with or without private bath. Food of highest quality, wholesome, tempting. Golf, tennis, boating, swimming, natural sand beach. Excellent fishing: Salmon, Black Bass. No car is necessary to come to Quisisana Camps. Convenient train or bus transportation. We meet all trains and buses. Non-Sectarian. Ownership-Management.
Weekly Rates from $38 American Plan — Lower Rates during June to July 15
WRITE FOR BOOKLET QUISISANA CAMPS, CENTER LOVELL, MAINE

AMUSEMENTS

CHERYL CRAWFORD presents

George Gershwin and
DuBose Heyward's
PORGY AND BESS

Air-Cooled MAJESTIC THEATRE, W. 44 St. Eves. Incl., Sun. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

"Go see 'Porgy and Bess' if you go see nothing else."

—Kronenberger, PM

PRICES:

Eves. . . . $2.75 to 55¢
Mats. . . . $2.20 to 55¢

SUBSCRIPTION FORM

THE NATION 55 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.

For the inclosed $..... please enter my subscription for the period indicated below:

- ☐ THIRTEEN WEEKS ($1) ☐ TWO YEARS ($8)
☐ ONE YEAR ($5) ☐ THREE YEARS ($11)

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

Extra Postage for Year: Canadian, 50c; Foreign, $1.00 7-11-42

Lafayette

LAFAYETTE AND THE CLOSE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. By Louis Gottschalk. The University of Chicago Press. $4.50.

PROFESSOR GOTTSCHALK is without doubt an authority of distinction on all matters concerning the Marquis de Lafayette. It is entirely probable that he knows more of the doings, correspondence, friendships, hatreds, philanderings, gaieties, and sorrows of the sprightly French nobleman than anyone else now living. He looks upon a fact concerning Lafayette, however little it may be, with the reverence that an inveterate stamp collector gives to a Mauritius blue of 1785. Dr. Gottschalk's present work, "Lafayette and the Close of the American Revolution," is a literary stamp collection built up around the gallant Marquis and his activities in America on his second visit, from April, 1780, to January, 1782. The book has 458 pages and 1,551 footnotes. The author never leaves his readers in doubt as to the source of his information. His work is as free from vagaries and flights of the imagination as a report of the New York Stock Exchange.

In remarking that the learned professor's book resembles a stamp collection the present reviewer does not intend, even by implication or innuendo, to discredit its value. On the contrary, this book—and those of Professor Gottschalk's that preceded it—are all valuable contributions to historical literature. Without such scholarly works as a source of reference an author who is writing history for the average reader would have immense difficulty in getting his facts together.

The volume under review is the third of a series on Lafayette. The preceding volumes are "Lafayette Comes to America" and "Lafayette Joins the American Army." As the present book ends at the close of the American Revolution, and Lafayette lived until 1834, Dr. Gottschalk must intend to write two or three more volumes.

The author brings out clearly the ardent affection that existed between Washington and Lafayette. The former was childless and Lafayette, when a boy, had lost his father, who was killed in battle. He wrote to Washington, "There never was a friend, my dear general, so much, so tenderly beloved as I do love and respect you." And Washington said to La Luzerne, the French ambassador, "I do not know a nobler, finer soul, and I love him as my own son."

This book is clearly not intended for popular reading. It is confusing, here and there, because of the piling up of unnecessary facts and the failure of the author to distinguish between great and small events. He is completely lacking in the sense of drama. One of the most startling events of the American Revolution was Benedict Arnold's treason; Dr. Gottschalk has managed, by some miracle of writing, to squeeze all the excitement out of it.

This reviewer does not hesitate to predict that when the Lafayette series is completed Dr. Gottschalk will be the recipient of a Pulitzer prize, though we may be sure that he is not writing with that reward in mind. W. E. WOODWARD

[Coming soon: "American Primitive Painting," by Jean Lipman—reviewed by Clement Greenberg.]

MUSIC

THE Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo has appeared recently at the Metropolitan, at the Stadium, and in films of "Capriccio espagnol" and "Gaité parisienne" at the Fifth Avenue Playhouse.

The film has its elements and procedures; and so has the ballet. In the ballet you see the entire human figure; you see the movement of this figure in a frame of space; and you see this movement continuously. You see the movement of the entire figure in a frame of space because that is what the ballet is concerned with; you see it continuously because the continuity of the progression of movement in one of the scenes of "Capriccio espagnol" is essential to its effect. As against this visual continuity the film achieves narrative continuity, by means—the shifts from one place or action to another, from long shot to close-up, and so on—that produce visual discontinuities. Filming a ballet, then, means combining these different objectives and different techniques; it means producing what at certain times is a motion picture with narrative continuity and at other times a picture of ballet movement with visual continuity. In the case of "Capriccio espagnol" it should have meant letting the camera move from place to place, action to action, long shot to close-up, for the motion picture narrative that takes us to the point where a dance-scene begins, and then holding the camera continuously pointed at this scene (though not necessarily motionless while so pointed). Instead, in the actual film of this ballet, the devices of the narrative are carried into the dance-scene: the camera jumps from the dance to the spectators, from one dancer to another, from one type of shot to another, destroying the visual continuity of the scene. Not only are the dance-scenes—all except Massine's—chopped up into bits in this way, but the dancers' figures are poorly presented in their frames of space: groups clutter the scene; leaping and whirling solo dancers are framed too closely. In addition there are moments when a close-up presents not the entire figure but only part of it. And there are other losses: on the stage Massine's entrance for the final scene of "Capriccio espagnol" is electrifying; on the screen—what with the commentator's voice that blankets the sound of his heels, and the crowd that screens his movements—there is no entrance.

The company in the films is the one that appeared at the Metropolitan last fall—with Danilova (who is hardly seen), Toumanova, Massine, Youskevitch, Eglevsky, and Franklin. It returned in the spring weakened by the departure of Toumanova and Eglevsky, the temporary absence of Danilova with an injured foot; and the losses were not made up by the return of Slavenska, whose dancing is an exhibition of pure, cold technical skill without the slightest overtone of poetry, style, or grace. This was important because the company has nothing but its few star dancers; and with the corps de ballet poor in quality and insufficiently rehearsed a piece like the first scene of Balanchine's "Serenade," with its wonderful ensemble patterns, is reduced to confusion and ruin by the smudging of the lines and group movements that must be clean and sharp, and other performances are no more than the moments when the stars are on the stage—including certain great moments like those of Massine's entrance in "Capriccio espagnol," his dancing here and in "Beau Danube," the dancing of Danilova and Franklin in "Gaité parisienne." But with all the departures and shifts in roles even these moments were fewer. One change was interesting: Youskevitch in place of Massine in "Beau Danube," making handsome appearance and youthful technical brilliance do for the older man's compelling presence and brilliance of style. The other changes, however, gave us Slavenska and Zoritch in place of Danilova and Franklin in "Gaité parisienne," Slavenska in place of Danilova in "Beau Danube," Zoritch in place of Youskevitch in "Afternoon of a Faun."

At the Stadium Danilova was back in "Gaité parisienne," but without Franklin; and she and Massine were in "Beau Danube," but with an otherwise undistinguished cast that made one think back to the first performances of the piece in 1934, and curse the human weaknesses that had broken up the brilliant company which included Massine, Woizikovsky, Shabelevsky, Lichine, Danilova, Toumanova, Riabouchinska, Baronova. The inadequacies of the Stadium stage conditions exacted their price in artistic effectiveness; and there was a further loss of communicative effect in the vast uncontained space of the open-air theater. Moreover, the music was badly performed and was distorted by the electrical amplification.

At the Metropolitan I saw my first performances of "St. Francis," which I had read was Massine's supreme creative achievement, but which confirmed the impression I had got from previous serious ballets of Massine—that his gift in choreography is for gaiety and fun and wit; though "Saratoga" provided evidence that he can fail even in these. Hindemith's music, for "St. Francis," which also had been spoken of as outstanding, I did not find different from the rest of his dry and sour output; Weinberger's for "Saratoga," on the other hand, turned out to be as it had been described: terrible.

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

PAUL MAXWELL ZEIS, assistant professor of political science at the University of Akron, is the author of "American Shipping Policy," the standard book dealing with government aid for the merchant marine.

DALE KRAMER has spent many years studying conditions among farmers. He has contributed to Harper's, the Survey Graphic, and other magazines.

JACQUES BARZUN, assistant professor of history at Columbia, is the author of "Darwin, Marx, Wagner."

HAL LEHRMAN is an American newspaperman who has lived and worked in France.

W. E. WOODWARD is the author of "George Washington," "A New American History," and "Lafayette."

BOOK BARGAINS

Balance Sheet of the Future: Ernest Bevin.....	$.50
Bulwark of the Republic: B. J. Hendrick ($3 ed.).....	.50
Meaning of Culture: John Cowper Powys.....	.50
The Airman: Selden Rodman (orig. $2 ed.).....	.50
Success: Lion Feuchtwanger (orig. $3 ed.).....	.50
The Pretender: Lion Feuchtwanger (Viking ed.).....	.50
The Marsh Voice: Rebecca West.....	.50
Europe in the Spring: Clare Boothe ($2.50 ed.).....	.50
A Prairie Grove: Donald C. Peattie.....	.50
Brief Hour of Francols Villon: John Erskine.....	.50
The Thinking Reed: Rebecca West.....	.50
Mulholland's BLUE GUIDES, $3, $4, $5, $6 list
French Alps; Southern Spain & Portugal; Normandy; 70 Miles Around London (Macmillan)	each .50
Stedman's Complete Pocket Guide to Europe.....	.50
Battle for Asia: Edgar Snow.....	.50
Owen Glendower: J. O. Powys ($5-2 vol. ed.).....	1.00
Moment in Peking: Lin Yutang (orig. $3 ed.).....	1.25
The Old Bunch: Meyer Levin.....	1.35
The Golden Bough: Sir James Frazer ($1.99 list).....	1.50
Out of the Night: Jan Valtin ($3.50 ed.).....	1.50
Meln Kampf: Hitler (Reynal & Hitchcock).....	1.65
The Mind and Society: Vilfredo Pareto.....	9.00
(the orig. 4 vol. Harcourt, Brace $20.00, new) Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences: Editors
Sellman & Johnson, new, $45 reg., 8 vol.....	32.50
Add 10¢ per book U. S. mailing on orders under $2

DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR, 212 B'way, N. Y. C.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES

62 cents a line (6 words)

Minimum 3 lines

THE NATION

55 Fifth Avenue New York City
Telephone, ALg. 4-3311

Letters to the Editors

A Partisan of the King

Dear Sirs: Leigh White's article in your issue of June 13 in which he attempts to answer the question "Whom does the Greek King represent?" is bristling with historical errors and unfounded conclusions. It appears that the author has not drawn his facts from a study of political events in Greece but has gleaned them from gossip by partisan Greek fugitives from embattled Greece, men who have come to the United States carrying their Greek or English wealth and now aspire to grasp the leadership of the Greek nation.

King George II of Greece has not come to the United States, as Mr. White claims, to bolster his throne. The Atlantic Charter declares that the policy of the United States and Great Britain—and now Russia's is the same—will be not to interfere with a nation's internal affairs. The Greeks, therefore, like all other independent nations, will decide on the form of government they want by themselves, without any outside help. King George and Premier Tsouderos risked a perilous voyage to America solely for the purpose of obtaining armaments to enable the Greek forces in Libya and Palestine and the Greek navy in the Mediterranean to keep up the fight.

Is King George hated by the Greek people? Let us look at the record, as Governor Smith used to say. When the King fled from Greece at the approach of the German invaders, he did not fly to Egypt or to Turkey or to the United States, as many of his enemies have done. He fled to the island of Crete, with his Cretan Premier, Tsouderos. Yes, to Crete, the homeland of Venizelos and Tsouderos, the hotbed of Greek anti-monarchism and radical republicanism. And the Greeks of Crete risked their own lives to save King George from the Stukas that were pursuing him. And what about the 75,000 Greek soldiers in the Near East who are fighting for democracy? Did they also resent the King's leadership? Have the Greek sailors rebelled against the King and Admiral Sakellariou? The answer of course is no.

Now a word about Admiral Sakellariou, whose appointment as Secretary of the Navy appears to Mr. White to prove conclusively that King George is a fascist. Admiral Sakellariou is one of the outstanding officers in the Greek navy. Under Metaxas he was merely naval chief of staff and did not receive a political appointment until Mr. Tsouderos, the avowed friend of democracy, appointed him to the Cabinet with the consent of the King. He has never participated in any political activities in Greece; nor did he take part in any of the many revolutions in his country. In fact, when he presided over the court martial which tried the Republican leaders of the abortive Venizelist revolution in 1935, the Greek nation had a unique opportunity to judge the fairness and generosity of Admiral Sakellariou, who urged the military prosecutors to refrain from meddling in the purely political affairs of the country and reminded them that it was their duty to serve the country as soldiers under any Greek administration. It is true that Admiral Sakellariou has always been loyal to the King, but he has never been personally loyal to Metaxas and his regime.

The Greeks are fighting against the enemies of America. King George and Premier Tsouderos and Admiral Sakellariou are leading the Greeks in that fight. And that is of paramount importance to America. When actions talk so loud, words and gossip serve merely to discourage our real friends. The American people should frown on such defeatist gossip.

N. J. CASSAVETES

New York, June 26

Mr. White Bolsters His Thesis

Dear Sirs: Mr. Cassavetes accuses me of writing an article "bristling with historical errors" but neglects to point out a single one. I must assume therefore that he takes exception only to my conclusions. Specifically, he disagrees with three: (1) that Admiral Sakellariou is a fascist; (2) that King George is extremely unpopular in Greece; and (3) that the King's motive in visiting the United States is to bolster his highly doubtful claims to a legally non-existent throne.

Has Mr. Cassavetes forgotten Sakellariou's famous strictures against popular government? "You've got to use a whip over the people" is one often quoted. "Democracy is the worst possible form of government" is another. Mr. Cassavetes may not attach much importance to such utterances, but I do, and I think the majority of the Greek people do—especially since the author was one of the prime instigators of the Kondyles dictatorship, a leader of the bloody counter-revolution against the Venizelist liberals in 1935, and the Metaxist chief of staff who removed almost every democratically-minded officer from the roster of the Greek navy.

As for King George's popularity, that can be finally determined only by means of an honest plebiscite after the war is won. To date King George has not been willing to submit himself to such a test. I realized his unpopularity after talking to large numbers of Greeks in Salonika, Athens, Patras, and Corfu between March and September, 1941. I can assure Mr. Cassavetes that a great wave of revulsion swept the country after the King escaped, and that the Greeks with whom I talked were almost unanimous in their denunciation of him.

Rightly or wrongly, they were convinced that King George as well as Metaxas was responsible for the sordid misappropriation of the aircraft funds that had been collected by direct taxation and for the appointment of such traitorous generals as Pappadimas and Tsolakoglou. They also blamed the King for the treasonable series of intrigues by which a large part of the Greek army was demobilized against its will before the final surrender to the Germans, and as a result of which Prime Minister Korizis committed suicide.

I heartily agree with Mr. Cassavetes that the Greek people should be permitted to decide for and by themselves the post-war government of Greece. That is precisely why I wrote my article. I was afraid—and I am still afraid—that King George and his camarilla will try to decide it for them. The Greeks deserve a better fate than that.

LEIGH WHITE

Lincoln, Neb., July 2

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 18, 1942

NUMBER 3

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

41

EDITORIALS

Should Wages Be Frozen?

43

Dies Tells Almost All by Freda Kirchwey

44

But Time Runs Short by J. Alvarez del Vayo

45

ARTICLES

The Nile and the Don by Donald W. Mitchell

46

Keep Them Out! V. Senator W. Lee O'Daniel of Texas by Willson Whitman

48

How to Talk to Hitler's Europe
by Gaetano Salvemini

50

In the Wind

53

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall

54

Moscow and Magnitogorsk by Marc Slonim

54

The Powers and the Peace by Bjarne Braatoy

56

In Brief

57

Drama Note by J. W. K.

58

Records by B. H. Haggin

58

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

60

✱

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON    MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

IN THE HEADLINE WRITERS' SCALE OF values a five-mile advance by the British in Egypt outweighs a hundred-mile break-through by the Germans in Russia. Such inflation of minor successes, particularly by the evening newspapers, makes it difficult for the public to grasp the gravity of the present position on the eastern front, where the Nazis have driven a huge wedge into Timoshenko's lines and are threatening to separate the southern wing of the Red Army from its center. To many people the Russian drama doesn't seem entirely real, nor its relation to our own task in defeating the enemy clear. To some extent Moscow must bear the blame. Its refusal to allow foreign correspondents or even Allied military observers anywhere near the fighting front has thickened the screen through which we view Russia's struggle, and our perspective has been further distorted by over-optimistic Soviet claims. What is clear enough, however, is that the offensive strength of the Reichswehr is still enormous and that its full weight is being employed to break Russia. Hitler is committed to victory in the east and cannot draw back without exposing himself to a ruinous counterblow. Thus the opening of a western front is both a strategic necessity and a great opportunity.

THE ISSUANCE OF SEVERAL MEANINGLESS communiqués on the trial of the eight German saboteurs and the admission of a handful of reporters during a suspension of proceedings do not appear to be much of a victory for Elmer Davis in his fight against unnecessary secrecy. But the victory is there, and it is a hopeful one because of the skill with which the newly installed director of the Office of War Information achieved it. Alien sabotage trials are obviously rich in information that can be of value to the enemy, particularly to other saboteurs still on the loose. Mr. Davis knew better than to make such a case a test of his broad powers. Theoretically these powers supersede those of the military in the matter of disseminating war news, but the trial commission had been given equally sweeping authority. What Davis did was to insist on his right to be consulted, on his duty to ask whether the public was not entitled to some degree of information about the progress of the trial. In that test Mr. Davis came through with colors flying. After months of submission to bungling, overlapping authority, and surrender to the bureaucratic will to secrecy, we can feel that war news is at last in the hands of an official who understands, to quote his own words, that "this is a people's war and to win it the people should know as much about it as they can."

★

WHILE IT HAS PARTIALLY RESTORED THE cuts made by the House in OPA funds, the Senate Committee on Appropriations has attached amendments to the bill which, according to Leon Henderson, will compel the abandonment of the general maximum-price regulations. The provision for Senate confirmation of all appointments carrying a salary exceeding $4,500 is a nuisance clause which seems to confirm the charge that Mr. Henderson has annoyed Congress by ignoring politics in the selection of his staff. Far more hampering, however, is the stipulation giving the Secretary of Agriculture veto power over price ceilings of commodities manufactured in whole or in part from farm products. Such ceilings are only to be approved if they reflect a return to the primary producers not less than any of the following: 110 per cent of parity; market price last October 1; market price last December 15; average price from 1919 to 1929. In order to satisfy this requirement, maximum prices on most foods and many types of textiles would have to be revised upward. At the same time the Senate, although favoring the sale of government-owned grain at below-parity prices, has passed a bill insuring 100 per cent parity loans on 1942 crops of wheat, corn, cotton, tobacco, rice, and peanuts. This means putting under most of these commodities a floor which will raise them well above present market prices. With Congress carrying on in this fashion, with landlords putting on a well-financed campaign to force up rents, and with labor, which ought to be backing the OPA, attacking in the rear because of Henderson's opposition to wage increases, the ropes holding down the inflation balloon can barely take the strain. It is time, the President gave a hand by restating his seven-point program to keep down the cost of living in specific terms of the administrative and legislative action necessary to make it effective.

★

THE HOUSE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE has made a number of last-minute revisions in the tax bill which will add a few hundred million dollars to the revenue but still leave the total more than two billion dollars short of the Treasury goal. One sensible new provision is the raising of personal exemptions for members of the armed forces, thus leaving the buck private's

$50 a month free of tax. The burden on individual income-tax payers is further increased by a 1 per cent addition to surtax rates all the way up the scale, making it 13 per cent in the lowest brackets and 85 per cent at the top. Combined corporation income and surtax is to be at the rate of 45 per cent, compared with an earlier recommendation by the committee of 40 per cent, while the excess-profits rate has been lowered from 94 to 87½ per cent. However, the post-war credit of 14 per cent, formerly proposed, has been dropped. One of the worst features of the committee's report is the 5 per cent railroad-freight tax, which has been vehemently condemned by Leon Henderson as directly inflationary. This tax will be levied on the movement of each component of a final product, with each processor adding to his price enough and a little bit more to take care of this added cost. Thus the charge will be pyramided, and the increased burden on the final consumer will be much greater than the additional revenue.

★

WILLSON WHITMAN GIVES A PICTURE IN this issue of the fantastic ingredients of the Texas Senatorial campaign and the personalities of the contestants. Very late news from the front indicates that O'Daniel is, as she suggests, slipping. Private newspaper polls covering the state show Allred in the lead, with O'Daniel second and Moody third. Texas is passionately patriotic—it has contributed the highest state proportion of volunteer soldiers and is at least 50 per cent pro-Roosevelt—and O'Daniel's vote last August "to send the boys home," together with his record of opposition to more stringent rationing measures, has offset the effect of hill-billy bands and old-time religion as vote getters. His attitude on the war and its direction was summed up in a campaign speech this week: "Don't let them know what you like. They'll ration anything that the people like." It looks as if Pappy O'Daniel would be back with the home folks next year.

★

GRADUALLY, ALMOST SURREPTITIOUSLY, THE United States has been moving closer to the Free French, and now Secretary Hull has designated Admiral Stark and Brigadier General Bolte as representatives to "consult" with the French National Committee in London. The action amounts to the accrediting of naval and military attachés to the committee and recognizes the closer relations between our fighting forces and those of the Free French. But the State Department has gone far out of its way to make it clear that the French National Committee is not recognized as a government but only as "a symbol of French resistance in general against the Axis powers," and that "the destiny of France must, in the last analysis, be determined by free expression of the French people. . . ." Since General de Gaulle has repeatedly proclaimed this position as his own, its official reiteration can only have the effect of irritating our Free French allies, grateful as they are for our closer collaboration. They must, one supposes, occasionally reflect that Laval's government is recognized by the United States even though it can hardly be said to have been selected through any technique of "free expression." But in these days one welcomes any evidence of courage and realism. The move of the State Department at least points up the fact that while our relations with De Gaulle are growing closer, those with Vichy are becoming more tenuous and uneasy day by day.

✱

BUT WE STILL TRY TO MAKE DEALS WITH the government that has sentenced De Gaulle to death as a traitor. According to dispatches from Vichy, the American chargé d'affaires, S. Pinkney Tuck, has been urging Laval to permit removal to safer ports of the French warships now interned at Alexandria. As might have been anticipated, Laval has refused, with a wealth of legalistic reasoning designed to conceal the obvious fact that Vichy can't hand those ships over to the Allies if it wants to; and it doesn't want to. They are a part of the prospective spoils of conquest, and Hitler will hardly authorize his puppet to cache them safely out of reach of the Nazi army. Attempts to induce Vichy to cooperate with the Allies instead of the Nazis have not been conspicuously successful to date. Remember Martinique? On that doorstep island our representatives, ignoring Vichy, were supposedly bringing about an agreement with Vichy's pro-Axis governor, Admiral Robert, to safeguard our interests by establishing American observers in Martinique and taking over the tankers sheltered in the harbor at Fort de France. If an agreement has been reached, nothing has been heard of it; and it is not likely that the State Department would fail to call attention to such a signal triumph. But Admiral Robert, on the other hand, broadcast a speech a few days ago in which he heaped insult and contempt on the American government which had tried, unsuccessfully, to "bribe" him into disloyalty to his country and his leaders. The speech was not released for publication. Why? Might this not be a suitable case for Elmer Davis to look into?

✱

LUDWIG LORE'S MEMOIRS, HAD THEY BEEN written, would have made good reading. His sixty-seven years were a political odyssey, from classic German Marxism, through the I. W. W. and pre-war socialism, to communism; followed by disillusion, fierce opposition to Communists of all shades, a renewed faith in democracy, and a passionate hatred for fascism and all its works. For all his natural kindness and personal charm, he was a hard fighter, and if most of his positions were tenaciously held only to be abandoned, his life was none the less meaningful. He learned a great deal at each political station along the way, and his fund of experience will be sorely missed in the years ahead.

Should Wages Be Frozen?

THE demand of the United Steelworkers for a dollar-a-day increase in pay for the employees of the "Little Steel" group, on which a decision by the War Labor Board is imminent, is generally regarded as providing a test case in respect of wage policy during the war. If the WLB orders the raise, it will set a precedent which can be used to justify wage demands in many other industries, and one of the seven points of the President's program for the prevention of inflation—wage stabilization—will become a dead letter.

It is hardly to be expected that the price-ceiling structure—already none too secure—could withstand such a blow. Not merely would added costs force an upward revision in some ceilings, but the additional volume of purchasing power seeking satisfaction in a restricted supply market would exert an intolerable pressure on prices as a whole. Spokesmen for the steel workers are inclined to treat the "inflationary gap" as a myth, but unfortunately it is all too real, as everyone will begin to realize in a few months when the inventories swollen by last year's super-production of consumer goods vanish from the shelves.

In the past few days the stock market has suddenly developed strength. It is a significant response to the increased danger of inflation, which offers golden opportunities to holders of stocks. But for the workers inflation always means a heartbreaking race against prices, a race which they cannot hope to win. Consequently, the first objective of labor statesmanship in a total war economy, which by definition rules out a general rise in the standard of living, ought to be the maintenance of a stable price level, and this is not compatible with a rising wage scale.

Considered in isolation, the case for an increase in steel pay is a good one, as the report of the fact-finding panel of the WLB showed. Steel workers' wages, although above the average of all industries, are not high in comparison with other capital-goods industries. Moreover, the increase obtained in the spring of 1941 has since been canceled by the rise in the cost of living. The "Little Steel" companies can well afford to add a dollar a day to wages. In fact, it would cost them very little, for the main result would be to shrink their excess profits, of which the Treasury will in any case collect 87½ per cent if the present tax bill is voted. This point has been used widely as an argument against a wage increase, but as the fact-finding report says, "if a wage increase, otherwise proper, is withheld because of its effect on governmental revenues per se, such withholding would involve an unauthorized tax on workers."

The verdict of the fact-finding panel was a recommendation that the Steelworkers' demands should be met, and purely on the merits of the case there is no doubt that the recommendation was justified. The WLB, however, cannot formulate its own judgment in a vacuum; it must weigh the effects of a rise in steel wages on the economy as a whole, and it cannot ignore the serious inflationary repercussions such a rise is bound to have.

Should the government then freeze all wages? This is not as simple a procedure as many of its advocates suggest. In some industries wages are below the level of health and efficiency, and in such instances they must be raised in order to secure a full productive effort from the workers. Again, there is the question of wage differentials between similar industries and even branches of the same industry. Los Angeles aircraft workers receive 75 cents an hour as a minimum, while at the Ford bomber plant at Willow Run the minimum is $1. On the Pacific Coast copper miners and lumber workers are quitting their jobs for better-paid employment in the shipyards. In an era when the demand for skilled and semi-skilled labor is threatening far to outstrip the supply, wage differentials of this kind are bound to lead to a high turnover of personnel—one of the greatest obstacles to efficient production.

The question which must be faced is: Can wages be frozen without at the same time freezing men to their jobs? Such a step would mean a far sharper break with our traditions of free enterprise than many measures which have been bitterly fought by business interests—as, for example, maintenance of union membership. In Great Britain five million men engaged in work of national importance have been tied to their jobs. But in return for giving up the right of free contract they are protected in their employment and cannot be dismissed except for gross misconduct. Moreover, they are guaranteed full pay for a normal week's work whether there is work for them or not.

Similar steps may prove necessary here before the war is over, but meanwhile we submit for consideration the following program:

1. Wages above a level to be fixed in relation to minimum needs for maintaining health and efficiency to be frozen, subject to adjustment in the event of a further 10 per cent rise in the cost of living. The freezing should also be applied retroactively to salaries and executive bonuses in excess of $25,000—many of which have been stepped up tremendously in the past two years—bringing them back to 1939 levels.

2. In industries producing war goods or essential consumer goods the WLB should have power to order wage revisions when existing levels can be shown to have a deterrent effect on labor supply.

3. Legislation for the compulsory payment of profit-sharing bonuses to workers, in the form of a special issue of war bonds which could not be cashed until after the war.

Such a program is admittedly pragmatic. It represents an effort to find a formula which will check the present inflationary trend of wages without reacting adversely on production. And it seeks a way of preventing the sacrifices which the community must ask of the workers from incidentally benefiting their employers.

Dies Tells Almost All

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

NO INDICTMENT of the tricky tactics of our little Texas Himmler, Martin Dies, could be more damning than the indictment contained in his own apology—offered in the face of a $75,000 libel suit—to David B. Vaughan of the Board of Economic Warfare.

Mr. Dies is, he says, an honorable man. He is the first to make amends when he unwittingly publishes an erroneous statement about a fellow human being. Especially a fellow human being who is able to hire the best law firm in Washington to defend his name. And especially when Mr. Dies's underlings have been incautious enough to put the erroneous statement into a press release—not privileged—instead of into a libel-proof committee report or speech on the floor of the House.

Mr. Dies warmly embraces the opportunity to apologize to Mr. Vaughan, who definitely means business about the $75,000. And in the course of his eager correction he manages to tell almost all about the methods of the committee of which he is the head.

It seems the name "David Vaughan" appeared on a letter-head listing the numerous sponsors of the American League for Peace and Democracy. That was enough. Mr. Dies wrote a letter to the Vice-President of the United States charging that several employees of the Board of Economic Warfare, including David B. Vaughan, head administrative officer, were members of "Communist front" organizations. He demanded that these subversive individuals resign or be fired. Mr. Vaughan sued.

It happens that David B. Vaughan is not David Vaughn. He never sponsored the League for Peace and Democracy. He is a person of mildly liberal views who was a banker before he went to work for the government. To be labeled a Communist or near-Communist is bad for his reputation and even bothers him in his work, which involves questioning other applicants for jobs as to their political views and connections. So Vaughan proved a prickly victim of the Dies technique. And after a lapse of three and a half months the Texas inquisitor decided to say he was sorry.

But in saying so, he said more. He admitted that his committee was willing to publish charges against a person without inquiry, without proof, without a hearing, without even bothering to check the spelling of the victim's name. He admitted it was willing to demand that person's dismissal or resignation on such flimsy grounds. He admitted, in total effect, that the methods of the committee which has pilloried hundreds of decent, patriotic citizens are as shoddy as they are vicious, a fantastic waste of the people's money, a flagrant violation of the most elementary civil rights. All that is implicit in Mr. Dies's unctuous apology to the one man he wronged who was in a position to sue him for libel.

What he did not say, but what lies just behind the language of retraction, is something like this: "Listen, old man. No offense intended. You see I didn't know you used to be a banker and I hadn't an idea you would sue. This Communist-front business is all the bunk anyhow. My chief investigator was one of those fellow-travelers himself once. That's not the point. I say 'Communist' just like Hitler does. All it means is democrat—small d—or liberal. What's the use of checking up whether a guy's a Communist or not when all you want to do is smear a New Dealer? But next time I'll watch my step. Either I'll hide behind Congressional privilege when I name names or I'll make sure my man can't hit back. This is politics, not justice."

But Time Runs Short

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

The great German drive to the east, with its gathering momentum, threatens to split the central and southern Red armies apart, gain the Volga at the great industrial city of Stalingrad . . . seal that waterway and other supply lines from the United Nations to the Russians, and conquer the oil riches of the Caucasus itself.—Associated Press dispatch, July 14.

I SHALL never forget the anguish with which the Honorable Member for X—asked me, in March, 1939, whether England could still do anything to save Spain. It was just ten days after the government had left the Central Zone and seven days before Franco entered Madrid. I had flown to London to see how many ships we could charter to take out Loyalists who otherwise would be dragged before a firing squad. The question whispered into my ear when I had finished addressing a hundred members of the House of Commons was so astonishing that I made inquiries about the personality of my interlocutor. He was a Conservative who for three years had understood nothing of what was going on in Spain, who had believed Franco could be "handled" through a British loan, who had applauded Chamberlain at Munich, and who now suddenly realized with horror that the victory of Hitler in Spain meant war for England and for the world. I was told that for three days he had walked like a somnambulist through the corridors of Westminster demanding that the British fleet be sent to Spain and asking why the French did not mobilize at once.

I cannot help recalling, in these days, that tardy savior who appeared when the zero hour was past, and I ask myself whether in the fall of 1942 we may not see another somnambulist full of despair because we allowed Russia to be smashed without our having fulfilled the promise of a second front.

And the promise was made. It was not formulated in an emotional moment of a Parliamentary debate. It was announced, officially and solemnly, by the two highest leaders of the United Nations at their last meeting in Washington. Nobody could doubt the determination of President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill to carry out their word. One is as shrewd a politician as the other, but both are men of an immense sense of responsibility and with too much respect for the peoples of the earth to try to play politics with one of the few remaining possibilities of winning the war. Everybody took the announcement as a settled decision.

Moreover, the promise to open a new western front in 1942 was made after an entire session in Washington devoted to the shipping problem. Both leaders, having listened to the experts, apparently agreed that, with more or fewer ships, an invasion of the Continent was going to be attempted because there was no other alternative to general disaster. And it is interesting to notice that in the very impressive and well-documented analysis of Ships and New Fronts in the last issue of The Nation Paul Maxwell Zeis, while emphasizing the paucity of shipping at present, wrote: "If the war is to be won, it seems certain that a second front must be established in Western Europe to take the pressure off the Russians in the east."

Russia is fighting at this moment better than ever. Its retreat is marked by greater heroism, more admirable resolution, than many a spectacular advance. But if Russia is fighting like this, it is partly because it takes seriously the British-American promise of a second front—because it waits from one day to the next for a new front to be opened. That is clear in the quotations from the Russian press, in the official broadcasts, in the orders of the day issued by the Red Army chiefs, in the calm confidence with which the Russian soldiers are dying—for all of us.

But time runs short. For the second front to accomplish its task of relief there is a very limited margin of time. Perhaps six weeks, no more. Or must we witness again the spectacle of a delayed—and useless—awakening to reality such as overwhelmed my British M. P. when Spain was already crushed?

The Nile and the Don

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE late Sir John Fisher, First Lord of the Admiralty during those critical years which preceded the first World War, was an acid critic of the British military and naval system. Commenting on the promotion of well-born but mediocre men to high places, he predicted, "Some day the British Empire will fall because 'it's Juggens's turn.'"

A third of a century later his prediction is being borne out. When the London Mirror a year ago began examining the Juggenses and Colonel Blimps of the British army, criticism of the military was promptly prohibited. A few months afterward the Japanese at Hongkong, in Malaya, and in Burma were proving the full justice of the Mirror's strictures. But the British army's defenders, overlooking the lack of vision and intelligent preparation in the High Command, could still plead lack of numbers or, in a few cases, as in Crete, where they had numerical superiority, point to enemy preponderance in the air.

In Libya the empire's forces had neither of these handicaps. A British army 11 per cent superior in numbers, 40 per cent stronger in tanks, 60 per cent better in artillery, and at least twice as strong in the air, operating closer to its base of supplies, suffered decisive defeat. We do not know all the details of the battle or of the subsequent rally in the shadows of Alexandria. But it is apparent that the Germans "surprised" their foe with a type of anti-tank gun which they had used in every major campaign of the war and with better tanks than the American products being sent to the British. More important, they showed far better coordination between air force and ground troops, better planes for such work, a faster repair service, better tactics, more offensive drive, and infinitely superior leadership. The lack of a unified command for the Army of the Nile was especially disastrous. In the crucial fight at Bir Hacheim which started the British collapse, the much stronger R. A. F. allowed the German dive bombers a field day. On the fatal day of June 13, when adequate cooperation between aerial reconnaissance and ground forces would have prevented the slaughter of British tanks and the consequent loss of Tobruk, there was still no sign of ability to work together. But the strategic results of the Battle of Eastern Libya are of less importance than the demonstration that nearly three years of defeat have not sufficed to teach the British High Command certain of this war's more elementary lessons. Nor are we ourselves in a position to criticize the British unduly, for we have made many of the same blunders. Our potential advantage in manpower and wealth is worth nothing unless it is used to win. We can't go on forever on the assurance that success is just around the corner.

At the time of writing, the outcome of the Middle Eastern struggle is still uncertain. The United Nations have given up large areas of desert not in themselves vital, but have also suffered serious losses in men and material. Their dominance of the eastern Mediterranean, for some months extremely shaky, has been weakened by the enemy's capture of sites for advanced air bases, and the conquest of Alexandria would bring it to an end. Nevertheless, the Germans have by no means won the campaign for the Middle East. Increasingly long lines of communication through difficult country, much inferior air power, and the British resolve to make a bitter, last-ditch stand still block the way to a complete German triumph. Actually a continued thrust by Rommel holds less danger than the possibility that the effort to stop him may have so weakened the British forces in Syria and Palestine that a German thrust through those countries by either sea or air would meet little resistance.

Americans have been slow to appreciate the vital importance of the Middle East in the present war. Alexandria is now the only major Allied naval base between England and Hawaii. German success in gaining the oil resources of Iran and Iraq would not only greatly ease Hitler's difficult supply problem but force the United Nations to bring their own oil from sources as distant from Europe as Texas, Venezuela, and California.

Russian defeats at Kerch and Kharkov have been serious, as was the earlier loss of Sevastopol. The latter was the one large naval base remaining in Russian hands, and with its fall the Soviets lost their last foothold on the Crimea. On the other hand, the Germans paid a high price for all these early gains, and even their capture of Sevastopol does not eliminate the small but extremely troublesome Black Sea fleet, which can use secondary bases farther east and so continue to discourage a sea-borne invasion of the Caucasus.

Not only the large German losses but the character of the early fighting seemed propitious for the United Nations' cause. For two months German efforts to cut through Timoshenko's defenses in depth and to force resumption of fighting along the lines of the earlier war of movement failed utterly. Apparently the Germans were to be forced to wage a war of attrition, the one kind of war that Hitler, facing new threats in the west, could not afford to wage. This encouraging outlook was altered by the German break-through at Kursk, which endangers the last of the north-south communication lines back of the Soviet front and also threatens with encirclement and destruction the armies directly north and south of the break-through. Everything now depends on the Russian reaction. If the Soviets are able to prevent further gains, then only territory has been lost. But unless the check is quickly applied, the Germans, despite the formidable obstacles of man-power and terrain still to be overcome, may be able to reach their goal in the Caucasus before the end of the summer.

In the event of this worst possible outcome, what chance will remain for the victory of the United Nations? Opportunities will have been greatly reduced, but some will still exist. According to the Russians, the industrial resources needed to support war, including oil, will be available farther north and east. This view is shared by those Americans who have had the most intimate recent acquaintance with Soviet economy. Loss of the Caucasus would, of course, close the Persian Gulf transportation line to Russia and diminish the flow of reinforcements to the U. S. S. R. But it is certain that the Soviet scorched-earth policy would leave no easy task for German reconstruction. It is believed by our service heads that the Nazis would require at least a year to exploit Soviet resources effectively. The loss of the Caucasus, therefore, unless it is accompanied by German conquest of the oil wells of Iran and Iraq, will by no means entail the loss of the war. Everything depends on the continued activity of the Russian armies. As long as the Soviets still have sufficient industrial resources to carry on a war and the Red armies remain in being, Russia can continue to trade even valuable territory for time.

But will the time gained at such enormous cost bring relief? Anyone can see that the miracles which are being achieved on American production lines can never bring victory while we are still losing three vessels to every two completed—despite the greatest turnout of new shipping known to history. Until we win the battle off our own Atlantic Coast we shall not be able to carry troops and supplies in great quantities to Europe.

This fact, however, does not eliminate all chance of an A. E. F. in the near future. In areas remote from the center of German power, such as Norway, we may be able to undertake partial offensives with fair chance of success. But we must here face the fact that limited offensives have only a limited nuisance value. A campaign that relieved pressure on Russia and bought time, even if it were unsuccessful and costly, might show a greater profit in the ledger of the entire war.

A vital question is to what extent the large-scale British air raids are a substitute for a new military front. The strategic purpose served by current air warfare is at least threefold. A limited but vocal group of aviation enthusiasts believe that air power has attained such primacy in war that persistent raids on enemy industry can bring about victory, or at least inflict ruin so great that a later mopping-up campaign on land would easily win the war. Most military critics refuse to go so far, but see air attack as a necessary prelude to an invasion attempt by land forces and as a means of establishing beachheads, blasting supporting war industries, and demoralizing civilians. Used as diversions, these raids are intended to be so damaging as to force withdrawal of important units of the Luftwaffe to meet a growing threat in the west. If in the process of meeting this threat the Luftwaffe can be enticed aloft and there destroyed, another step will have been taken toward ultimate Allied victory.

While we do not have the evidence upon which to base more than a tentative judgment, the attainment of all these objectives looks at least doubtful. There can be no question of the military and economic value of such cities as Bremen, Essen, and Cologne. But these are the easiest targets in Germany. The more distant centers—Berlin, Vienna, the Skoda Works at Pilsen, and Leipzig—have been almost untouched. They can only be bombed at a heavier cost of gasoline and casualties than the attackers have thus far been willing to pay. Even the damage done by such attacks is uncertain. Early estimates had five-sevenths of Cologne destroyed, but later reports based on aerial photographs reduced the estimate of the gutted area to one-eighth. Finally, the weak aerial resistance offered by the Germans and their slight attempts at reprisals argue that the attacks themselves have not done enough injury to compel any heavy concentration of the Luftwaffe in Western Europe. The Germans, in short, still have their eyes on the main front in Russia. No one in authority believes that aerial warfare over Europe has yet reached its height. American reinforcements based on both England and the Middle East should soon double the severity of the attacks. Nevertheless, air power today is neither winning the war single-handed nor affording much relief to the Russians.

A survey of the European war fronts, therefore, reveals much that is disappointing but little that was not expected by our more realistic war critics. Japan's conquests turned it into a "have" power in about six months. Germany's have not yet done so, but are now threatening areas of such enormous strategic importance that some authorities regard their ownership as essential to Allied victory. No immediate improvement in our strategic situation in Europe, except in the air, is to be looked for. If we win this summer's struggle in these vital areas it will be because existing lines are able to hold. As long as we are not winning the Battle of the Atlantic, we shall be unable to replace those elements of strength that are even now being lost along the Don.

Keep Them Out!

V. SENATOR W. LEE O'DANIEL OF TEXAS

BY WILLSON WHITMAN

WITH Texas fliers, Texas tank and submarine crews, and miscellaneous Texans from generals to mess boys conspicuous on all fighting fronts, it is a little embarrassing to realize that one of the two Texans in the Senate is a composer of radio commercials who voted against extending the draft "eighteen months, six months, or one day." Hope that the pending primary will assist in the removal of Senator W. Lee O'Daniel from Washington is making the political summer in Texas a warm one.

Senator O'Daniel is not actively against the war in the way a Bund member would be; he just doesn't want to think about it. To his campaign audiences he says, "There ain't gonna be no gasoline rationing in Texas, we ain't gonna lose this war, and there ain't gonna be no run-off"—meaning by the last the second primary due in August if the Senator fails to win a majority of the votes cast on July 25. Thus Senator O'Daniel is on record as willing to win the war against the Axis if it can be done without inconvenience to Texas oil operators. But he goes on to say, with fervor, that the real war is against "these wild-eyed labor-leader racketeers."

Unlike some other anti-labor members of Congress, who declared a truce on the home front in order to win the war abroad, the junior Senator from Texas is convinced that it is as important to break up the C. I. O. as to bomb Tokyo. Before Pearl Harbor, in a speech at the Dallas fair on September 7, 1941, he said the war had two fronts. "On one front we must guard to keep the dictators of the Old World from being able through force to control the affairs of our nation and to implant on our shores all of those foreign isms—Nazism, communism, and fascism"; on the second front we must guard against substitution of "a socialized system of business" for the American system of free enterprise. When he spoke in Washington three weeks later, he had reached the conclusion that of these two fronts the second was the more important—"as great a menace as, if not greater than, the threat of war." For, he explained, if foreign war should come, "we would win it, and after our victory we could all return to our usual domestic affairs under the same form of democracy we have always enjoyed. But if labor-union-leader racketeering is not stopped, our democracy will perish." To the Senator this was "the most serious problem confronting the nation."

The shooting war has not altered these sentiments; O'Daniel is making substantially the same speech in the Texas campaign, and the parents, sweethearts, and wives of fighting Texans are reported to be rolling up their sleeves and readying their poll-tax receipts to reply. The well-to-do Texans who do the voting (it costs $1.75 per person per year), not being ardent supporters of the forty-hour week, might not bother to oppose the Senator on the labor issue, but the war is different. You can't talk against the war or minimize its importance in Texas; besides sending its boys in impressive numbers, the state is booming with war industries.

It is hard to see how Lee O'Daniel happened to overlook either the psychological or the financial point. His rapid rise in politics—his career started four years ago when he won the governorship and was advanced by the death of Morris Sheppard, which provided a Senate vacancy—can be explained only by his high rating as a radio promoter, first of flour and then of W. Lee O'Daniel. Described as "the kind of salesman who could sell iceboxes in Labrador or snowshoes on the Equator," O'Daniel merited the praise when he sold himself as a statesman. To do it he had to be a good psychologist, vocally favoring home, mother, old folks, flowers, and religion. How does it happen that he fails to wave the flag? Nor is he an innocent babe in business. Rather than flour salesman, he prefers to be called a successful business man or small manufacturer, though he manufactures not flour but markets—for the "Hill-billy" brand, the product of General Mills. Surely it doesn't take much business gumption to see the new war factories all over Texas.

However, war industries don't advertise, and there perhaps you have it. O'Daniel is an advertising man, with all the glibness of a short commercial broadcast but without the basic horse sense even of a Huey Long, who did after all grow up among the Louisiana rednecks he bamboozled. O'Daniel is a phony manufacturer—a jobber, not a producer. He is a phony Texan—the author of the song "Beautiful Texas" was born in Ohio and raised in Kansas. He is a phony "old Southerner," sounding as if he wore a goatee, frock coat, and string tie but actually, like Martin Dies and Joe Starnes, a second-growth Chamber of Commerce Southerner. He is, of course, a phony New Dealer; after writing a song entitled "On to Victory, Mr. President," and pledging—three times—"one hundred per cent support" of the President, he voted against the Administration at the first opportunity. It happened to be the vote on extension of the draft.

Huey was disarmingly natural; Lee is admittedly slick—he is the first Senator to pose for publicity pictures with one eye screwed up in a wink. As an old-time Austin politician puts it, he is an unnecessary liar. And in time of crisis that isn't smart.

He has, of course, the support that is always available for a man who can get elected to office while openly working for low wages, anti-strike laws, and all the other reactionary goals. As governor of Texas, his main achievement was the passing of a state law which in effect forbids picketing; he puffed the law to Northern manufacturers in a sales letter which promised prison for strikers and ended with "I feel proud to have led the fight for this kind of legislation." However, he was unable to get the Texas law through Congress as an irrelevant amendment to other legislation or to win votes for an open-shop amendment to the Constitution. The O'Daniel tactics are pretty crude even for the Dies-Cox-Byrd machine.

As a member of a special committee on the oil shortage, Senator O'Daniel succeeded in preventing or at least postponing construction of the pipe line favored by Secretary Ickes. Ordinarily insistent on selling oil, hot or cold, Texas interests opposed the pipe line, the Senator carefully explained, because it might be used after the war for siphoning out natural gas. Actually of course they were fighting Ickes, with whom they have long had a feud. O'Daniel's service to the utilities goes back to the time when as governor he vetoed legislation that would have permitted Texas cities to build municipal power plants.

The opposition to O'Daniel is sincere but divided; there were eleven candidates against him in his first race for governor, twenty-seven in the Senate race last year. This time it centers in two other ex-governors of Texas, James V. Allred and Dan Moody. Allred, who resigned a federal judgeship to make the campaign, has Administration backing; but it must be remembered that in Texas Administration support means "Jesse Jones's money," and there are those in Texas as elsewhere who regard the Jones influence with a jaundiced eye. Some Texans insist that "outside interference" harmed instead of helped the deserving Lyndon Johnson in his effort to defeat O'Daniel last year. As governor, Allred was unable to effect any New Deal reforms in Texas. He had, of course, strenuous opposition from business, which organized "tax marches" and played an obstructionist game, but some New Dealers felt that Allred himself wasn't equal to the governor's job.

Dan Moody has played a lone hand in Texas politics but has no defeats against him. He started as a boy wonder, the reform candidate who first defied the Klan and later ousted the famous Ferguson gubernatorial team. Back in 1928, when Jesse Jones brought the Democratic convention to Houston, Moody was talked of as a running mate for Al Smith. But Moody, opposing "Ma" Ferguson, also opposed the Texas brewery interests which were prominent in the Smith repeal forces, and Moody support simply didn't mix with Smith and Jones. Moody left politics for the law, in which he has done well—incidentally serving the federal government in its prosecution of the Long machine in Louisiana.

Persons outside the state who feel that Moody is "too good" to be a strong candidate perhaps underestimate the Texas respect for virtue. O'Daniel and Allred both lean heavily on church support, and as Sheppard's successor in Washington O'Daniel has had to make half-hearted proposals to bar liquor from army camps. Nobody takes this effort seriously, and it has been openly charged that Texas brewers and distillers helped send O'Daniel to Washington. But lip-service to some form of temperance is by no means the handicap in Texas politics that it would be elsewhere, partly because of the people's fundamental morality and partly because Texas brewers have long financed corrupt voting. (It was the San Antonio brewers who defeated Maury Maverick, no prohibitionist.) In the last war the fact that the brewers were German made possible a wave of political reform. It could happen again; and in the appeal to respectability Moody has the advantage of sincerity.

The war issue, the important one, finds both Allred and Moody able to make a good showing against O'Daniel. Allred was in the navy, Moody in the army, during the last war, and both are unequivocal about this one. O'Daniel's anti-draft stand has alienated even the Texas Townsendites. His own win-the-war program, as presented to Congress, has eleven points: "(1) encourage individual prayer twice daily; (2) stop all non-essential government spending; (3) provide proper defense protection for civilians promptly; (4) outlaw force and violence in labor disputes; (5) give union and non-union men equal opportunity to work on jobs; (6) tax war profits 100 per cent and give half the tax to discharged soldiers when the war ends; (7) remove all farm planting restrictions; (8) restrict price-fixing to retail sales; (9) open immediately new reservoirs of raw materials; (10) cancel immediately all draft deferments of labor racketeers and other privileged classes; (11) abolish booze on army and navy reservations until the war is won." With the demagoguery taken at its face value, it still appears that these proposals—in effect, to abolish relief, the closed shop, and crop control, impede price fixing, and release hot oil—have to do with winning, not the World War, but O'Daniel's "most serious" war, the one against labor and the New Deal.

Senator O'Daniel

Texas war heroes are, of course, hailed by O'Daniel, who argues endlessly that the "boys in Bataan" and elsewhere were betrayed "because labor refused to manufacture the planes and material they needed over there." Confronted with figures on war production, he brushes them aside: "I do not think the people are interested a great deal in the statistics showing such a small percentage of strikes to be in existence at the present time, or that such a few man-hours are being lost, because those statistics will not help General MacArthur in his fight for freedom in Australia; those statistics will not help the cause in any way." This typical O'Daniel utterance, followed by the claim "I believe I have as good a labor record as any member of the Senate," has not fooled Texas labor. The unions are against "Pappy" with a unanimity that in any other state would insure his defeat.

But it is necessary to remember that because of the poll tax Texas elections are controlled by the people who can afford to vote. O'Daniel's anti-labor speeches bring him fan letters galore from Texas Chambers of Commerce, Lion, Kiwanis, and Rotary clubs, the D. A. R., bankers, and employers who hope to see strikes prohibited. That part of Texas labor which is able to vote has so far refrained from a choice between Allred and Moody, both of whom indorse Administration policies. The Moody platform, it is true, questions the wisdom of the forty-hour week in defense industries, but so does such a staunch Southern New Dealer as Senator Pepper. Three instructors in economics at the University of Texas have just lost their jobs because they spoke in support of the wage-hour law.

Northern guessers at the result of Texas elections, instead of counting union strength, might well give some attention to church support. O'Daniel and Allred are both members of the Christian Church and will therefore split that vote. Moody is a Baptist, and in Texas there are three times as many Baptists as members of the Christian Church.

Taking a look at those statistics which the Senator so despises, we find that in the last election, in which a majority was not required, he won with 175,368 votes. Lyndon Johnson was a close second with 175,273, and the charge was freely made that he was counted out; State Attorney General Mann polled 140,853; and Martin Dies trailed fourth with 80,601. To estimate the real O'Daniel strength we should add his vote to that of Dies, their appeal to ignorance being identical; but this gives a total of only 225,969 votes against the 315,126 polled by the others. In the coming primary Allred and Moody can divide the opposing vote without giving O'Daniel the required majority of votes cast; this will force a second primary in which the anti-O'Daniel forces will unite.

Another figure may be significant. At a recent anti-O'Daniel meeting in Austin two-thirds of the large audience had relatives in the fighting services.

How to Talk to Hitler's Europe

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

THE men and women who challenge death in underground activities in Europe perform a task of tremendous importance. They keep alive among their people a flame of daring and sacrifice. They prevent the moral conscience of their fellows from going to sleep. They keep the police in a permanent state of suspicion and anger, without rest, compelled to strike at random and so to increase the disgust and discontent. They force judges to disgrace themselves by passing obviously unjust sentences. They create in members of the ruling group the disheartening sensation that they are isolated and insecure in a hostile country.

But let us not delude ourselves into hoping that they can stage an all-out revolution for our benefit. The collapse of the Second Empire in France in September, 1870, the Russian Revolution of 1917, the Austrian and German revolutions in 1918—all were the aftermath of military defeats. Only when the armed forces have disintegrated, or at least when the army chiefs have discredited themselves to such an extent that they can no longer rely upon their own soldiers for repression, does a serious revolutionary uprising become technically possible. I was dismayed when I read that the British Foreign Secretary, Anthony Eden, on May 8 had urged the German people over the radio to overthrow Adolf Hitler's Nazi regime.

I also question the wisdom of urging Europeans in our own short-wave radio broadcasts to carry out acts of sabotage, strikes, or assassinations. We hope they will do so, naturally. But a man who, sitting safely before a microphone in America, tells people six thousand miles away that they should risk prison or death has very little chance of evoking a suitable response. He is more likely to arouse ridicule if not contempt. Men and women engaged in illegal activities on the spot do not need to be told what to do. They already know, and they do it on their own initiative and at their own risk. At the most I would, without comment, broadcast news of what is being done elsewhere; so that persons who wish to may apply other people's ingenuity. But misinformation or overstatement should be especially avoided. Any news which may be successfully contradicted is harmful.

Instead of dreaming of revolutions which are impossible as long as the United Nations' military power is unable to match Hitler's, and instead of asking the peoples of Europe to face deadly risks without adequate support from us, we should offer them a line of hope which of their own free will they will eagerly seize upon, even at the risk of their lives.

The longer this war continues the more the populations of the Continent will be tormented by starvation. We in America do not know what starvation means. When I see the waste of foodstuffs, for instance of butter, which still goes on everywhere, I am horrified. European starvation should be used as a weapon in this war, as well as an instrument of international policy during the immediate post-war period. The Germans and the Italians, and let us include the French as well, should be told that if, when the time is ripe, they cooperate to the best of their ability in the common fight against Hitler and Mussolini and Pétain they will receive the same treatment as the peoples of the Allied nations. Whoever is the last to move will be the last to be helped. And whoever does not move cannot expect help.

We must not confine ourselves to words; we must show that we mean what we say. It is not difficult to make an estimate of what each country of Europe will need during the six months or the first year after hostilities have stopped. While the war goes on, the government of the United States should start storing supplies for the immediate post-war period. North American production will be unable to meet the needs. South America should be brought in. Economic interests would thus be created in South America which would link those countries to the United States and Canada better than the empty words of politicians and diplomats. A few weeks ago we were informed that the United States was bolstering the economics of Latin America by buying and storing its coffee, cocoa, and bananas (New York Times, May 9). I have no dislike for coffee, cocoa, or bananas; but they belong to defensive economic warfare. If we want to shift to the offensive, both in economic and in political warfare, we must store wheat, meat, and condensed milk. And as this work goes on—in fact and not on paper—full information as to its progress and purpose should be broadcast to Europe.

But the promise of rewards to come is only half the story. If nobody in Germany or Italy is to pay for the present tragedy, I do not know how those countries can be made to realize, once and for all, that aggression is a costly game which must not be played again. This does not mean that we should threaten everybody indiscriminately with reprisals; nor should we shroud our intentions in mystery. Our method should be to drive a wedge between the great masses of the German and Italian populations, which should be left alone, and their leaders, who should suffer the most ruthless treatment—and should be told so in advance.

We should announce that while we do not regard all Germans as responsible for the shooting of hostages, we do hold responsible the Nazi party leaders, the army chiefs, the ambassadors, and all other high officials. Therefore, when the war is over, as many German higher-ups will be shot as there have been hostages murdered; and we shall not waste time in court trials. The mere fact that one is a responsible official in the Nazi civil or military administration will be sufficient ground for indictment, conviction, and execution. At the same time the property of all persons in the higher economic brackets will be confiscated in order to compensate those outside Germany whose homes and businesses have been looted. The same message should be delivered to the Italians also.

These promises of ruthless punishment to be meted out to the upper strata of Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy should not be made by radio commentators without governmental standing. They should be solemnly decided upon by the British Parliament, the American Congress, and the governments of all the other United Nations. Official committees should be set up to list the persons, starting with those at the top, who will be executed, or expropriated, or both when the war is over, and the names of those persons should be broadcast. The German and Italian peoples should be told that they are fighting, not in order to protect themselves from reprisals which nobody plans against them, but because Hitler and Goebbels and Himmler and Ribbentrop and Generals So-and-So want to save their skins and their property. We should revive the slogan of the French Revolution, "War to the palaces and peace to the hamlets."

In my opinion broadcasts such as those given by Sir Robert Vansittart at the end of 1940, which were handed down to posterity in the booklet "Black Record," can only foster among the Germans the persuasion that they are all in the same boat and all indiscriminately marked out for British vengeance. From the political standpoint these broadcasts were grist for Dr. Goebbels's propaganda mill. Any sensible man can judge for himself what impact Sir Robert's words must have had upon the minds not merely of the out-and-out Nazis but also of those Germans who hate the Nazis and would do anything they could to get rid of them. If we condemn, hate, and insult all Germans without distinction, and if we discourage those among them who are willing to work with us, the only course left to us will be to destroy the whole or the majority of the German population, or at least to divide Germany into tiny fragments. This is, in fact, the conclusion Dr. Goebbels was logically entitled to draw from Sir Robert's broadcasts, and it is on the basis of this conclusion that he is beating the drum of German national unity.

To avoid misunderstanding, let me state that nothing was more opportune than Mr. Churchill's announcement that "whatever we have to take, we will take, and we will give it back in even greater measure. We can play rough too." These manly words befit the virile leader of a virile people. We are at war, and nobody can expect British or American bombers to discriminate between "bad" and "good" Germans. And when the Nazi system breaks down, we must be prepared for news of harsh happenings in Germany and all the occupied countries. Terrible waves of revenge will be released, and innocent people will pay for the guilty. But when the governments-in-exile officially announced from London that for the "acts of violence" perpetrated against civilian populations in occupied countries everybody would be held accountable who had "ordered, perpetrated, or in any way participated in" them (official communiqué of January 13, 1942), they were thinking not of the war period or of the immediate post-war crisis, about which nobody can hazard any calculations, but of the resettlement period, which will be controlled by the victorious governments. Since all German soldiers in occupied countries have in one way or another "participated in acts of violence against the civilian population," this communiqué threatened a large part of the German people. And in case this braggadocio were not sufficient, the Germans were also officially told that the punishment would be meted out "through the channels of organized justice." One wonders how many prisons will be needed to house the millions of Germans awaiting trial and how many thousand judges will be needed to try them. These futile threats help Dr. Goebbels for the time being in his propaganda for national unity.

The methods used in dealing with Italy are even more fantastic. In December, 1940, Mr. Churchill told the Italian people that Mussolini, while admittedly a

Graphic by Pick-8

The Office of Facts and Figures has recently published estimates made by the Allied governments of the results of German occupation in the conquered countries. The figures given above are for the number of persons killed by the occupation forces.

"great man," had alone brought Italy to the brink of ruin. A more unfortunate statement could hardly have been devised. Mussolini could not have brought to ruin more than forty million people had he not found accomplices and partisans among them. The anti-Fascists in Italy were dismayed. Apparently the British Tories were prepared to sell the Italian people down the river to Mussolini's accomplices and partisans provided these partisans threw overboard Mussolini himself. As for the Fascists, they were entitled to think that if Mussolini had been a "great man" until he disturbed the British Tories, he must still be a "great man," even if the British Tories no longer liked him.

It seems that Mr. Churchill expected a revolution in Italy as a consequence of his address. Since it did not materialize, the British Ministry of Information discovered, during the summer of 1941, that all Italians, and not merely "one man," were responsible for Italy's being at war with England, and thereupon decided that a distinction should no longer be made between Italians and Fascists.

Aside from the historical falseness of its position, the British Ministry of Information was devoid of political common sense. The folly of this approach was shown by the way Mussolini was able to take advantage of it. One reads in the Manchester Guardian of March 9, 1942:

The Nazi theme "Hate Britain" was followed by Fascist propaganda rather uneasily and then abandoned. More successful must have been the reverse slogan, "The British hate you all," which has become the most consistent of all propaganda trends. Private letters to British newspapers suggesting that no real difference could be made between Italy and the Fascist regime have been eagerly quoted by Italian broadcasters. And Gayda in the Giornale d'Italia of January 30 wrote: "We note the mood of British propaganda—the British nation against all Italians. The Italians must at last understand that the English traditional friendship for them, for their national cause and their country, never existed." While the propagandists are stressing this theme they carefully conceal any remark from this side which may discriminate between Italy and Fascism.

We have other happy devices for helping Mussolini. Italians who know only their own language are told by American radio stations, in Italian, that their soldiers were right when they refused to fight in Albania and in Libya. But those who understand French or Spanish hear in other broadcasts, given in French or Spanish, that all Italians are cowards and know only how to run away.

During his recent visit to Washington Mr. Churchill said that Mussolini had "inflicted great sufferings and wrongs upon his industrious people." Let us hope that these words were in his speech not by accident but with a purpose, and that they indicate a new and sounder policy in our political warfare against Mussolini. Multiplying facilities for our enemies and difficulties for our friends should no more be the effect than it is the purpose of political warfare.

In the Wind

LAST WEEK two gossip columnists reported that Westbrook Pegler had been seen at the Stork Club with James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, a "unioneer" who has been the victim of some of Pegler's most bitter invective. Two days after the reported meeting Pegler published what was probably his first column in praise of a trade union, or at least in justification of a well-known and widely condemned trade-union practice. He defended the right of professional musicians to force the use of paid "stand-bys"—that is, musicians who are paid but do not play at entertainments where the music is provided by amateurs.

RAYMOND LESLIE BUELL, an editor of Fortune and one of Wendell Willkie's principal advisers on foreign affairs, is seeking the Republican nomination for Representative from a western Massachusetts district.

LIDICE is pronounced Lee'-dee-tsa.

JOSEPH A. BOWER, executive vice-president of the Chemical Bank and Trust Company of New York, is a candidate for United States Senator from New Jersey. Documents submitted to the Dies committee last year include a memorandum to Berlin written by a Nazi agent, Dr. F. A. Kertes, which reported a meeting in 1940 between Bower and Kertes. Kertes at that time was discussing with business men the possibility of American investments in post-war Germany. According to the memorandum, Bower was willing to cooperate; his only complaint against Germany, he told Kertes, was that his bank did not get much German business.

AT A FOURTH OF JULY meeting at Woodstock, New York, Professor James T. Shotwell delivered an address. He spoke eloquently of the thin lines of heroes holding back the enemy on many fronts—Americans, British, Free French, Chinese. But there was no word of appreciation for the Russians, or even any hint in the speech that the U. S. S. R. was fighting on our side.

A SEAMAN returned from South America tells this story of what one German did to another when a British warship sank a Nazi freighter and rescued its crew. When the men were brought aboard, one of them spied a fire ax on the British boat. He seized it and drove it deep into the skull of one of his crew mates. "A Gestapo man," he said to the Britishers who had tried in vain to hold him back.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

IT IS not exactly news, especially to writers, that literary production declines in time of war; but W. W. Norton, the publisher, cited fresh evidence of the tendency in a speech he made a few weeks ago at the convention of the American Booksellers' Association. The spring catalogues of the British publishers, he said, showed an extraordinary increase in the number and proportion of books by American authors. "This is no question of supply of paper available for books; it is a question of supply of manuscripts. For it is perfectly obvious that there are just not enough books of British authorship available after two and a half years of war." He looks for a similar shortage of material here, basing his prediction not only on recent British experience but on the record of the last war. (In 1917 about 10,000 titles were published in this country; in 1919 the number had fallen to about 8,500, and as Mr. Norton pointed out, the First World War was neither total nor revolutionary as this one is.)

It goes almost without saying that writers whose stock in trade consists of values rather than facts—that is, novelists, poets, dramatists, and critics, both social and literary—are the first casualties. It is no accident that the drama critics of New York awarded no prize this year, and at least one of the big annual fiction competitions has been called off for lack of sufficient good material. The reasons are both objective and subjective. Even if a writer has not been drawn into military service or an office of information and even if he can command the necessary working conditions—three meals a day and a dry place to sleep, time and relative quiet—there is no way of avoiding the disturbing influence of war on the mind and the emotions; and the more sensitive the writer, the greater the disturbance is likely to be. He labors under another difficulty. In peace time he tends to be regarded as a privileged yet non-essential citizen; in war time his vocation is regarded more than ever as a luxury trade—despite the fact that he is a chief carrier of the cultural values which are, in the present conflict, presumed to be a major issue. Given this public attitude, the writer himself, who shares the general compulsion to take an active part in the fight on which his own survival depends, may easily come to the questionable conclusion that a mediocre soldier is more useful than a good book.

The ironical part of it is that all reports coming from Britain, as Mr. Norton also points out, indicate an increase in the demand for books; and it would seem that the kind of books people want to read in war time are the very type least likely to get written, for in England at least there has been a definite return to the classics—the creative writing of earlier periods. Yet the only writers in Britain who have any status are the journalists. Journalism is a "reserved" occupation, and in this country newspaper correspondents have acquired so much prestige as authors that almost any batch of dispatches can pass muster as a book.

Mr. Norton would discover confirmation of his findings as to the shortage of manuscripts by British authors, particularly non-journalists, in a manifesto issued in behalf of young writers in the British armed forces and other war activities and printed in the October issue of the English literary monthly Horizon. It addressed itself boldly to the whole question of the creative writer and his role in war time. "Creative writers, poets, novelists, and dramatists," it stated, "have a skill, imagination, and human understanding which must be utilized as fully as the skill of journalists." Yet "as things are, . . . writer after writer is called up, or seeing no possibility of using his special talents in the interest of his country, has volunteered for war service." The manifesto demanded that creative writers be given the same facilities as journalists and be "used to interpret the war world so that cultural unity is reestablished and war effort emotionally coordinated." It advocated the international exchange of writers among the United Nations and the "formation of an official group of war writers."

I agree with the diagnosis; I'm skeptical about the cure. I might be in favor of exempting a good novelist or poet from military service on the ground that he is a good novelist or poet. But even assuming that such a thing should come about, and assuming, moreover, that the task of deciding who was entitled to exemption was given to the editor of Horizon rather than the local draft board, what would be the effect, I wonder, on the writer himself? If I know anything about novelists and poets, the sense of having been officially designated creative writers and officially excused from running the risk of death like other men would impose, particularly on the best of them, a burden of responsibility, not to mention guilt, that might well be fatal as far as creative activity was concerned. As for the "formation of an official group of war writers," it might produce useful and well-written interpretations of war issues and peace aims; it might insure the physical survival of talented people whose death would be a genuine loss to literature, and that is desirable; but I'm afraid that the writing it generated would be official rather than creative.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Moscow and Magnitogorsk

ONLY THE STARS ARE NEUTRAL. By Quentin Reynolds. Random House. $2.50.

BEHIND THE URALS. By John Scott. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.75.

A FOREIGN correspondent, says Mr. Reynolds, travels more and faster but learns and sees less than any other known form of animal or plant life. That statement does not apply fully to Mr. Reynolds himself. He traveled a lot, mostly by air—which does not always mean "fast" these days—but he also saw a good deal: England, Russia, and Egypt. In his book he tells us too what he learned. He spent a day with Churchill and describes the Prime Minister as a man "who grins when he fights." In London during the Battle of Britain he came to the conclusion that that battle was won by the courage and toil of thousands of civilians. He was at the front in Libya and learned there what a German dive-bomber attack in the desert is like. Before his African experience he had been with the Harriman-Beaverbrook group in Russia and after three months in Moscow and Kuibyshev realized that the U. S. S. R. was not a country for reporters, although he liked and admired the Russians; he was unable to obtain sufficient material for his articles, and the little he got was not passed by the Russian censor. Resenting this situation, he left Russia at the first opportunity; he then joined the Litvinov-Steinhardt party on their flight via Baku and Teheran to Cairo.

Like most of his colleagues Reynolds does not speak Russian. Therefore he could not read the Soviet papers or even decipher posters or shop signs. Neither could he converse with the Russians. Naturally, in these circumstances he found his sources of information rather limited. Imagine a foreign correspondent in Washington who has to send cables to Europe and write "stories" about the United States without being able to speak or read a word of English.

Mr. Reynolds's description of the official dinner at the Kremlin at which Stalin was present, after the Harriman-Beaverbrook conference, is vivid and amusing; his portraits of some of Russia's leading men—Lozovski, head of the Information Bureau; Vyshinski, state's prosecutor; and Eisenstein, the film director, whom Reynolds was supposed to help with his picture "Moscow Fights Back"—are sharp and full of humor. More serious but not less brilliant is his sketch of Moscow in October, 1941, when the city, calm and courageous, was ready for whatever might come. But one does not get much real information on Russia from Mr. Reynolds. His is a book of personal impressions and adventures, not one of analytical discussion or political synthesis. The best chapters are those on the "retreat" to Kuibyshev and on the life that diplomats and journalists were compelled to lead in that forlorn town. Written in the light, sparkling style which is always one of Mr. Reynolds's assets, the book tells us more about the ways of American newspapermen than about the U. S. S. R.

Mr. Reynolds writes about his adventures like a storyteller. John Scott is more of a sociologist. In "Behind the Urals" he tries to make his own story fit into the frame of Russia's economic and political evolution in the last decade. Mr. Scott left the University of Wisconsin in 1931 and went to Russia. There he became a welder in the new industrial base of Magnitogorsk, behind the Urals. This huge steel and coal center was created in a region inhabited by wandering Asiatic tribes. The history of its construction is a wonderful tale of unremitting struggle and sacrifice. In 1929 Magnitogorsk had fewer than 2,000 inhabitants; in 1939 its population had risen to 250,000. Magnificent plants and blast furnaces were erected in a desert which lacked roads, houses, food, and men. Now Russia's largest industrial stronghold, which furnished roughly ten million tons of steel in 1937-42, it was built at an enormous cost in human lives and energy.

Like rain in the Sahara

Writers in Crisis

BY MAXWELL GEISMAR

"It is almost like getting rain in the Sahara to find a new critical writer with something to say in 1942. Such a writer is Maxwell Geismar . . . Here, in six close-grappling chapters, we have the best behavioristic treatment of a group of writers since Edmund Wilson's 'Axel's Castle'. Mr. Geismar, by skillful foreshortening and condensation, exhibits minds and temperaments in miraculously small space." — John Chamberlain, New York Times

"A book of first-rate literary criticism, pure and simple. All through it one is conscious of insights and juxtapositions; of a keenness of perception and of discrimination that make it one of the most rewarding accounts we have of contemporary American writing." — New York Herald Tribune $3.00

Behind the Urals

BY JOHN SCOTT

"One of the most impressive books of recent years . . . It is impressive in exactly the way the quiet conversation of a mature, firm-willed man is impressive, when he reflects upon a profound experience." — New Republic $2.75

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY · PUBLISHERS

Men were injured and killed, women and children froze to death, thousands starved in order to secure the victory of Russia's industrialization front. "I would wager," says Mr. Scott, "that Russia's battle of ferrous metallurgy alone involved more casualties than the Battle of the Marne."

Mr. Scott worked five years in the Magnitogorsk plant. He learned Russian, attended a Communist university without becoming a member of the party, and endured the same hardships as his comrades. The boundless enthusiasm with which they sacrificed themselves infected him from the day of his arrival. And their sacrifices were not in vain. Mr. Scott points out that Russian resistance in 1941-42 was made technically possible only by the industrial output of the Urals and Siberia. He firmly believes that recent events have entirely justified Stalin's ruthlessness in building up Magnitogorsk and other big factories behind the Urals at forced tempo.

Mr. Scott led the usual life of a Russian worker. He married a Russian girl and acquired an intimate knowledge of the Russian mentality and of the contradictions of the Soviet regime. He gathered facts and figures in an objective, non-partisan way; he was able to observe and analyze; and his book on Magnitogorsk is a valuable contribution to an understanding of the U. S. S. R. Mr. Scott does not attempt to judge the regime or to generalize about communism, although he does not hide his opinion of the purge of 1936-39: it disheartened him extremely and in fact was the main cause of his leaving the country. But whatever his objections to the dictatorship, he never ceased to believe in Russia's great future. All that he saw and learned during his eight years' stay entitles him to proclaim that the country will never be conquered by Hitler, because "millions of Russians had been preparing for war for a decade, industrially, personally, and ideologically."

MARC SLONIM

The Powers and the Peace

CONDITIONS OF PEACE. By Edward Hallett Carr. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

E. H. CARR, Wilson Professor of International Politics at University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, has for ten years been publishing remarkable studies in the fields of international biography and international affairs. He celebrates the decade by producing a book on the most burning question of the day, always excepting the question of how we are to win this war. The latter question is of course implicit in the former. Those who would reject any study of the conditions of peace while we have not yet won the war seem to ignore the importance of the question for the morale of the United Nations.

Professor Carr is British. The book reflects his concern about British influence on the conditions of peace. He qualifies the assumption that Great Britain is destined to play a predominant role in the ordering of the world after the war. He concedes that after this war Britain's self-confidence will have received a "salutary shock" and will not repeat the error of 1918, that victory has enhanced its military and economic power. But he does think that Britain, if it pursues a wise policy, will be able to offer the same extensive markets as of old to dominions produce, and that if it "sets a wise course and recovers that sense of a mission which alone can preserve [it] from decay," it will continue to exercise a role of leadership and preeminence in large parts of Europe and Africa and in the Middle East.

Professor Carr's concern for British policy in Europe is tempered by a realization of the future Russian position. He also recognizes the strings that attach both to other than European factors. He does not concede the same possibility for other European nations when he visualizes a British-Russian European order instead of the defeated Axis order: "If Great Britain is ready to take her share of responsibility for a new order in Western Europe, there is a reasonable prospect of securing the whole-hearted cooperation of Russia in Eastern Europe." In regard to Germany, he admits that its defeat "is bound to be followed by an extensive military occupation," but insists on certain requirements in the preparation for the establishment of a new European order, in which Germans must ultimately be called on to participate: "If the occupying forces in Western Germany are predominantly British (perhaps with Dominion or American reinforcements), there should be no difficulty in securing a common-sense interpretation of these requirements. If Russian forces occupy Eastern Germany, there is reason to hope that they will observe a similar restraint." The implied acceptance of continued power politics will please citizens of the smaller of the United Nations as little as the statement that "in 1940 the resistance of small powers had no more than nuisance value." This is rank ingratitude for the added time their resistance afforded to the great powers and does not tally with the admission that "Dutch, Belgian, Norwegian, and Danish neutrality was, quite apart from anything these countries might think or do, an asset to Great Britain."

The smaller European nations are much too conscious of the independent value of their contributions to the joint war effort of the democracies, both on the home front and abroad, both before and after the successive waves of the Nazi invasion. They are beginning to be restive under the development of ideas that seem to indicate the abandonment of the fundamental unit in democratic society, the local community, in favor of centralized, distant control. A more realistic understanding of the tremendous tasks of internal rebuilding and rehabilitation that will face Britain, and Russia too, after this war might induce a more cooperative and democratic conception of the post-war order, particularly in Europe.

But in order to clarify these conditions of peace in one book, one would have to be an expert not only on international affairs but also on the inner working of democratic communities. Professor Carr proves to be the former in the second part of his book, which is concerned with "some outlines of policy," but he involves himself in contradictions and finds himself on unfamiliar ground in the first part, when he deals with "some fundamental issues." On both counts his book is, however, a fairly sound and faithful exposition of current ideas on the subject and is therefore useful. The index is less useful than it should be since it contains only the names of persons mentioned in the text.

BJARNE BRAATØY

IN BRIEF

ASSIGNMENT IN BRITTANY. By Helen MacInnes. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

The author of "Above Suspicion" gives us another literate tale of British espionage, less ingenious than its predecessor but more firmly written. The hero is Martin Hearne, an English agent who looks so much like the wounded Frenchman Bertrand Corlay that he is able to return to France in Corlay's place. It is neither a new device nor a very credible one, and Hearne, the expert, lacks the charm of Miss MacInnes's earlier non-professional hero and heroine. But Miss MacInnes has an unusual sense of terrain, and her picture of Nazi-occupied Brittany is at least geographically absorbing.

VICTORY ON WEST HILL. By R. L. Duffus. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

It's all rather confusing: Washington Hendricks doesn't approve of his family, and when three generations of his descendants arrive in Vermont for his ninety-fifth birthday he takes a glandular injection the better to cope with them. The treatment produces a delusion—the old man thinks he fought in the Revolution instead of the Civil War, and this seems so to confound and impress his relatives that they instantly reform their various ways of life, but not until there has been a mass lobster poisoning. The author is the well-known book reviewer for the New York Times.

TAP ROOTS. By James Street. The Dial Press. $2.75.

Mr. Street has chosen a new corner of the Civil War, that inexhaustible source of modern fiction, for the scene of a large, loosely woven, but highly readable book. Writing about a romantic Mississippi family, the Dabneys, he recreates one of the Southern anti-slavery communities, part pro-Union, part Abolitionist, part purely anarchic, which seceded from secession and waged its own private war against the Confederacy. The love story is not unfamiliar: there are the usual death-dealing hero and the inevitable lady of spirit whose fall goeth hand in hand with her pride; talk runs high about honor, and there's much concern about tainted blood. On the political side,

Mr. Street, aiming to shatter a few myths, does a more than usually realistic job on the nature of political motives.

DRIVIN' WOMAN. By Elizabeth Pickett Chevalier. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

Mrs. Chevalier's drivin' woman comes to maturity in the Civil War, flees her Virginia home after murdering the man who tries to rape her sister, marries a river-boat gambler, and then spends the rest of her life being faithful to her scoundrel-husband and trying to wrest a living from a tobacco farm in Kentucky. It's a hard life and not a very merry one, but there seems to have been a breed of gallant Southern lady for whom obstacles as enormous as those which confronted Merry Moncure were simply a challenge to the blood of her forbears. Mrs. Chevalier's long, detailed novel is competent though rather pedestrian, and it has an interesting account of the rise of the tobacco trust.

VILLAGE OF GLASS. By Frances Frost. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

Miss Frost's novel is about a glassmaker named Robin Thorn whose ambition in life is to blow his ideal woman in glass. He loves a girl named Laurel O'Hare and calls her O'Rabbit. All of a sudden there's a war (not this war, just Miss Frost's unpleasant fantasy of a war) and Vermont is invaded; at the drop of a cracker barrel, our glass-blower turns out to be a full-fledged pilot who zooms through the air as if a fighter plane were any man's bubble. An inept and ridiculous novel! It's a toss-up whether Miss Frost is at her worst being all poetic about nature, or all bloody about war, or just too hearty with those Vermont neighbors of hers.

DEEP VALLEY. By Dan Totheroh. L. B. Fischer Publishing Corporation. $2.50.

A lonely country girl and an escaped convict hide from the law and love each other in the isolated California valleys. Mr. Totheroh has written a short novel, pretentious in its poetic simplicity.

OUT ON ANY LIMB. By John Myers Myers. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Perhaps in a day when you can pick up your morning paper and read about the Commandos, the old-time cloak-and-sword story has lost some of its thrill. Mr. Myers's novel is set in Elizabethan England, and it is full of swash-buckling adventure, maidens in distress, and comradeship over a cask of ale. But for all its historical competence, it is peculiarly unsatisfying, even as romantic escape.

LAND OF UNREASON. By Fletcher Pratt and L. Sprague de Camp. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

An American ex-diplomat, convalescing from the war jitters in Yorkshire, substitutes Scotch for the milk put out on his doorstep on Midsummer Eve and in consequence is kidnapped by the Little People. An allegory, of course, and a rather confusing one, but if you have nothing in principle against pixies, or against political animals in the form of frogs, leeches, and bats, a modern diplomat's highly literate adventures in fairyland may appeal to you.

NEWPORT TOWER. By Philip Ainsworth Means. Introduction by Vilhjalmur Stefansson. Henry Holt and Company. $5.

As in the usual detective story, the question here is "who done it?" But in this case the "it" refers not to a murder but to the building of the Old

Don't Miss An Issue!

To keep THE NATION coming regularly just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION
55 Fifth Avenue, New York

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose.

$.....

- ☐ One Year $5
☐ Two Years $8
☐ Three Years $11

SPECIAL
INTRODUCTORY OFFER

to new subscribers only

☐ 13 WEEKS $1

Name.....

Street.....

City.....

State.....

Extra postage per year: Foreign and Canadian, $1.00 7-18-42

Stone Tower at Newport, Rhode Island, which was painted by Gilbert Stuart before the Revolution and has been the subject of curious speculation for more than a hundred years. The unsensational assumption that it was built by Governor Benedict Arnold as a windmill in 1675 seems to have gradually come to be accepted chiefly because it is so much less sensational than the rival theory, which holds that the Norsemen were responsible. Now the whole question has been reexamined exhaustively and from the beginning in this fascinating book by a trained archaeologist who has evidently devoted years to research spreading out into various fields, including the history of windmills and the architecture of the Norsemen, as well as what can be ascertained concerning the latter's voyages. The whole story of the evidence and its finding is presented as a sort of detective story which makes fascinating reading for anyone capable of interest in such a first-class puzzle as this one. The author believes that Norse origin is overwhelmingly probable. There seems little doubt that he has proved conclusively the complete absurdity of the theory that it was built as a windmill by Governor Arnold or anybody else; yet it was certainly there in Arnold's time. The book is profusely illustrated with fine pictures. The author, who has devoted himself chiefly to Central and South American archaeology, has done work in that field for the Smithsonian, the Heye Foundation, and other organizations.

Drama Note

BEING no skater myself I went without great eagerness to see "Stars on Ice," which is being presented at the huge Center Theater by Sonja Henie and Arthur M. Wirtz. Miss Henie herself does not appear, but I am happy to report that instead of getting enough of it in half an hour I found myself very much surprised that eleven o'clock came as soon as it did. The ballets, the comic interludes, and the demonstrations of virtuosity are so agreeably alternated that, unlike a variety show, which always seems to me more conspicuously lacking in variety than anything else, "Stars on Ice" is not monotonous. It is all very pretty, very graceful, and, like so many hard things done well enough to seem easy, somehow exhilarating. Of the ballets I liked best The Chase; of the trick skaters a comic named Freddy Trenkler, who is doubtless well known to everybody except me. J. W. K.

RECORDS

WILLIAM WALTON'S music gives me the impression of a keen mind, a real feeling for the medium, a highly developed competence and fastidiousness in the handling of this medium. I get this impression from the latest of his works, the Violin Concerto that Heifetz recorded for Victor with the Cincinnati Symphony under Goossens (Set 868, $3.68); and the qualities I have mentioned make it interesting to listen to from one moment to the next—even when what I am listening to is the wailing passages in the first movement that are curiously reminiscent of "Summertime" in "Porgy and Bess," or the stormy passages that alternate with them. But the interesting minute-to-minute talk does not add up to a single large-scale utterance with the impressiveness and impact that such utterance can have. It isn't for lack of trying: those stormy passages are, I think, part of the attempt; but they seem arbitrarily inserted in their context, not in organic relation to it. The first movement, the most pretentious of the three, is the weakest in substance and structure; the best passage are the capricious, grotesque ones in the other movements.

The work is one that appears to have been written with the intention of making musical use of all the capacities of the solo instrument, and provides Heifetz with the occasion for a display of his own phenomenal capacities; but the wailing passages also provide him with occasions for his wailing style of phrasing, which I do not like. The orchestral part seems well performed. On a Scott 23 with Brush PL-25 pickup the recorded sound is quite good, but loud passages are a little confused and some of the fastidiously wrought orchestral detail is not heard distinctly in quiet passages. On the same machine with the Astatic Tru-tan pickup the over-all sound is a little shrill.

Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," one of two pieces based on Lenau's "Faust," is for me one of Liszt's most enjoyable works. Koussevitzky's performance with the Boston Symphony (Set 870, $2.63) begins promisingly—which is to say the introductory measures establish the right tempo for the "Dance in the Village Inn" that is to come. But then, instead of a slight distention of this pace for the statement of the chief dance theme, we get a sudden violent interruption of the movement that has been established, a slowing down to a pace unrelated to that of the introduction for a bloated statement of the theme that protrudes out of its context. And this happens again later when the theme recurs. It is an example of the tendency to overemphatic statement and the lack of feeling for plastic continuity and coherence that spoil other Koussevitzky performances besides this one of the "Mephisto Waltz." The orchestra plays superbly; and the recorded sound of its playing on a Scott 23 machine with the Brush PL-25 pickup is very fine; but it is shrill and harsh on the same machine with the Astatic Tru-tan.

There are two or three details of overemphatic distortion in Koussevitzky's performance; and bad as they are in effect they proceed from an intention that is good—the desire to make the music effective, which in turn is part of the passionate devotion to music, the feeling of personal responsibility and dedication to it, which led Koussevitzky to his touchingly generous action of carrying the Berkshire Center program through on his own this summer. On the other hand, in the performance of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony that Stokowski has recorded for Victor with the N. B. C. Symphony (Set 880, $5.78) there is hardly a phrase that is not distorted, and distorted senselessly; and when you go back to the performance of this symphony that he recorded with the Philadelphia Orchestra thirteen or fourteen years ago you not only discover how the distortions which were moderate and occasional then have grown and spread until they now transform the work into a misshapen caricature of what Tchaikovsky imagined, but you perceive why they have grown and spread: the tendency to fuss with the music, to pull it this way and that, has grown with the impatient boredom of a man who had a phenomenal gift for conducting but no interest in music, a man for whom even the tonal part of conducting was a medium for personal exhibitionism; it has grown with the exhibitionism, which finally could be satisfied only by the opportunities that the films gave him for making a spectacle of himself.

The finale is objectionably cut, and the recorded sound is strangely drab, muffled, and at times almost inaudible.

B. H. HAGGIN

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- James Russell Lowell.* By Richmond Croom Beatty. Vanderbilt. $3.
- American Unity and Asia.* By Pearl S. Buck. John Day. $1.25.
- North Atlantic Patrol: The Log of a Sea-going Artist.* By Lieutenant Commander Griffith Baily Coale, U. S. N. R. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.
- The Netherlands Indies and the United States.* By Rupert Emerson. World Peace Foundation. 50 cents.
- Public Relations for Higher Education.* By Stewart Harral. Oklahoma. $3.
- The Long Ships Passing: The Story of the Great Lakes.* By Walter Havighurst. Macmillan. $3.
- City Lawyer: The Autobiography of a Law Practice.* By Arthur Garfield Hays. Simon and Schuster. $3.
- The Ageless Indies.* By Raymond Kennedy. John Day. $2.
- How Many World Wars? The Warning of Foch.* By Maurice Léon. Dodd, Mead. $2.
- Attack: A Study of Blitzkrieg Tactics.* By Major F. O. Miksche. Random House. $2.50.
- With Japan's Leaders.* An Intimate Record of Fourteen Years as Counselor to the Japanese Government, Ending December 7, 1941. By Frederick Moore. Scribner's. $2.75.
- Those Ancient Dramas Called Tragedies.* By William Kelly Prentice. Princeton. $2.50.
- Japan Rides the Tiger.* By Willard Price. John Day. $2.50.
- Men of the R. A. F.* By Sir William Rothenstein and Lord David Cecil. Oxford. $3.
- The Middle Ages: 395-1500.* By Joseph R. Strayer and Dana Carleton Munroe. Appleton-Century. $4.
- Some English Symphonists: A Selection from Essays in Musical Analysis.* By Donald Francis Tovey. Oxford. $1.50.
- Lawyers and the Constitution: How Laissez Faire Came to the Supreme Court.* By Benjamin R. Twiss. Princeton. $2.50.
- Time and the Town: A Provincetown Chronicle.* By Mary Heaton Vorse. Dial. $3.50.
- Civilian Morale.* Edited by Goodwin Watson. Reynal and Hitchcock. $4.75.

RESORT

Tall Pines

High in the Dutchess County hills 80 miles from New York... land and water sports... a design for leisure. Starlight Summer Theatre nearby.

Attractive Rates.
PLEASANT VALLEY, DUTCHESS CO., N. Y.
Phone 2741

ESPERANTO

LEARN the international language ESPERANTO. Booklet, etc., 5 cents—stamps. Esperanto-by-mail, St. Albans, New York.

FOR RENT

114 St., 508 W.—Arizona, $5 and up. Opposite Columbia, luxurious studios, house-keeping; 24-hour elevator, switch-board service; special monthly rates.

RESORTS

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women
ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

QUEEN WHITE MOUNTAIN LAKES

All Modern Camp Features
Sports... Dancing... Entertainment
Excellent Cuisine
Rates: $30 up to $35 Per Week
Write for Booklet
BOB BRICKMAN, Host
WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
LIMITED TO 100 — ATTRACTIVE RATES
MUSIC • LECTURES • CONCERTS
Under the direction of George Kleinsinger
MORDECAI BAUMAN, Baritone
ALL SPORTS — PRIVATE LAKE
N. Y. OFFICE: 35 W. 42 St. Longacre 5-3874
Directors: Harry N. Boardman - Louis A. Rothblatt
"The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group"

Birdland

Formerly Lewisohn's Estate. OPEN ALL YEAR
225-acre estate. Tennis, Golf, Swimming, Bicycles, Handball, Ping-pong, Games, recordings, library, dancing. Exceptional company. Excellent cuisine. Every comfort. Incomparable surroundings. Tel.: Highland Mills 7893.
Your Hostess: FANNIE GOLDBERG

LOCUST GROVE FARM

A "smallish" informal place overlooking miles of scenic hills. All sports, nearby lake, barn dances, good company. Just 55 miles from New York.

• OPEN ALL YEAR •

Limited Accommodation — Low Rates

George A. Podorson • Locust Grove Farm
SYLVAN LAKE, HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.
Phone 42 F 31

Gloucester, Mass.
ABRAM RESNICK
Director

This Adult Camp...

in safe little sheltered cove near picturesque Gloucester. Salt water swimming, sailing, boating and fishing on premises. Dancing, tennis, trips and all sports. Six hours by train from New York.

Write for booklet and rates

HATHAWAY LODGE

Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, most with open fireplaces and private porches. Tennis, Handball, Swimming, Pool, Horseback Riding; also Golf, nearby. Marvellous food.

Attractive Low Summer Rates

For reservations or further information, write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Tel. Tannersville 299 • N. Y. C. Tel. MU 2-2424

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS. STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes; Interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails; Fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping-pong, etc.; Intelligent, gay companionship.
$28 & $32 Weekly Non-Sectarian
OLIVE H. G. BARON, Dir.

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.

All Sports — Open All Year

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

Additional Resort Advertising
On Inside Back Cover

RESORTS

INFORMAL • INTIMATE RETREAT • ALL SPORTS Including GOLF
• DANCE ORCHESTRA • ENTERTAINERS • CONCERTS
RATES From $33.50
Send for Booklet N
City Office: 545 5th Ave., MU 2-4217

VALCOUR LODGE

On Lake Champlain Valcour, N. Y.
7 miles south of Plattsburg
Modernly Equipped Bungalows
ALL SPORTS EXCELLENT FOOD
DRESS INFORMAL
Write for Illustrated Folder (N)

OAKWOOD

NEW DELIGHTFUL DIFFERENT WINDSOR NEW YORK
Tel: Newburgh 4477. Only 53 Miles from N. Y. C.
Charming Colonial Estate. Spacious grounds. Unexcelled food. Tennis, Golf, Handball, Riding, Canoeing, Badminton. Limited accommodations. Attractive rates.

MAMANASCO LAKE LODGE

RIDGEFIELD, CONN. Phone 820
Welcome Glorious Summer at a luxurious country estate converted into a vacation paradise. Magnificent lake — all water sports, golf, tennis, riding. Dancing, recordings, fine library. Sumptuous cuisine. 50 miles from New York.
OPEN ALL YEAR

BREEZEMONT PARK

ARMONK, N. Y.
A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County

If you choose your hotel with the same care and taste as you would your home, visit this nearby resort. Exclusive. Dignified. Luxuriously furnished. All sport facilities. Excellent cuisine. Less than one hour from New York City.
Phone: Armonk Village 953 Open All Year

GOLF • PRIVATE BEACH • TENNIS
Hotel with All Outdoor Activities — Excellent Food
"Free Transportation from Bus or Train"
ATTRACTIVE RATES T. N. FLAUM

There is only one

RED OAKS

A Country Estate just 50 miles from New York
at ELBERON, NEW JERSEY
Under the Management of MASCHA STRUNSKY
ALL SPORTS OPEN ALL YEAR
Telephone: Long Branch 3330

CAMP THREE ARROWS, Barger Lake, Shrub Oak, N. Y. Wholesome food, swimming, fishing, ping-pong, handball, clay tennis courts. $20-$22. Special season rates. BA 7-7127.

POLTER'S WILLOWS, Nanuet, N. Y. Country estate 27 miles from city. Intimate atmosphere, superlative food $3.50 daily. Nanuet 2224.

ELM LODGE, Schroon Lake. All Sports. American-Jewish management. Delicious cooking. $27.50 weekly, adults; children $20. Telephone 127.

LE HAMEAU on Delaware River. Mountains. 1200 ft. Unexcelled French-American Cuisine. River sports, tennis on premises. Rate $25. Rigaud & Simon, EQUINUNK, Penna.

Letters to the Editors

The Battle Against Fascism

Dear Sirs: The article by J. Alvarez del Vayo entitled World War III? in The Nation of June 20 was extremely important. From 1936 to 1938 Mr. del Vayo warned the democracies against the dangers of fascism and of appeasement. Today he points out another danger, one which seems to me not less grave. To destroy fascism it is not enough to conquer the Nazi and fascist armies. We shall lose the battle if we do not attack the very roots of fascism, the social and economic forces of which fascism is the expression.

It is certain that we shall witness toward the end of the war and during the peace conference an offensive by all the forces of reaction. The directors and beneficiaries of the present economic system will try to prevent the explosion of the revolutionary forces that have been accumulating in Europe; they will seek to set up or to maintain politically reactionary governments in order to preserve the capitalist system, and in carrying out this purpose they will utilize certain governments-in-exile and certain self-styled neutral governments, such as those of Franco and Pétain.

The success of this kind of politics would lead the world to catastrophe. Violent civil wars would break out. Democratic, progressive, and revolutionary forces might be crushed. Europe would then again enter on a period of dictatorship, militarism, and strengthened capitalism. A new outbreak of fascism, in another form and under another name, would be inevitable, especially since the present war will have reinforced nationalist tendencies everywhere.

Experience has proved that capitalism in its present form does not constitute a favorable climate for the development of democracy. There is a contradiction between the principles of discipline and hierarchy, which are the basis of monopoly capitalism, and the principles of equality and liberty, which are the basis of democracy. Capitalistic free competition has been able to accommodate itself to political democracy, but capitalistic monopoly is unable to. One does not need to be a Marxist to make the following observations: (a) The evolution of capitalism brings about a change in the composition of the middle class.

Fifty years ago the majority of the middle class was made up of independent workers and professional men; today it consists of technicians caught in the hierarchy of capitalism and believing themselves the beneficiaries of it. (b) The increase of unemployment in an evolving capitalism makes social conflicts more and more acute; the period of class struggle is followed by class war. (c) The change from the capitalism of free competition to monopoly capitalism leads fatally to a corporative economy; and while the natural political form of competitive capitalism was democracy, the natural political form of a corporative economy is fascism.

A socialist economy, on the contrary, is suited to a political democracy; in a socialist economy political democracy is the natural outcome of economic democracy. I regret that I have not the space to consider the evolution of the political and economic systems of France, England, and Russia from this point of view.

In the world of tomorrow, if we wish to assure the development of democracy, fascism must be outlawed. On this point Del Vayo is absolutely right. What has happened in Europe should be a lesson to us. The moment that Italy suppressed democratic rights, democracy was threatened all over the world. Democracy and fascism cannot exist together in the same world and in the same epoch.

Communism and democracy, however, can exist in the same world. There is no contradiction of principle between the two formulas. Communism entails a period of dictatorship of the proletariat. But in the Communist thesis—and I venture to say in actual practice also—this period is an intermediate and temporary one. The Soviet constitution of 1936 is the most democratic one that I know. Its application has been suspended by the force of circumstances and by the necessity of preparing for war, but democratic liberties have been more or less suspended in all the countries which have prepared for war. There is no doubt that once the Soviet Union is rid of the Fascist and Nazi menace it will rapidly evolve into a political democracy.

The recent agreements among the Soviet Union, Great Britain, and the United States have an importance which I wish to stress. These agreements affirm the will of the democracies and the Soviet Union to collaborate after the war in the establishment of an international order founded on justice, the liberty of the people, and respect for treaties. In my opinion this collaboration, and it alone, will permit humanity to reach a point of social and political equilibrium, to make new progress, and to avoid new wars.

The achievement of this new democratic international order will demand much good-will and understanding. I hope that the private interests of which the capitalist regime is the expression will not obstruct the effort.

PIERRE COT,

Former Air Minister of France
New York, July 7

CONTRIBUTORS

WILLSON WHITMAN, a native of Texas, has written articles on former Governors Ferguson and Moody. She is the author of "Bread and Circuses: A Study of the Federal Theater" and of "God's Valley: People and Power Along the Tennessee River."

GAETANO SALVEMINI, formerly professor of modern history at the University of Florence, is now Lauro de Bosis lecturer on the history of Italian civilization at Harvard University. He is the author of "Historian and Scientist: An Essay on the Nature of History and the Social Sciences."

MARC SLONIM is a Russian writer and lecturer. He came to the United States last fall after having lived in Prague and Paris.

BJARNE BRAATOY, Norwegian author and journalist, is a member of the Norwegian Shipping and Trade Commission in the United States and chairman of the Inter-Allied Information Center.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 25, 1942

NUMBER 4

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

61

EDITORIALS

Gandhi and the War

63

Nelson's Fourth Try

64

Toward a Break with Vichy by Freda Kirchwey

65

ARTICLES

Who Is the State Department? I. Cordell Hull—the Great Anachronism by Robert Bendiner

66

Hawaii's 150,000 Japanese by Albert Horlings

69

Hitler's Quarreling Puppets by Eugen Kovacs

72

Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison

74

In the Wind

75

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

"P'town" by George Willison

76

Textbook on Blitzkrieg by H. S. Sewell

76

Art Hays by George Joel

77

The Correspondent's Book by Ralph Bates

78

Drama Note by F. K.

79

Music by B. H. Haggin

79

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

80

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

L. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor

RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

WITHOUT IN THE LEAST MINIMIZING THE gravity of the situation on the eastern front, it is possible to note some encouraging facts. Nowhere is there any sign of demoralization among the Soviet armies. In the extreme south where the flat, treeless steppes afford no natural lines of defense, the Russians are still retreating but in slow orderly fashion. Farther north the bloody struggle for Voronezh continues, and the Germans have been prevented from consolidating their bridgeheads on the Don River just west of the city. There are indications that Marshal Timoshenko is prepared to fall back behind the great bend of the Don, where he can make a real stand in defense of the key city of Stalingrad, which commands the last line of communications between Moscow and the Caucasus. Voronezh and Rostov would form the northern and southern anchors of this line and are therefore points which must be held at all costs. Hitler is evidently giving priority to the Russian battle, and consequently Rommel is getting only limited reinforcements and supplies. The danger to Egypt is not past, but with marked inferiority in the air Rommel can do little at the moment to counter the offensive which is being waged by British and American fliers against his communications.

✱

VERBAL APPRECIATION FOR CHINA IS ALL very well, but as Dr. Lin Yutang points out in a letter to the New York Times, the Chinese could get along better with fewer bouquets and more bombers. Recent promises made to the Chungking government, he says, are not being fully honored. Thus transport planes, which are vital to China, have been diverted for use in India, while the bombers under General Stilwell's command, which performed effectively against Hankow, have been transferred to the Middle East. Meanwhile, despite its lack of effective weapons, the Chinese army is continuing its struggle to hold Chekiang and Kiangsi. After an occupation of only six days the Japanese were driven out of the important seaport of Wenchow. And their newly won hold on the Hangchow-Namchang railroad has been broken by the Chinese recapture of a fifteen-mile stretch between Iyang and Hengfeng. Creditable as these achievements are to the Chinese army, it seems probable that the relaxation of Japan's grip in this sector is at least partly due to withdrawals of troops which are being sent northward.

✱

REINFORCEMENT OF THE JAPANESE ARMY IN northern Manchuria, together with reports of concentrations near the borders of Soviet-controlled Outer Mongolia, suggests that a sudden blow against eastern Siberia may be at hand. With the Red Army hard-pressed to defend the Caucasus from the Nazis, Tokyo may well feel that a stab in the back is in order. Are we prepared to aid Russia to resist a Japanese offensive? We have a vital interest in keeping Vladivostok and the Kamchatka Peninsula out of Japanese hands, for these are the best possible bases for an aerial offensive once Japan decides to take the risk of adding Russia to its list of enemies. By their occupation of the western Aleutians the Japanese have placed themselves in a position to interfere with our direct line of communications with eastern Siberia. Is the navy taking all possible measures to drive the invaders out before they establish fully equipped bases? Are any alternative routes being prepared? Are bases being constructed so that bombers can fly across the Bering Strait and thence to Vladivostok? Has any effort been made to open up communications with Russia by the Arctic sea route, which can be kept free with the aid of ice-breakers during the next two months? We ask these questions, knowing that military secrecy properly prohibits any answers, as a reminder to our strategists not to minimize the possibilities of the northwestern passages to Asia.

✱

FOR THE QUESTIONS IT RAISES RATHER THAN the solution it offers, we are glad to print in this issue the article by Albert Horlings on "Hawaii's 150,000 Japanese." On the face of things it is hard to explain why the Japanese of California and Oregon have to be moved inland while a far greater number are allowed to remain at what the author rightly describes as "the anchor of the whole Pacific battle line." Perhaps it is the very size of Hawaii's Japanese population that discourages mass evacuation. The Hawaiians themselves, including those of mixed racial stock, are a minority, numbering only some 63,000, as are the whites on the islands, numbering 108,000. Even assuming the shipping facilities for the project, the question of where 150,000 transplanted men and women could be located and what they could do to sustain themselves assumes staggering proportions. We cannot help thinking, moreover, that removal of more than one-third of the population would have a deeper effect on the islands' economy than Mr. Horlings is willing to grant. With internment at least equally difficult, the question remains dangerously unresolved.

GENERALISSIMO FRANCO CELEBRATED THE sixth anniversary of the fascist rebellion in Spain with a speech calculated to discourage his most persistent well-wishers in Whitehall and Washington. First, he admitted the existence of active opposition inside the country; second, he said that opposition or no opposition, Spain could mobilize an army of 3,000,000 men to fight communism, which was the only great problem facing Europe; and third, he ridiculed the "liberal, democratic form of government," asserting that the totalitarian system had proved its superiority both in peace and war. What is the answer of our policy-makers in Washington and London to this sort of talk? Do they really believe they can still win or buy Franco away from his open allegiance to fascism and the Axis? As the policy of appeasement crumbles to nothing in France, why does not our government for once act with decision? Let us take Franco at his word and accept him as the enemy he openly proclaims himself. A break with fascist Spain would not only be like a breath of fresh air in a sick-room; it would also serve the practical purpose of making possible a thoroughgoing campaign against the Phalanx, which today operates unchecked throughout Latin America in the service of Hitler.

✱

THERE CAN BE NO COMPLAINTS ABOUT the equity of the formula adopted by the War Labor Board for the national stabilization of wages. But the claim of William H. Davis, chairman of the board, that it will "lead to a 'terminal' for the tragic race between wages and prices" seems unduly optimistic. In fact, unless implementation of the new formula is accompanied by other measures aiming directly at the curtailment of purchasing power, the present trend toward inflation must be intensified. The first principle adopted by the board is that the purchasing power of a worker's hourly wage on January 1, 1941, ought to be maintained. Before this date, it is pointed out, there had been a long period of comparatively stable prices, but since then the cost of living has advanced 15 per cent. Thus wage advances to the same percentage are justified in order to maintain established pre-war standards. Unfortunately we have to face the fact that we cannot maintain the flow of civilian goods and services available on January 1, 1941, and hence if some income receivers are able to maintain their standard of consumption at that date, it must be at the expense of others who do not enjoy the protection of wage stabilization. Nor can it be argued that the necessary reduction in consumption can be made entirely at the expense of people in the higher income brackets. There are not enough of them—even if all incomes over, say, $5,000 a year, were confiscated—to take up the slack between national money income and national income in terms of consumable goods. If the WLB formula, therefore, is not to spur on inflation, there will have to be much more drastic taxation than anything yet contemplated by Congress, the Treasury, or the public. Actually this would be the best way of securing equality of sacrifice, but to be fully effective the burden on all classes of taxpayers would have to be staggering.

★

WE HOPE AN IMMEDIATE INVESTIGATION will be made by the Truman committee of the Maritime Commission's cancelation of its contracts with the Higgins Corporation of New Orleans for 200 Liberty ships. Although the cancelation is supposed to be based on a new general policy of allocating no more steel for ship-plant construction, it is curious and it may be significant that the Higgins yards are the only ones affected. Higgins and Henry Kaiser have been putting the conventional big shipbuilding companies like Bethlehem to shame with their mass-production methods and speedy deliveries, and Bethlehem exercises much power behind the closed doors of the Maritime Commission. "Maybe," Higgins said when he heard the news, "we were going to build ships too fast, maybe we were going to build too many ships and too cheaply." It seems strange that our most efficient shipbuilders should have the greatest trouble with the Maritime Commission and the dollar-a-year men—Kaiser has had plenty of headaches, too. We should like to know (1) just how far behind schedule Bethlehem and the other big yards are; (2) why some of their work can't be shifted to these smaller, faster yards; and (3) how long the WPB and the Maritime Commission intend to keep silent on the detailed suggestions made recently by Philip Murray and the steel workers for increasing, with existing facilities, the output of both steel plate for ships and armor plate for tanks.

★

DAVID B. VAUGHAN'S LIBEL SUIT AGAINST Martin Dies has hit the gentleman from Texas where it evidently hurts most, to wit, the pocket. Mr. Dies didn't mind apologizing on the floor of the House to avoid the short end of a $75,000 legal battle; he didn't even mind admitting that his scatterbrained committee had libeled Mr. Vaughan on no more evidence than the appearance of another Vaughn's name on a letterhead. On the contrary, he appears to be looking forward to other suits and wants to be prepared. It's not the principle of the thing that worries him but the few cents. Presenting a bill to Congress for $611 to cover legal expenses incurred so far, he asks for "an expression of policy" as to whether he or the people of the United States should bear the costs of his carelessness and flair for slander. We hope there is in Congress a man with pepper enough to give Mr. Dies the "expression of policy" which he needs—and which he hasn't had since Texas rated him a bad fourth in a four-man race for the Senate.

Gandhi and the War

ALONG the eastern frontiers of India the rainy season is still a bar to campaigning. But the Japanese conquerors of Burma are consolidating their positions there, and aerial reconnaissance has established the presence of troop concentrations which portend a serious attempt to invade India. Nevertheless, the Working Committee of the All-India National Congress, meeting at Wardha, has been concerned with the problem of pushing out the British rather than of keeping out the Japanese. After many days of discussion it adopted a long resolution which in effect threatened a campaign of non-violent disobedience unless British rule in India was ended immediately.

Although Gandhi has spoken of the resolution, which has still to be ratified by the All-India Congress Committee, as "open rebellion," that threat is implicit rather than explicit. But the resolution makes demands which no British government could accept at this time unless it were prepared to withdraw completely from India and to cease to interest itself in the war in Asia. There is hardly need to speculate on the outcome of such an action for India itself, for China, and for the cause of the United Nations as a whole.

It is true that the Congress disclaims any desire to embarrass Britain or its allies in their prosecution of the war or to encourage Japanese aggression. The proposal for the withdrawal of British power from India does not, the resolution declares, mean the physical withdrawal of Britons, and Congress would be agreeable to the stationing of Allied armed forces in India. But to what civil authority would the commander of such forces be responsible? And what would be the position of the Indian army itself, the backbone of the present defense of India? Would it operate independently under the authority of a provisional Indian government or remain under the control of a commander-in-chief responsible to London? The Congress resolution does not even touch upon these crucial questions.

To the difficulty of achieving a unified command under these circumstances there would almost certainly be added disunity in the rear of the most explosive kind. The All-India Congress, although the largest and most inclusive political body in the country, is bitterly opposed by other organizations—the most important being the Moslem League—which are too powerful to be ignored. The Wardha resolution professes to believe that once foreign domination is ended unity can be established in a degree that will make possible the solution of all internal problems "on a mutual and agreed basis." It is noteworthy, however, that this thesis has been hotly challenged by the Moslem League, which declares that Congress, far from doing its utmost, as it claimed, to settle the communal question, hounded its former Madras leader, C. R. Rajagopalachari, from the organization when he attempted to supply a formula. Though many Moslems support Congress, Moslem fear of a Hindu-dominated central government is acute enough to provoke violence should the British withdraw from India leaving the minorities question as unfinished business.

Reports from London suggest that the British government has no intention of yielding any ground. But while it is possible to agree that it can neither accept the demands of Congress nor permit the defense of India to be undermined by civil disobedience, it is necessary to ask for a stronger British renunciation of post-war imperialism. It is clear that Indian nationalists are intensely suspicious of Britain's good faith, and their suspicions are fortified by the attitude of powerful groups among the British Tories. Yet, as Nehru says in an article in the New York Times Magazine of July 18, Western domination of Asia cannot possibly outlast the war, and any attempt to reestablish the old relationships must result in another disastrous conflict. It follows that if irrepressible conflict inside India is to be averted, some way must be found of reinforcing the British promise of post-war independence. Nothing less than a joint guaranty by the United Nations of freedom for India is likely to carry enough weight.

Nelson's Fourth Try

FIFTY per cent of America's industrial capacity lies in its small factories and machine shops, and we shall not achieve the total effort required by a total war until they are brought into war production. The latest of many efforts to do so is the Smaller War Plants Corporation, whose five-man board of directors has just been named by Donald M. Nelson. We are sorry to say that we think it will take a maximum of public pressure to get a minimum of results from this body. There are three things wrong with the new setup. One is the Smaller War Plants Corporation Act itself. The second is Nelson. The third is the kind of board he has picked to run the corporation.

The Smaller War Plants Act, outgrowth of the Murray-Patman bill, represents more than an attempt to help small business. It represents the first effort to plan war production on total lines. It directs the chairman of the War Production Board to make a complete inventory of America's productive resources and then to take various steps toward spreading war work among all available plants. But these basic directives for an all-out industrial mobilization are to be carried out "whenever and to the extent that he [Nelson] determines such action to be necessary." The new corporation is expected to farm out prime contracts among small businesses, but it cannot obtain the contracts until Nelson issues a certificate to the Secretary of War or Navy declaring the SWPC competent to perform the contract. The corporation is also intended to finance small businesses engaged in war work, a task Jesse Jones has signally failed to perform, but after it has made a loan the loan is to be serviced and administered by Jones. This will leave the small producer financially at the mercy of a man who has never shown the slightest sympathy for little business.

The effectiveness of the act will depend in large part upon Nelson's willingness and ability to carry out instructions. Judging from his past record and present utterances, we fear he will make little effort to operate the SWPC as it was intended to be operated. Nelson has had three opportunities before this to bring little business into the war program. The first was under the old Defense Commission, when he was in charge of spreading work to the smaller plants but neither achieved that purpose nor convincingly explained why he failed. He had his second opportunity as executive director of the SPAB and priorities director of the OPM. These twin jobs gave him enormous power to energize the Plant Site Board and force the army and navy to stop building new plants and encourage the conversion of existing facilities and the spread of orders among small concerns. He accomplished little in this line, although if he had been successful, we should have been saved in part from the present shortage of materials. Nelson's third opportunity to spread war work came when, as chairman of the War Production Board, he was given authority over army-navy procurement. He had the power then to force big-business-minded brass hats to distribute the orders among small businesses, but he never had the force or determination to use that power effectively.

The job facing the Smaller War Plants Corporation is one that calls for men of great energy and capacity. They will face a hostile requirements committee for materials and a hostile army-navy procurement for orders. Of the five men picked by Nelson for the job, four are nonentities. Lou E. Holland, the deputy chairman, is the one man on the new board who has shown perseverance and organizing ability in dealing with the problem. He organized the Kansas City pool. Not a single engineer like Morris Llewellyn Cooke or S. T. Henry went on the board. Dynamic business men like Charles Schwartzbaugh of Toledo, organizer of the Toledo pool, were passed over for men no one ever heard of before. Peter R. Nehemkis, the dynamo and brains of the Contract Distribution Division under Odum, another outstanding candidate, was also rejected. It is as if Nelson had deliberately picked a weak board.

Nelson says we have not enough materials to give work to small business, and this may be an obstacle to new contracts. But what about breaking down and spreading out existing contracts now buried under the backlogs of big business? It takes no more material to do work in a small plant than in a big factory. And idle small plants can turn out the work faster than overloaded big ones.

Toward a Break with Vichy

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

THE dismal farce of America's relations with Vichy totters toward its predestined end, not through any sudden, belated access of realism on the part of the State Department but rather through the will of the German High Command and its agent, Pierre Laval. Our appeasement policy had no substance to start with other than the will to believe of a set of reactionary, tradition-ridden officials supported by the hesitation of their procrastinating chief. The history of our dalliance with Pétain's government is not unlike the history of other senile love affairs; it failed for lack of the necessary source of vital energy. The whole relationship has been a fraud, somewhat perverse, totally impotent.

The record of its last days is worth recalling for whatever lesson it may carry, though one begins to grow cynical about the value of demonstrations.

Having failed to win a single important concession from the day our government astounded the French people and even many French officials and high army officers by recognizing Pétain, State Department officials betrayed genuine annoyance when Laval was raised to power and publicly taken to the old Marshal's bosom. They had counted upon Pétain's widely advertised contempt for Laval—which means that they had counted upon his independence in the face of Nazi pressure. They resented Laval and said so. Perhaps they vaguely and uneasily recalled Hindenburg and Hitler.

In any case, relations with Vichy grew tense. Talk of the necessity of taking over Martinique—newspaper talk—was discounted at the State Department, but presently it was announced that negotiators had been sent to discuss the situation with Admiral Robert, Vichy's viceroy for the Caribbean. The negotiations were presented as a slap at Laval. We were by-passing him and dealing directly with the governor of the islands. This was the theory, and it was generally welcomed as evidence of a first retreat from appeasement.

The only trouble was it didn't work. Admiral Robert publicly announced that he was referring every proposal made by the United States to his government and that he would carry out Vichy's orders to the letter. Laval, through Robert, agreed to the disarming of the French warships at Martinique but refused other American demands. The negotiations were a failure, especially as a demonstration of our disapproval of Vichy, and when they were over, Robert broadcast a full and contemptuous repudiation of America's attempt to "bribe" him into disloyalty to his government.

Then came the fiasco over the French warships at Alexandria. Secretary Hull opened with a simple diplomatic lie—uttered, I am sorry to say, on the Fourth of July, a day sacred to the legend of the Cherry Tree. He denied flatly a report from Vichy that the American chargé d'affaires, S. Pinkney Tuck, had proposed that the French ships be moved to some port outside the area of operations. But on July 11 Vichy reported that Mr. Tuck had "reopened" with M. Laval the question of the French warships. (By this time the pretense that we were no longer dealing with Laval had been abandoned.) And on July 12 the Vichy government rejected the United States proposals, a fact that was admitted two days later by Under Secretary Welles in a statement describing the failure of the negotiations and expressing his confidence that the French people would consider the proposals very much in their interest. This touch indicated that disillusionment had not yet knocked appeasement out of the ring. But the publication by Laval of "essential parts" of the notes exchanged between Vichy and Washington showed that neither the French people nor their interests had played any role at all in the negotiations, while the German Supreme Command had fully approved Vichy's orders to the French forces in Alexandria.

Meanwhile the United States had drawn closer to De Gaulle, recognizing his position as leader of the Fighting French and appointing attachés to consult with the French National Committee in London. Thus the exigencies of war and the decisions of the German Armistice Commission combined to reduce the structure of appeasement to a shambles. That trouble may still lurk in the ruins is of course evident. For one thing, until we break off relations with Vichy fully and legally, the State Department will always find reasons for delaying or refusing to perform necessary acts of war. It is obvious that the United Nations forces in Egypt should not destroy the ships Laval has refused to hand over; they should seize them and use them. Why should good warships be sunk while the United Nations suffer for lack of them? They should be taken over by the Fighting French and manned by Frenchmen. But would such an obvious and realistic act be approved by our State Department? I'm afraid not. Instead, if the day comes when Alexandria is threatened, it will nod solemn approval while the British scuttle good ships and the Germans blaze their way eastward. What is total war compared with the niceties of even the most tenuous diplomatic relations?

Never mind, things are moving toward a break with Vichy. It will come in Hitler's own time, as did our break with Japan. And then, perhaps, we can fight on the side of our allies instead of our enemies.

Who Is the State Department?

I. CORDELL HULL—THE GREAT ANACHRONISM

BY ROBERT BENDINER

[This is the first of a series of articles on the men who head that most anonymous of all American government agencies, the Department of State. Based on chapters of the author's forthcoming book, "The Riddle of the State Department," this series is offered not as a review of American foreign policy, which is discussed in The Nation from week to week, but rather as a survey of the backgrounds and philosophies which have shaped the conduct of the department's personnel.]

THERE are no devils in the State Department. There are villains in the piece, but they are as impersonal, as anonymous, as cold as the department itself. Chief of these is the dead weight of tradition. Other agencies of the government in varying degrees reflect the times, but the faded and moth-eaten tradition of Victorian diplomacy seeps out of every cranny in the antiquated home of the State Department. It is a code of elegant cynicism, of tactical shrewdness that has small relevance beyond the horizons of the chessboard. Above all, it is a code of rules, of amorality within the prescribed bounds of international law. It isn't what you do that counts but how you play the game.

The diplomatic tradition once had its uses, but it belongs to an era of war between nations, and ours happens to be an era of war between ideas. The patriotism of the men of the State Department is unquestioned, but theirs is a loyalty to the United States as a nation among nations, not as an embattled democracy whose allies could never include states committed to the death of democracy. If our policy-makers had ever thought in these terms, they would not have tolerated the strangulation of one after another of our potential allies at the hands of our potential enemies. Nor would they have squandered time, money, and hope in endeavors to win over to our side men who had proclaimed their faith in a totalitarian world. They would have known how to tell America's friends from its enemies.

But the men of the State Department do not think in terms such as these, thrown up by the exigencies of a changing world. Their background, their schooling, their personal beliefs and family connections, their economic and social standing—all tend in the main to reduce democracy to an abstraction in the first place and, beyond that, to breed a disbelief in change, a suspicion of new formulations. The social origins of the State Department's personnel constitute only one factor in a whole complex of factors, but it is a highly important one. To some extent the traditions of an institution like the State Department mold the minds of its personnel regardless of their original predilections, but to a far greater extent the institution tends to attract—and select—men who might be expected to respond to those traditions.

These remarks are pertinent to the department's personnel as a whole. Having made them, we shall start with the exception that proves the rule.

Cordell Hull typifies the diplomat probably less than any other man in his Department of State. He claims no aristocratic forbears, spent his youth in parts physically and culturally remote from the halls of Groton and Harvard, and enjoys nothing resembling a private fortune. Even today he and his wife do an extreme minimum of entertaining and have almost no part in the social whirl that figures so largely in the lives of his subordinates. Making political capital of his back-country origins, the Secretary's champions are prone to swing too far in the other direction and put Hull in the log-cabin, poverty-stricken-youth tradition of Lincoln. Actually his father was a well-to-do Tennessee farmer and timberman, and while young Hull did a turn at rafting logs down the Obey River, he also had the benefits of such higher education as the region provided. After two years at National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio, he put in a year at the Cumberland University Law School and emerged at twenty a member of the Tennessee bar. At twenty-two he was a representative in the state legislature, and after serving as captain of a volunteer infantry regiment in the Spanish-American War he was appointed to the bench at the age of thirty-two. Four years later, in 1907, he went to Congress, and aside from a single defeat in the Republican landslide in 1920, he served steadily in the House until 1931, when he was elected to the Senate. The two-year gap in his Congressional record he filled in as chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Thus when Cordell Hull was asked by President Roosevelt to head his Cabinet he had behind him twenty-six years of Washington politics. Most of them were dedicated to a single thesis, to wit, that an equitable tariff policy on the part of all nations, leading ultimately to freedom of trade throughout the world, is the only basis of a lasting peace. To his credit, Hull's Congressional record shows that, in addition, he fathered the first federal income-tax legislation and the federal inheritance-tax law of 1916, both bold and progressive measures. But as he himself fondly recalls, most of his years in the House of Representatives were spent in struggling against the tariff, "the king of all our evils."

July 25, 1942

If Cordell Hull had become Secretary of State ten years earlier he might conceivably have altered the shape of things to come. His theories of a peaceful world based on free trade would not have been quite so archaic in those pre-fascist days as his critics regard them today. The props might have been taken from under Europe's incipient fascists, and the fierce nationalism on which they fed deprived of its most cogent appeal, if hope had been held out to the peoples of Europe and Asia that a world without trade barriers was in the making, a world in which sly barter deals and imperial conquest would be unnecessary because each nation, economically, would have the wide world for its Lebensraum. But great volumes of water had poured over the dam between 1923 and the day Hull became Secretary of State—and considerable blood as well. By 1933 fascism was firmly in the saddle, and Lebensraum was seen to be what it always had been—the sheerest pretext for the drive to power of the most rapacious movement that ever afflicted an ailing society. What Hitler has done to the Czechs, the Poles, the Dutch, the Belgians, the Norwegians, the French, the Greeks, and even the Italians is a revelation of the purposes fascism had reserved for its Lebensraum. They are purposes that have as little in common with Hull's freedom from tariffs as the purposes of a tiger have with freedom of religion.

No one ever has imputed or ever could impute to Cordell Hull the faintest sympathies for fascism. Aside from his typically American abhorrence of dictatorship, he perceived early enough that fascism, with its economic autarchy and international anarchy, was wholly incompatible with his dream of free trade and universal amity. Unfortunately the necessary treatment seemed to him almost as distasteful as the disease. Embargoes, boycotts, and other economic sanctions and "measures short of war" conflicted almost as much as fascism itself with his notions of attaining peace through commerce. They implied, moreover, an increase in government control over private business which so staunch a believer in laissez faire could hardly contemplate with satisfaction. From the start Hull found himself in a dilemma. To ignore the rise of fascism entirely, or to countenance its illicit gains, meant ultimately a world in which imperialist exploitation would be immensely advanced and free trade reduced to a minimum. On the other hand, to combat it effectively, to prevent it from ever attaining the strength necessary to make war, meant a serious retrogression in the particular process for achieving world peace which he had so earnestly cultivated for a quarter of a century.

Instinctively Hull moved toward compromise, procrastination, and wishful thinking. Everything that could be done to discourage fascism without imperiling his grand scheme became the essence of his approach. Castigations, moral homilies, and other verbal sanctions against the fascist states flowed endlessly, but whenever American action was taken its results were quickly mitigated, stopped short of effectiveness. The door was often closed halfway, but it was never slammed shut. Always there was hope that by threats here and promises there the fascists could be brought around and fitted into a scheme of informal cooperation that would finally blunt the edge of their sword and remove their incentive to aggression. Hull made it clear again and again that however much the United States might disapprove of the conduct of the aggressors, it did not consider them beyond redemption and stood ready to cooperate with them at the first sign of reform. Embargoes were always semi-embargoes, collective sanctions were scrupulously shunned—and always the promise of a glorious era of flourishing trade was held out if only the bad boys of fascism would see the light and enter the comity of nations. If the Hull policy was the appeasement of a nineteenth-century liberal rather than that of a Cliveden Tory, it was appeasement none the less, and in Berlin, Rome, and Tokyo it had the same effect.

Secretary of State Hull

The present Secretary of State will never go down in history as a great executive. From the start he addressed himself to certain chosen areas of operation, and for the rest delegated authority with a freedom that amounted almost to indifference. He is said, in fact, to have made his acceptance of the post conditional on his absolute freedom from personnel problems and responsibilities. In his chosen fields, however, Hull has tenaciously followed his own bent and bowed to no one. He has influenced the President as much as the President has influenced him. When Roosevelt, at the instance of Raymond Moley, exploded the London economic conference which Hull was hopefully nursing along, the new Secretary of State might well have resigned. Certainly he was seething enough, and privately he dug deep into the rich vein of profanity which he has at his disposal for such occasions. But instead of walking out in a huff he waited. It was Moley who resigned in the end, and Hull's economic internationalism became the theoretical keystone of the Roosevelt foreign policy.

The Secretary's chosen fields include principally the development of the Good Neighbor policy, Far Eastern relations, Vichy, and the promulgation of a long series of trade agreements. The last of these is closest to his heart and has probably received the greatest share of his administrative attention. The result is that the Division of Commercial Policy and Agreements, under Harry C. Hawkins, has established itself as a model of efficiency. With upward of twenty trade agreements to its credit, some containing as many as 3,000 items, this division has dispensed with languorous socialites, and until the war all but nullified its efforts it was probably the hardest-working unit of the department.

Next to the trade agreements, Hull's most solid achievement has been the cultivation of a Good Neighbor policy in soil that once sustained only Dollar Diplomacy and, before that, Manifest Destiny. Hull shares credit for the evolution of the Good Neighbor policy principally with Sumner Welles and Laurence Duggan, not to mention the President himself, but without the personal confidence he has inspired it is questionable whether the more solid work of others would have achieved the measure of success it has. It was Hull who went to Montevideo in 1933 and, uninstructed, laid down the principles of the Good Neighbor to an understandingly skeptical Pan-American assembly. On arriving in the Uruguayan capital he proceeded at once, hat in hand, to call personally on the heads of the other delegations. Gone were the arrogance and the patronizing attitude that had always characterized Washington's representatives at those hollow gatherings. Similarly at Lima, five years later, it was Hull who so impressed the delegates with his humility and genuinely democratic demeanor that street crowds cheered him as el Apostol and hailed him as the living symbol of the Good Neighbor. Again it was Hull who negotiated the trade agreements with the Latin American countries, including notably the one with Argentina, in which the United States made tariff concessions on eighty-four items of Argentine export. These agreements were concrete manifestations of good-will as well as good business. Together with the extremely favorable impression left by Hull, they went far to wear down the distrust of the United States bred in the Latin American bone by generations of Yankee imperialism.

The success of the Good Neighbor policy measured in terms of hemispheric unity in the war is far-reaching, the defection of Argentina notwithstanding. As an experiment in genuine international cooperation, the kind that must rest ultimately on a solid foundation of democracy and mutual regard, the dimensions of its success are less imposing. Collaboration with a tyrant like Vargas of Brazil—who scorns “the sterile demagoguery of political democracy” and has more than once hailed the “virile” dictatorships—or with a fascist-minded autocrat like Castillo is hardly on a moral plane above collaboration with Vichy. But diplomatically, geographically, historically, and almost every other way the relationships are too different to admit of glib comparison, and even by the harshest critics of the Administration the Good Neighbor policy must be put down as a major step toward decent international relations in the Americas.

Beyond the trade agreements and the doctrine of the Good Neighbor, the record of American foreign policy over the past ten years does Hull small credit. From the failure to stand up to Mussolini in the Ethiopian affair, through the scandalous treatment of the government of the Spanish Republic, to the systematic feeding of the Japanese war machine right down to Pearl Harbor, it is a record of perilous caution, of evasion, and of paralyzing contradictions. The temporizing that marked its course was not deliberately employed in order to “buy time” in which to prepare for a showdown; on the contrary it was the recourse of those who lived always in hope that the crisis would evaporate and the showdown forever be averted.

Thus toward Japan Hull adopted what he called a “middle-of-the-road” policy, something between the extremes of abandoning American interests in China and taking necessary measures to protect them. When he returned from South America in 1936 he privately called the Spanish embargo, invoked in his absence, “the worst act of the Roosevelt Administration,” but it was he who in the end was to bury the last chance of its repeal. His icy letter to Senator Pittman, then chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, explained that the Spanish struggle had become more than a civil war because other countries had intervened behind a cloak of “non-intervention” and in the circumstances the United States must do nothing to upset the balance of forces lest it run the risk of retaliatory action by the “non-interveners.” In effect, what the Secretary of State said was that we could do nothing to help the Spanish government because Hitler and Mussolini had said no.

As late as April 25, 1939, a month after the rape of Prague, Hull could still bring himself to tell a Red Cross convention: “We hope devoutly that a negotiated peace before rather than after the senseless arbitrament of war . . . will be the happy lot of mankind.” To be sure, he wanted a just peace rather than another Munich, but it is a testimonial to his ingenuousness that he could even then think in terms of a just peace with Nazism.

Indeed, no one appeared to be more surprised and disconcerted at each stage of fascist treachery than Hull, and his bitter recriminations have had a hurt and innocent quality that is strange to the cynical traditions of diplomacy. His upbraiding of Kurusu, the special envoy sent from Tokyo to discuss peace while Japanese bombers were being readied for Pearl Harbor, was typical of this outraged faith. His earnest and simple belief in the distinction between the Pétain-Darlan clique and that of Pierre Laval was similarly doomed to disillusionment, though the final rupture with Vichy has not yet come about. Ambassador Henry-Haye enjoyed the confidence of the Secretary long after most of Washington looked upon the collaborationist envoy with a jaundiced eye. Until the restoration of Laval, Hull received Henry-Haye frequently, both in his office and less formally at his home, to the mounting discomfort of the United Nations diplomatic corps. Henry-Haye worked assiduously on the Secretary's weak spot, impressing him with the contribution that a befriended Vichyite regime might make to a free-trade world after the war, and Hull's irritable outburst when the Free French seized the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon was a measure of the lengths to which he was prepared to go to nurse along this fruitless connection with the regime of the old Marshal.

Officials of the department have privately admitted that the wording of the protest over the seizure—especially the allusion to the "so-called Free French ships"—was unfortunate, and one of them explained that the Secretary used the qualifying phrase only because the news report that the ships were part of the Free French fleet had not yet been officially confirmed. This explanation, while not entirely convincing, was considerably more understandable than the Secretary's own attempt at clarification, which had it that the term "so-called" referred not to the Free French but to the ships.

In his motivations the idealistic, salty, stubborn Secretary of State stands head and shoulders above most of his department colleagues. If he has often been proved wrong by events, it is no more than just to insist that his mistakes be assessed against the background of a country and a Congress which chose by and large to ignore unpleasant realities. Nevertheless, even in a democracy an obligation rests upon the leaders to see farther and more truly than the led. In his nearly ten years as Secretary of State, the longest tenure in the history of the post, Hull has maintained an unbroken silence on everything that has not borne intimately on his department. In one of the most controversial Administrations of American history the ranking Cabinet officer has never expressed himself on domestic issues that have shaken the country. He is a specialist and has the specialist's scorn for stepping outside his own province. At a time when the foreign policy of every nation is more surely an extension of its domestic policy than has ever been true in the past, that trait in a world figure is less laudable than it might be in other circumstances. Cordell Hull's vision, limited by the boundaries of a laissez faire Utopia, has been inadequate to the task of checking the advance of fascism. In all charity, it is likely to be less adequate for the problems of a world that will have passed through the revolutionary fires of World War II.

["The Old Welles and the New" is the subject of the second article of this series, to appear next week.]

Hawaii's 150,000 Japanese

BY ALBERT HORLINGS

THE United States is making one of the most dramatic bets of history in Hawaii. It is gambling the internal stability of its greatest base in the Pacific—the anchor of the whole Pacific battle line—on the loyalty of 150,000 Japanese and Japanese Americans, 40,000 of whom are aliens, the majority of whom cannot read or speak English, and few of whom have ever seen America or have a clear understanding of what America stands for.

This is no mean wager. A Japanese fifth column in Hawaii could do great damage during an attempted invasion. It could halt civilian transportation, block highways, destroy the vulnerable reservoirs upon which Honolulu depends for water, wreck gas and electric service, destroy food, and terrorize civilians. By diverting man-power from the exterior defenses this fifth column could turn defeat for the invader into success.

Sabotage would be easy for it; the Japanese population is 40 per cent of the total, and its members hold hundreds of strategic positions in public utilities, in civilian defense, and in other services.

We might deserve praise for risking so much on the human heart if only we were not making the bet for the wrong reasons. I suspect we are making it not because the military authorities in Hawaii really trust the Japanese but because (1) pressure has been brought on them, and (2) they have been told that the economic life of the islands will collapse without the Japanese. Hawaiian business men are variously motivated, but some of them appear to favor a liberal policy toward the Japanese simply because they favor business as usual. And in the background hovers the case for Hawaiian statehood. The Japanese in Hawaii have long been held up to the mainland as first-class Americans by those pressing for the island's admission to the Union, and many islanders fear that to cast doubt on Japanese loyalty now would ruin the chances of admission. The real conviction of the white islanders is shown by the large-scale evacuation of women and children that has been going on ever since Pearl Harbor.

In this historic gamble we have certainly something to win. First, we can win the confidence of some good citizens of ours. Japanese communities in this country have in general realized that their members could never blend physically into the American stream, and so far they have shown no evidence of wanting to be anything but a Japanese colony abroad. But a few individuals in these communities, in Hawaii and in the states, have become truly Americanized in spirit, and it would be a tragedy if they were discriminated against by measures aimed at Japanese who merely live here. No one who knows the able, spirited, and likable American of Japanese ancestry will underestimate the contribution these people can make to American life once they choose—and once we permit them—to turn irrevocably to the West.

We gain something also by admitting that Hawaii has handled its peculiar racial problem sensibly and well, and by refusing unnecessarily to disturb the islands' equilibrium. Sociologically and genetically we have everything to win. Hawaii is one of the great anthropological laboratories of the world, and it would be easy to arouse antipathies that would destroy its value. The racial aloha of the islands is a real and priceless thing.

But the greatest thing we stand to gain is the aid of hundreds of millions of people whose skins are not the color of ours. Whether we win or lose the peace will probably depend greatly upon our success in convincing Asiatics, Indians, Negroes, and others that our plea for world leadership is not a screen for world domination. We must convince them that we are fighting not for an Anglo-Saxon world or a Caucasian world, but for a world in which humanity is the test of franchise.

However, our kindness to enemy aliens and enemy sympathizers at a naval outpost will avail us little so long as we needlessly affront our friends. The propaganda value of extraordinary solicitude for Hawaii's Japanese—and it is certainly extraordinary measured by Japanese and German standards, as well as by our own past performance—will be completely nullified unless we mend our manners. A Chinese seaman who was on our side years before the State Department knew which was our side is prohibited from coming ashore at an American port. And if it is true that an exclusion law aimed at all Orientals arouses more resentment than good treatment of enemy-alien Orientals can ever undo, then we must wonder whether we have not put the Honolulu cart before the Washington horse.

In any case Hawaii's safety is not a local matter, and a decision relating to control of a possible fifth column must be determined by national interests. How does our present policy look from that point of view? I am afraid that it looks crazy. I never found anyone in Honolulu, not even the most enthusiastic member of the Japanese Chamber of Commerce, who would say that Hawaii's Japanese were overwhelmingly loyal to the United States. Why should they be, and why should they want us to win this war?

The political and economic fortunes of a few depend upon our winning. Some have been released from stark poverty by living under the American flag. Some have washed away the stain of ostracism that attached to their family in Japan. Some believe that America's accent upon the worth of the individual will lead to greater happiness for themselves and the world. A few would rather see a defeated Japan than a militaristic one. Some have deeply rooted prejudices and sentiments binding them to our side.

But the proportion of these is not large. The majority have nothing to gain by the defeat of Japan. Their prestige as expatriates depends in large part upon the prestige of the Japanese empire. Their economic fortunes are often tied more closely to Japan than to America: they work for Tokyo banks and business houses; they import goods from Japan; they invest in Japanese securities. Even if they live entirely off Hawaiian land or its surrounding waters, their customers are likely to be members of their own race. When they work for the white man, it is in a menial position, one that is more likely to arouse resentment than regard. To a remarkable degree Hawaii's Japanese are untouched by American ways; all their pride of race, family, and religion binds them to Japan. Thousands see or hear almost nothing American, while they consume Japanese food, Japanese clothing, Japanese music, Japanese pictures, Japanese newspapers and magazines by the shipload.

In common with all the other races there, the Japanese love their purple islands, but they can imagine Hawaii without American rule. Indeed, Japanese propaganda has frequently drawn the picture for them. Instead of doing menial labor at the low end of a double wage standard, they would occupy lofty positions in the economic life of the islands. Instead of being crowded in slums, they would live in the cool valleys back of the city, from which deed restrictions now generally exclude them. Instead of seeing their children admitted to the best schools only in token numbers, they would enjoy all the emoluments of the ruling class. In hundreds of ways even the "good" Japanese would gain, not lose, by Japanese rule of Hawaii.

Nor are they unaware of these facts. In impressive numbers they fail to burn their bridges to Japan. Despite the numerous campaigns for renunciation of Japanese allegiance, there are still 60,000 dual citizens in Hawaii—in other words, the majority of American-born Japanese in Hawaii are willing to let the Japanese government claim them as its own. Some 15,000 Hawaiian-born Japanese have cast their lot permanently with Japan. Thousands of others shuttle between Tokyo and Honolulu, "taking my father's ashes to his homeland," seeking better jobs, or simply taking advantage of the low steamship rates through which Japan keeps in touch with its foreign colonies.

Only a Pollyanna could conclude that there is no danger in this situation. If only because it hides the emperor's agents, this large unassimilated group constitutes a real menace. Nor are the professional saboteurs who escape the FBI the only ones who would act with zest if they found themselves in a position to swing the balance against the United States forces. There are also congenital white-man haters (haole-haters in the island vernacular) among both the alien and citizen Japanese. The most innocuous papa-san could easily become their dupe. I do not say he will; the point is that we cannot be sure he will not. With no better material the emperor's men certainly welded efficient fifth columns in the Philippines, in Malaya, and in the Dutch East Indies. (There is another side to the coin, and in a happier time I would rather be polishing it—it presents the Hawaiianization of Japanese who can never be Americanized, for instance, and the human qualities which we must admire in these fine people whether they happen to be on our side or not.)

People who have been interned do not buy theater tickets or serve cocktails, and some islanders have argued that this is not the time to disturb matters in civilian Honolulu. Hawaii's Congressional delegate, Sam King, has worked assiduously to convince both Congress and the military that nothing should be done beyond apprehending known spies and treacherous ringleaders. Everywhere one hears repeated the testimony of Captain John Anthony Burns of the Honolulu police force that he has found the accounts of sniping at American soldiers untrue, and the touching story of Yoshio Yamamoto, who saves all his pennies for war stamps. Everywhere people emphasize that the Japanese are indispensable in Hawaii. But many of these are interested persons who overlook the Buddhist temples, the Japanese-language schools, the dozens of Japanese societies and organizations, some with official Tokyo connections, the ubiquitous pictures of the emperor, the Japanese holidays, the crowds flocking to see the emperor's cruisers, the subscriptions to Japanese war loans, the strongly nationalistic propaganda uncovered in Japanese-language publications.

The argument of Japanese indispensability, the one that has been dinned into the ears of Congress and the military authorities, is a fallacious one. It would be inconvenient to get along without the Japanese, but it would not be impossible. The Filipino has long been the backbone of the plantation labor supply, and there are thousands of Chinese, Hawaiians, Koreans, Puerto Ricans, and Caucasians to carry on essential functions. If the plantations should stop raising sugar and pineapples, which they would be forced to do during a long siege, there would be an over-supply of labor. Conversion to food crops has not taken place in Hawaii to the extent always thought necessary.

One articulate group in Hawaii advocates internment of the Japanese. The leaders of this group are life-long islanders, some of whom were raised with the Japanese and speak their language. Those I know are not given to jitters, and when they say that the absence of sabotage on December 7 proves nothing, I agree with them. If Japan has a well-organized fifth column in Hawaii it would certainly not have exposed it prematurely, before any effort was to be made at invasion, and when the saboteurs could have accomplished nothing but their own extinction.

I cannot agree, however, that large-scale internment of Hawaii's Japanese would be wise. Not only would internment be sure to cause great hardship, but it would be ineffective in one particular—in getting out of the invader's reach a large and competent reservoir of manpower which could be depended on to carry on civilian life in the islands. For whatever doubt there may be about the attitude of the Japanese before or during an invasion attempt, there is no doubt that the vast majority of Hawaii's Japanese will work with alacrity with the emperor's forces if Japan ever takes the islands. I favor evacuation, which would (1) remove this labor force, (2) bring less hardship, and (3) reduce Hawaii's consumption of food, much of which is convoyed from California. Since ships return from Hawaii with only sugar and pineapples, which we can forgo momentarily, plenty of bottoms are available for the purpose.

We should not underestimate the importance of what we are gambling. Hawaii consists of seven islands—only one of them fortified—as against the 2,500 islands of Micronesia; it is virtually our only neutralizing agent for the vast insular system of "stationary aircraft carriers" that projects Japanese power south to the Equator and east to within bombing distance of Honolulu. Hawaii is indispensable to us if we are to protect our flanks in the Antipodes and Alaska, safeguard the Panama Canal and our West Coast, and eventually carry out a frontal attack on Japan. Without it we should be impotent in the Pacific.

If it was expedient to remove a scattering of Japanese from our Western coastal regions, the American people should be told why it is not many times more necessary to remove this heavier concentration of Japanese from islands which are in greater danger and harder to defend. We are playing for the highest stakes: Congress should investigate immediately and tell us what the odds are.

Hitler's Quarreling Puppets

BY EUGEN KOVACS

DURING the critical period on the eastern front which preceded the present German offensive Adolf Hitler found time to go to Finland for a talk with Field Marshal Mannerheim. The reason given for his visit was that Herr Hitler wished personally to congratulate the Finnish leader on his seventy-fifth birthday. It is generally believed, however, that Hitler went to beg Mannerheim to contribute more troops to the war against Russia. Heretofore when the Führer has wanted something from the head of one of the "independent" states now allied to Germany, he has ordered his ally to come to him, but on this occasion he evidently thought it necessary to use gentler methods. What answer Mannerheim gave him is unknown, but there have been no signs of increased effort on the part of the Finns.

The Russian war has been very costly, and the new offensive is a tremendous drain on German man-power. Large numbers of troops must also be maintained in other parts of Europe to keep down underground activity, combat the Serbian guerrillas, and be prepared for an Anglo-American invasion of the Continent. At the same time the great need for war materials and food-stuffs calls for more and more men on the production front. Hitler is therefore asking for increased military support from his so-called allies, and since Italy is neither willing nor able to take part in the Russian war on a large scale, he is seeking fresh troops not only from the Finns but from the Hungarians, Rumanians, Bulgarians, Croats, and Slovaks. The answers he has received from the peoples of Southeastern Europe show that they do not intend to increase the aid they have already granted.

Their attitude surprises no one who has lived among them. The support they have given Hitler has always been compulsory and half-hearted. How small it really has been is revealed by the German communiqués, which from January 1 to July 15, 1942, have mentioned the Rumanians thirty-six times, the Hungarians thirteen times, the Slovaks and Croats five times each.

From the beginning these allies of Hitler's formed a strange and unnatural group. Most of them have always been arch-enemies. They joined in the war against Russia—and against Yugoslavia and Greece—only in the hope that they could thereby realize their own national aims. Now that the war has left their borders and the danger of a Russian invasion is past, they consider their part in it finished and are returning to their own national politics. The accounts they wish to settle are not with the Russians but with one another. All of them are pressing Hitler to fulfil the promises he made to them a year ago. But Hitler is in a bad position and has to postpone fulfilment. As a result these countries are preparing for a direct settlement, and Hitler has his hands full preventing war between Rumania and Hungary, Hungary and Slovakia, or Rumania and Bulgaria.

In his original plan of strategy against Russia, formulated in August, 1941, Hitler reserved an important role for the Hungarian army—the defense of the Carpathian Mountains. The partition of Transylvania, which gave the northern part of that province to Hungary, was in preparation for this. But the war against Russia was very unpopular in Hungary. It had been necessary to blame the Soviets for the bombing of the town of Kassa in order to find a pretext for a declaration of war against them. The Hungarian army participated only on a small scale, preferring to remain on the Rumanian and Slovakian borders and to hold the Bácska, which was "retaken" from Yugoslavia in spite of a pact of "eternal friendship." The former Hungarian Premier, Ladisla's de Bárdossy, declared in Parliament that his country would not increase the "expeditionary army" against the Russians, and his successor, Nicholas de Kállay, has made every effort to hold to that position. On his recent visit to Hitler he is reported to have said that Hungary needed its man-power for the harvest and to have offered grain instead of men. The government has been wholeheartedly supported by both Regent Horthy and the Hungarian aristocracy, which, though long notorious in Europe for its anti-democratic and fascist sentiments, is in the main anti-Hitler because it fears that after the Führer is victorious and no longer needs the support of the great landowners, he will advocate expropriation of the estates.

Hungarian policy is clear: Hungary wants to keep the former Hungarian territories "reconquered" from the Czechs in 1938 and from the Yugoslavs in 1941, and also that part of Transylvania which was retroceded by Rumania after Ribbentrop and Ciano worked out the Vienna award in 1941. But Hungary remembers its experience in 1918-19, when, its army having been destroyed, it had to submit not only to the dictates of the Allies but also to a Rumanian invasion and the occupation of Budapest. It refuses to repeat the mistakes of the last war and to sacrifice its youth in the cause of Germany. It remembers how, "mitgegangen, mitgefangen, mitgehangen," it had to share the fate of its allies and take full punishment.

Today Hungary is saving its army and its ammunition for the post-war crisis. Its position was made plain when Kállay, an intimate friend of the well-known anti-Nazi Count Stephen Bethlen, was appointed Premier to succeed Bárdossy, and when the son of the anti-Hitler Horthy was chosen to be his father's successor.

Relations between Hungary and Rumania are strained to the breaking-point. I was in Rumania when the present regime had to carry out the Vienna award and cede to Hungary half of Transylvania, "the pearl of Greater Rumania," with its capital, Cluj-Kolozsvár. I had also witnessed the return of Bessarabia to the Russians. The resolution of the Rumanian-Russian question without a war was welcomed by the people. Everybody was aware that Bessarabia was not worth fighting for, and no serious accusations were made against the government which ceded it. But when northern Transylvania and Cluj were to be evacuated, the bitterness was universal, and only the critical internal political situation—the revolt of the Iron Guard, the dethronement of King Carol, and the installation of the Antonescu regime—prevented open revolution. The anti-Hitler feeling then created grew stronger when the German "instruction troops" arrived and Rumania was prepared to become the battlefield of the campaign against Russia.

General Antonescu, Rumania's present dictator, is a soldier and only a soldier; he has had no political experience and cannot command the support of politicians. All his life he has been preparing for a Rumanian-Russian war, and as soon as Hitler made him "commander of the Rumanian-German armies operating in the south," he ignored the warnings of his advisers and sent his army into battle. Bessarabia was not worth the losses incurred, and generals as well as politicians are protesting against the cost of the dictator's military adventure.

Under pressure of Rumanian public opinion Antonescu presented his claims for a revision of the Vienna award. Hitler refused to discuss the Transylvanian question at that time. Meanwhile, clear-sighted persons in Rumania knew that while the country was being bled white for Germany, the Hungarians were fortifying their positions in Transylvania and had even gone so far as to ask for the second half of that province. Opposition to the continuation of the Russian war became more serious in view of Hungary's preparations. Two "secret" radio stations were set up on Rumanian soil to carry on anti-Hungarian propaganda among the Rumanian minority in Hungarian Transylvania.

Antonescu called on Hitler and brought back only new obligations to deliver more troops, food, and oil to the Führer. People are hungry and cold in a wheat-growing, richly forested country; the army's losses have been heavy; and nothing has been gained. The Rumanian nation is becoming impatient and is asking for an immediate solution of the Transylvanian question. If Hitler can do nothing, Rumania will refuse further help to the Axis. Dissatisfaction is great and open; both people and politicians are demanding the withdrawal of Rumanian troops from Russia and their dispatch to the Hungarian border.

The Slovaks are also reluctant to augment Hitler's strength. Not only do they feel their kinship with other Slavs, but they are afraid of the Hungarians. Hungary claims part of Slovakia in addition to those sections of Czecho-Slovakia which it seized in 1938. The troops of the two countries now face each other on the border and refuse to leave their positions to fight against the Russians.

The autonomous Croatia created by the Germans and placed under the leadership of Ante Pavelich is another "ally" of Hitler's. But not even the terror of the Ustashis (the organization responsible for the assassination of King Alexander) can break the influence of Vladimir Machek there. Although the Croat peasant leader is confined to his country estate in Kubinec, his followers are carrying on the struggle against Pavelich in his name. The king-killer has succeeded in gathering a number of Machek's followers into his so-called parliament, but the spokesman of the group has declared that only the "utmost terror" forced them to come. The Duke of Spoleto, the new "King of Croatia," does not dare to appear in Zagreb for fear of an attempt on his life. Rather than fight for Hitler, peasants are enrolling in the "green cadres," groups of deserters who in alliance with the Serb Chetniks are fighting against the Ustashis and the Italian and German occupation troops.

Bulgaria, like Hungary, is a victim of the First World War. From the beginning of the present conflict the Bulgarian press has never ceased to remind the people of the results of fighting a losing battle on the German side. "No war" is the Bulgarian watchword; "national claims must be satisfied by peaceful means." So far this policy has been successful. As a result of German pressure on Rumania Bulgaria got back the southern Dobrudja, and it has occupied parts of Yugoslavia and Greece that it has claimed for many generations. But it is unwilling to declare war on Slav Russia. It is fighting against Serbian Chetniks and Greek guerrillas, but exclusively on territory which it has occupied, and it has refused to furnish any military help to Hitler against Russia.

The firm stand taken by these countries reveals Hitler's weakness. If he were as strong as he boasted he was at the beginning of the Russian-German war, they would not have the courage to oppose his wishes. They are in a position to know the situation and chances better than more remote countries, and they have made their decision.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Too Much Wheat

OUT in the wheat belt the combines are humming as harvesting gets into full swing. Weather conditions during the growing season have been favorable, and there is a bumper crop to gather in, even though it will not quite measure up to last year's output. For this small mercy the Department of Agriculture may truly be thankful, since it is already almost smothered in wheat. At the beginning of the new "crop year" on July 1 there was a carry-over from previous harvests of 630,000,000 bushels. Add the estimated yield of this year's crop—868,059,000 bushels—and we have a supply equal to two years' domestic consumption with no important export outlets in sight so long as the war continues.

One result is a major storage problem. This week, with storage facilities at the terminal exhausted and with grain tying up badly needed railroad cars in the freight yards, the Kansas City Board of Trade voted a modified embargo on wheat shipments. In other terminal cities the situation is almost equally difficult, with last year's carry-over filling up the elevators. From all over the wheat belt come stories of farmers turning to all sorts of makeshifts in order to house their crops. Garages, vacant stores, and schoolhouses are being boarded up and used for storage. Even farmhouse parlors are being emptied of furniture to make room for wheat.

Despite this superabundance, only after a prolonged and bitter fight has the government obtained from Congress authority to sell some of its wheat holdings for animal feed at a price sufficiently below parity to make it competitive with corn. And it is permitted to dispose of no more than 125,000,000 bushels in this manner. Yet while our daily bread is more than amply assured, there is a real need to bolster the production of the protein foods which animals "manufacture" from grain—meat, eggs, and dairy products. In view of increased military and civilian demands and our lend-lease commitments, supplies of these commodities are none too plentiful. A near-crisis in pork is impending, with hogs commanding a market price far above the parity level and the processors, who operate under a price ceiling, becoming reluctant to buy. Increased supplies of feed will help to correct this situation.

Even before the farm bloc had suffered final defeat in its effort to prevent the sale of wheat below parity, it had a new inflationary iron in the fire. A bill has passed the Senate ordering 100 per cent parity loans on 1942 crops of wheat, cotton, corn, rice, peanuts, and tobacco. The passage last summer of the Steagal amendment providing for 85 per cent parity loans on basic crops gave a strong impetus to the upward movement in farm prices. Should this new bill become law, another rise in the cost of living can be confidently expected. In the case of wheat it will mean a price of 134.4 cents a bushel compared with an average price to the farmer in June of 96 cents.

Moreover, we have to consider the effect of such a bonanza price on the wheat grower. Encouraged to expect that the same bounty will be extended to him in respect of next year's crop, he will naturally try to increase his output. It is true that wheat-acreage allotment for 1943 is restricted to the legal limit—55,000,000 acres—as it was in the current year, but a full parity price will make it worth while to intensify production by using more fertilizer. Nor will the farmer be so apt to listen to Secretary of Agriculture Wickard's plea to turn suitable land from wheat to more urgently needed crops. Thus if the Senate bill is passed, labor, machinery, and fertilizers which could have been used in more fruitful ways will be employed to add to an already unmanageable surplus of wheat. Under war-time conditions waste of resources of this kind is worse than a blunder; it is treason.

By pushing demands which not only ignore the national interest but violate common sense the farm bloc is endangering the whole agricultural program, as indeed many farmers and farm organizations recognize. Few will deny the basic justice of the parity idea. But it is one thing to seek ways of guaranteeing the farmers a fair share of the national income and something else to attempt to freeze the crop pattern by protecting the production of obviously superfluous quantities of a particular commodity such as wheat.

Price guaranties and subsidies can be justified only when they seek to correct, and not to distort, an unbalanced supply-demand situation. Thus government underwriting of profitable prices for meat or soy beans or peanuts can be defended at this time on the ground that prospective supplies of these crops are inadequate. But to spur the production of wheat is about as sensible as closing the sluice gates of an overflowing reservoir. Intelligible aid to wheat farmers would be directed toward getting them away from wheat and into some of the many other crops for which there is an increasing demand, especially those which are the raw materials for the new chemurgic industries. These offer prospects for post-war development. When peace comes, there will be a relief demand of great magnitude which may provide a way of reducing wheat stocks to normal proportions, although we must not forget that Canada and the Argentine also possess very large reserves. It is highly improbable, however, that we shall permanently regain the export markets without which the present acreage devoted to wheat must be excessive.

In the Wind

THE FOUR FREEDOMS" is the title of a documentary motion picture just issued by the National Association of Manufacturers. The last of the President's four freedoms, "freedom from fear," is changed in the film to "freedom of enterprise."

AMONG THE GUESTS at a recent reception for Mr. and Mrs. Joseph E. Davies were Mr. and Mrs. Martin Dies and Hjalmar Procope, Finnish minister to the United States.

IN AN EDITORIAL on the fall of Sevastopol, the Green Bay (Wisconsin) Press-Gazette compared the resistance of the Russians with that of the besieged fascists "when the Republicans defended the Alhambra against the reds" in the Spanish war.

MANY VENDORS who used to hawk Social Justice are now selling Serve America Now, a new fascist-flavored magazine published in Boston.

GERALD L. K. SMITH is short of funds. In a circular letter to his supporters he says that his organization, the Committee of One Million, and his campaign for the Senate may both fail unless he gets the money to pay many long-outstanding bills.

JAMES E. CURLEY, three times mayor of Boston and once governor of Massachusetts, is opposing Representative Thomas Eliot in the Democratic primaries. Curley has a powerful machine and is popular with Irish elements in Boston who form a large part of the liberal incumbent's constituency.

REPRESENTATIVE HAROLD KNUTSON, in his column in the Brainerd (Minnesota) Dispatch, discussed last week the Dies committee's accusations against the Union for Democratic Action. Knutson cited a great many facts about U. D. A. leaders which in his opinion prove it is an alien group. His comment on Dr. James Loeb, executive secretary of the Union, was that Loeb formerly taught Romance languages.

THE SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC PARTY of Russia, what remains of it, now has its headquarters in New York. The war, however, is breaking it up, for several prominent Mensheviks are becoming increasingly sympathetic to the Bolsheviks. One of these is Max Werner, the military analyst. Werner spoke recently at a Communist-led meeting, and the Mensheviks decided to expel him. When two other leaders of the group, A. Yugow and Theodor Dan, supported him, they also were expelled.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

In the Heart of
The Adirondacks

SCAROON MANOR
HOTEL on SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.

9 HOLE GOLF COURSE
ON PREMISES

9 Clay Tennis Courts
8 Handball Courts

Complete Social
& Sport Staffs

Earl Carpenter
And His
14-Piece Orchestra

THE CASE AGAINST MARTIN DIES

How long must loyal Americans tolerate tax-supported undermining of their civil liberties?

HEAR

Freda Kirchwey . . . Editor of The Nation
Bruce Bliven . . . Editor of The New Republic
Victor Riesel . . . Labor Editor of The New York Post
Kenneth G. Crawford . Dir., Washington Bureau PM

at the N. Y. City Membership Forum of the

UNION FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION

HOTEL ASTOR—BROADWAY at 44th ST.
(AIR CONDITIONED)

Tuesday, JULY 28th—at 8:30 P.M.

TICKETS: 25 CENTS AT THE DOOR

For Reservations Phone: GR 5-4779

THE NATION INDEX

for Volume 154 of The Nation, covering the period from January through June, 1942, is now available. This excellent reference aid may be had for 15 cents.

Send your order for the Index, with remittance, to

The NATION

55 Fifth Avenue New York City

Don't Miss An Issue!

To Keep THE NATION coming regularly
just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $.....

- ☐ One Year $5
☐ Two Years $8
☐ Three Years $11

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER

to new subscribers only

- ☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name.....

Street.....

City.....

State.....

Extra postage per year: Foreign and Canadian, $1.00

7-25-42

BOOKS and the ARTS

"P'town"

TIME AND THE TOWN: A PROVINCETOWN CHRONICLE. By Mary Heaton Vorse. The Dial Press. $3.50.

AN AMPHIBIAN creature snugly nestled within the almost closed fist of Cape Cod, Provincetown is one of the youngest of Mother Plymouth's daughters, and by reputation at least the "fastest" and least prim from birth. Long ago, so legend has it, the devil had business with Captain Jeremiah Snaggs, a sinner from down-Cape, and after some difficulty ran him down in Provincetown.

"Well," said the Captain, "you caught me fair and square. Where do we go from here?"

"Go?" exclaimed His Nibs, a bit surprised. "Ain't we to Provincetown?"

Almost any and every attitude can be taken toward the town except indifference. People either love it passionately or hate it with equal fervor. Mary Heaton Vorse belongs to the first school, and her story of "P'town" is tender and understanding, with many deep insights born of an intuitive "feel" for things that cannot easily be explained. The mellow light of wisdom and sparkling flash of wit play over these pages, which are rich with amusing and revealing anecdote, illuminating more with a phrase than ten pages of ponderous analysis.

They are all here, all the diverse and jangling elements that have made Provincetown one of the most distinctive of American communities—the old-time whaling fleet, the Grand Bankers, the mooncussers, the Coast Guard, the fresh fishermen and weir fishermen, the "freezers" and beam trawlers, the scientists, writers, rum-runners, sculptors and painters, Lizzie Jazz Garters, boarding-house keepers, tin-horn politicians, crabapple Yankees, prolific Portuguese from ancient Lisbon and the Azores, Nova Scotians, "bohemians" (high and low), and the castellated "girls" of the Research (genealogical) Society, restricted to Mayflower descendants. Almost all claim at least one line of descent from Stephen Hopkins, rather ironically, for Hopkins was the most democratic of the Pilgrim Fathers, being constantly in trouble with the Plymouth authorities, twice for selling liquor without a license and once for inviting servants into his house to drink and play shovelboard, which the Research Society has yet to do.

Mary Heaton Vorse is at her best in telling the story of her early years in Provincetown, from 1907 to 1917, before automobiles and three-hour tourists came to clog its two long narrow streets and its maze of narrower cross lanes. Her description of the old Kibbe Cook house, which has been her home for thirty-five years, is a fine and sensitive piece of writing.

While the story has been told before and at greater length, there is interesting material here on the now almost legendary Provincetown Players, who presented their first plays on the Vorses' old fish wharf, long since fallen into the sea. Never since the days of Emerson, Thoreau, and their friends at Concord has there been such fruitful joint activity on these shores. Of Provincetown for a few brief years it can be said, as was inscribed with a burning iron on the door of the old stable in MacDougal Street that became the Provincetown Playhouse, "Here Pegasus was hitched."

Probably because the pattern of life at Provincetown, as elsewhere in the country, began to fall apart into rather meaningless pieces after the last war, the chronicle is not so rewarding in its final sections. It becomes somewhat too miscellaneous, quite out of focus here and there where it descends to a mere cataloguing of personalities, events, "quaint" industries, and who lives where. More than one of the later chapters might well have been telescoped to a paragraph or two. The space might better have been used by Mary Heaton Vorse to probe into the most puzzling and disheartening phenomenon of the town—the wide and as yet unbridged gap between persons like herself and the general run of the town. Writers, painters, and "thinkers" have never been accepted locally. This question goes deep, to the very roots of the community and, for that matter, of American life. There is a deadly parallel in the history of all American "art" colonies. Why do such communities dry up so rapidly? Can it be because the artists and writers are really little better than three-hour tourists, having their function elsewhere, drawing their bread and butter from outside, without roots in the local scene? Couldn't they dig in and sprout roots if they tried, instead of always living spiritually in New York or some other metropolis? After all, the painters of Siena did not commute either physically or spiritually to Florence, Venice, or Rome. They lived and painted in Siena, for the Sienese.

Whatever the cause, writers and painters have never made the grade in Provincetown, and this unquestionably has affected their work by constricting their lives. "Ma" Enos summed up the popular feeling about them when her husband, Captain "Kitty," took up art, decorating clam and quahog shells, even painting rather charming canvases, after he had been stove up by a fall from a roof.

"Go'dammit!" said Ma, "it's awful! Lucky, though, he fell off the right side of the roof. If he'da come down the left side, he might'a been one of them — — — writers."

GEORGE WILLISON

Textbook of Blitzkrieg

ATTACK: A STUDY OF BLITZKRIEG TACTICS. By Major F. O. Miksche. With an Introduction by Tom Wintringham. Random House. $2.50.

TOM WINTRINGHAM, in his introduction to "Attack," describes Major Miksche's work as a textbook of modern war, and the only textbook he knows that deals with war as the Germans have shaped it and are shaping it. He and Major Miksche served together with the International Brigade of the Spanish Republican army through the war in Spain, where they fought the German army specialists who made use of this campaign to try out their modern battle tactics and who incidentally gained much knowledge which they were later able to apply in Poland and France.

The German conception of war is to be found in the teachings of General Karl von Clausewitz, the military theorist who directed the Prussian War School in the early nineteenth century. The modern German army had its origin in the period when universal military service was adopted in Prussia; Hitler and his military advisers have built their war machine on the sound foundations of the old army and their strategy of conquest on the teachings of the Prussian War School. Clausewitz laid down that the military aims of conquest must be the destruction of the enemy's armed forces and the seizure of his means of aggression, that is, his raw materials, food, and industry. The final aim must be to overcome his will to resist; this is usually accomplished by a great victory in the field and the capture of his capital.

Only a small portion of "Attack" is devoted to the historical background of the Nazi system of aggressive warfare, but the evolution of this system through the Spanish and Polish campaigns is carefully traced. In the former the Germans learned much and the French little, and Major Miksche explains why the French failed to profit from the lessons of a campaign so near home.

The blitzkrieg, as tried out in Spain, started at too slow a pace, and there were many mistakes, though it is only fair to say that these were mostly made by the Italians. Toward the end of the war the pace quickened, and the technique of cooperation between tanks and aircraft was much improved. In the Polish campaign German operations assumed the rapidity of true blitzkrieg.

The story of the French campaign is well known, but Major Miksche has thrown new light on the reasons for the French miscalculation of German intentions. The campaign started with surprise, because the main attack was made not in the open plains of Belgium but through the Ardennes, by an approach averaging seventy miles a day. This was quite contrary to General Gamelin's ideas that no force could penetrate that region swiftly owing to its lack of roads and railways. The roads were too few for an army maintaining a broad front, but they were enough for an armored and motorized drive that pushed hard on narrow fronts and was not disturbed by gaps between those fronts. Surprise was achieved by speed, and success was exploited by keeping up the speed. The German Staff utilized the rapidity of modern road transport in cooperation with the airplane on a scale on which it had not been used before. Success in France was largely the result of practice in Spain and Poland. Since 1940, though new weapons and equipment have imposed some changes in method, the German principles of attack have remained the same.

Major Miksche has made a thorough study of the tactics of attack as perfected by the Germans on the battlefield. In Spain he was given one of the highest ranks bestowed on staff officers of foreign birth, and he organized the defensive system of the Republican army. By the end of the campaign it was clear to him that new weapons and methods had changed both attack and defense. The greater part of his book is given over to this subject, and it is one of much interest and moment, not only to soldiers, but to the people of all the Allied nations.

H. S. SEWELL

Art Hays

CITY LAWYER: THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A LAW PRACTICE. By Arthur Garfield Hays. Simon and Schuster. $3.

THERE are few labor causes to which Arthur Garfield Hays has turned a cold shoulder. The reason is apparent in the foreword of his new book:

My life is essentially a struggle . . . the usual one of making a living, and then making living a little easier for those who are the perennial victims of persecution. After a good many years of it, I am convinced that the struggle itself, whether temporarily won or lost, is what counts. To press for some cause bigger than oneself, however hopeless it may seem, isn't necessarily noble. It is just about the best fun there is in life for people of my disposition. . . . It may well be I have been worth more for the defense of the rights of others to express their ideas (with a great many of which I have not agreed) than for any other purpose.

However, it should be quickly added that his new book is not a polemic on liberalism or a dissertation on how to succeed in the law. For the most part it is a warm, informal, loosely knit account of the career of a man who enjoys his profession and enjoys writing about it.

As a fighter for liberalism, Mr. Hays is familiar to Nation readers. But this book presents him in a less familiar role, that of a successful practicing lawyer of international reputation. Perhaps that is why "City Lawyer" has so fresh a touch. He has recounted in great detail his non-political cases and kept his "cause" cases down to a minimum.

Subtitled "The Autobiography of a Law Practice" rather than the autobiography of a lawyer, the biographical details are played down; yet more of them appear here than in any of his other books. Born in Rochester, New York, in 1881, of a fairly well-to-do middle-class family, he came to New York City as a boy, attended City College, then Columbia, and was graduated from the Law School of that university. He passed the bar in 1905 and spent the summer in Europe on the usual grand tour. He entered a well-established, highly reputed law firm in New York's financial district, but soon formed a partnership with S. Walter Kaufmann and Norvin R. Lindheim. Because of Kaufmann's German connections, the young firm received a great deal of work from German sources. In fact, Hays got his first taste of international law when he went to England to protest against the seizure of German goods by the English in the early years of the war. When he returned to America he found the United States at war with Germany and his law firm under accusation of aiding the enemy. The ensuing investigation—Hays personally was not involved—resulted in the conviction and disbarment of his partners, and it was not until many years later that they were reinstated.

Under the heading The Pictures on My Office Walls, Hays discusses the high lights in his career. His cases ranged from the defense of Wall Street brokerage firms to divorce and libel actions. Interspersed were his "liberal" cases—Sacco and Vanzetti, Robert Burns of "Georgia Chain Gang" fame, the Scopes trial, H. L. Mencken and the Watch and Ward Society of Boston, Mayor Hague of New Jersey, and many others. But he has reserved most space for a case that was without a tinge of "social significance"—the Wendel will case. The problem was to break the will of Ella Wendel and determine who were the lawful heirs. A reputed fifty million dollars was involved, and the law fee was a million. It is the best mystery story of the thirties, and why no one has written a novel using it as a background is an even greater mystery.

Another case to which Hays devotes a good deal of space is the Reichstag-fire trial, in which he sat in as an observer for the defense. More interesting than the trial itself are the details of how Hays got in and out of the case, especially his description of Nazi court procedure and of the treatment accorded him by the Nazi authorities. On the fire itself nothing has ever been written to equal the brilliant full-length account by Douglas Reed, published—and neglected—in this country in 1934 under the title "The Burning of the Reichstag." Reed, an English journalist, devoted an entire book to this sensational event; Hays sees it through the eyes of an American lawyer.

The layman may find Mr. Hays's book rather technical in spots, but in most instances the material is so interesting, and is presented so vividly, that the legal phraseology is forgivable. "City Lawyer" may not be Mr. Hays's most important book, but it is by far the most readable.

GEORGE JOEL

The Correspondent's Book

ASSIGNMENT TO BERLIN. By Harry W. Flannery. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

ABOUT this much there is no argument: a radio correspondent upon his return from Berlin will have at least something of interest to say. And one may agree that if the correspondent has an alert mind and a terse biting style he should be encouraged to write a book. Mr. Shirer, for instance. But not Mr. Flannery. Mr. Flannery was good for a Town Hall luncheon or one article in some genteel, rather portentous magazine, the Atlantic Monthly, say. But there he is, an honest, rather sentimental man, "well-informed," diligent, soft-spoken, and slightly confused, clapped down by Mr. Knopf beside the ejaculator of exact and brilliant paragraphs. How do you do, Mr. Shirer!

There is, of course, plenty of information in "Assignment to Berlin." Much of it is about Mr. Flannery's not very exciting profession, about which Mr. Shirer has told us all we need to know. A radio correspondent will meet bureaucrats, censors, and officials; not very interesting creatures unless one is interested in the study of censorship for its own sake. It may be admitted that what a censor permits one to say, or what he prohibits, may throw light upon a government's plans. Mr. Flannery throws no light, however. He was exasperated by the German censors, who co-operated whole-heartedly with CBS's man only when they saw propaganda value in one of his stunts, such as interviewing a pugilist named Max Schmeling or one of the pilots alleged to have bombed the Illustrious. Then, again, Mr. Flannery is at pains to tell us that the incredible Mr. Wodehouse is a dangerous nitwit with a materialistic mind. And since he had not before traveled outside the United States, Mr. Flannery sets down a few of his, presumably, choicer impressions. German dark beer is sweeter than light beer, and Mr. Flannery did not like it. Also, German photographic films are inferior to American. Probably the famous American remark about European plumbing is to be found somewhere in the author's pages. Again, a little tenderness is called for by the recipe for this kind of book. Mr. Flannery therefore reports his telephone conversations with his wife back home in the States—four thousand miles away! Sometimes he had a good connection and at other times he did not. But modern science is wonderful, anyway.

But what kind of information can a correspondent gather? Gestapo vigilance cannot prevent his collecting exact data about the food situation. Mr. Flannery does something in this line. He can observe certain things of military value. The author gives us a few extremely interesting facts about the camouflage of Berlin, together with a rumor, popular in the German capital, that the Nazis have built a fake Berlin to deceive any British or Russian bomber pilot whose navigator chances to be dead drunk over his maps. An observer in the author's position may make a faithful report on the German press. We get a little of that. He may recount war-time gossip, though he should be careful not to let his gossip reporting become downright assertion. It is, for example, very probable that after the invasion of the U. S. S. R. dissension arose within the German military class. So much we had gathered back here. In any case, war-time chatter would busy itself with the theme. Since the matter is "of the essence," when Mr. Flannery states positively that the German army wanted more say in government, he ought to disclose his source of information. Upon all these subjects, then, Mr. Flannery has something to say, but never does he go after his theme and clinch his few instances with a well-ordered abundance of fact. Almost the only matter to be treated generously is German morale, the curious, anxiety-ridden grayness of mind characteristic at least of the middle-aged masses. For the rest he ambles along, rehashing material made public before or at the most spicing it with unimportant details.

The criticism, however, is not merely directed against a slightly lower than average "correspondent's book" but against the whole surfeit of them. Unless such a manuscript is written with the imagistic brilliance of Mr. Werth, or unless a historical curve shoots up out of it like a fiery rocket, as out of "Berlin Diary," there is only one characteristic that should earn it publication. A deadly, universal war is not merely a dubbed-in background for a display of chest-thumping in the manner of Tarzan Reynolds. Nor is it the occasion for a well-mannered conversation piece like Mr. Flannery's. What we do need is an abundance of relevant and exact information—but exact. The remark, which indicates satiety rather than ill-temper, is addressed to publishers, for their information and necessary action, please!

RALPH BATES

Drama Note

THE current revivals of famous musical comedies at Carnegie Hall may not be brilliant as productions, but they provide a pleasantly nostalgic summer night's entertainment, especially for veterans of the first engagements of the old favorites. The scores seem as fresh as ever. The action, if that is how you describe what goes on in an old-school musical comedy, is slow in parts; other parts have been truncated, perhaps to speed things along but not always to the advantage of the production as a whole. Stage sets and costuming are economical but more effective, I thought, than some reviewers would admit. The casting is also so-so; adequate rather than first-rate.

In spite of this rather faint praise, nobody who would be likely to go to "The Chocolate Soldier" or "The Merry Widow" risks serious disappointment. The former played an extra week to good houses. "The Merry Widow," now running, has met with an equally enthusiastic response. Helen Gleason, who played the lead in both, has an excellent voice and is pretty besides. The role of Prince Damito in "The Merry Widow," made famous by the forgotten Donald Brian, is sung with humor and spirit—though with an unnecessary touch of clowning—by Wilbur Evans, known in the past chiefly as a radio and concert singer. My memory may have exaggerated the glamour and gaiety of the final scene in Maxim's in the original performance, but I suspect that some of it has been ruthlessly deleted, perhaps in deference to Helen Gleason's very modest abilities as a dancer. Nor have the lines been improved by the injection of a few topical witticisms. But no impious hand has touched the Lehar score, and that, after all, is more important than action or words, scenery or costumes. F. K.

MUSIC

HERBERT GRAF, the Metropolitan's stage director, has written a book called "The Opera and Its Future in America" (Norton; $4.75). For the simpler-minded who think that opera is a number of exciting works by Mozart, Verdi, Wagner, Mussorgsky, its future is obvious enough: the best possible performances of these works to satisfy the interest of those who are excited by them, and to stimulate the imaginations of the creators of new works. But for

Mr. Graf, who has the German tendency to intellectualization and schematization, the future of opera is the future of "the eternal musical theater," of which the opera of the past three hundred years is one of the particular forms determined by "particular social, political, and cultural surroundings." The true musical theater, in which "all arts—poetry, music, the dance, painting, sculpture, and architecture . . . worked together as a perfect ensemble in the service of a common purpose," was the democratic folk theater of the Greeks, which represented folk emotion about subjects close to the folk mind and heart, and represented the need for community participation, as one can see in the architectural form of the theater, which created no distinctions in the audience and did not separate the audience from the performers. Hence the seventeenth-century Italians who set out to reproduce the Greek drama were doomed to failure from the start, since what they produced represented not folk emotion but the mere intellectual interest of aristocrats, not the need of community participation but an aristocratic society's desire for mere entertainment, as was evident in the fact that the works were performed in palace theaters in which the audience was separated from the performers. And later came the performances in public theaters in which the tiers of boxes and seats separated the different classes of the audience; performances of works which the desire for entertainment made into "medley[s] of independent attractions: singing for the sake of vocal display, dancing to show off feats of virtuosity in bodily movement, scenery for the sake of mere pomp and color." It was liberal and democratic tendencies that changed all this: the Age of Reason produced Gluck's simplification of grand opera; Mozart's sensitiveness to the political currents of his time led him to a democratization of grand opera through the infusion of elements of folk opera—the every-day, true-to-life subjects close to the mind and heart of the folk, and calling for a more natural style of singing, acting, scenery, and so on. Beethoven, Verdi did the same thing; Wagner too used subjects from the history and mythology of his own people in works that employed all the elements of the stage in the service of "social document[s] of folk expression"; and he also integrated these elements in performances of the works. But in the end Mr. Graf is not satisfied with even perfect performances of Mozart or Wagner if proscenium arch and curtain separate audience from performers, if tiers of boxes and seats separate groups of the audience, if this audience is not the folk.

So with America. It was, he says, the moneyed aristocracy who, for their entertainment and social prestige, imported and supported in copies of the European court theaters the alien art of grand opera in foreign languages that had no "broad basis of support in the masses of the people." "In 1929 the wealth of the country was sucked into the maelstrom of financial depression"; and opera passed from the hands of those who no longer could afford to support it to the hands of new sponsors—the people. The result was its democratization: performances were broadcast to the entire nation; "the boxes in the grand tier, which had belonged to the stockholders of the [Metropolitan] Real Estate Company, were replaced by seats . . . a step toward widening the opera's appeal and bases of support"; "the great age of foreign opera in its original form, produced with the most famous casts and elaborate effects which could be bought in all the world, and presented by a skilful organization" ended; already there has been increasing use of American singers, a beginning with the use of English; and these point toward the future that Mr. Graf wants: an opera of the people in a theater of the people, employing subjects, a language, a style of performance that will engage their emotions.

The replacement of grand tier boxes by seats costing $5 represents perfectly the Metropolitan's democratization; Mr. Graf's citing of it represents equally well the writing in his book—superficial, remote from reality, inaccurate, uncritical, and this even in artistic matters. The Metropolitan was not democratized: the people contributed the funds to continue the performances and buy the opera house, but the moneyed aristocrats rented the parterre boxes they had owned and remained the directors of the producing company. And its artistic improvement has been in the direction of the recent performances of "Don Giovanni" and "Fidelio" in their original forms with the best available singers, mostly foreigners. For while such opera may originally have been imported by the moneyed aristocracy, it engaged and still engages the emotions of the musical public; and it will continue to do so.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Democracy Is Indivisible

Dear Sirs: In his Nation article of June 20, Mr. del Vayo reminded us, as Ferrero and others have done, of the Congress of Vienna and the attempt made there to reconstruct Europe on the old principle of monarchist legitimacy, "the eternal law," as Metternich called it. The parallel between that congress and the future peace conference, after Allied victory, is indeed striking. Like the congress, the peace conference will follow a revolutionary period that produced dictators attempting to unify Europe by conquest.

The peacemakers of Vienna were out of step with history. They did not understand that the old principle of monarchist legitimacy had been finally replaced, in the revolutionary struggles, by a new principle—the principle of the Rights of Man. This, in fact, was a descent from heaven to earth; it was a change from a political principle based on divine right to one based on human rights.

Against this new principle the privileged fought step by step. Paradoxically, they were able to use the new nationalism created by the revolutions to postpone social and political reforms. The new nationalism built up psychological Chinese walls between the peoples, high enough to prevent them from seeing their common interests, but not so high as to stop vested interests from pursuing, in international accord, a counter-revolutionary policy. Nothing is more typical of this than the wishful belief, often expressed in reactionary circles, that Soviet Russia is going back to nationalism. It is in line with the policy that put Hitler in the saddle and finally led to the anti-Communist Munich agreement and the present war.

The next peace conference should clearly establish the new principle as the only source of political authority. It must be universally accepted, as was the previous principle of the divine right of kings. Naturally, different forms of government can be adopted, according to the educational level and the political evolution of the various peoples, but other wars are inevitable if a general principle of political authority is not established, if democratic solidarity does not become an almost religious need, taking precedence over nationalism.

The British-Russian pact, by creating the basis for a real understanding between the Western democracies and Soviet Russia, opens the road toward a "people's peace." But before that goal is reached, political clarification inside the Western democracies must take place. Declarations like the recent addresses of Messrs. Wallace and Welles clearly point the way. Of course the elimination of the men who believed in appeasement, who, as Mr. del Vayo puts it, may be considered "a useful element of counterpoise in a Europe which tomorrow might swing too far to the left," is indispensable. Without it, the threat of "counter-revolution" after the victory has been won will keep alive Soviet suspicion of the Western powers, and the result will be another peace based on the balance of power and another war.

Naturally the argument of the appeasers is the danger of communism or even of socialism. But labels are very confusing. Where, for instance, does a progressive trend, as exemplified by the New Deal, end and socialism begin? The difference lies rather between Anglo-Saxon pragmatism and European dogmatism. If the British-Russian treaty bears all its fruit, the Soviet Union will have no reason to deny its peoples the complete enjoyment of the Four Freedoms. It had a justification for not doing so only in the past, when anti-Communist coalitions were possible. What is essential is that we all understand that the "people's revolution" must be directed and organized by international democracy. This will be the paramount task of the future peacemakers. It implies the revision of the traditional conception of national sovereignty that paralyzed the first League of Nations. A limit must be set to the sovereignty of the state in order to protect the sovereignty of the people.

CHARLES A. DAVILA,

Former Rumanian Minister to
New York, July 13      Washington

Balance of Power a Necessity

Dear Sirs: With the Anglo-Russian pact the very principle which Mr. del Vayo condemns has now been reasserted by the chief exponent of a people's revolution. For the balance of power is bred not by design but necessity. In the twentieth century it has been the logical response of countries with the one basic common interest of self-preservation to Germany's ceaseless megalomania.

Nor does it rule out hope of a wider system of security. But this, too, must deal with that contest of power which is the underlying reality of politics. Russia and Britain have framed specific guaranties of "mutual assistance" against Germany so that power may rest in the hands of the law-abiding—in the hands, that is, of any larger organization which they underwrite. Will these allies—together with France and the other liberated nations—have the economic stability thus to keep Europe's peace? The United States, in the interest of its own security, must take steps to make that possible. If the great anti-Axis combination is assured of a favorable balance of European power, it may be able to direct that power toward a better world.

Mr. del Vayo's account of pre-war diplomacy gives pause. For in Britain, at any rate, the government did not pursue what he thinks was a traditional policy of balance of power but the precise and tragic reverse. By acquiescing in the growth of German strength, the method employed was not that of balance but of unbalance.

For the ideological version always portrays Downing Street and the City magnates as being much less stupid than they were. It omits the fact that since the 1920's Germany had been among all classes of Englishmen the most popular of European countries. Many on the right detested not only Communist Russia but the French right and center; it was to be Blum and not Barthou who took his orders from London. Liberal England and czarist Russia united against Germany's previous bid for power. If historical precedent had been followed, close ties would have been formed with both Moscow and Paris.

As for the left, it too helped discredit Versailles beyond reason or safety. Appeasement was its own revisionist doctrine borrowed and intensified. Chamberlain tried to invent a substitute for that balance of power which embodies the experience of the past. From this all parties may learn. For a policy which comes from the heart but ignores the head may be as disastrous as one which appears to spring from neither.

LIONEL GELBER

Toronto, July 9

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 1, 1942

NUMBER 5

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

81

EDITORIALS

The Old Deal Looks to 1944

83

The President's Advisers by Freda Kirchwey

84

A People's War—or Monopoly's? by I. F. Stone

85

ARTICLES

The Battle of Oil by Harold L. Ickes

86

Who Is the State Department? II. The Old Welles and the New by Robert Bendiner

87

Rebuilding the Danube Basin by Antonin Basch

91

Invasion via Norway by Gunnar Leistikow

93

In the Wind

94

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

An Open Letter on Critics and Criticism
by Joseph Wood Krutch

95

The Martyrdom of Poland by Rustem Vambery

96

Of Our Own Time by Babette Deutsch

97

Post-War Probings by Bertram M. Gross

97

In Brief

98

Records by B. H. Haggin

98

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

100

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor

RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

THE FALL OF ROSTOV IS A HEAVY BLOW to the cause of the United Nations, and even worse is the establishment of German bridgeheads on the lower Don, where it was hoped Marshal Timoshenko would be able to build a solid defense line. Hitler is dangerously near to achieving his immediate objective of cutting off the Caucasus with its vital oil and food supplies from the rest of Russia. It is not surprising, therefore, that the agitation for an immediate second front should be rising in a crescendo, particularly in Britain, where it appears to be getting on the government's nerves. In so far as the fervent demand for action indicates a willingness to face the enormous losses which the successful establishment of a second front will involve, this agitation is a healthy sign. On the other hand, it is obvious that whatever action the British and American High Commands have planned for the next two months must have been decided upon weeks ago, since even a small overseas expedition requires meticulous preparation. There are some indications that the next step will be a great intensification of air attacks on Germany. Experts like Major Seversky may well be over-optimistic in believing that the bomber alone can knock out the Axis; but a steady succession of raids, on a greater scale than anything Germany achieved over England, could do much to soften German morale and disrupt communications and production. There could be no better preparation for a later invasion of the Continent.

★

ARGENTINA HAS GONE A STEP FARTHER IN its double policy of supporting the Axis and repressing all dissident liberal opinion. Señor Ruiz Guinázú's violent anti-American speech in the secret meeting of the Chamber of Deputies served as a cynical commentary on a government prone to boast of its immaculate neutrality. The curious and round-about repudiation of this speech, issued through the Argentine Embassy in Mexico, convinces us only that the Foreign Minister, on second thought, concluded that the word recua (a drove of beasts of burden), applied to the American republics which have chosen to follow Washington rather than Berlin, was not, from the point of view of protocol, a happy choice. So officially at least it was never spoken.

But viewing the incident unofficially, we are prepared to accept the original report of the secret meeting presented in the uncensored press of Montevideo by members of the Argentine parliamentary opposition. We are the more inclined to take their word for what was said when we note how closely it parallels every other act of the Castillo government. Within the last few days the Minister of the Interior has decreed the suspension of three more newspapers sympathetic to the cause of the United Nations and has seized all available copies of "Campo Minado" (Minefield), in which the former deputy, Adolfo Lanús, a member of the committee of investigation into anti-Argentine activities, describes most impressively his experiences in dealing with Nazi intrigues in his country. Castillo cannot afford to have the public know to what extent his pro-Axis policy has opened the doors of Argentina to the political invasion of Adolf Hitler.

★

THE NEW YORK WORLD-TELEGRAM SHOWED peculiar editorial judgment in featuring with banner headlines a story on the increase in strikes on the same day that it printed in a far less prominent position a WPB forecast of curtailed production in many directions due to shortages of materials. The World-Telegram pointed out that a million man-days had been lost through strikes since January 1, or enough time to produce 200 tanks. We hold no brief for labor walkouts at this time, but the toll they are taking in production is small compared with that caused by shortages of material, particularly steel. Two years ago government experts foresaw that our steel-making capacity would prove inadequate under total war conditions, but their plans for expansion were drastically cut down owing to opposition within the industry. Now we find that while astonishing progress has been made in stepping up output of war goods, we are having to allow machines and skilled hands to remain idle because the steel mills cannot keep up with demand. As a result the program for 200 badly needed ships has been scrapped—a loss far more serious than that of 200 tanks. Moreover, it appears that an over-all shortage of steel is being accentuated by uneven allocations. According to evidence presented to a subcommittee of the House Marine and Fisheries Committee, "some old-line shipyards, subsidiaries of the old steel trust, had inventories out of proportion to their normal needs. If this steel had been properly allocated and distributed, there would have been sufficient available to carry out the whole program of 1942 and 1943, including the Higgins contract." These charges deserve a full and open investigation.

★

THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE MADE A poor start on the task of improving the tax bill passed by the House when it rejected out of hand two Treasury proposals for increasing revenue. In his statement to the committee last week Mr. Morgenthau drew attention to three groups of taxpayers enjoying "special privileges." The existence of $14 billion worth of tax-exempt securities, he pointed out, opens a wide breach in our system of taxation in accordance with ability to pay. He quoted the case of an individual with a gross income of $975,000, of which more than two-thirds is derived from tax-exempts. Under the House bill this multimillionaire will pay a tax of only $243,000, whereas if the privilege of tax exemption were removed, he would be liable for $832,000. There is general agreement that tax-exempts are an anomaly in a progressive system, but the fact that existing issues were sold on this contractual basis does create a legal obstacle to their abolition. The desired result, however, could be approximately arrived at if Congress adopted the President's suggestion that all incomes be limited to $25,000 for the duration of the war. Unfortunately, the Senate Finance Committee has turned down the proposal to end the tax-exempt privilege and has also refused to consider Mr. Morgenthau's recommendation of mandatory joint income-tax returns for married couples. The question of abolishing the 27½ per cent depletion allowance enjoyed by mining and oil properties, no matter how long they remain productive, the third proposal of the Secretary of the Treasury, has been left open.

★

TWENTY-EIGHT PETTY TROUBLE-MAKERS know now that American democracy is not too flabby to swish the flies off its back. After eleven months of patient investigation, in which 150 witnesses were heard and 6,880 pages of testimony recorded, William P. Maloney and John T. M. Reddan, special assistants to the Attorney General, have brought in their catch. A more unsavory mess hasn't been hauled in since the round-up of the Mafia. Here are the scheming little merchants of hate whose names have figured in exposure after exposure in the liberal press over the past ten years. Winrod, Griffin, and Pelley; Dilling, Hudson, and Edmundson; Jones, True, Noble, Smythe, and the rest are all to be confronted in a court of law with the words they hoped would weaken the country and perhaps bring them to power: "the Axis powers are fighting to free the world from domination by communism and international Jewry"; "the Japanese war against China is morally right"; "the Japanese attack upon Pearl Harbor was instigated by Great Britain"; this is a war in defense of "international Jewry-organized finance," of "British imperialists' and "Mongolian Jews," and so forth ad nauseam. We do not wish to seem grudging in praise of Mr. Maloney's catch, but it does appear that some of the larger fish are yet to be netted. There is the Coughlin agent in Boston who, after Pearl Harbor, mailed thousands of letters to men in the camps assailing the President as a "murderer"; there is the Senator who on the side publishes a journal hardly less slimy than those on the prosecutor's list. And whatever became of the projected probe of those responsible for Social Justice? If it was barred from the mails for being "clearly seditious," surely its editors and guiding spirit are not above investigation.

✕

THE RESIGNATION OF TIBOR ECKHARDT AS leader of the Independent Hungary group and the subsequent dissolution of the group itself have caused an elation in some liberal circles which we are unable to share. What is in the wind, apparently, is a reorganization under the auspices of a number of Hungarian ex-diplomats, including Anton Balasy, former counselor of the Hungarian legation in Washington, with a view to obtaining the support of the Association of Democratic Hungarians, led by Rustem Vambery. A respectable cloak for the new setup is to be provided by giving nominal leadership to Bela Bartok, who is being billed as the "Hungarian Paderewski." This unoriginal design is to be credited to the British Foreign Office, but the cutting and finishing are being performed by Harold B. Hoskins of our own State Department, who had previously done his best to disguise Eckhardt's feudal past in democratic homespun. The attempt failed because the odor of the anti-Semitic "Awakening Magyars" clung to the new garments. But even if Mr. Eckhardt has really been dropped, we should examine very carefully the credentials of the self-appointed guides of Bela Bartok, who is entirely without political experience. Before their organization is afforded any kind of recognition they should be required to give proof both that they have shed all allegiance to the Horthy regime and that their democratic sentiments are something more than a concession to American opinion.

The Old Deal Looks to 1944

WE HAVE seldom encountered anything more revealing than the outburst of editorial hypocrisy which followed Senator Mead's decision to seek, with the President's blessing, the gubernatorial nomination in the New York Democratic primaries. Solemn lectures were read to Mr. Roosevelt about the wickedness of "politics as usual." His only business, he was told, was to get on with running the war, letting the political chips fall where they would. Clearly somebody's plans had been seriously upset by Mr. Roosevelt's action.

In their eagerness to censure the President, the anti-New Deal editorial writers and columnists chose to overlook the fact that he is not only Chief Executive but head of his party. Our own criticism of Mr. Roosevelt is that he has been wrong to pretend he had no vital interest in the New York elections and that he ought not to have waited for the eleventh hour before coming into the open. Under our democratic system politics are the legitimate means of making ideas effective, and since Mr. Roosevelt's ideas are shared by vast numbers of his fellow-citizens he has not only a right but a duty to attempt to implement them.

Everyone knows that the contest in New York is not primarily between Mead and Bennett but between Roosevelt and Farley, between the New Deal and the Old Deal. And the stakes are not the nomination for governor but control of the state delegation in 1944. Mr. Roosevelt has a vital interest in the nomination of his successor in the White House because he properly wants to see his policies continued in the crucial years after the war. And his opponents have every right to strive by political means to thwart his efforts—but let them not pretend that their virtue is his sin.

It cannot be denied that while the President has been absorbed by war problems the Old Dealers have been playing politics as usual and have hatched out a very pretty plot providing them with a two-way bet. Their Republican wing, without consulting the wishes of Wendell Willkie, titular party leader, has little Tom Dewey lined up as its candidate for the New York governorship—a safe man, willing to take orders from Herbert Hoover and Roy Howard and to accept Westbrook Pegler as unofficial publicity agent. On the Democratic side Mr. Farley, no doubt in consultation with the Southern Democrats who supported him for the Presidential nomination in 1940, has been busy garnering pledges for his boy Bennett, hoping that the only business of the state convention would be to ratify his choice.

If both Dewey and Bennett are nominated, it will matter little to the Old Dealers which man wins. Bennett's victory would leave Farley in full control of the Democratic state machine and probably enable him, in cooperation with his friends from the poll-tax belt, to name the next Democratic candidate for President. On the other hand, a Republican victory would place Dewey in an excellent position in 1944 to take the prize which eluded his grasp in 1940. Thus either way the Old Dealers would be sure of a White House amenable to instructions during the critical post-war years.

This is a plot which must be thwarted if America is not to be swamped by a wave of reaction. The drafting of Senator Mead is a first step. Now rank-and-file Democratic and labor voters, whose ballots for years have made New York the spearhead of the New Deal, must raise their voices, must strive to cut the delegates out of the bag into which Mr. Farley has sewn them so tightly. But they must work fast, for the time available is woefully short.

The President's Advisers

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

IF THE appointment of Admiral Leahy and the speech of Secretary Hull had come at any other time than last week they would have been easier to stand. Worse choices and speeches have often been made. But taken in conjunction with the agony of Russia's slow fighting retreat across the Don with all it implies of danger to the Allied cause, these two minor incidents took on major significance. Here, at the most threatening crisis of the war, was alarming evidence of the weakness and contradictory purposes that still infect our national policies.

Of course Mr. Roosevelt needs help and advice. He shoulders an impossible burden of responsibility and actual direction. If Admiral Leahy can serve as a useful assistant, there is no reason on earth why he should not be the chief of staff to the Commander-in-Chief. But if his appointment is designed to obviate the need for a General Staff, or to silence demands for one, it must be strongly condemned. In discussing the appointment the President implied that Leahy's job would be largely technical and advisory. All right. If this is true, the need for a unification of control in a staff representing both military and political branches remains as urgent as ever. If this is not true, if Admiral Leahy is to have any over-all executive power, then the appointment is most disturbing.

One of the early comments on the choice of Leahy pointed out that his experience as American ambassador at Vichy would be of utmost value now that the question of a second front had become paramount. It attributed to the Admiral "an intimate knowledge of the vast 'V' army among the French population, which is expected to rise and join hands with the Anglo-American army of liberation." What a pleasant fantasy to weave about the appointment of a man whose knowledge of the forces of resistance in France was gained as envoy to a government devoted assiduously to the stamping out of resistance, a man who supported Pétain and, even after the accession to power of Laval, argued against a break with Vichy! How is such a man to advise the President on the political forces which must join with the military for an offensive action in the West? Will he even support an invasion of France? To do so would be to acknowledge the failure of the policy he advised and helped to carry out. Never has Admiral Leahy shown any sign of that profound political comprehension which is an absolute necessity in plotting major strategy in Europe today.

What the President needs to fortify him in his overwhelming task as Commander-in-Chief is a staff which will combine the best military and naval brains of the services with political astuteness and an intimate understanding of the forces at work in the Europe of today and tomorrow. And the political members of such a united high command must not be afraid of the word revolution.

But if the appointment of Leahy created doubts, Hull's speech multiplied them. What good words can one find to describe the vast, dull reaches of this endless address? Noble, perhaps, or well-intentioned. It was general to the point of evaporation. Delivered at a moment when the people of the world crave firmness and clear-cut direction, its soft, hazy contours offered no substance, nothing to grasp, certainly nothing to fight for. Instead of carefully combing the speech for quotable excerpts, Goebbels could have issued it in full as a classic example of democratic vagueness.

Above all, the speech was full of obvious inner contradictions. In one breath the Secretary of State urged the solemn truth that "liberty is truly won only when it is guarded with the same watchfulness, the same courage, the same willingness to fight for it which first secured it." And he drew the obvious conclusion that nations which have forgotten this have "been surprised and unprepared" when the inevitable attack came. But then, several breaths farther along, with equal solemnity he patted the United States on the back—for what? For preparing to fight for our threatened liberties? For defending those nations which had been made the victims of unprovoked aggression? Not at all. Such was not the policy pursued by Mr. Hull's department. "From the time when the first signs of menace to the peace of the world appeared on the horizon," said Mr. Hull, "the government of the United States strove unceasingly to promote peace on the solid foundation of law, justice, non-intervention [remember Spain?], non-aggression, and international collaboration." But war came anyhow. And as soon as hostilities broke out, "our government made every honorable and feasible effort to prevent spread of the conflicts and to safeguard this country against being drawn into war." But war came to America, too, and also took it by surprise. Was our effort to keep out more realistic than that of other countries? Was this the example Mr. Hull wants to hold up to the desperate peoples of Europe, whom he invites so warmly to rebellion?

Fortunately, the strength and political wisdom of the nation are not to be measured by these words or by the capacity of Mr. Hull or Admiral Leahy. It is clear that the President himself realizes fully the significance of the Russia retreat. More and more evidence accumulates to indicate that a second front is probable, and may be opened within a few weeks. The desirability of such a move has been evident since long before the German offensive began, but only recently have high officials indicated that enough ships and equipment could be mustered to make it possible. But if a second front is actually in the making, all the more is it important that the President surround himself with a staff fully capable of waging a war which to succeed must at the same time be a political revolution.

A People's War— or Monopoly's?

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, July 26

IT IS painful to hear the slogan of a people's war raised by Cox of Georgia. "This bill"—for a Farm Rubber Agency—Cox told the House on Friday, "is in response to public demand for a broadening of the synthetic-rubber program. This is still a people's government, fighting a people's war." Those who have been watching the rubber program know that the first sentence in Cox's statement is literally true, though there is more wish than fulfilment in the second. Nowhere is the difference between a democratic and a monopolistic effort more clearly displayed than in the handling of rubber, and the President's decision to sign or veto the bill will reflect (1) his own comprehension of what a people's war really means and (2) the extent to which a people's war is possible in a monopoly-dominated America.

The bill was written by the five members of a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry—Senators Gillette, Norris, McNary, Wheeler, and Elmer Thomas. It represents the fruit of the investigation this subcommittee has been making since March 20 to discover how the war program can use farm products. Though it had only $5,000 to spend and has spent less than $2,000, and though its energetic counsel, Paul E. Hadlick, has had a staff consisting of one girl typist, it has taught us more about the problem of rubber and other synthetics than any other committee here. The bill written by this committee would set up a separate agency to arrange for the production of synthetic rubber from farm and forest products. And its purpose in establishing a separate agency, in the words of Senator Norris, is to see that the program is "carried out by men who are friends of it, and not those who have thrown cold water on it always in the past."

The truth is that our failure adequately to utilize all our sources of rubber does not differ fundamentally from our failure to achieve a total effort in steel, copper, aluminum, or magnesium. The difference is that opposition to the mishandling in those fields has come from labor unions, scattered small business men, and some independent engineers. In the case of rubber, the oil-rubber-chemical-alcohol combine has come up against a large and powerful segment of the property-owning classes themselves—the farmers. In that sense rubber from farm alcohol is, indeed, what the New York Herald Tribune recently called it, "political rubber." But what that organ intended as a sneer may be taken as an accolade, for here the processes of political democracy are at work to give us the rubber we need by the shortest, best, and cheapest route. If rubber from farm alcohol is "political rubber," then most of the rubber on order today in the $650,000,000 WPB-RFC program is "monopoly rubber," "Standard Oil rubber."

Few people yet realize that rubber from petroleum has never been manufactured on a commercial scale anywhere in the world, that the German Buna process which I. G. Farben never fully revealed to its subservient cartel partner, Standard Oil, is not a process for making rubber from oil. It is a process for making rubber from coal. The only process for making synthetic rubber which has been successfully used is the process for making it from grain alcohol, as the Russians are still doing and as the Poles did before their defeat. It was a shortage of grain, even more than a shortage of petroleum, which led the Germans to seek their rubber from coal gases. Standard Oil and its satellites and allies are now engaged in the difficult task of applying what they know of that German process to petroleum gases—the same gases we need for our aviation-gasoline program.

Ignorance, insincerity, and duplicity—it will be some time before we know the exact proportions of each—have mingled in the making of the present program. Although rubber from alcohol is an old story to chemists, the WPB was blanketed in official ignorance of its very existence until a few months ago when the Gillette subcommittee began its work. Under pressure from that committee it has now been decided to make 200,000 tons of our 800,000-ton program from alcohol, but the entire quota has been assigned to Union Carbide and Carbon, an ally of Standard Oil and part of the inner chemical ring. Union Carbide makes synthetic, not grain, alcohol and turns it into rubber by a variant of the oldest Russian method, a complicated four-step process long since improved in the Soviet Union. Today there are processes available in laboratories run by the Department of Agriculture and state colleges in Nebraska and Iowa which can produce butadiene—the raw material of Buna-type rubber—much more quickly and efficiently. The inventor of the Polish process is operating a pilot plant for a one-step process at the Publicker Alcohol Plant in Philadelphia, and the newer butylene-glycol process—an American discovery—skips the alcohol stage entirely.

Far more than rubber is involved in this struggle. The surpluses from our farms, the sulphite waste that flows from our pulp mills, the very husks of corn and hulls of oats contain countless wonders to which organic chemistry already holds the key. The alcohol, glycol, and furfural which chemists can derive from them are the materials from which we can draw fuels to replace our limited supplies of petroleum, plastics to replace our metals, and synthetics better than natural rubber. Here lies the solution of farm surpluses and the farm problem, but here also lies the death of the oil, rubber, chemical, and alcohol trusts. That's what all the shootin's for.

The Battle of Oil

BY HAROLD L. ICKES

SO FAR as my information goes, this war has not been officially christened. The last report was that the search was on for a name that would at the same time identify the war and forever remind us that it must never be permitted to happen again. The person who submits the suggestion that is generally accepted may get his name in the newspapers or even in the history books.

One thing that we do know is that several wars within the war are raging daily and that these "second fronts" are already pretty well named for posterity. There are the Battle of Production, the Battle of Rubber, the Battle of Oil, and many others.

Yes, the Battle of Oil, with which I am principally familiar, is a war within the war, and it is one of major importance. The Battle of Production is being won, but the Battle of Oil, as well as the Battle of Rubber, is still in the fluid stage, with pincer movements and attempted encirclements of daily occurrence. As this is written, the Nazis are pushing on toward the Caucasus oil fields; should they reach them and put them to work, Russia's mechanized strength would be crippled and the Nazis' own prospects greatly improved. It would be a telling blow to all the United Nations.

In our own case, the fight is of another but nevertheless a desperate sort. With us it has not been a question of supply. We still lead the world in production, although the rest of the world has much more oil in reserve than we have. This I have tried by every conceivable means to make clear. With us the question is how to get petroleum products from where they are to where they are needed. When I was appointed Petroleum Coordinator toward the end of May, 1941, the situation had become serious, chiefly by reason of the necessary diversion of oil tankers to Britain.

The first effects of these diversions were felt in our reserve centers. The direct effect on the individual, perhaps unfortunately for the country, was not immediately noticeable. The daily supply of petroleum was apparently as plentiful as ever. I can understand, therefore, why the average motorist refused to let himself get excited when he was told that a shortage was just around the pump, all set to stick its tongue out at him if he didn't economize in his driving. But I shall never be able to understand, nor shall I be quick to forgive, the newspapers that told the motorist to travel as usual, on the wholly untenable ground that our petroleum supplies were the most plentiful in the world, and without end. This never has been true of our reserves, though we have made more oil available to consumers than the rest of the world.

Had we been given the cooperation then that we are getting now—although even now there are mole-like exceptions—the oil crisis of today might have been deferred, and in the interlude we might have been spared the inconvenience and annoyance of rationing. Also the contribution to victory would have been worth while.

The danger of exhausting our reserve supplies in above-ground storage was what practical oil men foresaw first, and acting upon their expert advice, the Office of the Petroleum Coordinator tried valiantly, though in vain, to lessen consumption. We couldn't, with prudence, permit this above-ground storage to get too low, and it was clear that only by using less could we prevent an over-drain upon our storage tanks. With daily movements from the oil fields seriously interfered with by reduced shipments over the water routes, it became necessary to make up the difference out of the reserves if the daily demand of individuals was to be satisfied. But if reserves are drawn down day after day and week after week, there will come a time when there won't be any reserves, and then, with a scarcity of transportation, will come confusion and a serious curtailment that, like rain, will fall upon just and unjust users alike.

Meanwhile reserves in the Atlantic States kept falling lower and lower. From a high of 82,000,000 barrels on December 1 they fell to a low of 46,488,000 barrels on April 11. Since then we have not given out the figures for military reasons, but citizens may rest assured that the situation did not suddenly and drastically improve. Some relief was felt when railroad tank-car movements increased and a few of the borrowed tankers were returned to us by England, whereupon the newspapers, with the motorists echoing them, labeled it "Ickes's phony oil shortage" and filed the whole thing away under "finished business." But the relief was purely ephemeral. Individuals continued to burn as much as they ever did, although less regular gasoline was being produced in order that we might produce more aviation and industrial fuels. The problem of how to transport enough heating oil to keep everybody warm next winter then began to show its ugly head. On top of all else, it was clearly demonstrated by the continued decline in reserves that the railroads' boasted best was not nearly good enough. Then, and not until then, was belated but nevertheless welcome consideration given to additional pipeline transportation.

The Ickes pipe dream, better known to the trade as the "Ickes pipe line," has begun to come true. The first of the new lines now under record-speed construction between Texas and Illinois will be opened for business, we hope, some time within the next four months, and when the flow starts it should alleviate, although it will not overcome, the scarcity of heating oil in the Atlantic States. In addition, old lines are being relaid to carry more oil east. I have just seen the first of the new giant tubes "come off the line" at Lorain, Ohio.

The inevitable rationing was sneaking up on the people while they stubbornly refused to envisage the danger, and for their obscurantism I hold the newspapers almost entirely responsible. They may disclaim it loudly or hide in the tombs of silence, but the fact is clear that the shortage was intensified and accelerated by the editors who refused to apply their reasoning powers to a problem that their eyes couldn't actually see. "Intellectuals" all!

I wish that I might feel sure that, with continued and increased railroad tank-car shipments, which have pretty nearly reached their capacity, with an increased movement of oil by means of new and relaid pipe lines, with added barges, we could overcome fully the loss of tankers resulting from diversions and submarine sinkings. I do not consider it wise to count upon tanker transportation of petroleum to our East Coast states. We are hoping that this may be resumed, but we can't be sure, and so we do not add to our figures what might possibly accrue to our supplies from this source.

Washington officials have been freely and, I may say, often unfairly set upon for the manner in which gasoline rationing was imposed in the first instance. I do not offer it as an excuse, but it should be obvious to any fair-minded person that the job of distributing millions of barrels of petroleum products to 33,000,000 motorists, not to mention millions of truck owners, of meeting the demands of the government in the prosecution of the war, and at the same time of keeping our home fires burning is no mean one. Moreover, it was not a job for which we had ever had a precedent or previous training. Add to all this the outcropping of abuse by newspapers, some of which I sometimes think would not be overwhelmed by a complete breakdown of our war effort, and the resulting situation was by no stretch of the imagination a simple one. A serious rubber shortage has made the gasoline situation still more complex.

For all its many troublesome angles, the problem will be well on the way to a satisfactory resolution just as soon as the car owners of the nation get down to the job of beating it, and the car owners will get down to this job just as soon as they realize the full extent of their responsibility. At this juncture, the newspapers have their chance to make amends for their lack of foresight and their bullyragging tactics of a year ago.

Who Is the State Department?

II. THE OLD WELLES AND THE NEW

BY ROBERT BENDINER

TO CRITICS of the snobbish caste traditions of the State Department, Sumner Welles seems to offer a perfect target. In temperament, which is austere and formal, if not downright chilling; in background, which is wealthy and aristocratic; in sartorial appearance, which is fastidious and soberly elegant; and in political philosophy as well, he is at opposite poles from his chief. The feuding Tennessee frontier of Hull's boyhood is replaced by the stuffy affluence of the home of a successful financier in the New York of the nineties; a financier of lineage as well as wealth, a member of that same New York aristocracy that produced the Roosevelts. The Welleses and the Roosevelts, in fact, crossed paths long before Franklin D. appointed Sumner to his Little Cabinet. Eleanor Roosevelt and Sumner Welles shared the same godmother, and as a boy of thirteen Welles served as a page at the future President's wedding. The tie assumes some importance, by no means decisive, in explaining the President's loyalty to the subordinate who has borne the brunt of the criticism directed against the State Department.

Groton and Harvard were inevitable for young Welles. He appears to have gone through school with characteristic sobriety and aloofness. A snob perhaps but never a playboy, Welles seems always to have been mature beyond his years. He determined while at school to prepare for the Foreign Service, worked hard at languages and economics, and, with the best of connections, found no difficulty in being admitted. From the start he was convinced that Latin America would be supremely important in the years to come, and while other budding diplomats asked, futilely enough, to be sent to Paris or to London, he requested a South American capital for his first assignment. The department sent him to Tokyo instead, where he worked up a thoroughgoing dislike for the Japanese, but after two years it relented and shifted him to Buenos Aires. In 1920 he was brought back to Washington to serve as assistant chief of the Division of Latin American Affairs, and a year later, despite the political change in administration, he became at twenty-eight the youngest division chief in the history of the department. His interest has been fixed on Latin America ever since.

As a prodigiously hard-working chief of staff, eager to assume the powers so readily relinquished by Hull, Welles has been the guiding spirit of the department. He sees the President even more frequently than the Secretary does, and diplomats, valuing his acute and precise comments, prefer discussions with him to those with his vaguer and somewhat rambling superior. Welles is thus accountable for much of the department's record, even though his chief interest has been Latin America.

In general he has taken a more realistic attitude toward the Axis than has Hull. He is credited with having stiffened Ambassador Grew's hand in Tokyo on more than one occasion, and his comparatively friendly attitude toward the Soviet Union over a long period of time stemmed from a desire to checkmate the Japanese. He favored Russian recognition from the start, was convinced that the Soviet-German pact would prove to be of short duration, and did his best to warn the Russian ambassador in Washington of impending Nazi treachery. On the other hand, he shares responsibility with Hull for the fatuousness of the Vichy policy, and despite his reputed personal inclinations, he sided with the embargo forces in the Spanish war—largely with an eye on the pro-Franco dictators of Latin America, whose friendship he so earnestly courted as a Good Neighbor.

Like Hull, Welles has never showed the slightest sympathy for fascism—except the Brazilian variety—and in his icy way he has been at even less pains to conceal his scorn and contempt. If Hans Thomsen of the German Embassy had gone to Hull with his protest when Secretary Ickes excoriated the Führer he would merely have been told, as often before, that the United States is a democracy and its citizens enjoy the right of free speech; he went instead to Welles, who chilled him to the bone with the brusque information that the Ickes speech accurately reflected the views of the American people and their government.

Nevertheless, it was not until the speech he delivered at Arlington on May 30, 1942, that Welles presented himself as a champion of democracy. His opposition to the Axis had always had a quality of nationalism about it. Like Churchill he appeared to be an intelligent Tory, aware that fascism represented a menace to a society which he found good and which he had no desire to modify in any way. In a limited sense Welles's nationalism, whatever its social implications, was a better antidote to appeasement tendencies than the liberal but curiously archaic type of internationalism represented by Cordell Hull; just as Churchill's imperial instincts were a better safeguard for England in the teeth of the fascist gale than the vapid pacifism of the Lansburys or the trading instincts of the Chamberlains. But Churchill would not have turned the tide of the war on the basis of an aristocratic nationalism, and neither can America fight a people's war purely on the basis of national self-interest. There are bigger issues at stake.

At Arlington Welles demonstrated his awareness of this major truth. Only six weeks before, he had told the Vichy Ambassador that "the government of the United States fervently hopes that it may see the reestablishment of the independence of France and of the integrity of French territory" and that it recognized the sovereign jurisdiction of the people of France over their territory and possessions. The pronouncement, reasonably enough, was taken as an indication that the government, or at least the State Department, favored a restoration of the pre-war colonial system. In the Arlington speech Welles spoke in a different vein. "If this war," he said, "is in fact a war for the liberation of peoples, it must assure the sovereign equality of peoples throughout the world, as well as in the world of the Americas. Our victory must bring in its train the liberation of all peoples. . . . The age of imperialism is ended. The right of a people to their freedom must be recognized." Moreover, he warned, "the selfishness of small groups" would not be allowed to block the "new frontier of human welfare."

These are words, however brave and timely, and words are the commonest coin of diplomacy. It is not unreasonable, therefore, to judge them against earlier words and the actions that flowed out of them.

Welles's first years in the department were marked by swift success and gradual development. Throughout Harding's Administration and part of Coolidge's, he carried out a number of delicate missions in Central America, working in close collaboration with Secretary of State Hughes, who has always been something of a hero to him, but slowly he grew more skeptical of the old-line Republican techniques of dollar diplomacy. As high commissioner to the Dominican Republic from 1922 to 1925, he successfully pressed Hughes for the withdrawal of the marines, the first step in clearing the Caribbean of American soldiery. Friction with President Coolidge brought about his retirement in 1925, and except for a brief mission to the Dominican Republic in 1929 he remained out of public life until the election of Roosevelt.

The period of retirement was extremely important to the Welles career. He had spent ten years in the service and developed some marked ideas on what the future course of policy toward Latin America should be. The ideas took the ponderous form of a two-volume work called "Naboth's Vineyard," a history of Santo Domingo, and they represented a drastic change from the concepts that Welles had put forth in the early days of his service. In 1924 he had written an article for the Atlantic Monthly in which he belittled the extent of dollar diplomacy and, at a time when Washington interference in the Caribbean was at a peak, compared Latin American critics of the United States "to those groups in our own country who promote racial or religious antagonism for their own ends." Conceding that "mistakes undoubtedly have been committed," he maintained that "our record in general has been one with which every American citizen may well be content." And in recommending the policy to be followed he wrote that the United States must be "ready to assume the responsibility of offering its friendly mediations or, in extreme cases, its friendly intervention [author's italics], should conditions be such as to threaten a national or international conflagration" endangering "the policy of self-protection of the United States known as the Monroe Doctrine."

From this brave shouldering of the white man's burden to the thesis of "Naboth's Vineyard" is a far cry. The conclusion of that standard work on the Dominican Republic is a full statement of what Welles himself was one day to christen the Good Neighbor policy. A few excerpts will convey the flavor of the new doctrine:

It was in the following Taft Administration, under the guidance of Secretary Knox, that there first became noted that pernicious phase of the Latin American policy of the United States which consisted in the attempt to intervene in the affairs of the Caribbean republics in order to force upon the inhabitants of those countries governments considered by the Department of State in Washington suited to their requirements, regardless of whether or not the people of the nations concerned had a real voice in their selection. . . .

It was inevitable under such conditions that any government in one of those republics which favored American commercial expansion must necessarily become identified in the eyes of the Department of State with a government suitable and proper for the people of that republic. . . .

Until the moment arrives when the average American appreciates the fact that friendly cooperation and intercourse, both political and commercial, with the other American republics constitutes the future safeguard and the fundamental advantage of the United States, . . . no healthy established continental policy will ever be maintained, and the United States will continue to remain alienated from the other republics of the hemisphere.

Nor was the Welles of "Naboth's Vineyard" hazy as to the outlines of a "healthy established continental policy." It is only in the "stimulation of commercial ties, in the facilitation of educational advantages to students from the southern republics, in the limitation of financing to productive purposes, in the proffer of technical and expert assistance when it may be needed," he wrote, "that the United States will obtain the results desired, and not through military occupation, military intervention, or armed supervision of elections."

What are the "results desired"? Hostile critics insist that the Welles policy is imperialism in disguise, that it aims at control over the other countries of the hemisphere by means less brutal and more effective than crude interventionism. On the evidence of the book itself this interpretation seems unduly harsh and suspicious. In the light of Welles's subsequent record, caution, at least, would appear to be warranted.

Throughout the Hoover Administration Welles remained in obscurity, awaiting the opportunity to put his new thesis to the test. In the interval he was divorced from his first wife and married Mathilde Townsend, an extremely wealthy Marylander, formerly the wife of Senator Gerry of Rhode Island. With the Townsend fortune came a great mansion on Massachusetts Avenue and Oxon Hill Manor, a magnificent 220-acre country estate in Maryland.

The opportunity came with the nomination of Franklin D. Roosevelt. At the convention of 1932 Welles, now become a full-fledged Democrat, had a major hand in shaping the planks on foreign affairs, and he worked for the nomination of his old friend. After the victory at Chicago he contributed generously to the Roosevelt campaign fund, and in March of the following year he reaped his reward in the form of an assistant secretaryship in the State Department.

Within a month Welles made his first essay as a Good Neighbor. Even by his own standards it was a dismal failure, and though it accomplished one laudable purpose it doused whatever Latin American hopes had been generated by the Good Neighbor promises written into the President's inaugural by Welles himself. The scene of the experiment was Cuba, and the purpose of the mission—Welles was almost immediately converted into an ambassador—was to bring order out of the chaos produced by Machado, a dictator whose corruption had brought Cuba to the brink of revolution and had, more than incidentally, endangered American interests on the island. Welles was to mediate between Machado and the leaders of the opposition, obtain certain urgent reforms, and thus avert bloodshed and the possibilities of revolutionary change. Mediation with Machado was a sham from the start, and Welles soon found himself laying down terms which no dictator could accept. To forestall more drastic developments Welles selected the weak Carlos Manuel de Cespedes as the next President of Cuba and proceeded to undermine the Machado regime by the time-worn methods of imperialist pressure. It was all sanctioned by the Platt Amendment, a section of the Cuban constitution which gave the United States the privilege of intervening in Cuban affairs for the protection of "life, property, and individual liberty."

Sumner Welles

Welles had at first enjoyed the support of the opposition groups, and his efforts at mediating their differences with the dictatorship were heartily indorsed. But with the installation of Cespedes, the applause came from a different quarter. Cespedes gave promise of combining Machado politics with a greater degree of sensitivity to American interests, and Welles found himself lauded by Cuban representatives of the United Fruit Company, by American utilities executives in Havana, and by the American Chamber of Commerce in Cuba. But popular feeling turned sharply against him. If there was no doubt that the Cuban people wanted to get rid of Machado, there was every doubt that they wanted Cespedes. Welles was adamant and backed his man in the face of a rising movement headed by the liberal Grau San Martín. The movement proved stronger than Welles, and within two weeks, before Welles could even receive the promised Grand Cross of the Order of Carlos, Cespedes fell. The Cuban revolution rolled on.

What followed cannot be squared with a Good Neighbor policy of any description. At Welles's insistence recognition was denied the Grau San Martín government, credits were held up, American warships steamed south, and despite the break in relations Welles stayed on, converting the American Embassy into a center of intrigue against the regime. It was futile for Grau to ask Roosevelt for the envoy's recall, because the President, backing Welles, refused to recognize Grau's existence. The result was that widespread demonstrations broke out in Havana. Mobs shouted "Down with Sumner Welles," "Down with Yankee imperialism." The creator of the Good Neighbor policy, hooted in the streets of Havana and hanged in effigy, finally withdrew, but his continued pressure, exercised from afar, finally brought about the downfall of the Grau government.

It was a wretched experience, and Welles's supporters insist that he himself now believes he was wrong, though he is too proud to acknowledge it. The one good outcome of the affair was the abrogation of the Platt Amendment, which Welles brought about in the spring of 1934. In long-range terms this move was ample recompense to the Cubans. Extinguishing the last pretense to the legality of intervention in Latin American affairs, it enabled Welles successfully to live down the woeful start he had made in promoting the Good Neighbor doctrine.

Since the disastrous Cuban episode Welles has made non-interference the keystone of his policy, and in the case of Brazil at least it is not unfair to suggest that he has leaned over backward. When Vargas established his totalitarian regime in Rio de Janeiro, it would have been one thing for Welles to explain to the country that the Washington government was no longer engaged in the business of setting up and knocking down the governments of less powerful sovereign states. He might even have strengthened his case by admitting he had been wrong in the Cuban affair and avowing his intention to steer clear of such practices in the future. But surely there was no need to indorse a regime just then engaged in conducting a reign of terror that would have done Mussolini proud in the heyday of his glory. Sumner Welles, by now Under Secretary, did just that.

Only a few weeks ago there took place in one of the greatest republics of the world, the United States of Brazil [he announced at the height of the terror], a change in the governmental structure of that nation. . . . We too often forget here in the United States that, with the exception of our neighbor Canada, the other great independent nations of the New World spring from a heritage which is different from ours, have inherited certain concepts of government and of law which are divergent from ours, are the product of a civilization distinct from, although quite as advanced and quite as admirable as, the Anglo-Saxon civilization from which we ourselves derive—and very naturally by consequence employ in the solution of their national problems methods which at times are distinct from those which we ourselves employ in striving toward objectives which may in turn be quite the same as theirs.

Welles's relations with the Vargas regime, taken together with the Cuban affair, reveal him as an international politician rather than a homey Good Neighbor, as a tactician, sometimes shrewd and sometimes not so shrewd, rather than a political philosopher. It is hard to down the suspicion that his current emphasis on "the frontier of human welfare" stems at least in part from the pressures of the war and the competition of rival government agencies.

The record is mixed, and Sumner Welles himself remains something of an enigma. Clearly he is not the simple moneyed snob that his critics see in him, but neither is it to be wondered at if his Arlington speech puzzled a country that had never before seen in him the sympathetic understanding, the human warmth, and the militant spirit needed to inform a people's war and inspire a people's peace.

["The Assistant Secretariat"—A. A. Berle, Breckinridge Long, Dean Acheson, and G. Howland Shaw—is the subject of the third article of this series, to appear next week.]

Rebuilding the Danube Basin

BY ANTONIN BASCH

[Perhaps the most critical economic and political problems of the post-war period will find their focus in the reconstruction of Central and Southeastern Europe. A discussion of some of those problems by Milan Hodza, conservative agrarian leader and former Premier of Czecho-Slovakia, appeared in The Nation of May 16. A strongly contrasting view is presented in the following article by a leading Czech economist. Still another analysis, more strictly political, by Rustem Vambery, Hungarian democratic leader, will appear in an early issue.]

TWO problems must be kept in mind in discussing the economic reconstruction of Central and Southeastern Europe. Along with the vast task of immediate post-war relief it will be necessary to grapple with the even more important duty of developing a long-range political and economic program for the consolidation and development of this area, which contains more than one-third of the territory and one-fourth of the population of Europe (excluding Russia). Eight countries are in this region, of which the River Danube forms the spinal column—Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Austria, Hungary, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Greece, most of them states which by Western standards must be accounted economically backward. There can be no hope of a stable and peaceful Europe so long as this area remains in the depressed condition which, before the war, enabled Germany to achieve there an economic hegemony which has proved one of the main buttresses of Nazi aggression. Purely political machinery will not provide the necessary strength unless it is backed by a powerful and balanced economy, for as the present struggle has amply proved, military power must rest upon an industrial basis.

The comparatively primitive economy of the greater part of Central and Southeastern Europe does not stem from a lack of natural resources. On the contrary, this area has been better endowed by nature than either Western Europe or Central Europe proper. As a whole it grows a surplus of food, and its agricultural production can reasonably be expected to increase when its farming methods are brought to the level of efficiency prevailing in other parts of the Continent. This region also produces a large surplus of timber, hemp, and flax and some supplies of wool and silk. It is plentifully supplied with minerals, in 1937 producing 26 per cent of the world's bauxite, 45 per cent of the magnesite, 24.7 per cent of the chrome ore (if Turkey is included), 9.8 per cent of the antimony, 7.6 per cent of the zinc ore, 6.7 per cent of the lead ore, 1.7 per cent of the copper ore, 5 per cent of the pyrites, 4.3 per cent of the coal, 2.6 per cent of the mineral oil, and 1.5 per cent of the iron ore. But the whole area in this year had only a 6 per cent share in total world trade.

Although Central and Southeastern Europe achieved progress in some lines after the last war, the region's economic structure remained notoriously unbalanced. No part of Europe was more seriously affected by the world-wide depression after 1929. The crisis followed a vast influx of direct and indirect foreign credits which had created an illusion of prosperity but had done little to correct the basic instability of the regional economy. Before any constructive program for the future can be formulated, the causes of this structural weakness must be discovered.

Was the depression that racked Southeastern Europe during the thirties due to lack of cooperation between the several states or was it merely a part of an unstable world situation? After 1918 this whole area faced the necessity of two major adjustments—to the radical changes in political boundary lines and systems which followed the collapse of the Hapsburg Empire and to the simultaneous major new developments in world economy. But these adjustments were delayed, and little had been done by 1930 to absorb the shock of the international financial crisis. An underdeveloped and poorly organized agriculture, the economic mainstay of the region and the chief source of exports, could not withstand the impact of world-wide surpluses of farm products. At the same time the practical cessation of overseas emigration closed an important outlet for the overpopulated villages. The isolation of Russia from the currents of foreign trade was another unfavorable influence, and the rise of Nazism, in addition to exercising an adverse political influence on many of these states, imposed on countries that were closely linked to Germany economically and trying to find markets for their agricultural surpluses the necessity of remolding their production to conform with the demands of an autarchic war economy.

Such adverse external factors are not to be ignored, but part of the responsibility for the difficulties of the different countries must be assigned to their economic and political nationalism. Particularly after 1931 this took the form of direct administrative protection, promoting new emphasis on agriculture in some parts, in others over-hasty industrialization. But we must not forget that during this period the big and wealthy creditor countries were also pursuing a policy of intensified protection. It was up to these countries to make the pattern for the world's trade policy, and it could not be expected that small and undeveloped debtor nations would take the initiative in the opposite direction. Even a customs union among the states of Central and South-eastern Europe could not have provided a real solution of the crisis; it could only have mitigated its effects.

The fall in prices of farm commodities for which the agricultural states had to find markets in competition with cheaper overseas production was the real problem. In turn the agricultural crisis directly affected Czecho-Slovakian and Austrian industry, which were dependent on consumers in the rural areas. The solution of the problem seemed to be not merely the opening of foreign markets but some kind of preferential treatment, since competition with exports from overseas was impossible without a major readjustment of the cost structure of the region's agriculture. This was the chief aim of the agrarian bloc of Central Europe created in 1932. At the conference at Stresa in the same year this bloc attempted to persuade the importing countries of Western Europe to grant tariff preferences to the agricultural surpluses of the countries in the Danubian basin, but it failed. Then Nazi Germany entered the picture and by using new and deceitful methods of economic penetration was able to force upon these countries, one by one, the adoption of economic policies designed solely to serve the German war machine. The agrarian bloc was not strong enough to form a united front for dealing with Germany.

Now that Hitler has a firm military grip on this whole region, we may assume that new measures of exploitation have been adopted regardless of the maladjustments that may result. We know that the production of various raw materials for which there is a desperate need in Germany is being pushed regardless of cost, while at the same time industries adapted to the needs of local consumers are being either shut down or shifted to the manufacture of war goods. Thus the lack of balance between agriculture and industry within the region is becoming still more pronounced.

After the war, even if the countries of Central and Southeastern Europe can be drawn into a single economic unit, it is not to be supposed that they will be able to solve the problems of reconstruction in isolation. A solution will have to be sought within a framework of total European reconstruction and through reintegration with the world economy. Success will depend on a revival of the international division of production and the promotion of a universal economy of expansion.

One factor not to be neglected is that this part of Europe is not socially and economically homogeneous. Before the war, Czecho-Slovakia, Austria, and western Poland had achieved an economic development comparable to that of Western Europe, and up to 1938 Germany had not succeeded in expanding its economic influence over these countries. Czecho-Slovakia, by virtue of its well-balanced industrial-agricultural structure and the importance of its foreign trade, could be classed with Sweden, Switzerland, or Belgium. Out of the total population gainfully occupied, agriculture accounted for 34.2 per cent in Czecho-Slovakia and 32 per cent in Austria, which compared with 28.9 per cent in Germany. In contrast, we find 53 per cent in agriculture in Hungary, 54 per cent in Greece, 76 per cent in Poland, 75 per cent in Yugoslavia, 78 per cent in Rumania, and 81 per cent in Bulgaria. And with this concentration on the land went low crop yields and high birth rates, leading to land hunger and overcrowding.

This is one of the biggest problems for which a solution must be found. Mass emigration is no answer, nor is intensification of agriculture an adequate one, though this is one of the goals to be sought. A shift in the crop structure will be necessary, with a view to taking advantage of new scientific trends toward the use of farm products as industrial raw materials. Merely to multiply the output of wheat and other cereals, even at lower cost, would do little to improve the peasants' standard of living. A prerequisite for improved farming is a great development in popular education. Scandinavian countries have shown what progress can be achieved, even under unfavorable conditions of soil and climate, by a rural population trained to scientific methods. Moreover, only among an enlightened peasantry can there be much hope of the kind of cooperative organization which has today become almost essential to a prosperous agriculture. But social reforms of this character must take root with painful slowness unless there is a high degree of international cooperation.

The development of a modern agricultural economy will not by itself relax the pressure of population on the land. Industry also must be built up on a large scale if the problems of Central and Southeastern Europe are to be solved. This does not mean the indiscriminate creation and protection of industries. On the other hand, the argument that production costs are higher than abroad cannot be accepted as a final barrier to industrial development. Even with a lower output per worker than in more advanced countries, the productivity of labor, taking the economy as a whole, will be raised in comparison with the very limited productivity resulting from existing agricultural methods. This will justify a certain degree of tariff protection for new industries, and for a limited period of readjustment Western Europe may reasonably be asked to give preferences to the farm exports of the Danubian lands.

Because of the present low density of railroads, highways, and utilities in this region any program of intensive economic development will call for huge investments in public works. Here again is an opportunity for international planning which will bring together the surplus savings of the advanced industrial states and the capital needs of backward countries.

After the war we may expect that the foreign trade of Central and Southeastern Europe will increase in volume while changing in structure. There will be smaller imports of consumer goods but larger imports of overseas raw materials, of high-quality industrial products—especially capital goods—and of colonial products; and while there will be less mass export of agricultural products, there will be larger exports of specialized crops, semi-finished goods, and raw materials. Bilateral trade—exploited by the Nazis—will be replaced by multilateral trade, and the expansion of inter-Danubian commerce as the result of diversified production will strengthen the position of the industrial countries in this area. The danger of economic dependence on one country, such as Germany, will be substantially reduced.

Assuming general agreement on basic economic policies at the peace conference, what are the essentials of a program for the economic reconstruction of the depressed area with which we are now concerned? It would be wise to insert in the peace treaties some provisions forbidding any return to pre-war economic nationalism, for without close cooperation there can be no hope of peaceful prosperity. With this principle established, it is then possible to consider what form of political organization will best meet the economic requirements of the region. The several constituent countries are not economically complementary to an extent which would make this a persuasive argument for their integration in one political unit. Moreover, such a transformation would require a much greater similarity in social structure and political ideology than actually exists. We dare not overlook incongruities which would contribute to the degeneration of an outwardly strong political entity.

It will be more appropriate, then, to begin by forming two or three federations, linked together for specific economic purposes in such a way as to make possible a gradual enlargement of the sphere of collaboration. One such unit might include Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Austria, and Hungary*—and possibly even Rumania—because in spite of many differences there are important similarities in the economic structure of these countries. Another unit could comprise the Balkan countries, which face common problems of population and agriculture. In private enterprise maximum efficiency is often attained by the medium-sized rather than the giant concern. A similar principle applies also to the organization of nations, especially in a system of planned economy with expanding government interference. For in an unwieldy economic unit government planners are likely to overlook their long-range functions in favor of bureaucratic interference in the daily life of business. Moreover, the greater flexibility of medium-sized units makes possible adjustment to changing conditions.

* Needless to say, Hungary would first have to undergo a profound change from feudalism to political and economic democracy.

What must be found, then, is a political form, backed by popular consent in the nations concerned, that will bring real progress to this part of Europe. The freedom, prosperity, and security of these countries, together with the promotion of democracy among them, demand a general improvement in their standard of living and closer ties with the main stream of world economy. Unless these things can be achieved, no political organization of a permanent nature will be possible.

Invasion via Norway

BY GUNNAR LEISTIKOW

TALK in London about a possible invasion of the European continent "on a limited scale" is making the Swedes extremely uneasy. Nowhere is there any real prospect of this kind of limited second front except in northern Norway. But an attack there, the Swedes fear, would be likely to put an end to their cherished neutrality and pitch them into the war. Surrounded by the Germans on all sides, with United Nations submarines disrupting their iron-ore trade across the Baltic, and with mysterious, probably Nazi, planes dropping Russian bombs near King Gustav's summer residence, they are distinctly between the devil and the deep blue sea. Should the Allies choose to secure the route to Murmansk by smashing the bases from which the enemy now launches his attacks on Russian-bound convoys, the neutral position of Sweden would in all probability become untenable.

Behind the nervousness of the Swedes is the military fact that northern Norway cannot be effectively defended by the Germans from southern Norway but only from northern Sweden. The three Norwegian counties north of Trondheim—Nordland, Troms, and Finmark—are almost completely isolated from the rest of Norway. There is no connecting railroad, and the only highway is the solitary road built by the Germans during the occupation. The district, however, is easily accessible from Sweden. Narvik, the biggest city in northern Norway, is the terminal of a Swedish railroad which connects the Norwegian port not only with the famous iron mines near Kiruna but also with Gällivara, from which two major railroads run south to Stockholm.

The British navy showed in June, 1940, that Narvik can be reduced from the sea. The task would probably be much harder now, but it seems unlikely that the Nazis have been able to make the port impregnable to attack by a resolute and daring invader. If Narvik falls, the rest of northern Norway will be practically cut off. The only line of communications for the Germans, unless they go through Sweden, would be the circuitous and difficult road through Finland to Petsamo. It is clear, then, that if Germany chooses to defend northern Norway it will have to make use of the Swedish railroad. That is why Sweden fears that if the United Nations choose this locale for their second front it will be confronted by a German ultimatum within a few hours.

What will Sweden do in such circumstances? Considering the feeling that has developed among the people since the occupation of Norway, it is an excellent guess that Sweden will fight, especially if it sees immediate prospect of help. When I left Sweden fifteen months ago I was assured in well-informed circles that there was no difference of opinion in the Cabinet on what to do if the Germans initiated their Russian campaign with an ultimatum to Sweden. Speeches of Cabinet ministers since then show that the government has not become any more complaisant. Thus the opening of a second front in Norway might well make Sweden a belligerent on the side of the United Nations.

Swedish military men at that time were prepared to lose southern Sweden in the event of a German attack. The major problem was how to stave off an eastward drive by the strong tank forces which the Germans had assembled in and around Oslo with the probable purpose of cutting Sweden in two just south or just north of Stockholm. On the other hand, the Swedish military felt confident of taking Narvik by land and thus establishing an outlet to the sea. Their main concern was the doubt that help from the British would be in sight once they had taken Narvik.

In the year that has passed, the military situation of Sweden has worsened. The country would now have to face attack from the east also, by parachute troops and air-borne infantry from German-occupied Estonia, if not from Finland. On the other hand, if the showdown with Germany is precipitated by Allied landings in northern Norway, Sweden need not fear having to keep watch on the Narvik strand alone.

Germany's problem would be, first, to establish contact between troops landing in southern Sweden and the Nazi garrison at Oslo, and, second, to secure the rail line from Malmo through Gothenburg to Oslo. It would probably leave central Sweden and Stockholm aside for a while in order to concentrate on the railroads linking the southern half of the country with Ostersund, the strategical center of Swedish Norrland, from which Trondheim could be protected against surprises from the land side. This would be quite a job for the German panzers and parachutists, who would have to protect their exposed flank from counter-attack by the main body of the well-trained and extremely well-equipped Swedish army of more than 500,000 men.

Thus the opening of a second front in Norway might easily develop into prolonged fighting all along the Scandinavian peninsula. It would be a race against time both for the United Nations and the Axis, and it would offer a chance to separate the war-weary Finns from their fateful attachment to Hitler. But whatever is to be done must be done quickly. If the Russians go down in defeat and the Germans are able to withdraw whole armies from the eastern front, the Swedes might think twice about pitting their strength against Adolf Hitler.

In the Wind

SECRETARY OF STATE HULL has served notice on Elmer Davis that the State Department is to be considered out of bounds for the activities of the Office of War Information.

AS PART OF HIS CHARGE to a jury, Judge Joe Ben Jackson of the Ocmulgee (Georgia) Circuit Superior Court saw fit last week to add the following judicial guidance: "I deserve to be reelected. I want the job and I think I should have it as my indorsement term." During the course of the trial the Judge, a Talmadge appointee, urged the jurors to support Roosevelt, Talmadge, and himself in the "cause of defeating the enemy."

THE INCREASING COCKINESS of the military in Washington is exemplified by a remark made to Donald Nelson by Lieutenant General Somervell, commander of the army's supply services. When Nelson refused to accede to a War Department request, Somervell said he liked to see Nelson in Washington and regretted that the war-production chief was so determined to cut short his tenure of office.

A MEXICAN READER of The Nation reports that for the first time an issue of the magazine has been subjected to the scissors of the censor. The offending article was an editorial on Odell Waller expressing the opinion that his execution represented a lost battle on the home front.

FALSE RUMORS are circulating in New York to the effect that The Nation and the New Republic are planning a merger.

THE 1922 COMMITTEE, composed of Tory M. P.'s who are not in the government, was responsible for getting J. B. Priestley off the air, according to the New Statesman and Nation. The same group is now trying to bar Julian Huxley, C. E. M. Joad, and Harold J. Laski from broadcasting to Europe and America.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

An Open Letter on Critics and Criticism

DEAR MARGARET MARSHALL: When you first asked me to send you something for this page I sat down and wrote about 2,500 words on Literary Scholarship and Literature. Being, like most journalists, thrifty, I used some ideas I had used before in a speech to an academic audience, and I was pleased enough with what I wrote to put it in a file from which it may some day be disinterred. But it occurred to me that though the essay embodied approximately what I wanted to say to one audience, it was not quite what I wanted to say to another. I was outlining what I considered the very narrow limits within which scholarship could be of use to literature, but I deliberately left the general impression that criticism, on the other hand, could profitably illuminate the darkest corners of the mystery of art. The truth is, however, that I think critics quite as likely as scholars to overestimate the importance of what they accomplish, and since The Nation is primarily a journal of criticism I should prefer to say something about that.

In recent years criticism has certainly been taking itself with a new seriousness. After scorning the easy impressionism of the late nineteenth century, it now scorns also the easy Freudianism of the twenties, and is showing signs of scorning only a little less openly the easy Marxism of the thirties. The science of aesthetics has come into fashion again. Poets, many of whom seem to be more interested in criticism than in poetry, have got so far from the old romantic attitude toward their art that they argue at length such metaphysical questions as the cognitive or non-cognitive nature of poetry. But they are especially interested in the secrets of technique and generally prefer to examine a writer, especially if he be a poet, word by word or, at most, half-line by half-line. In The Nation itself "sprung rhythm"—and with all deference to Hopkins it is a singularly repellent phrase—has recently been getting an amount of space roughly equivalent to that devoted to the Battle of the Atlantic. And when the Seven Types of Ambiguity can all be discovered in two or three words, then the half-line is admired with all the enthusiasm of Polonius for "mobled queen."

But I wonder whether the New Seriousness isn't reducing itself to a New Pedantry. Mark Van Doren was telling me recently of his experience with a cooperative volume on the poetry of Yeats. It was, he said, careful, learned, intelligent, and ingenious. He read it with great respect for the authors. But it left him with the troubled impression that it was impossible to read Yeats with any profit unless one knew more about him, about the history of poetry, and about a lot of other things, than anyone except the authors of the essays was at all likely to know. At about the same time an enthusiastic dissector of poetry by the methods of semantics said to me with an air of triumph, "At least I have shown that it is not easy to read a poem." But I wonder if to carry that conviction is to perform any very useful service for poetry. I have the impression that at least ninety-nine out of a hundred contemporary readers accept it already—accept it, indeed, so absolutely that they have no intention of trying. I wonder if the answer said to have been made by Victor Hugo to the lady who asked him if it was difficult to write an epic is not equally applicable to the reading of good poetry: "Madam, it is either easy or impossible." The early readers of Chaucer and Shakespeare and Milton and Pope and Byron and Tennyson found it easy. Is it our ultimate aim to make it impossible?

A good deal of fun used to be made by critics of those academic courses in Shakespeare which devoted most of their time to tracing one by one the etymologies of the words he used as they turned up in the passages being read. The objection was not that the etymologies were false or even that the history of words was in itself a profitless subject. The argument was simply that it was a subject of interest chiefly to a group of specialists, and that when Shakespeare was studied primarily as someone who afforded a text for philological dissection, the student learned nothing about the great poet, however much he might learn about etymology. Now I grant that the ambiguities and the sprung rhythms of a poet may reveal more of his art than a study of the history of his words would. I also admit that the study of such things is a perfectly legitimate, and to many an interesting, one. I deny, however, that it is essential to the most important kind of appreciation of literature, and I would even insist that it is quite as likely as philology or the study of "sources" and "influences" to inhibit in the too self-conscious reader the effect that a work of art should produce. The best reader is the one in whom the author has stimulated the thoughts and emotions he intended to communicate, but that reader is certainly not necessarily the one who is most acutely and most perfectly aware of what makes the wheels go round. When the seven ambiguities have been disentangled and spread out on the dissecting board they have lost their magic power.

I say nothing—though I might say a good deal—about the additional fact that even when the sprung rhythm and the seven ambiguities really are there they are seldom all that is there, though they do tend to convince the complacent analyst that the admired line or the admired passage is nothing but a certain rhythm and a certain set of associations. I should like to go at least as far with Van Wyck Brooks as to insist that a really great writer is a Great Man Writing, as well as an adroit technician, and this the admirers of technique are likely to forget. But leaving all this aside, it seems to me that if we are talking not about how accurate or how interesting literary analysis may be as a subject for specialists but simply about how much service it renders to literature, then the new seriousness is, if anything, rather less useful than, to take an extreme case, the mere whooping it up for this or that unknown writer which such men as Huneker used to do.

Recently I read in The Nation a very good review, by a very able critic, devoted to a new book on Dickens. But in the course of it the author said something to the effect that it was high time criticism was doing something for the author of "Pickwick" and "Our Mutual Friend." The implication seemed to be that if criticism didn't do something pretty soon, poor Dickens would be lost to the world. The truth is, however, that if criticism neglects him it will be too bad for criticism but no great loss for Dickens, who will continue to be read whether critics do or do not discover what seems to them an adequate justification for the interest which he continues to evoke. To talk about the necessity of doing something for him is like anxiously calling attention to the growing neglect of Niagara Falls or the Grand Canyon. Criticism needs literature. But in all seriousness and speaking as one who, in various ways, made his living for more than twenty years by writing about books and plays, I doubt that literature very much needs either the critic or the scholar.

All along I have, of course, been assuming that criticism and scholarship both have it as their ultimate aim to do something for literature; that both are rather elaborate means taken to accomplish what the eighteenth century would have called "the diffusion of polite letters," and are not simply a highly technical and rather remote subject for detached specialists. But perhaps this assumption is wrong. Perhaps many critics are, on the contrary, as was suggested by something I read only a few weeks ago, anxious chiefly to frighten off as much of the potential audience as possible, very much in the spirit of the lady editor of a then moribund periodical who remarked to me brightly, "You see we have succeeded in whittling away our subscription list until the magazine reaches only those who are genuinely interested in aesthetics."

In any event, the article which raised my doubts, an essay-review in a large metropolitan daily, concerned itself with a recently published study of the audience for good music on the radio. The study was said to reveal that a very large number of listeners to such music were not properly prepared for the music they were hearing—just as undoubtedly most readers of Yeats's poetry are not properly prepared—and that though they enjoyed it, it was almost invariably only as a series of disjointed passages rather than as an architectural whole. No doubt this is true; in me at least the statement merely evoked the unsensational reflection that half a loaf is better than either no bread or bad cake. But the author of the study and the commentator seemed indignantly agreed that something should be done and done quickly to discourage the playing of good music on the radio and thus to protect Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms from unqualified listeners who should be given only what was fit for them.

What proportion, I wonder, of the audiences which for more than two centuries kept Shakespeare alive on the stage understood everything that a qualified critic could find in his works. How much better off would they and literature have been had they been convinced by semantic critics that it is not easy to understand "Hamlet" and that accordingly it ought to be protected from them? What, in other words, is the best base for great art, a broad base of eager readers and hearers or a select coterie capable of analyzing the seven ambiguities and of knowing a sprung rhythm when they see one? If serious criticism tends to encourage the choice of the second alternative, then I hope that serious criticism will be read by no one except serious critics.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Martyrdom of Poland

THE NEW ORDER IN POLAND. By Simon Segal. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

POLISH scholars used to disagree as to the causes which led to the repeated partitions of their country. The Krakow school of historians upheld the theory of inner decay; the Warsaw school maintained that external aggression was responsible. The so-called Scientific Institute set up in honor of Hitler's birthday settled the controversy by explaining that the Jews were to blame for the downfall of the old Polish state.

This explanation provided at least an excuse for the persecution of the Jews; the Nazis have not bothered to give a reason for the treatment which the "inferior Polish race" has had to endure. Not only Jews but Poles have been expelled from the area incorporated in the Reich. From Gdynia the Nazis removed the entire population of 130,000 and from Posen one-third of the inhabitants in order to make room for German colonists; the remaining Poles were degraded "to the status of a lower class." The 82,000 people that have been tortured and killed during the two years of occupation include Gentiles as well as Jews. Food rations for Germans are twice as high as they are for Poles. Education being unnecessary for an "inferior race," all universities and high schools have been closed. Ritual slaughter has been forbidden because under German sovereignty "cruelty of any kind to animals is considered impossible." Yet cruelty to human beings seems to have been possible, and not only to Jews, as is illustrated by the cases of a seventy-nine-year-old Protestant and a seventy-five-year-old Catholic bishop.

The economic policy of Poland is determined exclusively by the necessities of the Reich. Cheap Polish labor is taken to Germany to enable German exports to compete on the world market. Since Poles can be drafted for any kind of work, their condition differs little from that of the Jews, who are subject to forced labor.

At the beginning of the occupation not only Polish but German and Czech Jews were to be dumped into the Lublin "reservation"; later on ghettos were established in six cities along with all the abominations that the term ghetto implies.

Mr. Segal's picture of present-day Poland—both the incorporated area and the region now termed Nebenland (annex country)—is all the more gruesome for being pruned of sensationalism. Here are the facts, conscientiously gathered and carefully sifted, about the torture and exploitation of Poland and the Poles. Here also is a documented picture of the fate which is in store for other European colonies of Greater Germany.

I should disagree with the author only at one point. Like other scholars aiming at objectivity, Mr. Segal terms Nazi ruthlessness and the manifestations of the berserk revolution a "system of government." The systematic perpetration of atrocities is not a form of administration; and it sounds as if the author were being ironical when he points to the difficulty of determining the "legal character of the Government General" and when he speaks of "the principle of two judicial systems." For obvious reasons the Nazis prefer to call tyranny, violence, and terrorism a New Order or a totalitarian form of government, but there is no reason why we should not call a spade a spade. RUSTEM VAMBERY

Of Our Own Time

THE GARDEN IS POLITICAL. By John Malcolm Brinnin. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

IT WAS the writer's privilege to choose a manuscript of Mr. Brinnin's for one of the Avery Hopwood awards which he received, significantly enough, for three successive years, and it is a tribute to the living quality of this verse that familiar poems offer renewed pleasure. Even obviously occasional pieces have a durable toughness. Here is a young man aware at once of his world and of the instrument with which he calibrates it. He has learned most of the necessary lessons: from the now aging masters, the care for the exact epithet and a reverberant concision of statement; from their influential heirs, that ethical concern which compels him to see the garden as political. Beyond that, they have taught him, what is more valuable, to take no narrow view of man's fate, but to envisage the social order in the setting of the larger natural order which nurtures and challenges it.

The book opens with a handful of pieces on political subjects, while each of the remaining four sections includes some personal and some social poetry. Even in the love lyrics the political theme is sounded, giving additional weight to the title poem. And sensitive though Mr. Brinnin is to the meanness and horror of our time, the dominant mood is one of hope. Indeed, he does not always escape the tyranny of a youthful optimism. The value of these poems is not their effort to disperse the dark night of our present fear. Their value is that here sincere feeling informs technical alertness. Consider the peculiar fitness of the opening lines of the Address to the Refugees:

We have the statue for it—Liberty,
Whose classic vulgar hands invite you Home. . . .

Note the metaphors in A Letter, with the startling excellence of this image:

If no one dressed in seaweed lurches in Like some surprised Ophelia with green hands, followed by the beautiful placidity of:

There is communication on the earth
As quiet as the opening of a wing.

Examine the condensed writing on the Visiting Card for Emily, and then go back to some more recent and more public history, like Cadillac Square, or to one of the most moving and least ambitious pieces, Rowing in Lincoln Park, and see how in each there is the strength of feeling, the insight, the tenderness that illuminate the poem. Mr. Brinnin's is not the more accessible kind of poetry. It is difficult partly because of the privacy of certain references, which is a fault, partly because the poet telescopes his meaning with a rapidity that bewilders, which is the defect of a virtue.

In spite of a buoyancy marking certain pieces which seems somewhat unreal today, his is essentially contemporary work. This is not only because some of the finest passages deal with airports and travel by plane, but because of the nature of the garden that the poet cultivates. The contemporaneity of the book is also due in part to his gift for finding the unobtrusive half-rhyme and for introducing interesting irregularities into the meter. But chiefly this poetry is of our own time because it is written by a man who is young in this time, and who, having the eager awareness, the hungry spirit of youth, has set down for us what his heart grieves over, what his imagination hopes for, all the while conveying faithfully what his keen senses report concerning this our world.

BABETTE DEUTSCH

Post-War Probings

THE COMING SHOWDOWN. By Carl Dreher. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

BOOM OR BUST. By Blair Moody. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

THE title of "The Coming Showdown" does insufficient justice to the contents. Dreher's book is much more than a discussion of what kind of world we may have in the future. More than half the book deals with past economic and political crises when showdowns should have come about but didn't. It presents a graphic picture of what business as usual consisted of during and after World War I. Still more important, it gives some of the current facts that show how business as usual has affected our participation in World War II. Against this background are placed fundamental problems concerning America's future. Dreher believes that collectivism of some sort is inevitable, that the question is whether it will be a fascist or a democratic collectivism, and he argues persuasively for the desirability of the latter.

Moody is more the journalist, less the thinker. "Boom or Bust" reviews the major policies of the pre-war New Deal and calls for a bigger, better post-war version that will take fewer zigzags and be more diplomatic. Full employment, based upon more government spending, and a better distribution of a higher national income are his goals. No attempt is made at independent analysis; the emphasis is upon popular explanation of the major ideas held by the more progressive economists and administrators in Washington.

Neither book is a definitive statement of the domestic issues facing us today or after the war. "Boom or Bust" will serve as quick, easy reading for someone who wants to learn some of the fundamentals of New Deal thought. "The Coming Showdown," on the other hand, is a good book for the more thoughtful to read carefully and then to brood over. A significant difference between the two books is that Moody seems to think this is a world where worth-while plans are all that is needed to get the proper things done. Dreher, knowing a hundred-fold more about planning, is aware of its limitations and fully recognizes the role played by social conflicts.

BERTRAM M. GROSS

IN BRIEF

ALL THE TRUMPETS SOUNDED.

By W. G. Hardy. Coward-McCann. $2.75.

Probably no Biblical figure is more suggestive to the fictional imagination than Moses. Mr. Hardy's long and circumstantial life of the Jewish leader is especially engaging in the section that deals with the proud young Egyptian prince as yet unaware of his mission. A curious provincialism in the prose and in the treatment of the female characters lowers the intensity of an interesting story.

PLUME ROUGE. By John Upton Terrell. The Viking Press. $2.75.

If Mr. Terrell's novel about the opening of the West were less burdened with literary aspiration it would be a better novel. The material is there, and Mr. Terrell seems to know it thoroughly. But nobody in this story asks a straight question or gets a straight answer, the complexity of the characters seems to spring from the author's ambitions for them and not from themselves, and the action is advanced with a kind of persistent indirection that is rather wearisome. Placed between the chapters—a pointless device, and the publishers should have been firm about it—is a poetic counterpoint to the main narrative, set in different type.

HIGH STAKES. By Curt Riess. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

Nazi espionage in America is the subject, the FBI is the hero, and Mr. Riess states clearly that the characters in his novel are not wholly fictitious, nor the similarity to persons living or dead coincidental. The result is a thriller that owes its excitement more to the timeliness of its revelations than to the creative talents of its author.

FORWARD THE NATION. By Donald Culross Peattie. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

This brief fictionized account of the Lewis and Clark expedition is worth reading by anyone who hasn't looked into the Journals themselves. Mr. Peattie rightly makes a heroine of the Indian girl, Sacajawea, who guided the explorers across two-thirds of the continent. Because his narrative of a great exploration is so generally sound and readable, one can overlook the occasional platitudinous heroics that mar his prose and even forgive the amateurish attempt to set off Napoleon and Josephine—representing futile pomp and destructive ambition—against Thomas Jefferson, Lewis and Clark, and Sacajawea—representing vision and courage.

RECORDS

VICTOR'S June list included a first recording (Set 901, $2.63) of Schubert's Rondo Op. 70 for piano and violin. This is a small-scale work, but in the slow introduction one hears the dramatic force, and here and in the rondo itself the melodic loveliness, the harmonic freedom, the rhythmic exuberance of the great works on larger scale. It is recorded by Hephzibah and Yehudi Menuhin; and though Yehudi's playing is more straightforward and therefore more acceptable than usual, it hasn't the incisiveness of phrasing and rhythm that causes Hephzibah's playing to dominate in effect even though poor balance in the performance or the recording causes Yehudi's to predominate in volume. I should mention that I am speaking of what came off the records on a five-year old Magnavox Symphony phonograph with a markedly limited range and a heavy pickup, which I must suppose was different from what the sound of the music and the surfaces would be on a wide-range machine with a sensitive, light pickup.

Newly recorded also, I believe, are the three Strauss waltzes on Victor's July list (Set 907, $3.68)—the unfamiliar and charming "Liebeslieder" and "Morgenblätter," the well known "Du und du" from "Die Fledermaus," which is one of the best. They are well performed—the first two by the Vienna Philharmonic under Krauss, the second by the same orchestra under Kleiber. And they sounded well recorded on the Magnavox Symphony.

Also I have at last heard Victor's February set (867, $5.52) of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 6 recorded by Stokowski with the Philadelphia Orchestra. The work has two fast movements of the usual Shostakovich hubbub—the melodically and harmonically distorted grimacing and nose-thumbing carried to diffuse lengths by pretentious fluency. And these are preceded by a slow first movement in which Stokowski or Koussevitzky may hear profundity, but in which I hear only an attempt at profundity pushing itself to diffuse lengths again by means of a mere ability to keep sounds following sounds—one striking example of the intention, the method, the result being the long flute solo (on side 3, I believe). The performance seems good and sounded well recorded on the Magnavox Symphony.

One would suppose that with the present scarcity of materials Victor would avoid duplication of a work except where the duplicating performance is of outstanding importance and interest, as a Toscanini performance is. No such importance and interest explain the issuing of a new version of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony recorded by Iturbi with the Rochester Philharmonic (Set 899, $5.78). It is a performance with details that make me prefer the older Szell-Czech Philharmonic version, the recorded sound of which, on the Magnavox Symphony, is very good in its own way—with more body where the new version, on the same machine, gives indications of more spaciousness and brightness.

Victor also offers a new album (Set 893, $4.73) of piano pieces of Brahms played by Artur Schnabel, at the same time as it withdraws one of the albums in which the pieces are better played by Bachaus. Bachaus did not record the Rhapsody Op. 119 No. 4, which Schnabel, as it happens, plays very well. But of the others—the Rhapsody Op. 79 No. 1, the Intermezzi Op. 76 No. 7, Op. 117 Nos. 1 and 2, Op. 118 Nos. 2 and 6, Op. 119 No. 3—I prefer Bachaus's performances because he phrases them simply, whereas Schnabel distorts the phrases with the mannered style in which he plays Chopin. The recorded sound of his performance is brighter.

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

ANTONIN BASCH was formerly director of economics at the Czech university in Prague. He is now professor of economics at Brown University.

GUNNAR LEISTIKOW was foreign editor of a Copenhagen newspaper.

RUSTEM VAMBERY, criminologist and sociologist, was a member of several Hungarian ministries and government committees. He is now writing and lecturing in this country.

BABETTE DEUTSCH, poet and critic, is the author of a book of verse entitled "One Part Love."

BERTRAM M. GROSS has contributed frequently to the New Republic, Harper's, and other magazines.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- The Diffusion of Science.* By Jesse Lee Bennett. John Hopkins. $2.25.
- Keep Them Human: The Young Child at Home.* By C. Madeleine Dixon. John Day. $1.50.
- India Today: The Background of Indian Nationalism.* By W. E. Duffett, A. R. Hicks, and G. R. Parkin. John Day. $1.75.
- Anthology of Canadian Poetry (English).* Compiled by Ralph Gustafson. Penguin. 25 cents.
- Strategic Materials and National Strength.* By Harry N. Holmes. Macmillan. $1.75.
- Fire in the Pacific.* By Simon Harcourt-Smith. Knopf. $2.
- See Here, Private Hargrove.* By Marion Hargrove. Holt. $2.
- The Truth About Ann.* By Thomas Lennon. John Day. $2.
- Jane's Fighting Ships, 1941.* Edited by Francis E. McMurtrie. Macmillan. $19.
- Year of the Wild Boar: An American Woman in Japan.* By Helen Mears. Lipincott. $2.75.
- American Reveille: The United States at War.* By Ward Morehouse. Putnam's. $2.50.
- The Best Poems of 1941.* Selected by Thomas Moulton. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
- Global War: An Atlas of World Strategy.* By Edgar Ansel Mowrer and Marthe Rajchman. Morrow. $1.
- The Latin American Republics: A History.* By Dana Gardner Munro. Appleton-Century. $5.
- Christianity in Peril. The New World Order and the Church.* By Andrew R. Osborn. Oxford. $2.
- Anthology of Magazine Verse for 1938-1942 and Yearbook of American Poetry.* Edited by Alan F. Pater. Paebur. $10.
- Negroes in Brazil: A Study of Race Contact at Bahia.* By Donald Pierson. Chicago. $4.50.
- A History of Economic Thought.* By Eric Roll. Prentice-Hall. $4. Revised Edition.
- State Housing Agencies.* By Dorothy Schaffter. Columbia. $7.50.
- The Port of New Orleans.* By Harold Sinclair. Doubleday, Doran. $3.50.
- Religion in Colonial America.* By William Warren Sweet. Scribner's. $3.
- Turkey.* By Barbara Ward. Oxford. $1.
- The Golden Age of Colonial Culture.* By Thomas J. Wertenbaker. New York University. $3.
- The Growth of American Constitutional Law.* By Benjamin F. Wright. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.
- The Coming Battle of Germany.* By William B. Ziff. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. $2.50.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 65 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

RESORTS

★ STAR LAKE CAMP ★

IN THE GLORIOUS ADIRONDACKS

Between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground, 1,800 feet elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Canoeing, Swimming, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Interesting one-day trips arranged. Delicious wholesome meals. Rate $27.50 weekly. New Bungalows, semi-private baths for couples—$30.00 per person. Dietary laws observed.

Send for Booklet—New York Office
116 NASSAU ST., Room 802a, CO 7-2667
Sundays, Evenings, Holidays—PR 4-1390
Auto service from and to New York every Saturday and Sunday

FOR THE TIME OF YOUR LIFE

• Come to gorgeous Plum Point, only 55 miles from New York, with its 70 restful, green acres touching the Hudson. Recreational activities to exercise and relax your muscles. Dancing and entertainment. Heaping courses of appetizing foods. Splendid rooms with sleep-inviting beds.

Non-Sectarian

plum point
ATTRACTIVE RATES FREE BOOKLET
New Windsor, N.Y. Newburgh 4270

Tall Pines

High in the Dutchess County hills 80 miles from New York... land and water sports... a design for leisure. Starlight Summer Theatre nearby.

Attractive Rates.

PLEASANT VALLEY, DUTCHESS CO., N. Y.
Phone 2741

NEW DELIGHTFUL DIFFERENT

OAKWOOD

NEW WINDSOR NEW YORK

Tel.: Newburgh 4477. Only 53 Miles from N. Y. C.

Charming Colonial Estate. Spacious Grounds. Unexcelled food. Tennis, Golf, Swimming, Handball, Riding, Canoeing, Badminton. Limited accommodations. Attractive rates.

BREEZEMONT PARK ARMONK, N.Y.

A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County

If you choose your hotel with the same care and taste as you would your home, visit this nearby resort. Exclusive. Dignified. Luxuriously furnished. All sport facilities. Excellent cuisine. Less than one hour from New York City.

Phone: Armonk Village 955 Open All Year

VALCOUR LODGE

On Lake Champlain Valcour, N.Y.
7 miles south of Plattsburg

Modernly Equipped Bungalows

ALL SPORTS EXCELLENT FOOD DRESS INFORMAL

Write for Illustrated Folder (N)

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoe; interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails; Fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping-pong, etc.; Intelligent, gay companionship.
$28 & $32 Weekly Non-Sectarian
OLIVE H. G. BARON, Dir.

Additional Resort Advertising
ON INSIDE BACK COVER

RESORTS

GLENMERE

- Easy to Reach — Hard to Forget
- In the Ramapo — Commuting Distance
- 1600 Acre Estate — 51 Miles from N. Y. C.
- Superb Accommodations and Cuisine
- Private Lake; Golf Course; All Sports

SPECIAL RATES

By the MONTH, SEASON or YEAR

Glenmere

CHESTER, NEW YORK
Phone CHESTER 200
N. Y. C. Phone • REctor 2-5047

HILLTOP LODGE

On Beautiful Sylvan Lake

HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.

R. R. Station: Pawling, N. Y.

Tel. Hopewell Junction 2761

Only 65 Miles from N. Y. C.

HILLTOP... Yours for Vacation - Pleasure
• Every Sport and Recreation Facility • Golf is Free on Premises • Food is TOPS

Reasonable Rates

Paul Wolfson and Sol Rothaus (Directors)
N. Y. OFFICE: 170 BROADWAY Cor. 7-3958

SWIMMING • TENNIS • BADMINTON • HANDBALL • BOATING • ARCHERY • SQUASH • RECORDINGS • SIDNEY BECHET'S BAND • SPARKLING

ALLABEN ACRES

Fun Time and All's Swell...
Through every crowded hour at this mountain-top beauty spot. Fun-full days of stimulating sports on lake and land... pleasure packed evenings with Al Saxe's peppy musicals and Sidney Bechet's danceable numbers. The best in food... plus all-convenience log cabins and bungalows.

N. Y. OR 33 W 42nd St PE 6-3063

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women

ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

QUEEN WHITE MOUNTAIN LAKES

All Modern Camp Features
Sports... Dancing... Entertainment

Excellent Cuisine

Rates: $27.50 up to $30 Per Week

Write for Booklet

BOB BRICKMAN, Host

WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

The LITTLE CLUB

ON SCHROON LAKE
In the Adirondacks
NEW YORK

GOLF • PRIVATE BEACH • TENNIS
Hotel with All Outdoor Activities — Excellent Food
"Free Transportation from Bus or Train"

ATTRACTIVE RATES T. N. FLAUM

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.

All Sports — Open All Year

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

Letters to the Editors

To Defeat Hamilton Fish

Dear Sirs: A committee known as the Independent Committee of the Twenty-sixth District has been formed to bring about the defeat of Hamilton Fish in the coming Congressional elections. It is composed of Democrats and Republicans and has a large membership in the three counties forming the district. It is not controlled or directed by either political party and will be guided in its actions solely by the desire to defeat Fish and to elect in his place a competent Congressman, regardless of party.

The committee has already distributed thousands of pieces of literature showing the record of Congressman Fish; it has delivered many radio addresses and expects to use the radio freely; it has held a number of meetings in homes in the district; and it is preparing through its Research Department carefully documented evidence of Fish's record which it intends to publish and make available to writers, speakers, publishers, candidates, and all who need such information. It is a people's movement and contains in its ranks representatives of the various interests in the Congressional district. It will need a substantial campaign fund; it will need helpers in the distribution of literature and the holding of meetings. In every way possible the cooperation of those who are interested is invited.

The committee's main office is now at 2 Cannon Street, Poughkeepsie, New York. After the primaries it expects to establish branches in various sections of the district and to make an aggressive fight.

JAMES H. CAUSEY, Chairman
Poughkeepsie, N. Y., July 23

On Revolution in Italy

Dear Sirs: In The Nation of June 20 Gaetano Salvemini, in his review of "Agent in Italy," agrees with the book's author that Italy will not drop out of the war by itself. "Such an event," says the author, "can be brought about by only two means. . . . One is invasion by the United Nations, which would be warmly welcomed and abetted by the mass of the people. The other is for Germany to be militarily defeated and Nazism destroyed. . . . There will be no revolution in Italy until peace comes again to Europe."

Many Americans seem to be very impatient for a revolution in Italy and to think that the Italians should revolt without delay if they want to regain the respect of the world. The Italian people already oppose the Fascist regime in many ways, and it is possible that an actual revolution will gradually develop. But to think that it is the Italians' duty to revolt now is nonsense. If the Italians are now prisoners of Hitler and Mussolini, this is not the fault of the Italian people alone. In his article World War III? in The Nation of June 20 Alvarez del Vayo wrote: "From the moment that fascism established itself in Italy there was in Europe a popular anti-fascist current strong enough to have forced the adoption at Geneva of a policy of resistance to violent and unilateral solutions of international problems. But the defenders of the existing economic order saw in fascism an effective means of creating a new balance of power against any possible advance of a democracy which might try to go too far." To expect the Italians to revolt now is like expecting the Spanish people to revolt against Franco after the latter received the support of all the governments in his fight against Spanish democracy; or like expecting the French people to revolt against Pétain when he enjoys the moral and material support of the United States.

I think that the Italians already deserve the respect of the world because, in spite of having been poisoned for twenty years by a fascism which has been kept alive and prosperous by the reactionaries of the whole world, they have behaved in this war as a civilized people.

As Salvemini says, the British and American governments still speak of making peace with the king or with the Italian army chiefs, thus showing the Italians that a revolution would be welcomed only if the people had no benefit from it. It seems to me that if we ask a people to revolt, we should make it clear that we are with them without reserve and will welcome their popular revolution as part of a people's war for a people's victory.

M. T. MARSTRO,
Italian News Editor

Columbia Broadcasting System
New York, July 21

A Thai Asks Us to Hurry

Dear Sirs: My unlucky homeland has lost its democratic freedom. Our democratic regime was inaugurated on June 24, 1932, by a group of earnest Buddhists, aided of course by native men at arms. During the brief glorious period of less than ten years, up to December 8, 1941, the masses became deeply impressed with the unfamiliar yet comfortable notion. Now the destiny of all Thais is dark.

The gallant Thai minister in Washington, M. R. Seni Pramoj, after the arrival of a short communiqué from Bangkok to the effect that Japanese forces had entered Thailand told the people of this country of his intention to strive for his country's independence regardless of any eventuality—be it death. That was his stimulating action on December 10, 1941, just two days after the government had capitulated.

The hundred-odd Thai students in America were chilled by the gruesome news when the legation circular reached their hands. It is not at all a pleasant feeling to know that one may become a man without a country permanently.

The Thai minister kept his word when he refused officially to deliver the declaration of war against the United States as instructed by the puppet Bangkok government. The Thais in the United States are still free to help the righteous Allies. They are still free to face torture and slow death as long as the Japanese aggressors are at large.

Shortly before the departure of the Gripsholm, a final warning came through the royal Thai legation at Berne, Switzerland, with the following Japanized message: "Kindly communicate to all concerned that by Premier's order Thai subjects are to return Thailand on first exchange vessel. Penalty for disobedience in official case is instant dismissal from the service; in ordinary case they will lose their Thai nationality and will be barred forever from entering Thailand."

Now we know where we stand. Now we know where we are heading for. Will it be asking too much, if I beg the American fighters to speed up a little bit, before my mother gets too old and too familiar with the hissing sound?

M. C. CHETNA
Ithaca, N. Y., July 20

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 8, 1942

NUMBER 6

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 101

EDITORIALS

- Three Ways to an All-Out Effort 104
A New Plan for Spain 104
Western Front—Talk and Reality by Freda Kirchwey 105

ARTICLES

- Japan's Second Front by Donald W. Mitchell 106
Who Is the State Department? III. The Assistant Secretariat by Robert Bendiner 107
Two-Way Stretch by Suzanne La Follette 111
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 114
In the Wind 115

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- One Morning the World Woke Up
by Oscar Williams 116
Two Studies of Appeasement
by Joseph Newman 116
The Mind of Nehru by Reinhold Niebuhr 117
Humanity and Humor by Diana Trilling 118
In Brief 119
Records by B. H. Haggin 119

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 120

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON    MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

IN THE PAST WEEK THE R. A. F. HAS STEPPED up its offensive against Germany and the occupied countries in an impressive manner. From July 25 to 31 inclusive five heavy raids were made against four German cities—Hamburg (hit twice), Duisburg, Saarbruecken, and Dusseldorf. All these places, it is worth noting, are key communication centers as well as the homes of leading war industries. At the same time fighters and light bombers have been carrying out regular daylight sweeps along the invasion coast hitting at airfields, barracks, gun-sites, and freight trains as well as constantly and successfully challenging Nazi planes. One result is that the Luftwaffe has been stung into making a new series of reprisal raids on Britain. But these seem to have caused comparatively little damage while costing the Germans a far higher percentage of losses than the British have suffered in their night bombing attacks. Altogether the Nazis lost 113 planes over Britain and Western Europe during July while 251 R. A. F. machines were downed—a comparison by no means unfavorable considering the immensely greater scale of British operations. Undoubtedly, the British offensive—soon to become the Anglo-American offensive—has by no means approached full violence. In a radio message to Germans Air Marshall Sir Arthur T. Harris, Britain's bomber chief, warned that far heavier raids were coming and that one city after another would be pulverized. We do not know whether the Anglo-American staffs regard this air offensive as an end in itself or as a preliminary essential to the establishment of a second front. Recent Nazi moves suggest a fear that the latter is true, and we hope this fear will be rapidly justified.

✱

GENERAL DRAJA MIKHAILOVITCH'S ARMY continues to maintain a second front of genuine military significance, tying up Axis forces at least as large as those engaged in North Africa. For some weeks it has been on the offensive and has extended its operations to all parts of Yugoslavia. One daring column is reported to have carried the war right to the Italian border near Trieste and Fiume. Other bands have been raiding along the banks of the Danube, threatening oil shipments from Rumania and forcing the Hungarians to send heavy reinforcements. The latest reports speak of a foray into Dalmatia which succeeded in destroying the important bauxite mines at Suk, smashing harbor installations along the coast, and capturing large quantities of Italian supplies. In Croatia battles on a large scale have been taking place. The Axis radio frequently speaks of "punitive expeditions" but the only successes they seem to have scored have been against civilians. There are many Lidices in Yugoslavia. Tens of thousands of men, women, and children have been massacred and huge numbers deported. But support for the patriot army grows ever stronger, and increasing numbers of Croats are revolting against their fascist government. Three weeks ago Major Helm, Gestapo chief in Croatia, was assassinated in the streets of Zagreb. His bodyguard ran amok with grenades and machine guns, killing 700 persons and providing an unforgettable demonstration of the meaning of the "New Order." Despite General Mikhailovitch's successes, he badly needs supplies if he is to continue fighting. To what extent support is reaching him is of course a military secret. But we hope that everything possible is being done to send him essentials by air. He has shown his ability to make a little go a long way.

✱

INDIA'S ZERO HOUR IS VERY NEAR. NEW movements of the Japanese Burma army toward the Bengal frontier are reported and on August 7 the All-India Congress is expected to ratify Gandhi's proposals for a civil disobedience campaign to compel Britain to grant immediate independence. It is uncertain what form the campaign will take—a general strike, a boycott of British goods, refusal to pay taxes—these are some of the possibilities. Undoubtedly there will be mass demonstrations giving rise to excitement which can all too easily result in bloody disorders. This Gandhi himself has recognized. It is improbable, however, that Congress will receive as wide support as it has in the past. The Communist Party, which the Indian government has wisely legalized, is influential both among the students and the trade unions and it is hotly opposed to disruption of the anti-Axis front at this time. Nor are Indian business men, busy with war contracts, likely to be so free with financial support for Congress as they have been in the past. But even a partially successful civil-disobedience campaign might have disastrous results. In a recent open letter "To Every Japanese," Gandhi wrote: "You have been gravely misinformed that we have chosen this particular moment to embarrass the Allies when your attack against India is imminent. You will be sadly disappointed if you believe that you would receive a willing welcome from India." But, in his latest statement, he warned that unless India received complete independence now "her hidden discontent may burst forth into welcome for the Japanese." It is clear that Congress believes that Britain's present danger presents a unique opportunity. Yet Britain cannot defend India and at the same time abdicate all its authority, so any victory Congress achieves will be a Pyrrhic one. At this stage lifting India out of the British frying pan means dropping it in the much hotter Japanese fire.

✱

AIDED BY AMERICAN PLANES THE CHINESE have succeeded in nullifying a greater part of the successes won by the Japanese in their great offensive of early summer. Although Japan still holds the important air bases in Chekiang province seized several weeks ago, the Chinese have recently recaptured a number of towns in the area, including Kienteh, thirty miles north of Kienhwa, and Tsing-tien, a few miles from the important city of Wenchow. The Chinese have also reoccupied a short stretch of the Hangchow-Namchang railway and thus, temporarily, at least, disrupted Japanese plans to link Shanghai and Canton by rail as part of a grandiose Shanghai-to-Singapore rail project. Several sections of the Peiping-Hankow railway are reported to have been put out of commission by Chinese sappers. The small American air force which has been sent to aid Chiang Kai-shek's forces has distinguished itself in both offensive and defensive action. The Americans have successfully raided Hongkong, Hankow, and various Yangtze river ports, and have succeeded in turning back the one attempt that the Japanese have made to resume their usual summer bombing attacks on Chungking. Efforts by the Japanese to destroy the main American base at Hengyang have so far failed despite the use of more than a hundred late-model bombers and fighters manned by experienced airmen. Although Hengyang is not as favorably situated as some of the air fields that have recently been taken by the Japanese, it is well within Flying Fortress range of Tokyo—if only China had the Flying Fortresses!

✱

SERIOUS SHORTAGES IN STEEL, ALUMINUM, copper, and other critical materials are threatening to slow down armament production at a moment when additional output is desperately needed if a second front is to be opened. Responsibility for the new bottlenecks is difficult to fix. Friends of Donald Nelson have been inclined to blame the Army and Navy Munitions Board for diverting steel and other materials to relatively unessential projects. The board insists that the WPB alone has the power to cope with the raw-materials shortage. Harvey Anderson of the WPB's Conservation and Substitution Division declares that there "is no real shortage of critical materials . . . merely the most extravagant kind of wastage." The waste is held to be most flagrant in the Army and Navy, but is serious throughout industry. It is evident also that we are paying a heavy price for industry-dominated estimates of steel and aluminum needs made by the OPM in the early days of the arms program, as well as the business-as-usual attitude which permitted large quantities of essential materials to be consumed in unnecessary civilian production. Basically, the shortages are due to poor coordination and lack of planning. But although responsibility for industrial planning rests with Donald Nelson, his ability to anticipate and prepare for tomorrow's needs clearly depends upon the United Nations' grand strategy for the war.

✱

THE SENATE PATENTS COMMITTEE WILL, WE hope, resist pressure from Under Secretary of War Patterson to "go easy" on its investigation into certain of our patent monopolies. It is more important than ever to throw the spotlight on every one of them, and to make sure that they are available for use in war production. Even in the field which has been most investigated—that of synthetic rubber patents—there is no ground for complacency. Du Pont is still keeping its neoprene patent to itself. Standard is doing likewise with butyl and under cover of the war program has succeeded in establishing a measure of control over Buna rubber that John W. Davis himself thought impossible and contrary to the anti-trust laws. We also hope that the committee will reject the feeble patents bill proposed to it by Thurman Arnold on behalf of the Department of Justice. We can hardly believe that this bill really embodies Arnold's views, and we feel compelled to attribute it to pressure within the Administration intended to tone down action against the patent monopolists. Instead of the lengthy legalistic rigmarole envisioned in the Arnold bill, we believe that there should be compulsory licensing of all patents, with the same right to seize patents as we have to draft men. And, somewhere, officials with the courage to use that power.

✱

JUKE BOXES AND RECORDED BROADCASTS have created some real problems for American musicians, but no solution is likely to be found until the players are represented by someone other than James Caesar Petrillo. It is unquestionably true that canned music in its several forms has cut down the number of jobs open to professional musicians and has lowered individual earnings. Some way should be found to distribute royalties so that orchestra members get more for records which make money for their owners than they get for those which merely entertain a household. But this will not be done by ukases from Mr. Petrillo barring members of the musicians' union from making new recordings. The most immediate effect, as Elmer Davis has pointed out, will be to cripple hundreds of small radio stations throughout the country which are invaluable to the nation as disseminators of news but which survive economically through the use of recorded music on sustaining programs. We could probably get along without juke boxes, but the fact is that they do afford amusement to a great many people who have few other ways of getting it, and in only a few places where they now perform could the management afford to replace them with even one tinny piano. What the musicians face is a difficult technological problem similar to those that have been faced by workers in many other industries. It will be solved partly by intelligent collective bargaining, partly by painful readjustment. Mr. Petrillo understands neither of these processes and until the musicians shelve this frock-coated symbol of labor racketeering, the public will not be lavish with its sympathy.

✱

A TOUCH OF THE LUDICROUS IS A SMALL price to pay for maintaining the traditions of American juridical procedure. Whatever the fate of the Nazi invaders who landed on our beaches in the middle of June we need not begrudge them the few extra weeks of life involved in giving them a more than fair trial. The niceties of jurisprudence, however, can be carried too far, and in this case the procedure was beginning to take on such overtones of fantasy that the Supreme Court's refusal to give the defendants standing in the civil courts came in the nick of time. If defense counsel was not so obviously in desperate straits it might almost be suspected of having sabotaged the prisoners' case, so fanciful were its contentions: the defendants were escaping from Germany; not counting several chests of choice explosives, they were unarmed; they had no intention of carrying out their orders; they were entitled to civil trial since the beaches where they landed were not theaters of war. Had the Supreme Court granted their petitions, American soldiers would have to go into battle with John Doe summonses in place of rifles and a round of subpoenas in their cartridge belts. But the Supreme Court held firm, and Ringling Brothers need not worry about having to turn Gargantua loose on a writ of habeas corpus.

✱

THE COWARDLY ATTACK ON WALDO FRANK in Buenos Aires was a typically fascist attempt to silence argument by violence. Mr. Frank himself has absolved the Argentine government of responsibility, but there is no doubt that it is morally responsible, both because of its statement declaring the noted American author persona non grata and because of its toleration of the fascist press which directly instigated the assault. The incident has aroused widespread indignation in Argentina and throughout Latin America, and it may have a healthy effect by drawing new attention to the pro-Axis character of the Castillo regime. But as Mr. Frank said, in an interview with PM, it should not be allowed to react against the Argentine people, who are badly misrepresented by their government.

Three Ways to an All-Out Effort

WHATEVER action the President takes on the farm rubber bill, we hope that Congress will go on embodying its suggestions on war production in legislation. At the very least, bills like the farm rubber bill tend to call the attention of the White House to the need for drastic changes in the war-production setup. They exert much greater pressure on WPB officials than mere recommendations. And they serve, by informing the public, to prepare the way for what must some day be a fundamental reorganization in our present system of managing industry for war.

The capacity of WPB officials to ignore Congressional recommendations and to forget their own pledges of reform has shown itself in one instance after another. Three main criticisms have been made of the war-production effort, and these criticisms have been amply bulwarked with evidence elicited in a series of Congressional investigations, but nothing has been done about them. Where Knudsen was coldly contemptuous under an appearance of simplicity, Nelson has proved essentially indifferent under an appearance of agreement.

First among these criticisms is that an all-out effort will not be achieved so long as the industry and commodity branches of the WPB are largely in the hands of men who have a private interest in the industries or commodities under their jurisdiction. In hearings earlier this year before the Truman committee, Nelson and his chief subordinates, James S. Knowlson and Philip D. Reed, promised that no man would be allowed to pass on matters directly affecting his own company, but this has been so narrowly interpreted (and so frequently disregarded) as to have produced no real change in the situation. One of the oldest lessons of the war-production program is that steel men cannot be trusted to expand steel production, that automobile men cannot be trusted to force conversion of automobile plants to war purposes, and that aluminum monopolists cannot be trusted to tell us the truth about aluminum. Yet today a Ford man is head of the automotive branch, a director of Goodrich Rubber and the Rubber Manufacturers Association is head of the rubber branch, and a Mellon man is in charge of chemicals.

The second point is that an all-out effort cannot be achieved until we bring the smaller business men into the program. The war-production program today under Nelson is being operated by substantially the same big business men in whose hands it has been since the beginning. Newer men and older ideas—Higgins and mass production in shipbuilding, Kaiser and cargo planes, Publicker and rubber from grain alcohol—all find it difficult to make headway against this big-business bureaucracy. Until independent business men are represented in the program, we shall not get the fruits of genuine enterprise and we shall not be able to tap the idle resources in our smaller plants and mills.

The third point made again only recently in the Truman report on the Guthrie case, is that an all-out effort cannot be achieved without bringing labor directly into the war production program. In the NDAC and in the OPM, labor was represented by Hillman. In the WPB, there is no labor representation in the upper levels of the setup. Wendell Lund, the labor production head, is well intentioned and trying to do his best. But he is not a trade-union representative, and he was picked because the inside big-business crowd, with Hillman pushed out, didn't want a labor leader around. Yet labor proposals for increasing the output of steel and copper open new possibilities of overcoming the shortages of these materials. Labor's ideas often conflict with the customary and the most profitable ways of doing business. That does not make them any less useful in the war program.

Is Donald M. Nelson going to stop agreeing politely with everybody who talks to him? Is he going to substitute action for the appearance of action and make the essential changes? Or will it be necessary to find a new WPB head before we can hope for full war production?

A New Plan for Spain

OUR appeasers are planning a surprise which may be sprung any day now. Since failure has so far been the outcome of every attempt at appeasement, a surprise must necessarily be in the nature of a success, or at least an apparent success. And that is what certain persons in the London Foreign Office and in our own State Department are working for. Just one instance of successful appeasement would, in their minds, provide historic justification for a long succession of failures and expose leftists and non-conformists of all colors as irresponsible talkers without any sense of foreign affairs.

The plan, worked out quite recently in London and in Washington, has for its final objective the establishment of a new Spanish provisional government made up of six or seven generals which would prepare the way for the early return to Spain of Infante Don Juan, third son of the late King Alfonso and heir to the throne. Franco, it is agreed, would be confronted with an ultimatum from the army demanding that he dissociate himself from the Phalanx, but, as recompense, the plan provides that a place would be made for the Generalissimo in the new regime. The authors of the scheme hope for two happy results: the obvious advantages of a pro-Ally policy on the part of Spain and the beneficent influence on Latin America of a military-clerical Spanish government.

Two persons are said to have been primarily concerned with perfecting the new plan of appeasement: the Papal Nuncio in Madrid and the American Ambassador. In this maneuver may be found an explanation of the amazing speech delivered by Ambassador Hayes on July 30 in Barcelona in which he declared that "the United States understands Spain's position in the war." We wonder who in the United States "understands" it besides Mr. Hayes and some of his colleagues in the State Department and some members of the Catholic hierarchy. Surely not the people at large. For the policy of Franco and the speech of Hayes and the plan to establish a clerical-military reaction in Spain are all of one piece and all designed to disgust men and women who believe that we are fighting for the Four Freedoms.

Western Front—Talk and Reality

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

THE worst thing that could happen to the United Nations would be the collapse of the Eastern front. That is admitted even by persons who deny the possibility of a Western front. Newspapers have almost dropped the habit of talking about a second front as a device to help "our hard-pressed Russian allies." More and more it is realized that the Russian front is our front, the Red Army our army, and the struggle along a thousand miles of blood-soaked Russian earth the only part of our war against Hitler that amounts to a row of shell holes.

If the Caucasus is lost, much more is lost than oil and territory. The Caucasus guards the entire Middle East from Nazi invasion. Even an Allied victory in Egypt would be meaningless with German armies driving through to the Persian Gulf and to the shores of the Mediterranean.

If the Caucasus is lost, or if the German army pushes down to the Caspian Sea, the central routes for the transportation of supplies into Russia will have been severed—the chief railway lines, the great inland waterways. Russia will not only have lost its own most valuable sources of oil and its most highly developed industries, it will have been cut off from all supplies from the outside world except such as can be convoyed through the dangerous northern sea route.

If the Eastern front collapses, the Nazis can send a hundred divisions to the West in case they choose to move in that direction. With no first front left in Russia, when could a second front be opened in Western Europe?

These desperate facts are known and accepted. There is really no debate about them. The unanswered questions are two: One, can Russia hold out if no help is available beyond that afforded by heavy Allied air-raids on Germany and Occupied Europe? And, second, if the chances are against Russian survival without a second front, is an effective invasion of the Continent possible?

Experts argue these questions over the air and in square miles of news print. Absolute disagreement is registered by responsible men who should have access to the same facts. But the general public, in America as in England, continues to demand a second front without regard to the calculations of officials or special writers. The demand is born of an instinctive feeling that inaction must again bring disaster, that risks must be taken even with the odds on the other side, that nothing could be worse in any case than the defeat of Russia.

Last week The Nation pointed out the obvious truth that the current clamor for a Western front is, in a sense, ex post facto. Either an invasion of the Continent has already been decided upon and planned to the last detail or no invasion can be launched in time to check the Nazi drang nach Osten. Either decisive action will be taken soon—within the next few weeks—or it will not be taken this year. So, from the point of view of practical advice, demands for a second front are all but senseless.

But advice is not the purpose of political agitation. And war is only partly a practical business involving amounts of equipment and plans of action. It is also a political—and therefore an emotional—business, a business involving the desires of men and the ambitions of leaders. The success of a given course of action may depend as much on these unpredictable sources of strength as on the slow, patient preparations that make possible the effective movement of planes and men, guns and tanks. A second front cannot be opened this summer as the result of public demand; but if a second is on the point of being opened its power will be multiplied by the popular desire, the sense of ardent participation, that has made itself manifest in recent weeks.

But if the passionate feeling of the people is a source of strength in time of action, it is a deadly threat if action is refused. The people believe that Roosevelt and Churchill promised a second front in 1942. The penalty for failure to keep that pledge would be too great for any politician to face; and the effect of such failure on the war effort here and in Britain and on Russia's fighting spirit would be beyond calculation. It is this obvious fact, more than the evidences of actual preparation, that leads me to believe a second front is going to be attempted. Public men as astute as the President and the British Prime Minister would never offer the people such broad promises, or allow popular feeling to rise to such heights if they did not mean to act. The demand for a second front is part of the preparation for a second front.

Japan's Second Front

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

ANY close observer of Japanese actions in the present war is at once impressed by two things: the marked ability of the Japanese to complete a definite plan successfully despite obstacles and losses, and the apparent uncertainty, lack of decisiveness, and opportunism once the basic plan has been worked out.

The first five months of Pacific warfare produced one of the fastest and most successful campaigns in history. Japan struck swiftly and powerfully at one objective after another, accepting occasional heavy losses and upsetting all its opponents' pre-arranged plans and time tables. But the days that followed the conquest of Burma have shown an entirely different picture. A Japanese fleet entered the Bay of Bengal, made threatening gestures at India, and did great damage before its retirement. Submarine and air raids have been conducted off the coasts of Australia. A strategically unsound attack was launched at our Hawaii-Midway area. China received increased attention and a Japanese submarine sank a Soviet merchant ship in the Sea of Okhotsk.

These tentative moves in many directions have led some military writers to the conclusion that Japan's purpose has been to mislead its opponents and thus mask its real intentions. While this may be partially true, it seems at least as likely that the Japanese, engaged in consolidating their gains, are "testing" the resistance at various prospective points of attack.

Whatever the motives, the process has already resulted in definite gains to the Japanese. It has caused the British to rush reinforcements to India, and the United States to employ its best general, a fair-sized body of troops, and desperately needed merchant shipping in Australia, an inactive theater of war and one very poorly adapted to serving as a base for offensive operations. However justified the move may have been from political and ethical standpoints, the diversion of large supplies to Australia has already been proved a strategic mistake.

After the Doolittle raid on Tokyo the Japanese shifted their main attention to China and started simultaneous offensives from several directions. But these gestures have recently weakened into what is mainly an attempt to take possession of air bases within bombing radius of Japan. Chinese resistance has been unexpectedly successful because—and this is important—Japanese divisions are now being diverted to Inner Mongolia and Manchukuo.

Since 1919 sporadic outbreaks have occurred between Russians and Japanese without bringing on war. But the success of Germany has introduced a new element into the situation. Japan may hesitate before taking so decisive a step as a full-fledged attack on the Soviet Union but, with Siberia weaker than it has been for some years, the common unreadiness of the two powers is no longer equal in degree. Police duties in its newly won empire employ only a small proportion of Japan's forces. India seems to have been abandoned as an immediate objective. Australia is probably not worth a major effort nor does it as yet offer any particular threat. The mid-Pacific has proved far too expensive. Japan apparently believes that China can wait. There remains, then, only Siberia.

Under normal conditions the Soviet Union enjoys an unusually favorable situation for offensive action in the Far East as compared to Japan. Bombers based at Vladivostok are in a position to raid virtually every major industrial center in the Japanese Empire. But much of this well-advertised advantage has been lost. At the time of Japan's entrance into the war the forces maintained on each side of the Manchukuoan-Siberian border were estimated at twenty-five divisions, or roughly 500,000 men. In both cases the troops were of excellent quality, with perhaps a slight advantage on the side of the Soviets, whose mechanized forces proved more than equal to their opponents in repeated frontier clashes. However, the ratio of these forces has undoubtedly changed. Japan has certainly diverted many of these border troops to its southern campaign, and the Russian reserves which last year repulsed the Germans before Moscow were Siberian troops. But the significant fact is that Japan is in a position to replace its border divisions while the Soviet Union is not.

The only information on the Soviet Far Eastern fleet is two years old and comes from the Japanese newspaper Hochi, which credits the Russians with 18 destroyers, 160 motor torpedo boats, and 70-odd submarines—a fairly formidable force in view of its closeness to Japan's centers but one which, due to its lack of heavy ships, would almost immediately have to yield command of the sea to Japan. There are probably 1,000 to 1,500 reasonably modern planes also available. Behind this front are lines of communication which are free from sea attack and reasonably safe from air raids but definitely vulnerable to attack by land.

Aside from the weakening effect of troop withdrawals, there is some danger that the ideal air base of Vladivostok could not be maintained for any length of time. Located at the very end of an extended peninsula, it can be supplied only by the long line of the Trans-Siberian Railway, a line which everywhere runs close to the borders of Manchukuo. Recognizing this vulnerability, the Soviets have developed several secondary bases farther north but these newer centers, farther from Japan, are naturally of much less offensive value.

The vast extent of the Soviet Far East in itself operates against complete or speedy conquest. Any adequate occupation would require months or even years. A weaker Red Army could if necessary retreat for some distance, pursuing a scorched earth policy, lengthening Japanese communication lines, and at the same time holding air bases from which to continue harassing the invader.

The significance of a second Russo-Japanese war to the United States is obvious. We have been urging the Russians to make their bases available to American bombers, but in an effort to placate Japan they have not only refused to allow the delivery of bombers for the European front via Alaska and Siberia but have even been unwilling to supply the technical information essential for full aid by this route. A new Siberian front would offer the hoped-for chance of bringing American troops to grips with the Japanese at the end of a much shorter transportation line than those now available. It would also provide an opportunity—the last and only good one we may have in the present war—to hit Japan hard by bombing from nearby bases.

Are we ready to take advantage of this opportunity? Not fully. The slowness of both the Canadian government and our own War Department has held up the building of a defense highway to Alaska which should be in use at the present moment. Air transportation and reinforcement by way of Alaska have been prevented by the Russians themselves.

A major proportion of troops and supplies, moreover, would have to go by ship and cross the North Pacific under heavy naval escort. Clashes with Japanese vessels would be frequent, and it is here that our services have been perhaps most at fault. The official Navy view that Japanese occupation of three barren Aleutian islands is not in itself a serious menace to the United States is substantially correct, since bases there are far from Alaska and much farther from the United States. But if we are to take any advantage of an additional land and air front, we have no right to allow our foes to occupy and consolidate positions along the route that would have to be followed by Pacific shipping. We should rather take steps to add to the security of this route by snatching the offensive away from Japan, by seizing and fortifying outposts in its own Kurile Islands. If we wait until the Siberian front has already been established, Japan will again determine our policy. We may then face the choice of abandoning an ally or taking an action which the enemy has already prepared to meet.

Who Is the State Department?

III. THE ASSISTANT SECRETARIAT

BY ROBERT BENDINER

ADOLF AUGUSTUS BERLE, JR., is the thinker of the State Department. He is its dreamer and its boldest planner. When Welles and Roosevelt agreed to make him an Assistant Secretary, despite the somewhat hostile indifference of Cordell Hull, they did not expect the subjects allotted to his post (finance, Canada, Greenland, and aviation) to occupy more than a corner of his brilliant, if unpredictable, mind. At forty-three Berle had amassed an impressive record. Son of a liberal Boston minister with marked ideas on child training, he had gotten off to a lightning start, emerging from Harvard with honors at the age of eighteen and from its law school at twenty-one, with a year out for his master's degree. After a brief apprenticeship with Brandeis he had spent a year in military intelligence work and wound up his war service as Wilson's adviser on Russian affairs at the Versailles Conference. He was then all of twenty-three. Corporation law, writing, and academic work in the fields of law and finance occupied him until the election of Roosevelt, who first made him financial adviser to the American embassy in Cuba and, later, special counsel to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. A term as chamberlain in the New York municipal government preceded his appointment to the State Department.

Berle was a natural choice for a post in the New Deal. He had long since discarded the Brandeis doctrine, and in "The Modern Corporation and Private Property," written with Gardiner Means, he accepted "bigness" as the essence of the corporate era. The solution to the problem of maldistribution, the authors agreed, lay not in the breaking up of giant business and financial structures but in strict government controls over management. By virtue of the wide distribution of corporate stocks, management had replaced ownership in the control of industry, they wrote, without retaining the checks and responsibilities that ownership had formerly imposed. While Berle went farther than most New Dealers in urging a concentration of power in the hands of government, his book unquestionably pointed the way to such controls as the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Little of Berle's importance in the department stems from his assigned areas of operation. Alone among the Assistant Secretaries he takes part in the major councils on foreign policy. He is also chief drafting officer of the department. More than any other individual, he frames the statements of policy which eventually appear, usually in drastically altered form, over the signatures of the Secretary or even the President. Most of the messages that were frantically dispatched to Europe's rulers in the days leading up to the debacle at Munich, and again in August 1939, were drafted by Berle.

A. A. Berle, Jr.

Another task adopted by Berle, and reputedly dear to his heart, is supervision of the department's informal intelligence service. On intimate terms with J. Edgar Hoover, with whom he exchanges information, Berle has himself taken to playing the G-man in a small way. One highly placed envoy on leave, incensed at having his mail opened and secretly photostated, went to the length of taking quarters in another government building rather than expose himself to this zealous departmental snooping. American travelers returning from wartime Europe are questioned at La Guardia Field by naval intelligence men concerning their activities abroad. In one instance an arrival protested that he was on his way to Washington and would divulge his information to the proper authorities. He was asked point blank whether he would see Berle and on giving an affirmative answer was permitted to pass. It has even been charged that Berle has agents in other government departments. This cannot be proved but it is known that he keeps a sharp eye on liberal and radical movements and has kept many an anti-fascist refugee from getting a visa on the faint suspicion that he might be tainted with Stalinism.

Overflow work from the Welles desk, particularly on Latin American affairs, occupies a good deal of Berle's attention. As Counselor to the Embassy in Havana in 1933, he supported Welles in the Cespedes affair, and, like Hull and Welles, he is impressed with the extreme importance of hemispheric cooperation. But he too sees unity in terms of political negotiation with governments rather than through a more fundamental appeal to the people of the hemisphere. Thus he viewed the seizure of St. Pierre and Miquelon not as a victory for the forces of democracy, but rather as a technical contravention of the Act of Havana, even though the move accorded perfectly with the spirit of that agreement to keep the Axis out of the Americas.

Berle manages so well to combine this formalistic approach in action with the most eloquent flights of theory that he frequently serves as the department's interpreter to liberals of all shades. He is accessible, cordial, and free with his time, and his wide-ranging conversation is fascinating as an intellectual exercise. Berle's mind is much occupied with the post-war world, particularly America's economic demobilization, which he believes will have to be as carefully regulated and financed by the government as the mobilization has been if we are to avoid a catastrophe. He has not allowed his enthusiastic hostility to Communism and Communists to blind him to the necessity for wholehearted cooperation with the Soviet Union for the duration—and perhaps even after. Similarly, a more than faint anti-British bias had to be doused when war came.

Not of the rich stock that characterizes the department, Berle married into the Bishop family, resting on the bedrock of New York real estate and substantial enough to make the Social Register. The Berles are not prominent in the social life of the capital though they do considerable entertaining in Latin American diplomatic circles.

Socialistically minded liberals who rejoiced when Berle was appointed to the department have long since ceased to regard him as a champion. More than four years after his appointment to the post, Berle has left no mark on the course of American foreign policy. On the contrary, that policy has left a mark on him. Intimacy with great events seems to have developed in him a scorn for the idealism of his old friends and a sense of infallibility which has won him few new ones. The man who, by his own admission, went into the department "on condition that I could do some dreaming" before long became the overly shrewd diplomat who fully endorsed the appeasement of Japan, who saw the problem of Vichy solely in "military" terms, without regard for the implications of political warfare, who schemed along with his colleagues to buy Franco and Pétain with food, credits, and diplomatic favors. It was Berle who in the days preceding Munich urged that we should not be "swung off base by either diplomacy or emotion." Alsop and Kintner, in their quasi-official "American White Paper," quote a memorandum by Berle pleading "for the most hard-headed—even cold-hearted—approach to the Czecho-Slovak question."

Passionately opposed to the materialism of the Marxists but still believing in some vague form of socialism, convinced of the need for strong government controls over the national economy, and attracted to the play of power politics, Berle inspires doubt on all sides. People admire his brilliance, his potency in argument, the broad perspectives that he brings to the department; but he does not command the confidence that would be accorded a steadier, if less glittering, mind.

II

None of those complexities of character which make Berle the Great Anomaly of the department afflict the Assistant Secretary next in line. The Breckinridges of Kentucky and the Longs of Virginia combined to make in him a Democrat of the old school, a politician of pure and simple lines who strayed into the State Department by chance instead of going to Congress by way of the Missouri State Legislature. Born in St. Louis sixty-one years ago, Breckinridge Long came East to Princeton at the turn of the century. He studied under Wilson, and the connection proved fruitful. Returning to St. Louis to practice law, Long married Christine Graham, a granddaughter of the General Blair who had held Missouri in line for the Union and a daughter of the rich paper-manufacturing Graham family. Out of his wife's ample fortune Long contributed generously to the Wilson campaigns and found himself in 1917 as third Assistant Secretary of State (the Assistants were ranked in those days). The Republican victory of 1920 eased him out of office, and, like Hull, to whom he had become attached and who had likewise been buried under the Harding landslide, he joined the party machine. An ardent League of Nations champion, he contested the party's Senatorial nomination with Jim Reed in 1922 and lost. Long's ardor for the League, incidentally, was not enduring. To conciliate American isolationists, he successfully fought the transfer of the League's International Labor Office to the United States when the war broke out, and the ILO ultimately found haven in Canada.

After the Senatorial defeat the Longs bought a racing stable and an estate near Washington and settled down to become leaders in the ultra-fashionable social set of the capital. While waiting for a turn in the political tide, Long continued to contribute to the party's campaign chests and remained in close touch with its leaders. As one of the Wilson-House group, he had come to know Franklin D. Roosevelt and in 1932 he backed the New York governor against the opposition of the group headed by Newton D. Baker. At Chicago he served as Roosevelt's floor manager and again contributed sizably to the campaign fund. The President, whether or not he regards Long highly as a statesman, retains a personal fondness for him as an old friend and supporter and as a convivial fellow.

It was inevitable that with Roosevelt elected and Hull installed as Secretary of State, Long should come into his reward. Just as Berle came in as a Welles man—only to break sharply with him—so Long reentered the department as the Secretary's man and has always been scorned by Welles. He was sent to Italy and soon appeared to forget his worship of Jefferson in his admiration for Mussolini. Long burned the cables with advice to his government not to invoke oil sanctions against Italy, and when his counsel prevailed and the democracies had given the first great proof of their unwillingness to contest the advance of the fascist states, he told Louis Fischer that he was very happy because he had "helped avert a European war."

Long's role in blocking oil sanctions was grounded on more than a fear that Il Duce would declare war in retaliation. The Ambassador was so attracted to the regime that he could even speak of the Ethiopian victory as the "fruitful harvest of Mussolini's enterprise." In the summer of 1936 he resigned, ostensibly for reasons of health, though it was hinted at the time that his indiscreet approbation of Il Duce's "enterprise" might have had something to do with his return to Washington.

For three years Long worked intermittently at odd jobs in private life. One of these, strangely enough in the light of his subsequent efforts to obtain help for Franco, was a fruitless lobbying campaign to lift the Spanish embargo, undertaken at the behest of pro-Loyalist organizations at a handsome fee.

In matters of policy Long does not rate as an important figure in the department. Since his freely offered assurances that Mussolini was too smart to get sucked into the war he has been chary of offering political advice. Until the spring of 1941 he was chairman of the Board of Foreign Service Personnel, but his most conspicuous task as Assistant Secretary, before the United States entered the war, was the supervision of Avra Warren's Visa Division. And the record of that division ranks as a monument of ineptitude and callousness.

It is impossible here to review the scandalous story of the department's handling of the refugee problem, but it is noteworthy that some of the most ardent official defenders of appeasement grow apologetic over this aspect of the department's record. The ultimate failure of the refugee policy does not lie primarily in the number of victims admitted. That has been woeful enough, to be sure, but here the role of Congress cannot be ignored, nor can a badly informed public opinion. The department's policy had deeper defects than the numerical: its essence lay in the systematic discrimination that was practiced against all those who had in any organized fashion dared to oppose the tyranny of fascism. It was not that the department favored fascism but merely that it distrusted anyone who was vocal in opposing that curse of the twentieth century, the flat assumption being that the dissident must be a radical. As a result, the crudest tests of political conservatism were applied and the most endangered victims were in all too many cases the ones least likely to be admitted.

Breckinridge Long

Among the consuls—ultimately responsible to Mr. Long in the matter of visas—prejudice, indifference, and maddening red tape were the order of the day. Officials like Ogden Hammond, Jr., in Vienna, Leland B. Morris in Berlin, and James B. Stewart in Zurich were openly charged with anti-Semitism. When complaints were filed with Long, he is said to have admitted that anti-Semitism existed in the service, but no action of any kind was taken against these outer guardians of American democracy. Long, moreover, opposed any congressional change in the quotas themselves, and Warren was given to boasting of how he had reduced the issuance of visas to a minimum.

The Department has always been quick to explain that great care had to be taken to protect the country from fascist agents in the guise of refugees. Fascists without disguise, however, had little trouble getting in. No suspicion attached to Pierre Massin, for example, although he had financed the rise of the virulent Jacques Doriot and although, as he was at no pains to conceal, he was in good standing with German officials in Paris. John Makkai, a Hungarian of the same stripe, was admitted with similar ease. So was Armand Gregoire, a French fascist who had even made a quick visit to Germany three weeks before he got the visa that enabled him to come here to "study law." But the young son of the former Foreign Minister of the Spanish Republic was denied a visa because his father's past was suspect in the eyes of Avra Warren and Breckinridge Long. And Free French aviators were even refused permission to cross American territory on their way to Canadian training fields.

Even as a bureaucrat Long has little to recommend him. Whatever the President may owe him for political services rendered, his status as an Assistant Secretary of State comes under the head of Presidential luxuries.

III

A newcomer to the department and something of a stranger to its traditions is Assistant Secretary Dean G. Acheson. His appointment early in 1941 was hailed as an attempt by the President to inject fresh corpuscles into the sluggish bloodstream of the department, perhaps to compensate for Berle's failure to live up to expectations. It is still too early to predict the success or failure of the operation. Mildly progressive in his personal views, Acheson would hardly rate as a fire-eater in other agencies of the government. His education (Groton-Yale-Harvard) is in the best State Department tradition and his social and financial status compares favorably with that of most of his colleagues. His previous experience in the Roosevelt Administration was a brief tenure in the post of Under Secretary of the Treasury in 1933. Berated as a "sound money man," he resigned after six months and returned to his private law practice in the capital.

Acheson's reputation as a liberal stems in part from the fact that he was a protégé of Brandeis and for two years served as the Justice's secretary. More than that, he has been outstandingly sympathetic on the refugee issue, he and his wife having even arranged parties for the benefit of the Emergency Rescue Committee. Acheson's firm—Covington, Burling, Rublee, Acheson and Shorb—has acted as Washington counsel for a wide range of corporations and causes. He appeared before the United States Supreme Court as attorney for the Ethyl Corporation, owned jointly by Du Pont and Standard Oil of New Jersey, but before the same court he also argued the New York minimum wage case.

Acheson has always favored the more militant aspects of the President's foreign policy, and his private condemnation of his colleagues' conduct in the affair of St. Pierre and Miquelon was spirited in the extreme. On the other hand, his own militancy left something to be desired on the occasion of the department's fight against the Gillette-Coffee resolution. This measure, proposed in the summer of 1941, called for an investigation of the leak of American supplies to the Axis countries. Acheson was chosen to present the department's case to a Congressional committee, and the case he made was the same mess of contradictions which the department had been serving up long before his arrival on the scene. In the words of I. F. Stone, he argued "that disclosure of the facts would be unwise; that the facts are already disclosed in Department of Commerce reports; that exports to countries friendly to the Axis are being carefully watched; that, of course, although they are being carefully watched, there is no way of being sure supplies are not being forwarded to the Axis; that one must be careful in shutting off supplies to countries friendly to the Axis because that would make them friendly to the Axis." The argument may have lacked logic but, coming from a recently appointed interventionist, it was taken as a sign that the President opposed the resolution, which was promptly abandoned. Viewed either as Acheson's own convictions or as a first painful surrender, the performance was not promising. It is possible, of course, that Acheson was simply made the departmental goat on this occasion and that better things are to be expected from him.

IV

The most recently appointed of the Assistant Secretaries is the one who has been longest in the service, in fact the only real career man among them, Gardiner Howland Shaw. A scholar and a deeply religious man, Shaw is less political than any other high official in the department. Personnel is his chief concern, and although he has been in charge too short a time to make any kind of record, he conveys the impression of being genuinely eager to abandon the snobbish standards of the department. Independently wealthy himself and equipped with the standard Boston-Harvard background, Shaw diverges sharply from the usual pattern. Aloof from Washington society, he leads an austere bachelor existence, giving much of his wealth and time to penal reform and to charities for children. His social philosophy centers about a kind of religious humanism. "Where American ideals are concerned," he once wrote in Commonweal, "there has so far been no New Deal," and he counsels his readers to turn inward and cultivate the "ideal of success based upon the interior life." In the scheming world of the State Department it is a bit of a shock to come upon the advice that "we can learn from a Lord Grey of Falloodon who found it possible to study birds and enjoy the poetry of Wordsworth while at the same time carrying the heaviest of burdens as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, or a Monsieur Herriot who has written a biography of Beethoven in the midst of an arduous and distinguished political career, or a Kenneth Grahame, who successfully combined important duties at the Bank of England and the authorship of a series of particularly delightful books for children." If Mr. Shaw's gentle philosophy does not especially equip him to confront Axis thuggery on the diplomatic front, neither does it stand in the way of his being a capable administrator and, as a judge of personnel, a vast improvement over his predecessor, Breckinridge Long.

[The concluding article of this series, to appear in the next issue, will tell "Why the Cow Is Sacred"—why a fighting President conciliates a department so frequently at odds with his fundamental purposes.]

Two-Way Stretch

BY SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE

NOW that all good citizens have ransacked their premises from attic to garage in search of rubber to be salvaged for the war effort, a few notes on replacements seem to be in order. The shortage of rubber is so acute and has been so widely publicized that those who have parted with articles not easily spared may possibly not realize that as yet there appear to be few rubber gadgets (except tires and tubes) that one need do without. Tires and tubes, as everyone knows, have been frozen for months. Everyone knows, too, that confiscation of those now in use has been hinted more than once by government spokesmen as a not impossible step, and that there is constant talk of nation-wide gasoline rationing to force conservation of tires. But rubber—rubber for comfort, convenience, beautification, amusement—is still to be had at modest prices and in large quantity in the usual over-the-counter transactions, without a by-your-leave to Mr. Henderson, Mr. Nelson, or any other official gainsayer.

I propose to furnish a sort of guide to replacements of rubber articles donated for reclamation. It will not be complete. The rubber shortage being what it is, patriotism and economy dictated a halt in my researches when they had worn the second pair of rubber heels down to the leather.

One word of warning. These researches were completed in late July, 1942, a little more than seven months after Pearl Harbor, five months after the fall of Singapore, and four months after the fall of the Dutch East Indies. We have lost access to 90 per cent of the world's supply of raw rubber, and our stocks are dwindling. I am told that most of the rubber goods now available were on hand or on order by January 1, and when they are exhausted there will be few or no replacements.

If you have responded to the appeal for rubber by donating the very erasers out of your pencils, you need not cross out the misspelled word. You can still buy plenty of new pencils, with the usual erasers. Or you can buy slip-on erasers, containing only a little more rubber than those you donated, which will enable you to use up the old pencils with no inconvenience. There are also the usual large separate erasers in harder and softer rubber, adapted to all needs. And if you have reluctantly tossed your typewriter eraser into the salvage container, you will not be forced to pay for your generosity by becoming more accurate. You will find plenty more, either with or without the little attached brush.

Broken nails need not be the price for parting with your rubber typewriter keys, for these can be replaced. And you need not waste another minute tying and untying knots of string because you have donated all your rubber bands. These are on sale in opulent variety, from

OUR RUBBER SITUATION

SUPPLY

TOTAL STOCKS JANUARY 1st. 693,000 TO.

CRUDE RUBBER IMPORTS 434,000 TO.

TOTAL SUPPLY 1,157,000 TONS

SYNTHETIC RUBBER
PRODUCTION 30,000 TONS

1942

DEMAND

ARMED FORCES: LEND-LEASE
307,000 TO.

CIVIL CONSUMPTION
150,000 TO.

TO NON-AXIS COUNTRIES
198,000 TO.

CARRY-OVER

502,000 TONS

TOTAL DEMAND 655,000 TONS

SUPPLY

FROM CARRY-OVER 502,000 TO.

CRUDE RUBBER
IMPORTS
135,000 TO.

SYNTHETIC RUBBER PRODUCTION
350,000 TO.

TOTAL SUPPLY 987,000 TONS

1943

DEMAND

ARMED FORCES: LEND-LEASE
463,000 TO.

CIVIL CONSUMPTION
124,000 TO.

TO NON-AXIS COUNTRIES
198,000 TO.

CARRY-OVER

202,000 TONS

TOTAL DEMAND 785,000 TONS

SUPPLY

FROM CARRY-OVER
202,000 TO.

CRUDE RUBBER IMPORTS
98,000 TO.

SYNTHETIC RUBBER PRODUCTION 800,000 TO.

TOTAL SUPPLY 1,100,000 TONS

1944

DEMAND

ARMED FORCES: LEND-LEASE
463,000 TO.

U. S. CIVILIANS
124,000 TO.

TO NON-AXIS COUNTRIES
198,000 TO.

CARRY-OVER

315,000 TONS

TOTAL DEMANDS 785,000 TONS

GRAPHIC BY PICK-S

the three-inch loop which you tried to stretch to eighteen, to the loop which measures a good eighteen inches without stretching.

You can also replace the little rubber sponge in its glass dish, which you bravely decided to do without. Or if you prefer to moisten your envelopes with those bits of rubber sponge ingeniously set in a smooth rubber holder fitted into a glass tube, you may have those instead. You will find rubber date stamps, and your stationer will still make up special rubber stamps to order.

The woman addicted to the rubber makeup pad need not be torn between her desire to be beautiful and her impulse to be patriotic. She can indulge both by tossing the old pad onto the salvage heap and replacing it with enough new ones for a long duration. The Good-year company puts out an "automatic compact" called "Vic-tex," ingeniously fashioned from two round pieces of fine rubber sponge welded together at the edges, with an opening on one side through which powder can be inserted. Other aids to beauty are rubber complexion brushes, rubber curlers in fascinating variety, and ingenious rubber rollers which will hold your locks firmly in an eight or nine-inch roll on the back of your neck without benefit of hairpins.

Rubber bathing shoes are still to be had, as well as rubber-soled sneakers; also a perfect rainbow of rubber shower caps and bathing caps. One ingenious cap of very thin rubber comes compressed into a little ball tied up in a cellophane bag, and is so stretchy that it can be draped to taste. Many shops carry rubber-lined beach bags; and you can still find the inflatable rubber fish and swans and water balls that children and grown-ups like to take in swimming.

In these days when you are walking to save rubber, it will be a comfort to know that the supply of rubber heels and soles is holding up well. Like rubber stoppers and numerous other household articles, these are of reclaimed rubber, use of which by manufacturers was unrestricted until a couple of months ago. You can still buy the elastic bands which relieve the strain on arches and ankles. Elastic may still be had by the yard, too, in all the usual widths.

The corset makers are experimenting with new materials in the effort to secure flexibility and elasticity without rubber. But the customer need not experiment—yet. The elastic girdle is by no means a thing of wistful memory; nor is the girdle of pure rubber. Garment grippers of "live rubber" will keep blouse and skirt, or shirt and trousers, from parting company.

The variety of gadgets for the home is bewildering. You will be able to replace the rubber mat with its little suction cups, which kept you from breaking your neck in the shower. You can also buy the spongy kind, in an assortment of pretty colors. You can buy rubber covers for your bathroom shelves, and rubber-coated racks for your towels. The supply of rubber bath sponges holds up well. Indeed, in a certain de luxe five-and-ten I found the great granddaddy of all rubber sponges, intended for your car, but also recommended for your person. Weight, five ounces; price, twenty-five cents, which is cheap at a time when your morning paper tells you day after day that every ounce of rubber is precious.

Rubber mats are not confined to the needs of the bath. There are mats to protect the top of your stove, to place before the door or the sink; round utility mats in several sizes. You can buy rubber-coated dish drainers and plate racks, rubber faucet sprays and faucet connections, door-knob covers, toilet-seat bumpers, toilet-box plungers, holders for deodorant. There are rubber-insulated domes of silence, rubber cups for the feet of chairs and sofas, rubber tips for chair legs, bumper tacks, floor stoppers, suction cups, candle fitters, fly swatters, wedges for doors and windows. The supply of extension cords and plugs seems endless. Rubber covered flashlights can still be had. You can even buy electric fans with rubber blades into which the children can thrust their hands with impunity.

The children need not yet forego their rubber toys—animals and dolls that squeak, rubber balls, rubber-tired toy automobiles and planes large enough to ride in. One super-de luxe roadster has pneumatic tires perhaps an eighth the size of those you placed on the salvage heap. Bicycles, tricycles, and scooters are purchasable, all rubber tired, and doll carriages large enough to hold the baby. Balloons are plentiful, and toss-ups in amusing forms, from bunny rabbits to an image of your Uncle Sam with the slogan "Remember Pearl Harbor" neatly lettered across his lower limbs.

This should give you a fair idea of the myriad articles of need, comfort, convenience, and luxury still freely available in the scarcest of our strategic materials. I have left out rubber for therapeutic uses. One must stop somewhere; and besides such articles have priority ratings.

While you are replacing your garden hose with "victory hose" of rubber-lined fabric, or buying your winter goloshes or some new toys for the children, you may feel like picking up something for the salvage heap. I learn that as yet the government has made no move to secure retail stocks of rubber for the war effort. Perhaps the experts attach no importance to them, but the mere layman finds them impressive when he remembers that imports have practically ceased. Indeed, he can't help reflecting that military uses, added to civilian uses exclusive of tires and tubes, must be putting quite a two-way stretch on our rubber stock pile. A "buy-rubber-for-salvage" week might help. I would gladly open it by donating my five-ounce rubber automobile sponge. I only bought it to find out how much it weighed. An automobile sponge isn't really of much use when your car has no tires.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Targets for Tonight

WE ARE all becoming painfully familiar with the term logistics—"that branch of the military art," to quote my dictionary, "which embraces the details of transport and supply." We know how much the United Nations are handicapped by the fact that their main industrial centers are separated by wide seas from the fighting fronts, making the shipping shortage our No. 1 bottleneck. Hitler, on the other hand, with his supply bases in the midst of a compact land mass, can use lines of communication corresponding to the radii of a circle, and in all his major campaigns he has had available a highly developed network of railroads and highways.

Nevertheless, it is well to remember that, despite these geographical advantages, Hitler is also suffering from logistics trouble. His transport facilities were never adequate for a long war and after three years of campaigning they are strained to the utmost, so that a scientifically designed bombing offensive aimed at the weakest links may well throw the whole system into confusion. From the beginning the R. A. F. in its raids on Germany and German occupied territory has always regarded transport as among its major objectives. How often we have read of the bombing of Hamm, the site of enormous freight marshaling yards! And the constant attacks on Bremen and Hamburg are designed not merely to destroy factories, warehouses, and shipyards but to render these ports unusable for shipping.

Leaving aside air transport, which the Nazis have used very effectively but which at present cannot be relied upon for mass movements of men and freight, Germany has four interlocking systems of communication—sea-shipment, inland waterways, roads, and railroads. Before the war, a great deal of the trade between Germany and its allied countries was carried on by sea. Coal exports from the Ruhr to Italy went by barge to Rotterdam and were there transferred to ships sailing through the Straits of Gibraltar. Oil from Rumania, ores and agricultural products from the Balkans, were brought to Germany by sea. Now this traffic must move, if at all, by the Danube or by rail and the task of transporting even a bare minimum of coal to Italy by rail monopolizes a large number of locomotives and freight cars.

Sea routes were also important for inland trade. Coal and heavy manufactures from the Rhineland used to move by sea through the Kiel Canal to East Prussia, which sent return cargoes of grain and potatoes. At the beginning of the war the combined German and Italian merchant marine, including all vessels over 100 tons, totaled 7.9 million tons. Up to the end of last year the British claimed that they had captured, sunk, or severely damaged no less than 5.225 million tons of Axis shipping. This far exceeds the estimated new construction in Germany and Italy together with tonnage captured in occupied countries. The possibilities of sea transport, therefore, are now severely restricted. Ships creeping down the North Sea coast are constantly attacked by British planes and naval units and even the Baltic has become so dangerous that almost all the ferry services to Denmark and Sweden have recently been discontinued.

Germany has five important navigable rivers—the Rhine, Elbe, Ems, Oder, and Danube—linked together by an extensive canal system. While preparing for the war, the Nazis did much to improve these waterways and this policy has undoubtedly paid them dividends. But there are many signs that the system has become congested in its efforts to relieve the overburdened railroads. Last winter orders went forth that certain classes of freight must be dispatched only by water, but not long after another order forbade the use of the Danube system for short hauls. Inland waterways offer some tempting bombing targets. The recent plastering of Duisburg, the greatest inland port in Europe, has undoubtedly put a severe crimp in its shipping activities. Regensburg on the Danube, the transshipment post for Rumanian oil, is probably high on the R. A. F.'s priority list of places to be visited when the nights are longer. And the new aqueduct which carries the Mittelland Canal over the Elbe near Magdeburg certainly merits some high explosives.

In the pre-war period, super-highways were Hitler's favorite public works, and many people believe that they represent one of his most serious errors, for gas and rubber shortages greatly restrict their use in war. Road traffic in Germany now is confined to short hauls and can make only a minor contribution to the solution of transport problems.

While road building boomed railroads were neglected. As early as 1938 they were operating at near capacity, and an official report that year spoke of the urgent need for 100,000 new freight cars. In his recent book, "Will Germany Crack?" Paul Hagen provides much evidence of the overstrained condition of the railroad system and reports numerous accidents, some due no doubt to sabotage, but many caused by defective material. Lack of efficient lubricants, in particular, has led to the rapid deterioration of rolling stock.

From its western conquests Germany was able to loot 2,500 locomotives and 150,000 freight cars, which alleviated for a time the transportation crisis. But the Russian campaign has multiplied the strain on the railroads without producing any similar compensation. The Red Army left little equipment behind, and German locomotives proved unable to stand up to the Russian winter as Hitler himself has admitted. Moreover the Eastern campaign so drained reserves of rolling stock that unnecessary passenger travel has been made a crime, and cities like Berlin are short of vital coal and food because supplies cannot be moved. Yet if a second front is established, the German railroads must shoulder the task of rushing reinforcements from the east. That is why British fighter planes are now peppering every locomotive they can catch and why intensive bombing of every junction, major railroad bridge, freight yard, and repair shop that can be reached is an essential prelude to an Anglo-American invasion of the continent.

[Keith Hutchison will be on vacation during August but will resume Everybody's Business in September.]

In the Wind

THE FIGHTING FRENCH may go on occupying St. Pierre and Miquelon but the American State Department has neither forgotten nor forgiven. M. Alain Savary, present Administrator of the islands, arrived recently in Montreal intending to proceed from there to Washington and New York for consultation with De Gaullists in this country. He has been informed by the American consul that his application for a visa has been rejected on orders from Washington.

AMERICAN TROOPS in Great Britain who now know enough to avoid using the word "bloody" in mixed company can thank Eric Knight, the novelist, for their education in British usage. Mr. Knight, it turns out, is the author of the unsigned and excellent "Guide to Britain" provided for the enlightenment of the A. E. F.

TWO NEW COMMITTEES have sprung up to fill crying needs in American life. One is established to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the appearance of the first greeting card. The other is the National Hallowe'en Committee, which feels that because of the war "this year, more than ever, there is certain to be great activity centered around the traditional Hallowe'en celebration."

FUNDAMENTAL CONTRIBUTION to the social sciences by Gill Robb Wilson, president of the National Aeronautic Association: "I hold that air commerce properly belongs in the category of free private enterprise since it can if properly fostered by Government sustain itself on the profit motive and provide social security for the quota of society therein engaged."

THE TROTSKYITE PAPER, the Militant, has published a letter from a German underground worker asserting that several Trotskyists in the Reich early in 1941 learned of the coming attack on Russia and informed the Soviet Embassy. Their information, which is said to have included even the names of the divisions to be used, was taken into account in the Soviets' preparedness plans.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item, —EDITORS THE NATION.]

The Truth about Hungary

ACCORDING to Professor Renner's "geo-political" map of post-war Europe, Hungary has been permanently handed over to Germany.

How did Hungary happen to become a puppet of the Nazis?

What does "revisionism" mean? And why has it resulted in a Hungarian brand of Nazism?

What is the objective of Hungarian propaganda?

These and many other questions are answered in a timely 48-page booklet by Rustem Vambery, well-known Hungarian criminologist and sociologist, who has written extensively on Central European problems and whose articles have frequently appeared in The Nation.

Mr. Vambery's booklet, part of which appeared in Foreign Affairs, shows how the Magyar people can escape from the domination of the semi-feudal military dictators of their country. Since Hungary's central position in southern Europe and the social structure of the Magyar population lend the Hungarian problem more than local importance, Mr. Vambery believes that only a Danubian Federation, as suggested in this booklet, offers an adequate solution of the Hungarian problem if it is to be solved in the interest of the Hungarian people and the future peace of Europe.

Nation Readers

can acquire a copy of this valuable booklet, priced only 10c, by filling out the coupon below and mailing it with the remittance to The Nation. Special rates on large quantities will be furnished on request.

CONVENIENT ORDER FORM

THE NATION • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York, N. Y.

Please send me a copy of "The Truth About Hungary," the new 48-page booklet by Rustem Vambery. I inclose 10c.

NAME.....

STREET.....

CITY.....

STATE.....

BOOKS and the ARTS

One Morning the World Woke Up

BY OSCAR WILLIAMS

One morning the world woke up and there was no news;
No gun was shelling the great ear drum of the air,
No Christian flesh spurted beneath the subtle screws,
No moaning came from the many agony-faced Jews,
Only the trees in a gauze of wind trembled and were fair.

No trucks climbed into the groove of an endless road,
No tanks were swaying drunken with death at the hilltop,
No bombs were planting their bushes of blood and mud,
And the aimless tides of unfortunates no longer flowed:
A break in the action at last . . . all had come to a stop.

Those trees danced, in their delicate selves half furled
And a new time on the glittering atmosphere was seen;
The lightning stuttering on the closed eyelid of the world
Was gone, and an age of horizons had dawned, soft, pearly,
The world woke up to a scene like spring's first green.

Birds chirped in waterfalls of little sounds for hours,
Rainbows, in miniature nuggets, were stored in the dews,
The sky was one vast moonstone of the tenderest blues,
And the meadows lay carpeted in three heights of flowers:
One morning the world woke up and there was no news.

Two Studies of Appeasement

WITH JAPAN'S LEADERS. By Frederick Moore. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

JAPAN RIDES THE TIGER. By Willard Price. The John Day Company. $2.50.

BOOKS about our enemy in the Far East continue to come off the presses. The publishers are inspired perhaps by the desire to provide badly needed information to a reading public which has been subsisting on an unbalanced European diet and by the hope that one of them may succeed in puncturing American apathy.

The reader of Frederick Moore's book is bound to suspect that the author desired to explain and apologize for his long service to the Japanese government. In a frank autobiographical account, the more convincing for its naivete, Mr. Moore recalls his fourteen years as counselor to the Japanese government, a period which came to an ugly end on December 7 when he found himself in the unenviable position of being employed by the Japanese Embassy in Washington while bombs were falling on Pearl Harbor. There was little idealism in Mr. Moore's decision to work for the Japanese, who paid him $500 a month plus 10,000 yen a year, as he stated in his report to the State Department, with which he was registered as a Japanese agent. His employment was not legally improper, but to many persons his support of the Japanese cause through these years, when he knew so much of their aims and methods, will appear morally and intellectually questionable.

Mr. Moore recalls with justifiable pride that when he was stationed in Peking as a news correspondent he cabled to this country the first reports of the notorious "twenty-one demands" which Japan made on China in 1915. Did these mean nothing more to him than news stories? Japanese treachery and aggressive intentions were fully exposed at that time and were revealed again during the Paris Peace Conference in 1919, which Mr. Moore also covered as a news correspondent; yet with full knowledge of these things he went to work for them in 1921 as "adviser on international affairs."

Had Mr. Moore limited himself to purely technical work, such as correcting the faulty English of official communications translated from the Japanese, he would have been no more at fault than numerous other foreigners employed by the Japanese. But in serving the Japanese as an "adviser," which covered everything from making contacts for Japanese officials to hiring a butler for the ambassador, Mr. Moore acted as an apologist for Japanese aggression. In 1932 he joined his friend Yosuke Matsuoka, whom Secretary Hull later called "as crooked as a basket of fishhooks"—I personally had occasion to learn in Tokyo that this was an understatement—in defense of Japan's invasion of Manchuria before the League of Nations. "I felt that Japan had considerable arguments to present to the League, and I was glad to be of assistance to her government," he writes. In March, 1932, during a discussion at the Institute for Far Eastern Affairs at the American University in Washington, he presented one of his "arguments." He suggested that the Japanese could defend China from Russia!

Mr. Moore explains in his book that he defended Japan because "Western peoples were not warranted in denouncing the nation for imperialism that was relatively limited compared with the imperialisms of Britain, France, and Russia." This was a view of international affairs that fitted in nicely with Japanese propaganda.

Mr. Moore, however, did more than justify Japanese aggression. He made a serious effort to restrain American intervention in the Far East at a time when we might have been able to check the Japanese without recourse to arms. At a Town Hall discussion in New York in 1937, the year in which the Japanese started the "China incident," Mr. Moore urged an American policy of strict neutrality and hands off.

It may be recalled that Mr. Moore is the author of another book, published in 1929 and called "America's Naval Challenge," free copies of which were distributed to members of Congress. Disparaging the Administration's efforts to bring the American navy up to parity with the British, Mr. Moore said: "In no case are we likely to have war with that country [England] or Japan, unless this country is responsible in a large part for it." He insisted that America did not need to maintain a navy capable of defending the Philippines. "We should maintain armament for the proper home defense of our possessions, from Alaska and from Maine to the Panama Canal, but not for defense across the Atlantic or across the Pacific"—advice with which the Japanese were thoroughly in accord.

After the resumption of the China invasion in 1937, Mr. Moore found it increasingly difficult to defend his employers, and is indignant that only five years after the seizure of Manchuria the Japanese should have sought more loot. He did not, however, resign his post. Japan had begun to "ride the tiger," and Mr. Moore like his employers found it difficult to dismount. Mr. Moore says he continued in their service in the hope that he could serve both the United States and Japan by attempting to prevent war, although it had already become clear that peace could be purchased only by surrender to the Japanese program of conquest.

Mr. Moore, together with his fellow-isolationists and appeasers, failed to realize until it was very late that national disaster was implied in their counsel. We might have had peace in 1931, when Mr. Moore found Stimson's policies so distasteful, or even in 1937, when he advised a "hands-off policy," but in 1941 all that was left was "hope." It was Ambassador Saito who pointed out to his somewhat startled adviser the wisdom of a strong American policy by saying he hoped Congress would approve the fortification of Guam because "the effect would be valuable upon our militarists."

Willard Price's new book is largely a rewritten version of his "Children of the Rising Sun," published in 1938. In the earlier book the author saw with exceptional clarity the course of Japanese aggression but was completely at a loss about how it should be met. In fact, his suggestion was not to meet it at all. He virtually conceded Japanese domination of the Far East and, like Mr. Moore, suggested that the United States withdraw. Like Mr. Moore again, he thought that "our best hope may be through Japan," with which country we carried on more trade than with any other in the Orient. He even questioned the value of a military victory over Japan because "things would soon be just as before."

Mr. Price's new book eliminates the numerous inaccuracies and outdated views of his old one, while retaining much interesting and important information about the Japanese people, whom Mr. Price understood better than he did the international situation.

JOSEPH NEWMAN

The Mind of Nehru

GLIMPSES OF WORLD HISTORY. By Jawaharlal Nehru.
The John Day Company. $4.

A HISTORY of the world by the second most important leader of India naturally arouses great interest. It is, if nothing more, a testimony to the intellectual versatility of its author, who amid the activities of political life has read so widely and gathered facts so intelligently that he has managed to produce a quite creditable survey of world history, not inferior to Wells's "Outline of History," to which incidentally the author acknowledges his indebtedness. Interest in the work is increased by the knowledge that the book was written in prison in the period 1931-34, and that it was meant primarily for his youngest daughter. The chapters are in the form of dated letters to her, but the personal element is never obtrusive. Many chapters were obviously written for a larger audience, for they would hardly be comprehensible to a small girl.

It cannot be claimed that the book as history contains anything striking or original, although its emphasis on Oriental events and its treatment of the great heroes of the East wholesomely offset the usual historical survey which makes world history ancillary to the history of Europe. The author has some difficulty in finding a pattern to give meaning to the panorama of events that he records. He presents modern history primarily as a struggle between imperialism and nationalism, and his position as a nationalist leader prompts him to regard this struggle as a conflict between good and evil, but he is too conscious of the divisive force of nationalism in the world to hold to such a thesis resolutely.

Most of us will probably be more interested in the glimpses into Nehru's own mind that the book affords than in its presentation of world history. Among the great leaders of history Akbar, Napoleon, and Lenin claim his particular interest. Akbar he regards as "in a sense—the father of Indian nationalism," a "wise despot," who made commendable efforts to synthesize Hindu and Moslem culture. Of Lenin he declares that "as time passes he grows greater; he has become one of the chosen company of the world's immortals." His enthusiasm for Lenin extends to the whole Soviet experiment.

It is not unnatural that he should find difficulty in doing justice to Britain and British civilization. He thinks that Britain does not have real democracy but rather exploits the democratic idea for undemocratic purposes. The depth of his anti-British feeling warps many a judgment. His own political convictions may be described as passionately democratic and socialistic. Of the terror unleashed by revolutionary movements, he observes that it is only more vivid than the "day-to-day terror of starvation which overshadows millions."

Quite obviously his political convictions are not identical with those of Gandhi. He is of course generous in his appreciation of the Mahatma. He observes that "behind his language of peace and friendship there was power and the quivering shadow of action and a determination not to submit to wrong." But it is significant that he transmutes Gandhi's religious doctrine of non-violence into pragmatic strategy, justified because no other alternative is open to India. "Armed rebellion seemed out of question for the Indian people. We were disarmed, and most of us did not even know the use of arms. Besides, in a contest of violence the organized power of the British government, or any state, was far greater than anything that could be raised against it." Gandhi's program was "an effective way to get the masses to function, and it seemed to fit in with the peculiar genius of the Indian people."

Nehru's autobiography furnished us of course with other glimpses into the mind of one of the great political leaders of our day, and perhaps this book gives us no new insight. It is nevertheless a rewarding experience to accompany this man through the paths and bypaths of history. He is plainly a leader of striking spiritual integrity. Is he also, one wonders, a man of resolute action?

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Humanity and Humor

ONE MAN'S MEAT. By E. B. White. Harper and Brothers.
$2.50.

BETWEEN July, 1938, and December, 1941, while the Second World War was getting under way, Mr. White was turning his place in Maine from a vacation retreat into a working farm with chickens, pigs, and sheep. He still had to earn his living by writing, and the essays in this volume—most of them for Harper's—were composed on the run, as it were, between the hen-house and the radio. They are divided between E. B. White the farmer and E. B. White the paragrapher of current affairs, whose talent has made such an impress on the front pages of the New Yorker, but the interplay of the two personalities is close and healthy; his devotion to his farm spares Mr. White no responsibility in the world, and his worldliness gives an added dimension to his farm. Unlike most literary people who return to the soil, Mr. White is a person of sensibility, not a sentimentalist, and when, for instance, he helps deliver a lamb, he has a decent self-consciousness but no need to glorify himself. An individual and a gentleman, he isn't out to sell you the idea that a farm is any man's meat. The record of his adventure shows not the slightest trace of being directed against you: peculiar among literary farmers, Mr. White didn't leave the city in order to leave you behind, nor is it any part of his effort to outsmart you on new territory. He will respect you and leave you alone as long as you respect him and leave him alone; this would be his definition of democracy, and he is ready to die for democracy. Vulgarity is something Mr. White takes into account by the way; he helps fumigate it out of existence with his fine aseptic prose.

The kinship with Thoreau is explicit throughout this book but there is also Mr. White's implicit kinship with Montaigne. Obviously, compared to the great humanist, Mr. White's powers are on a minor scale; in the matter of style, real as his gifts are, we question whether his felicity has not sometimes been achieved by going around rather than over intellectual hurdles. But as we read the diary he kept in the First World War, we recognize how compellingly the humanistic tradition had already claimed him, even as a young man. Perhaps this isn't remarkable—young men often reach a kind of climax of intellectual decency in their college years, after which their development is a steady retrogression justified in the name of "reality"—but what is remarkable is that Mr. White has held fast to this heritage into maturity and through a period in the world's history in which, on the liberal as well as the reactionary front, it has been so tempting to pervert mind to the uses of power.

I recall only one essay in the volume that deals specifically with the temptations that writers face in a troubled society. Nevertheless, every line Mr. White writes—whether he is dealing with egg-production or the Townsend plan, country schools or Anne Lindbergh (his analysis of "The Wave of the Future," incidentally, is a small masterpiece, one of the best things in the book)—supports in practice this single statement of his literary creed. It is January, 1939, and Mr. White has been informed that a certain writer, stricken by the cruel events of the world, has vowed never again to write anything that isn't significant and liberty-loving. "I have an idea that this, in its own way, is bad news," writes Mr. White. "Having resolved to be nothing but significant, he is in a fair way to lose his effectiveness. . . . Even in evil times, a writer should cultivate only what naturally absorbs his fancy, whether it be freedom or cinch bugs. . . . A literature composed of nothing but liberty-loving thoughts is little better than the propaganda which it seeks to defeat. In a free country it is the duty of writers to pay no attention to duty. Only under a dictatorship is literature expected to exhibit an harmonious design or an inspirational tone." And he sums up: "A writer must believe in something, obviously, but he shouldn't join a club."

Well, Mr. White has joined no club except a society called Friends of the Land, but he believes in many good things. Being a humanist himself, he is a firm believer, for one thing, in man's humanity.

DIANA TRILLING

CONTRIBUTORS

SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE began her editorial career on The Nation, leaving to become a member of the Freeman staff when that lively weekly was founded by Albert Jay Nock. She is the author of "Concerning Women" and "Art in America."

OSCAR WILLIAMS is the author of a book of poems, "The Man Coming Toward You," and editor of "New Poems 1942: An Anthology of British and American Verse."

JOSEPH NEWMAN served as Tokyo correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune until the outbreak of war. He has recently published a book about his experiences entitled "Goodbye Japan."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary, is a contributing editor of The Nation and the author of several books, including "The Nature and Destiny of Man" and "Reflections on the End of an Era."

DIANA TRILLING regularly reviews fiction for The Nation.

HIGH HOLIDAY SERVICES

OPEN UNTIL SEP. 28

SOCIAL &
SPORT STAFFS

SCAROON MANOR

HOTEL 471 SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.

FREE GOLF after LABOR DAY

THE NATION INDEX

for Volume 154 of The Nation, covering the period from January through June, 1942, is now available. This excellent reference aid may be had for 15 cents.

Send your order for the Index, with remittance, to

The NATION

55 Fifth Avenue New York City

IN BRIEF

THE UNINVITED. By Dorothy Macardle. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

As you've probably heard, this is the new "Rebecca." It's about a nice young brother and sister who take a house in North Devon, despite being warned that there are "disturbances," and find among their uninvited guests a strange pair of materializations. The goings-on include emanations, séances, and some pleasant conversations; you don't have to believe in ghosts to enjoy it, although it probably helps. A very successful job.

SHAKESPEARE IN HARLEM. By Langston Hughes. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This book by the "Negro Poet Laureate" describes itself as a "book of light verse. Afro-American in the blues mood. Poems syncopated and variegated in the colors of Harlem, Beale Street, West Dallas, and Chicago's South Side. Blues, ballads, and reels to be read aloud, crooned, shouted, recited, and sung. Some with gestures, some not—as you like. None with a far-away voice." Death, frustration, poverty, and persecution are related in tones that ask, as it were, for sympathy through laughter rather than for sympathy through understanding. From the drawings (in reverse) by E. McKnight Kauffer to the title and lavender print on the black-cloth cover, the book attempts a folklore atmosphere and succeeds in being lugubrious. In the main, the lyrics, more in the category of Americana than poetry, are sincere and very readable, a kind of tragic light verse of today.

RECORDS

A CHICAGO reader has sent me a clipping from the Chicago Daily News, in which he says I will be interested "as an admirer of Schnabel, and especially of his playing of the Beethoven Fourth [Concerto]." I think that others besides myself will be excited by the news that Schnabel has been recording the Fourth and Fifth Concertos with the Chicago Symphony under Stock. With some of the outstanding recorded performances like the Cortot-Thibaud-Casals versions of Beethoven's Trio Op. 97 and Schubert's Op. 99 being withdrawn from the catalogue, it is a relief to know that Schnabel himself is making replacements for his incomparable performances of those two Beethoven concertos in the old Victor sets. And one hopes that after this beginning Victor will go on to record Schnabel's incomparable performances of Mozart—in the Concertos K. 450, 453, 466, 482, 488, 491. One hopes also for more recordings of his incomparable performances of Schubert.

The word "great" may be used loosely for mere emphasis; but applied to the last instrumental works of Schubert—the C major Symphony, the C major String Quintet, the posthumously published piano sonatas in C minor, A major, and B flat—it is used strictly to describe the experience and emotion they communicate, the musical forms in which the experience and emotion are communicated: in these respects the works are among the greatest that have come down to us. Only one of them, the posthumous Sonata in A major, has been available in a recorded performance fully commensurate with the stature of the work—the performance by Schnabel. The C major Quintet, in particular, we have had only in the mediocre performance of the Pro Arte Quartet; and so the Columbia set (497, $6.83) offering a superb performance by the Budapest Quartet with Benar Heifetz as added cellist is one of the events of the year. I played the set on a privately made phonograph which gives the finest reproduction of records that I know; I played it on this machine first with the wide-range, light-weight Brush PL-25 pickup, then with the limited-range, heavy Astatic Tru-tan; and with each pickup I also played the imported recording of Beethoven's Quartet Op. 74, which gave me the sound of the Budapest Quartet as I know it in the concert hall—the rich, warm, beautifully blended sound of the entire group, with the dark, deep-plumbing sound of Schneider's cello as its foundation. It would have been a pleasure to hear these things come off the Columbia records; and it was a disappointment to hear instead an altered over-all sound that was voluminous but cold and coarse, with the cellos heard only faintly under the other instruments. This was true with both the Brush and the Astatic; but the surfaces which were extremely noisy with the Brush were fairly quiet with the Astatic. The records, in other words, will sound best on the machines of limited range with heavy pickups that are in most homes.

The contrast between Toscanini's shattering concentration and intensity and Bruno Walter's rhetorical expansiveness that was presented by their recorded performances of Beethoven's "Eroica" a year ago is now to be observed in their performances of the Fifth. Toscanini's version was issued by Victor two years ago; Columbia now offers Walter's (Set 498, $4.73), which on the whole is more straightforward and effective, to my ears, than his performance of the "Eroica"—with only a couple of Luftpausen in the second movement, as against the emotional wallowing in the "Eroica." The recorded sound of the Toscanini performance was hard, wooden, harsh; with the Brush the sound of the Walter performance is voluminous but cold and hollow on top and wooden down below, and reverberant and noisy; with the Astatic it is brighter and clearer; with both the surfaces are a little gritty. In the end you may prefer the powerful and well recorded Weingartner performance, which it is to be hoped Columbia will keep in circulation.

The Grand Fugue Op. 133, which was the original finale of Beethoven's Quartet Op. 130, and which for some listeners remains formidable and difficult to grasp even after other works of this last period are accessible, has been recorded for Columbia by the Busch Chamber Players (Set X-221, $2.63). The Budapest Quartet of ten years ago recorded a performance that can still be listened to; but this is a piece of music which gains by the greater weight of sound from the larger group of players; and even apart from that the Busch performance is a good one. Its recorded sound is a little cold but otherwise good, the surfaces gritty—with both pickups.

When I heard Ormandy's performance of Schumann's Second Symphony a few years ago I found it a little tense and hard; but at that time I had not yet heard the violently, explosively tense performance which Mitropoulos has recorded for Columbia with the Minneapolis Symphony (Set 503, $5.78), and which I find even less advantageous than Ormandy's for a work of such warmth and intimacy. On a Scott 23 machine with the Brush the over-all sound was good except for coldness, occasional faulty balance (the murmuring strings at the beginning, for example, were almost inaudible), and occasional rattles and break-ups; and the surfaces were bad. With the Astatic the surfaces were quieter.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Hawaii's Loyal Japanese

Dear Sir: In his Nation article of July 25, Albert Horlings scores the United States for its liberal or lax treatment of persons of Japanese extraction now residing in Hawaii. He argues that the great majority of them cannot be trusted; that we are taking a bad risk. The charges made by Mr. Horlings against these 150,000 Japanese, 110,000 of whom are American citizens, are numerous and serious. I wholly agree with Mr. Horlings that "Hawaii's safety is not a local matter, and a decision relating to a control of a possible fifth column must be determined by national interest." It does not follow, however, that a prejudiced, ill-considered presentation of the case will be any help in clarifying the situation. Being of Japanese descent, born and reared in Hawaii, I too may be biased, but let us look at the other side of the coin.

The degree to which people of Japanese blood have been assimilated into Hawaiian-American society has been, I feel, grossly understated. I doubt whether there is one island sociologist or any one else familiar with the island's racial problems who will go halfway with Mr. Horlings. The statement in his opening paragraph to the effect that a majority of us cannot read or write English is plain nonsense. For the citizen group, the extent of American schooling is as high as for other racial groups in Hawaii and compares very favorably with that of the mainland states. Alien Japanese recently arrived in Hawaii do as well, on the whole, as others of like circumstances. "Thousands see or hear almost nothing American, while they consume Japanese food, Japanese clothing, Japanese music, Japanese pictures, Japanese newspapers and magazines by the shipload," says Mr. Horlings. He does not mention the overwhelming majority who prefer Bob Hope, Bette Davis, and Gary Cooper; who read the Reader's Digest, the Woman's Home Companion, the Saturday Evening Post, Life, The Nation, Harpers; who dress as Americans and sing American songs. It seems silly to deny that our attitudes are fashioned after American patterns. Where Mr. Horlings gets the idea that we of Japanese blood "imagine Hawaii without American rule" and picture ourselves as top dogs in this new Hawaii, I do not know.

The question of dual citizenship cannot be dismissed so easily. As Mr. Horlings states, it is true that a great number of American citizens have failed to burn their bridges to Japan. Non-expatriation, however, is by no means an indication of disloyalty to the United States. Many are still dependents of aliens who cannot become American citizens because of the Immigration Act of 1924 and, therefore, cannot act independently. Many have been simply negligent, for expatriation is a cumbersome and time-consuming affair. The leaders among the citizen group are all expatriated, for it is impossible to make much headway in Hawaii without taking this step. As we go into the third and fourth generations, this problem will automatically be solved.

The question of our loyalty, of course, forms the hub around which all other considerations revolve, and loyalty is too much an intangible thing to permit of estimates or generalities. Most of our non-Japanese island leaders have vouched for the loyalty of Hawaii's Japanese. This was borne out during and after Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor and has been officially confirmed, but Mr. Horlings prefers to judge our loyalty on purely racial lines.

What of the solution? Can we gamble on the loyalty of the 150,000 Japanese in Hawaii? I will not deny for one minute that some agents of Tokyo and their dupes are still running loose, but the overwhelming majority of us here proved that we will stand by America when the zero hour strikes. We have brothers and relatives in the armed forces of the United States and are just as anxious for an Allied victory as other Americans.

Double or triple the FBI force in Hawaii. This would be more practical and wise than a wholesale evacuation which would involve innumerable hardships as well as seriously undermine our democratic concepts and the value of United States citizenship. That the Japanese on the West Coast have been evacuated is no reason for the same treatment in Hawaii. In reading through the Tolan Committee hearings and reports, I am far from convinced such drastic steps were necessary, especially since they were instigated not by the military but by hysterical civilians and interested groups. I suggest further that we young men of fighting age be given the same opportunities in the armed forces as other American boys and, secondly, some assurance of equality in the post-war world.

THOMAS H. IGB

Madison, Wis., July 29

Bethlen an Anti-Nazi?

Dear Sirs: In his Nation article of July 25 Mr. Kovacs referred to Count Stephen Bethlen as "the well-known anti-Nazi." This epithet seems to me too generous and somewhat misleading when applied to the man who wrote in 1938 the following lines in his Hungarian Quarterly:

Many a time it would have been easier [for Hungary] to become incorporated in the ring of the Little Entente, for that would have meant exchanging our condition of life for far more favorable ones than those existing at present. We could have sold our birth-right for a mess of pottage and made it possible for a hostile Great Power to come into being on the southeastern frontier of Germany, which might have completed the work of blockading her. We did not do it, although there were those among us who might have been won over to this policy. . . . By not doing it, however, we have rendered the German nation an immense service; and we are still doing so today, when this road might still be open to us.

Count Stephen Bethlen, the president of the Hungarian Quarterly, Tibor Eckhardt, one of its vice-presidents, and many more such "anti-Nazis" are certainly annoyed today with the Nazis in Hungary who actually supervise the methodical oppressing of the unfortunate Hungarian people, a function the Hungarian estate owners and Junker-bureaucrats consider their privilege.

When Secretary Hull spoke the other day of "growing cancers within and among the nations" and of that extreme nationalism which "encouraged and facilitated the rise of dictators," it was hard not to recall that among all the Prime Ministers of Europe Count Stephen Bethlen was the very first to seek a meeting with the still plotting and relatively obscure Hitler in 1930, and was the first to confer with him when the Führer came into power in 1933.

STEPHEN DOKTOR

New York, July 26

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 15, 1942

NUMBER 7

What Gandhi Wants

BY LOUIS FISCHER

LORD LINLITHGOW, Viceroy of India, said to me: "Gandhi is the biggest thing in India." Now he has ordered Gandhi's arrest. I think all of us will have to pay for this. Trouble in India means prolongation of the war. It is therefore America's business.

Shortly after the British were driven out of Burma, General Alexander, the commander of the British army in Burma, gave an interview to the press in New Delhi, India. The text of the interview was printed the next day in the Indian papers. "Burma must be reconquered," Alexander said. "It is part of the British empire." Just imagine how this must thrill the Chinese soldiers who are at bay in Burma or the American pilots who are flying over Burma or the Indian troops who would have to retake Burma: they fight to give Burma back to the British empire. Yet Alexander expressed what he felt. He is battling for empire.

General Sir Archibald Wavell, now British Commander-in-Chief in India, takes a few moments occasionally to continue work on the second volume of his biography of General Allenby under whom he fought in the first world war. Wavell gave me part of the manuscript to read. One chapter deals with the 1922 crisis when Allenby threatened to resign as High Commissioner of Egypt unless the British protectorate over Egypt were dropped and independence granted to the Egyptians. In brilliant prose reflecting a deep grasp of politics, Wavell described Allenby's struggle with the British Cabinet in London. Prime Minister Lloyd George, Foreign Secretary Curzon, Milner, and other ministers opposed him. But of all the opponents of Egyptian independence, Wavell writes, "the most determined had been Winston Churchill" who was then in the cabinet.

Churchill led the opposition in the House of Commons against the 1935 Act of India under which India was ruled until the outbreak of this war and which granted some limited measure of self-government to India.

Churchill is a good imperialist by temperament, tradition, and conviction. So is the Secretary of State for India, Mr. Amery. He told me so. Neville Chamberlain was an appeaser because he was afraid that if England became involved in a war, his England, the England of money and privilege, would die. He was probably right. But Churchill says, No, England can fight a war and win it and remain his old England. Churchill's England includes India.

We must be very clear that Gandhi's civil-disobedience move is not merely a matter of whether the police are stronger than the Indian nationalists. It raises the whole question of what we are fighting for. In my talks with Mahatma Gandhi in his village of Sevagram, central India, I said we wanted the world to be a better place after the war. He replied, "I am not sure it will be. I would like to see right now a change in the heart of England and in the heart of America. Then I may believe your statements about the future." Gandhi has confronted us with the problem of our moral position in the war.

If the British wish to imply that Gandhi is pro-Japanese they may do so; it only makes a settlement in India more difficult. Gandhi is not pro-Japanese or pro-Axis. He is pro-British, he is pro-Chinese, he is pro-American. He wants us to win the war. But he does not think we can win it unless we enlist the support of Indians by purifying our war aims.

Jawaharlal Nehru, who actively demonstrated his anti-fascist attitude in relation to Abyssinia, Loyalist Spain, and China, agrees with Gandhi on this matter. I was present at an open-air meeting in a park on the outskirts of Bombay addressed by Nehru. A crowd of some 30,000 men dressed mostly in white and women in bright sarees gathered to hear what he spoke into the microphone. Before long a group of Communists yelled: "This is a people's war." Now Communists are always well-disciplined and purposeful and they came to that meeting either to disrupt it or to impress their views on it by repeated interruptions. After their first shout, one immediately sensed the hostility of the audience towards them, and Nehru simply said: "If you think this is a people's war go and ask the people." Thereafter the Communists shut up.

BURLINGAME

I think it is a people's war, but the leaders and people of India see no proof thereof in the behavior of their rulers, and the arrest of Gandhi will certainly not incline them to see it that way.

On my travels in India, I spent a night and morning in the same railway compartment with a Bengali Moslem, an officer in the Indian Air Force which is, of course, a British air force. He had volunteered two years ago. I have never heard more violent denunciations of the British than from him. "I am told," I probed, "that the people of Bengal are pro-Japanese." Bengal, with a population of 60,000,000, is the province which the Japanese will probably invade first if they do invade India. "No," replied the airman. "If you pardon me, that is not the correct way of putting it. But we have been slaves so long that many do not mind who their master is."

Practically every Englishman I talked to in India realized that the country had never been as anti-British as it is today. The causes may be manifold and subject to dispute. The fact is indisputable.

This is the problem—whether we like it or not, and it is not solved by maligning Gandhi in America or imprisoning him in Poona. There was no Gandhi in Burma, yet the civilian population, the British admit, helped the Japanese.

Wavell said to me that in Burma 80 per cent of the population were indifferent to the war, 10 per cent were pro-British, and 10 per cent were pro-Japanese. That may be correct. But the 10 per cent who were pro-British fled to India while the 10 per cent who were pro-Japanese stayed to show the Japanese forces shortcuts across difficult terrain, to lead them to British warehouses, to feed them and to create the friendly atmosphere which facilitated the invader's progress.

Both the Gandhi Congress and Mohammed Ali Jinnah's Moslem League have publicly resolved not to cooperate with the British in the war effort. Some Moslem leaders might have wished to stand by the empire, but the war is too unpopular in India for them to risk advocating such a policy. In the circumstances, the primary task of the British governments in London and New Delhi should have been to court Indian civilian support. Cripps tried it. But he did not enjoy the collaboration of some key British politicians. In any case, he failed.

Another attempt should have been made. Gandhi and Nehru and other Congress leaders were ready to make far-reaching concessions. The British knew this because they watched Gandhi openly reduce his demands. First he asked the British to go bag and baggage. Later he said they and the United States could keep their armed forces in India and use India as a base for military operations against the Axis. This and similar equally clear developments told the British that agreement with Congress was possible through compromise. But the British seem to have closed their hearts and minds. From what many of them said to me I am convinced that they have decided that Gandhi's influence is waning and this is a golden opportunity to break his power. The present is a queer time indeed for such a dangerous experiment.

Is this to be the second front—the front against Gandhi? Perhaps, after their many defeats in the field, the British can actually win a victory over Gandhi. I do not know. He is a tough, shrewd, and strong customer, and India is in an ugly mood. But if the British do crush the Gandhi movement what have they achieved? India will be bitter, sullen, and resentful and an easier prey to Japan and Germany. If they crush Gandhi then one of our biggest successes in this war for democracy and freedom will be the smashing of a great world-known movement for democracy and freedom.

Many experts wonder whether the United Nations have enough armed force to hold India against an Axis push. There may be no invasion of India. But if it came, the active and passive aid of the Indian people might improve the chances of resistance. We are not so strong as to afford to throw away such help.

British officials in India told me that they did not believe Indian cooperation would be of much avail in case of invasion. That may explain their readiness to strike at Gandhi when they should be preparing to strike at the foreign enemy. But they have made too many mistakes recently in handling military and civilian problems in the East for us to trust their judgment.

Can anything be done now? I think yes. Gandhi is not at all vindictive. He would forgive the British if they released him, and he would negotiate with them with a view to supporting the war. Nehru said at a meeting: "I would fight Japan sword in hand." But, he added, he could only do so as a free man. That is the crux of the situation.

It is difficult, however, to imagine the British suddenly generating the suppleness of policy and the subtlety of brain to alter their course without a potent prod from the outside. Only the United States could make such a move. Of course Washington can take the position that this is the British empire's private business. It is, admittedly, a delicate matter. India is the British empire. But America has armed forces there, and if India becomes a battlefield it will be a serious matter for us whether the ground is solid rock or a soft mire. Besides—and this is not the least consideration—India is an acid test of the sincerity of America's purpose in fighting this costly war.

[In later issues of The Nation, Louis Fischer will discuss the failure of the Cripps mission and other phases of the Indian situation.]

The Shape of Things

THE TRAGIC PATTERN REPEATS ITSELF IN India: provocation is met by repression; repression breeds rebellion; rebellion is crushed by force. The old pattern—but in a new, ominous setting of total war with the United Nations facing their most desperate crisis. The outcome can only be catastrophe. India in revolt, held down by British troops, is an open invitation to Japan. Can anything be done? At this moment there is little profit in apportioning blame. The Congress leaders have allowed their old distrust of British to half-blind them to the total, unmitigated slavery that faces their country and the world under Axis rule. The British have too easily abandoned the effort, implicit in the Cripps mission, to overcome this distrust by every available means, without regard to "face" or traditional counsels of caution. But what matters today is not past mistakes; what matters is the chance of preserving India against chaos and terror—and ultimate conquest by Japan. We join Louis Fischer in pleading for final effort to reopen negotiations between the British authorities and the Indian leaders. We beg the President to intervene and offer his services as mediator between the leaders of the Indian parties and the government of India. If he made his offer in collaboration with the two other chief nations allied with Britain—Russia and China—it would carry great weight with British and Indians alike. It is, we believe, the last and only hope of averting a tremendous defeat.

✱

WHEN DO THE UNITED NATIONS PROPOSE TO unite—even for military purposes? Everyone agrees that a unified high command, with a predetermined global strategy, is indispensable, that it is sure to come eventually—and that we shall have to go through worse disasters than any yet experienced before we get it. Pending catastrophe, we must presumably go along making bombs that don't fit British bomb racks while England makes bombs that don't fit ours. We must follow one theory of how to attack Germany by air while the British follow another, so that we can take no part in the air offensive on the Continent until we have built a completely separate force in England, even down to the ground crews. We must play our commitments in the Pacific against those in Europe; the British must weigh their stake in Africa against their obligations to Russia; the Chinese must plead for an Asiatic front, perhaps at the expense of a Continental invasion, while the Russians think solely in terms of a second front in the West. What may fortunately precipitate the formation of a United Nations general staff without the preliminary disasters accepted by the fatalists is the serious shortage of raw materials and the consequent necessity for their intelligent allocation. Against this crying need, against the overwhelming popular demand—80 per cent in the last Gallup poll—stand the same traditional nationalistic jealousies that staved off a unified command in the World War until the darkest days of 1917. All the United Nations are at fault—not least the Soviet Union, whose continued reluctance to divulge economic and military information to its allies makes that much harder the second front support which it so eagerly awaits and so richly deserves.

✱

THE NAZI DRIVE INTO THE CAUCASUS HAS moved with Blitzkrieg rapidity since the fall of Rostov scarcely two weeks ago. The German army has succeeded in taking the Maikop oil fields and has pushed well on toward Grozny, an even more important oil center near the Caspian. But though the Soviets have lost the greater part of the North Caucasus, they are putting up magnificent resistance at Stalingrad and have made slight progress in the counter-drive at Voronezh. The battle for Stalingrad is likely to be the crucial struggle of the 1942 campaign. As long as the Soviets can hold this important tank-manufacturing city, they have a chance of launching a counter-offensive that might pinch off the German forces in the Caucasus. Loss of the city would cut the last remaining supply route by which oil from the Baku fields may be delivered to the armies in North Russia. It is obvious that Stalingrad will not fall easily. Soviet forces in this sector have been heavily reinforced. The presence of Major General Follett Bradley in Moscow has encouraged the rumor that units of the American air force will soon be sent to Russia to fight alongside the Soviet air force. Meanwhile the arrival of new contingents of American troops in Britain reinforces the hope that a second front is in the making. It must become a reality within a few weeks if it is to be of any use in turning the Nazi tide in the Caucasus.

✱

ELMER DAVIS LIVED UP TO EXPECTATIONS in his first report to the country as Director of the Office of War Information. Mr. Davis did not mince words in saying that neither our material aid to our allies nor our production of war materials had been as large as we said they would be. He gave us some encouraging news about ship sinkings, but offset it by reporting that our production of military planes, tanks, artillery, and naval vessels—especially anti-submarine craft—had fallen behind schedule in June. He pointed out that so far our allies have been doing most of the fighting and that our turn must come soon if we are going to win. His frankness, even his pessimism, was refreshing after the vague optimistic reports we have been getting in the press regarding the progress of our military and production efforts. But the Davis statement was nevertheless disquieting. While it is true that "we are not yet more than ankle deep in the war," the fault certainly does not lie with the common people. It is to be found in lack of planning, lack of imagination, and lack of faith in the people.

✕

THE PRESIDENT HAS VETOED THE GILLETTE bill which would have set up an independent agency for the manufacture of rubber from farm products, on the ground that it would divide authority; and he has appointed a committee consisting of Bernard Baruch, Dr. James B. Conant of Harvard, and Dr. Karl T. Compton of M. I. T. to investigate the whole rubber situation. With the soundness of the general principle that rubber control should be centralized we have no quarrel; but it is up to Mr. Roosevelt to see that it is exercised by independent, disinterested persons. In other words the stranglehold of the oil-chemical-rubber combine on synthetic-rubber production must be broken. We have a great deal of respect for Bernard Baruch and his distinguished colleagues, though we wish the President had appointed at least one expert from the farm states. The test of the committee will be whether or not it accepts the WPB's alibi that the present synthetic-rubber program—which does not allow for the production of rubber from farm products—is adequate and functioning. Testimony before the Gillette Committee indicated that the program exists only on paper and that actual construction work has scarcely begun.

✕

A FRESH OUTBURST OF UNREST IN FRANCE has led neutral observers in Switzerland to predict the early fall of Laval and his replacement by a new Hitler favorite. Doriot, on his part, has hastened to proclaim himself Berlin's latest choice. Apparently unshaken by the slaying of his lieutenant, Henri Gachelin, a new evidence of the hate that surrounds his movement, Doriot has assured his followers that he will be in power before October "with the Marshal or against him." As interesting as the news itself is the way in which it has been presented. In comparison with Doriot, Laval is offered as a minor evil. Here we are again in the middle of another conga dance of appeasement. First came Weygand. We were asked by the State Department and by a section of the press to recognize how lucky it was for the democracies that Weygand stood at the right hand of the old Marshal instead of the small, envious, anti-British Darlan. Then Weygand disappeared and Darlan's star rose. Nobody could, of course, convert him over night into a pal of Churchill. But we were told that it would be infinitely worse for France and for the democracies should he be supplanted by that hateful symbol of German-French collaboration, Pierre Laval. Then, Laval. He was more difficult to fit into the intricate dance pattern. To begin with, his behavior was rude and disdainful to anybody who tried to appease him in any language but German. But at the mere rumor that Doriot might take his place we notice a certain inclination in the press to concede that Laval is, after all, a much better man than Doriot. Who will be held up as "the greater evil" if Doriot becomes Prime Minister of France? Himmler?

✕

FROM BUENOS AIRES TO MEXICO THE movement of protest against the cowardly assault on Waldo Frank has assumed extraordinary proportions. There is scarcely a Latin American capital where the press, the universities, and the literary clubs have not expressed in one way or another their sympathy for the noted author. This has confirmed the fact, about which Waldo Frank himself complained not long ago, that he enjoys in the Spanish-speaking countries much more authority and popularity than in his native land. Certainly the demonstrations of feeling in Latin America have found faint reflection in the North American press. As was to be expected, in Argentina itself the condemnation of the fascist attack was mixed with severe criticism of the government and the local authorities. Américo Ghioldi, the much respected leader of the Opposition parties in the Chamber of Deputies, spoke of the article by Waldo Frank which produced the government's declaration that its author was persona non grata in Argentina, as "the most correct and inspired analysis that had been written on the situation of the country." The leader of the Socialist Party, Nicolás Repetto, told the Conservative members who sided with the Opposition, that it was illogical to condemn the attack on Waldo Frank if at the same time the government itself were not condemned for its arbitrary interpretation of the article in Crítica as an affront to the Argentine nation. All this emphasizes what we have said a hundred times—that Latin America at heart is with the democracies and that a clever American and British policy would find no difficulty in winning its active support.

Monopoly: Hitler's Ally

THIS war cannot be won until monopoly is out of the saddle. The Truman committee hearings on steel reveal conditions worse, if possible, than those it disclosed a year ago in its inquiry into aluminum. We have not enough armor plate to keep our tank arsenals going at capacity. The Detroit press reports that the great Chrysler arsenal has been on the verge of shutting down for lack of steel. We are not producing enough steel plate to build enough ships to carry the tanks we are making. Some people at the War Production Board explain complacently that the lag in the tank program does not matter since tanks are piling up even at reduced rates of production—waiting for ships to carry them away. There are countries in which the steel manufacturers responsible for this situation would be awarded not an "E" but a load of lead.

What do the Truman committee hearings reveal? At a time of the greatest steel shortage in history many steel plants are partially or totally idle. This in itself is news only to a press which has consistently ignored the detailed and specific recommendations Philip Murray and the United Steel Workers Union have been making. The small plants which figured in the sensational disclosures of the hearings were discussed in the Murray plan of January, 1941, and were among the score or more named in his second steel plan in June of this year. The first report revealed almost 6,000,000 tons of idle capacity; the second showed how steel-plate production might be increased 15 per cent and armor-plate production increased many times by industry-wide planning to end competitive scrambles which leave a sizable proportion of our facilities, even in the big companies, working at less than capacity.

The steel-plate shortage for shipbuilding began to be apparent in February, 1941, at the very time that Stettinius and Gano Dunn were telling the President—who repeated their words—that talk of a steel shortage was "a deliberate lie." The shortage of steel plate could have been remedied at once by one or both of two measures: conversion of continuous strip mills to plate production and compulsory allocation of steel business to get maximum output from big companies and small.

Instead of taking these measures the government last July began to dicker with Bethlehem Steel for a $23,000,000 plate plant at Sparrow's Point, Maryland. Three months passed before Bethlehem turned up in October with a contract. The contract was so extortionate that Clifford Durr, now a Federal Communications Commissioner, then counsel for the RFC Defense Plant Corporation, wrote a memorandum (later turned up by the Truman committee) opposing its acceptance, and later resigned in disgust. Although the OPM told the President last September that this plant was part of the navy "speed-up" program, it is now revealed that Bethlehem and the WPB—after wasting all that time—have decided to abandon both the Sparrow's Point and the Bethlehem Los Angeles steel-plant projects because neither could be completed even by July, 1943!

The hearings also reveal that Henry Kaiser, who is now building a steel plant at Los Angeles, was kept dangling by the OPM and the WPB from midsummer of 1940 to March, 1942, before a direct appeal to Nelson finally brought him permission to use $50,000,000 of his own money—not the government's—to build this plant. The explanation lies in the disclosure that the WPB committees which control plant expansion are made up entirely of dollar-a-year men still on the payrolls of the big steel companies. No independent steel man can obtain either the certificate of necessity allowing five-year amortization on his investment or the materials for expansion without the permission of these committees.

While steel is so scarce, the WPB is handling our steel supplies with the carelessness of a sailor on a spree. The Journal of Commerce reports that despite inventory control the inventories of manufacturers using steel aggregate 17 million tons, more than four times the pre-war normal. Only a few months ago the inventories of the railroad-equipment industry were found to have enough steel above reasonable requirements to build sixty ten-thousand-ton cargo ships. Priority control is as flabby as inventory control. In June requirements were 10,000,000 tons; production 5,000,000 tons. But the WPB has no records to show where almost 1,000,000 of the 5,000,000 tons went! Supervision of this kind, plus the go-and-sin-no-more consent decrees imposed on Carnegie-Illinois and Jones & Laughlin for consistent violation of priorities, explains why a "black market" flourishes. And why we and our allies are still losing the war.

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

What Gandhi Wants by Louis Fischer	121
The Shape of Things	123
Monopoly: Hitler's Ally	124

ARTICLES

Who Is the State Department? IV. Why the Cow Is Sacred by Robert Bendiner	126
Helicopters for Victory by Henry Hazlitt	129
Keep Them Out! VI. Clare E. Hoffman of Michigan by Will Chasan and Esther Jack	131
In the Wind	133

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Peacock by Louis Kronenberger	134
Three Personal Histories by Betsy Hutchison	135
Materialism and Democracy by Lewis Corey	136
Poets and Scholars by Robert Penn Warren	137
Music by B. H. Haggin	138

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 140

Who Is the State Department?

IV. WHY THE COW IS SACRED

BY ROBERT BENDINER

IF POLITICS were simply an exercise in cold logic it would be impossible to explain why President Roosevelt tolerates, consults, and conciliates a Department of State so drastically at odds with his fundamental purposes. The department, after all, is responsible to him. He is charged by the Constitution with the conduct of foreign affairs and he has only to clean house to obtain a department consonant with his own views. Strong Presidents have traditionally been their own Secretaries of State, and Roosevelt is among the strongest of the strong.

It might be argued, of course, that the President himself was sold for a time on a policy of appeasement, that his own position did not, in fact, differ materially from the department's, and that he, like his official advisers, was swept by the tide of events into ultimate resistance. But the facts are all against this theory. It is true that the President bears a particular responsibility for the Spanish embargo and for the miscarried policy toward Vichy; it is true that in the last analysis he is responsible for the sum total of American foreign policy, with all its mistakes of omission and commission. Yet it remains clear beyond doubt that his lapses into appeasement have been by way of surrender rather than through choice. Nowhere in the record is there an instance of his forcing appeasement on reluctant advisers; the process has all been in the opposite direction. The daring proposal to quarantine aggressor nations was solely his own idea, slipped into a prepared speech without the sanction of the department; while the virtual retraction of that challenge was the work of advisers who were horrified at his boldness. Earlier than any other top-rank statesman he understood, and said, that a militant tyranny anywhere in the world was a threat to all the world. Two of the Administration's boldest moves in the field of foreign policy—the destroyer deal and the Lend-Lease Act—came directly from him and not from the department. If his foreign policy has moved a step backward for every step and a half in the direction of a cooperative internationalism, the forward motions have been the ones dictated by choice. Where he has appeased, it is not the enemy who was the prime object of the appeasement but his advisers, both in office and in private life.

All these considerations—the President's militant point of view, his dynamic character, and his legally constituted power over the department—serve only to heighten the paradox. The question of why he has seen fit not only to leave the department intact but to surrender to it from time to time remains to be considered.

The mystery is more apparent than real. In the complex of presidential politics there is a great deal more than the mechanical application of a given policy, and the enigma of Roosevelt's relations with the department works itself out in the light of political, personal, and administrative realities. Some of them are compelling, some are not. None of them justifies appeasement as such, but all of them help to explain the President's vacillation.

THE PRESIDENT AND POLITICS

To begin on the loftiest plane, the President is not an independent force, free to operate at will. He is a resolution of forces, embodying in his person the aspirations of conflicting sectors of the population. Not merely in a demagogic, vote-catching sense, but in the best tradition of representative government, he dare not regard himself as an individual, free to impose his own position without regard for the views of a sizable opposition. To do so would be to put a period to the course of democratic development, to substitute the Führerprinzip for representative government. On the other hand, to go to the opposite extreme and bend before every breeze, to give no guidance and assume no leadership, would be to invite paralysis and the equally certain destruction of political democracy.

The problem is an infinitely delicate one of degree, and all but the rabidly biased will admit that Roosevelt has shown a remarkable skill in steering somewhat on the leadership side of a middle course. Inevitably he has swung the wheel over from time to time. That is in the nature of his office. Lincoln repeatedly appeased the conservatives of his party, and the Northern Democrats as well, and he was roundly berated for it by the radicals. Nevertheless, his own point of view prevailed in the end. This is said, certainly not in defense of appeasement, but as a commentary on the nature of the presidency. In other words, a cogent case cannot be made against the President for heeding an authentic force within the country, however dubious; it can be made only against the force itself. The State Department to a large degree identified itself with such a force, and this is what distinguishes its conduct from the President's. It championed appeasement, whereas the President, as President, merely yielded, on occasion, to appeasement's advocates.

On a lower level of politics, as opposed to theoretical statesmanship, there are equally compelling, if less noble, explanations of the President's indulgence of the department. His choice of Hull, to start with, and his support of the Secretary through thick and thin have been due in no small measure to Hull's weight with Congress. Until 1932 no Secretary of State since Taft's Administration had been an alumnus of House or Senate. Hull was a member of both and he commands a respect on Capitol Hill which no President—especially one whose Administration is as controversial as Roosevelt's—can afford to overlook. In particular, the Southerners in Congress venerate Hull. He is one of them, in fact their most honored representative in the government. His mild internationalism, his homey morality, his social conservatism, and above all his years of struggle against the tariff dragon make him their logical St. George, and they would take it very much amiss if the President were to deal high-handedly with him.

The power of the Southerners, moreover, is not to be taken lightly—thanks to the rule of seniority by which the chairmanships of Congressional committees are determined. Throughout twelve lean years of Republican rule, few Northern Democrats got elected to either house, but no G. O. P. landslide ever kept the Solid South from sending its quota of Democrats to Washington. The result was that when the great overthrow occurred in 1932 and the new majority party proceeded to reorganize the committees, the chairmanships went automatically to the veteran Southerners. The newly elected Northern Democrats got scarcely a look-in, though some of the standbys of the city machines likewise came into their own. Even now, ten years after, the most vital committees of Congress are chaired by Southerners. In the Senate the Foreign Relations Committee is headed by Connally of Texas, the Military Affairs Committee by Reynolds of North Carolina, Finance by George of Georgia, Appropriations by Glass of Virginia, Commerce by Bailey of North Carolina, Agriculture by Smith of South Carolina. In the House the crucial Ways and Means Committee is chaired by Doughton of North Carolina, Naval Affairs by Vinson of Georgia, Military Affairs by May of Kentucky, Judiciary by Sumners of Texas, Agriculture by Fulmer of South Carolina. The list is far from complete but it will suffice to illustrate Hull's pivotal position in the Administration.

Beyond the President's political dependence on Congress there stretch the vastly complicated questions of his strategy vis-à-vis the electorate. They are questions which are beyond the scope of this article but they bear on it in so far as they show the inevitability of the President's tacking and hauling before the winds of a country that could not make up its mind. If the dictates of public opinion go far to explain the President's indecision, however, they afford little justification for the conduct of the department. In the first place, the department stands in no such political relationship to the electorate. Its officials think of themselves, and are thought of, as experts. On the basis of their prestige they could have strengthened the President's hand in educating the country to the need for a firm stand against the fascist advance. They followed no such course. On the contrary, they weakened the President's hand at every turn. Far from opposing conciliation, they had constantly to be conciliated themselves—and to a certain degree they were in a position to command it. They were the President's experienced advisers. By the country at large the department has always been held a bit in awe, what with its fund of "confidential information," its general air of legitimate secrecy. It would not have helped Roosevelt's position with the country if so revered a figure as Hull or so skilled a technician as Welles had seen fit to break with the Administration on a question of policy. With the nation so bitterly divided on the issue of intervention, such a split in the highest reaches of the government might in fact have been fatal. In a sense, therefore, the President was as dependent on his advisers as they were dependent on him.

PERSONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE

Even if the exigencies of politics had left it possible for the President to clean house in his State Department, it is extremely doubtful that he would have done so in any effective degree. Here again the question is not one of logic but of reality—this time the reality of the Roosevelt character. It is well known in Washington that the President finds it next to impossible to dismiss anyone. He has kept men in office long after it became clear to the country that they had nothing in common with his purposes and would not hesitate, in fact, to work against those purposes. As a personal trait, this loyalty may be an attractive aspect of the President's character. As an administrative quality it is a good deal less laudable. But whatever its merits, it is a fact.

When a fairly close personal relationship is involved, it becomes doubly hard for the President to act—and that happens to be the case with the leading figures of the State Department. Hull, besides being the President's ace with Congress and the lieutenant best equipped to keep the right wing of the party in line, is an old friend and a political supporter of long standing. Welles, besides having contributed generously to past campaigns, is one of the President's last remaining ties with the Groton-Harvard world of his youth. He enjoys the society of Welles—perhaps all the more because that world has so bitterly denounced him as a traitor to his class—and a dinner at Oxon Hill is among his favorite diversions. Breckinridge Long commands an affectionate loyalty for years of consistent, if unintelligent, personal support, and further down in the department the protégés of Hull and Welles are assured the friendly interest of the White House.

The President does not play favorites, however, and among his closest friends are those who, like Bullitt and Davies, are for personal reasons at odds with the department hierarchs. Within his official family he stays on good terms with both sides in any controversy and cannot bring himself to alienate either. In his strong dislike for rows he will go far to bury issues and smooth over differences rather than make clear-cut decisions. He has had his fingers burned on the few occasions when he has interfered in the administration of the department and his reluctance to repeat the experience has been a source of weakness. The department finds it easy to appeal to his tendency toward procrastination, and while it may not be able to sell him much in the way of affirmative policy, it has often succeeded in selling him on caution and delay, which happen to be the chief ingredients of appeasement.

Those who urge a clean sweep of the department overlook one final reality, even more formidable than the President's personality, namely, the Civil Service and the department's own merit system. Even if this carefully worked-out scheme of job security, unassailable in principle, were not politically risky for any President to attack—and it is risky to an extreme degree—it would still be technically beyond his assault. The laws governing the operation of the department are Congressional statutes and only Congress can repeal or revise them.

THE ROOSEVELT SOLUTION

Despite all these political, personal, and administrative handicaps, it cannot be said that the President has allowed the department to run untrammelled. Aside from invoking his own considerable powers of persuasion, he has resorted to three devices of control. The first and most elementary is the simple act of anticipating his foreign experts with some move or pronouncement which leaves them no recourse but to follow—or at least to seek a compromise. Beside the quarantine speech—and more important—the destroyer deal with Britain may be put in this category. So may the stab-in-the-back speech against Mussolini and, above all, the Lend-Lease Act, probably the most vital legislation of the entire war crisis.

A less blatant device has been the quiet substitution of special emissaries for the routine service men in the case of particularly important or delicate missions. This practice is far from new but Roosevelt has probably carried it further than other presidents. To clear up the false impressions left by Ambassador Kennedy, to restore decent working relations with the British, and simply to obtain reliable information, Harry Hopkins was sent to London, with instructions to get as close as possible to Prime Minister Churchill and learn the precise intentions of the British government. He did his job well and the President followed up by naming his Social Security Administrator, John G. Winant, as Ambassador. Hopkins was later sent on an informal mission to the Soviet Union; Lauchlin Currie, one of the President's six "anonymous" administrative assistants, performed a similar service in Chungking; and Colonel William J. Donovan was sent on an unofficial but highly important tour of the Balkans and the Near East. All of these special agents reported in confidence to the President and acted without benefit of the established State Department channels.

The third and most subtle of the Roosevelt checks on the department is also the most typical. Unwilling to replace major subordinates or to provoke open clashes, the President has quietly hedged the department about with new agencies designed to syphon off its powers. The first of these was the Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, better known as the Rockefeller Committee, created to propagandize Latin America on behalf of the Good Neighbor Policy. The department bitterly resented this infringement of its natural jurisdiction and made its peace only when the two agencies united in opposing the Donovan Committee, which at one point threatened to enter the Latin American arena. Formally the Office of the Coordinator of Information, the Donovan agency was commissioned to assemble and analyze, for government use, information on foreign affairs obtained chiefly by short wave and, more important, to direct a counter-propaganda service. So lively was the scuffle between the COI and the department that at one point, according to Pearson and Allen, the Donovan agency sent electricians around to rip out the teletype machine by which the department was receiving news for a contemplated series of propaganda broadcasts of its own.

Even in the issuance of visas the department lost a measure of its control when the President set up a Board of Appeals, consisting of two members responsible to himself, to pass upon rejections of visa applications by lower boards. The Secretary of State still has the last word, but the chances of his overruling the Board of Appeals are slight.

Far beyond any of these trespasses on the department's estate are the powers that have been conferred on the Board of Economic Warfare, which now decides what products are to be exported and where they are to go, the very field of action in which the department for so long concentrated its appeasement strategies. The promulgation, in the spring of 1942, of Executive Order 9128, awarding these extraordinary powers to the board, came like a thunderclap to the ears of department officials. Welles was indirectly reported—by Arthur Krock, who should know—to have been reduced to "anguish" by this transfer of "a fundamental foreign policy which it is the historic function of the State Department to formulate and conduct." And when Hull returned from a rest cure he is said to have blamed Welles and Duggan for their failure to head off the coup.

Even before the President endowed the BEW with these special powers it had been a thorn in the side of the department. Headed by Vice-President Wallace, it is concerned primarily with obtaining products necessary for the war effort and with using American economic and commercial power as a weapon against the Axis, particularly in Latin America. It believes in vigorous methods. To cite only one example, it urges use of American personnel to speed up the production and shipment of Brazilian rubber. The department, on the other hand, is essentially political. With a nervous concern for the Good Neighbor Policy, it is worried about Brazilian sensitivities and prefers leaving the job to Brazilians, even if that course entails long negotiations and delay. Both agencies obviously have a case, and both harry the President with appeals.

Obviously this device of piling up new agencies to circumscribe the powers of the old has its administrative weaknesses. It is costly and where it does not produce a duplication of effort it provokes jurisdictional rows that are at least as unpleasant and disorganizing as the bitterness that would be caused by shake-ups in personnel. Nevertheless, it appears at times to offer the President the only way out of a difficult situation. In any event these shifts of jurisdiction must be looked upon as temporary expedients rather than institutional changes. The powers so quickly conferred on a new agency are just as quickly modified or revoked. It is the hope of the State Department that the BEW will never be allowed to use its paper powers in full, and that hope has already been partially justified. In arbitrating between the two agencies the President has tended to mollify the outraged department and to restore to it some of its traditional prerogatives. But his very position as umpire has strengthened his hand. The threat of rival agencies challenging its sacred jurisdictions has stirred the department out of its ancient lethargy and forced it, as the recent pronouncements of Hull and Welles have demonstrated, to speak the language of a people's war.

[Problems and personalities of the State Department not discussed in this series will be treated in the author's forthcoming book, "The Riddle of the State Department," on which these articles have been based.]

Helicopters for Victory

BY HENRY HAZLITT

WE HAVE been telling ourselves now for three years that the Axis powers have won their victories by deceit, treachery, and ruthlessness, and by a numerical superiority in weapons created over a long period. It is all perfectly true. But there is another lesson, more difficult for us to learn, because less flattering to our vanity. The Axis powers have won their victories also by unified command of all services and by the imagination and audacity of their strategy. With few exceptions the strategy of the United Nations, when not actually bungling, has been timid and uninspired.

We have finally learned—from the Axis—the paramount importance of air power. But in the main we have learned only to imitate. The great innovations in air power—self-sealing tanks, troop strafing, large-scale troop transport, parachute troops, gliders—all had to be successfully demonstrated by the Axis first before the generals and admirals of the democracies could be brought to take them seriously. Is it not time that we seized the imaginative leadership?

No one can doubt that our military leaders and technicians are constantly working to increase airplane speed, maneuverability, ceiling, range, armor, fire power, and the like. But are they applying the same ingenuity and persistence in the development of new forms of aircraft for uses of which present aircraft are incapable? As the war reaches a crisis, the need for one such new form becomes increasingly clear. This is a form of air power that does not require the use of airfields, runways, or catapults; that can land slowly and vertically without injury on any chosen point—field, street, housetop, ship deck, body of water—and ascend with the same ease. In addition it is desirable that such craft should fly slowly as well as fast and still maintain altitude.

This type of machine is not a mere inventor's dream. It is not a mere set of engineer's blueprints. It exists. It exists in the helicopter, impressive flights of which were made in April a year ago by the noted airplane designer, Igor Sikorsky. Mr. Sikorsky has been constantly improving his machine. You do not have to take his word regarding what it can do. He has shown colored motion pictures of its remarkable feats. In these you can see him rise vertically from land, water, and marsh. You can see him rise a foot or two above the water, skim over it at this level, or hover stationary at the same level, and alight like a feather, without even a splash. You can see him circle around a lake, come to a dead stop in front of a dock, hover in the air at the height of a man's shoulder while a man on the dock hangs a suitcase on the helicopter; then you can see Mr. Sikorsky swing around the lake a few times with the suitcase hanging on, and stop dead again (in the air) in front of the dock, while the man lifts his suitcase off. You can see Sikorsky's helicopter come to a sudden stop in midair from a high speed. You can see the helicopter stop in midair at the height of a man's shoulder while an assistant takes hold of one of the wheels and pulls the machine with him, which is made to follow docilely by the man at the controls like a great floating camel.

Sikorsky also explains that the helicopter is extremely easy to fly. You could learn to fly it indoors, in a moderate-sized auditorium. It seems to be at least as easy to master as an automobile. A striking comparison suggests itself here. Suppose one had to start learning to drive an automobile at a minimum speed of sixty miles an hour? How many people would learn to drive automobiles? Yet this is the situation with regard to the airplane. But with a helicopter you can start as slowly as you like.

To anyone with the slightest imagination, all this should suggest an entirely new form of air power, with a range of possibilities in war hitherto undreamed of, waiting merely for us to develop and exploit. This can only be done quickly enough if the leaders of our army, navy, and air forces take an active interest and pool the ingenuity and technical skill of our aviation engineers and designers for that purpose.

Helicopters would have innumerable uses as a supplementary air arm, carrying out all sorts of tasks impossible for the orthodox airplane. They could be used for liaison and reconnaissance in the field under almost any conditions of land warfare. Light, short-range helicopters such as this country could turn out in great quantities without the extensive use of aluminum and other material needed for combat airplanes, could be used all along our coast line, at points where airfields are not available, to spot submarines. They might be much more useful than orthodox airplanes for this purpose because they could hover over a given point, and if necessary slow down their speed to that of a submarine itself. Heavier helicopters could be used from the decks of merchant ships to spot or bomb submarines. They might prove a far more useful anti-tank weapon than airplanes, because, though they can go faster than any tank, they can also slow down to the pace of any tank, and so make the target stationary in relation to themselves.

But the greatest advantage of helicopters, if we had them at this moment, might be in connection with an invasion of the Continent from England. At present the British and Americans have a hard choice. Mere air bombardment is obviously not going to be enough. And it is enormously costly and wasteful in proportion to the military results that it achieves. From the humanitarian standpoint, night bombing destroys hundreds of homes and kills and maims thousands of civilians, in order to destroy also a few war factories; from a cold-blooded military standpoint, it represents an enormous waste of bombs that miss their intended mark. The only other choice today for supplementary attack is between a full-scale invasion and Commando raids. It is a closely guarded military secret whether or not we have the ships for a successful invasion. In any case there must be terrific losses in ships and men before a bridgehead could even be established. The alternative is hit-and-run raids limited to the immediate shoreline. The individual soldier must do his task in a few hours, return to a designated point on the shore, and hope to find a ship there waiting for him.

Contrast this with a helicopter invasion. Even at their present stage of development helicopters could be landed at points one or two hundred miles in from the French coast, beyond the elaborate shoreline protections. Men could land from them, plant their time bombs or dynamite precisely where they would do the most good, gather information directly or from the native population, supply subject populations with bombs and arms, take back recruits, seize German prisoners from among the occupying forces. If the invaders found themselves outnumbered, they could leave quickly at a hundred miles an hour. And the invaders could come in great numbers. Helicopters with relatively small horse-power motors could be turned out with the speed of automobiles. Those who fly them would require nothing like the elaborate training necessary for regular flyers.

It is true that the helicopter is in some ways not so efficient as the airplane. Let us say that with the same horse-power motor it can go only half the speed of the airplane, or only half the distance, or lift only half the weight. All this does not mean that it would not be extremely valuable in war: for it can do what the orthodox airplane cannot do. It is not proposed as a substitute for the airplane, but as a supplement to it. Sikorsky compares the relation of the helicopter to the plane with that of the automobile to the railroad. The railroad is far more efficient than the automobile in certain respects, particularly for carrying great weights over long distances. But the train has to go from one prepared terminal to another, while the family automobile can be parked in your backyard, can go anywhere, and can take you to or from your railroad. Just so the airplane and helicopter. The airplane must start from an extensive and elaborately prepared airfield in friendly territory; it is unable to land in enemy territory and to leave again. The helicopter does not need an airfield at either end.

But would not helicopters be vulnerable to pursuit airplanes, which can go faster and carry more fire power? They would be. So, for that matter, in varying degrees, are bombing planes, flying boats, transport planes, motor-torpedo boats, army trucks, motor-cycle troops, and infantry; but that is not a reason for dispensing with any of these. The helicopter, however, for invasion purposes, would be far less vulnerable than transport ships, invasion barges, or destroyers and cruisers. It is faster than anything that travels on land or sea. It could, therefore, evade hostile airplanes better than anything on land or sea; and, being individually small, it would make an unrewarding target. Helicopters could travel like a swarm of gnats, with the protection of their own fighter planes.

Though any effective weapon, once developed by either side, is taken over as soon as possible by the enemy, the element of surprise, of getting first into production, counts heavily and could play a determining role. Helicopters, moreover, are at least one weapon that would be far more useful to the United Nations than to our enemies. American mass production could turn them out faster than the Axis. Used in connection with merchant ships they could protect the sea lanes, so much more important to us than to the Axis. A final reason for their superior usefulness to us lies in the very character of the war. Throughout the lands conquered and occupied by the Axis powers there is seething discontent. All these peoples, forced by their conquerors to produce weapons and supplies against us, are our potential and moral allies and need only to be turned into real allies. Think what the United Nations could accomplish today with helicopter raids in Norway, Holland, Belgium, occupied France, Yugoslavia, or in the conquered sections of Russia and China! They could establish contact with and supply arms to guerrilla fighters like those under General Mikhailovitch in Yugoslavia. They could establish so many nests of resistance that the Nazi task would become impossible. If we use air power imaginatively and boldly, we may enormously shorten the war.

Keep Them Out!

VI. CLARE E. HOFFMAN OF MICHIGAN

BY WILL CHASAN AND ESTHER JACK

CONGRESSMAN CLARE E. HOFFMAN has a grievance. Last April a federal prosecutor asked him to explain the distribution by American fascists of copies of his isolationist speeches in envelopes bearing his Congressional frank. Hoffman's reply, belated from the floor of the House, was that he was being made the target of a "smear campaign." The federal prosecutor, he shouted, "is making ammunition for a campaign. He's a smear artist."

Actually any attempt to "smear" the gentleman from Allegan, Michigan, would be an exercise in futility. A crabbed, small-town Republican lawyer with a dour face and a vigilante spirit, he has been described, among other things, as "scurrilous," "berserk," and "a one-man lynch mob." His voting record in Congress during the past eight years makes Hamilton Fish look like an interventionist by comparison, and Eugene Cox like a New Dealer. In addition, he has earned the ugly distinction of being the most vituperative man in the House. "Get some more men like Hoffman into Congress," one of his colleagues observed recently, "and our democratic process will simply break down."

Hoffman first achieved national prominence through his violent hostility to the New Deal and organized labor. A member of the extreme Tory wing from his first day in Congress, he was one of the thirty-three House members who voted against the Social Security Act. He opposed slum-clearance and low-cost housing, and fought bitterly against the Wage-Hour Law and National Labor Relations Act. He has kept up a drumming attack on the National Labor Relations Board, commonly referring to it as "this wrecker of business, this creator of unemployment, this conspiring and arrogant NLRB, which has assumed to itself powers never given it by Congress." The Senate Civil Liberties Committee's disclosure of illegal anti-labor practices by American industry so incensed him that he called the committee's chairman, Senator Robert LaFollette, a "disgrace to the Senate, a stench in the nostrils of all true Americans."

Both in and out of Congress, Hoffman has advocated mob violence against the C. I. O. During the "Little Steel" strike, he wired to Mayor Daniel A. Knaggs of Monroe, Michigan, where one of the struck plants was located, that he was ready to march to the aid of the city with a group of "reliable" and "well-armed" citizens. He wired to his secretary at Allegan, Miss Lelia Boyce, instructing her to make preparations for his expeditionary force, telling her specifically to have his son Carl "locate 200 rounds of 12-gauge No. 1 chilled" shot and "100 rounds of 30-30 automatic." He delivered an inflammatory speech against the C. I. O. at Johnstown, Pennsylvania, when the notorious "Citizens Committee," sanctioned by Mayor Shields, was "restoring law and order" with funds supplied by Bethlehem Steel. Hoffman was so impressed by the city's strike-breaking activities that he said, "What we need in the White House is a man with the capacity of Mayor Shields." Hoffman's presidential candidate, it turned out, was an ex-bootlegger who had served a prison term for tampering with evidence in a prohibition case.

Hoffman's most blatant appeal for mob violence was contained in a speech to the House last year. If strikes continue, he said, "we shall inevitably see a situation where either the law-abiding citizens will insist upon public officials performing their duty even though it means bloodshed, or will do as was done in the early days in the West—take the law into their own hands. . . . If nothing else will end the lawlessness there is the possibility of a rope, a noose at the end, and a convenient lamppost."

Clare E. Hoffman

Hoffman's animus against the New Deal often has expressed itself in personal attacks on President Roosevelt. He has charged the President with hypocrisy, with obtaining his election through fraud, with being a tyrant, with unethically making money out of the Presidency, and with "deliberately and wickedly, with the aid of the Communists, preaching their anti-religious doctrine, the destruction of this government by force." On July 9, 1940, he rhetorically asked the House, "Who is Franklin D. Roosevelt that he should characterize the action of anyone as a stab in the back, as he charged was the recent action of Italy? From the beginning of his Administration down to the present moment, the President has himself been stabbing in the back, not only his political friends but our form of government." On another occasion he described the President as a "crazy, conceited megalomaniac."

Hoffman obviously believes in personal abuse as a political weapon. In a letter to some of his colleagues two years ago, he suggested that if five or six of them took the floor each day to "bawl hell" out of the President "we can accomplish our purpose," i. e., the defeat of Roosevelt at the polls. Hoffman's vulgar and venomous criticism of the President, made from the House floor, where the libel laws cannot touch him, are typical of his personal attacks on other New Dealers. He has called Harold Ickes a dung-cart, and insinuated that Frances Perkins was not reporting her income properly on tax returns. He often attributes financial greed to his opponents. During the foreign policy debate, he proposed a 35 per cent decrease in congressional salaries, saying, "I venture the prediction that if we pass a law taking 35 per cent of the salary of congressmen during the duration of the emergency, there will be at least a 50 per cent drop in congressional oratory on the necessity for war."

In contrast to all this venom, Hoffman's attitude toward the Axis powers has been surprisingly mild. He has taxed Roosevelt with "shattering the world's neighborliness," criticized the Administration for "provoking" Japan, and warned it against "incurring the ill will of the German rulers." After all, he said in a House debate on the Lease-Lend Act, "many of us doubt that Germany wants more than has been asked down through the ages by every people, by every nation, which has found itself with territory too small to contain its increasing millions or with men capable of fighting not needed in peaceful pursuits and with a leadership at once efficient and ambitious."

This unashamed justification of Nazi aggression accounts for Hoffman's opposition to New Deal foreign policy. He voted and actively campaigned against the fortification of Guam, revision of the Neutrality Act, Lend-Lease and the appropriation bills that went with it, the ship-seizure bill, conscription, extension of the draft period, and the arming of merchant ships. In opposition to each of these, he repeated the stock fascist arguments, and his speeches frequently were reprinted in the American fascist press. Almost every one of the papers recently banned from the mails for seditious utterances at one time or another published Hoffman's speeches.

The Michigan Congressman's relations with fascists and fascist groups extended further. As the District of Columbia grand jury disclosed, he placed his franking privilege at the disposal of William Kullgren, editor of the pro-Nazi Beacon Light. He inserted speeches by Gerald L. K. Smith in the Congressional Record, presented Smith's petitions for the continuation of the Dies Committee, and wrote to Social Justice that "no politician or group of politicians, no international bankers or group of bankers, or money changers or war profiteers are going to force us into this war." Hoffman's Washington office was a rallying point for visiting fascists. Elizabeth Dilling wrote, after she and one of the Coughlinite "mothers'" groups had descended on Washington for some unmotherly hell-raising, that he had given them a "fine welcome" and had invited them into his office. Hoffman was the unofficial spokesman for the "impeach Roosevelt" drive, and American fascist newspapers advised their readers to go to Washington, call on Hoffman, and demand Roosevelt's impeachment.

The Michigan "statesman," as Gerald Smith's Cross and the Flag describes Hoffman, was not jolted out of his antagonism to the war effort by Pearl Harbor. In the past eight months he often has derided our allies, but rarely our enemies. Last February he told the House, "I am beginning to wonder whether we are fighting to preserve our land, our nation, or whether we are fighting for the preservation of the British Empire." Previously he had asserted that the United States was sending "suicide squads" to England for attacks against the Continent, in which Churchill had refused to sacrifice British soldiers. He suggested, perhaps significantly, that it would be better to deploy our men and planes against Japan. It will matter little, he declared on another occasion, "whether Hitler gets us and skins us from the top down, or whether our ally, Joe Stalin, gets us and skins us from the heels up."

His criticism of the Administration has grown in intensity. He has accused Roosevelt of not caring as much about winning the war as about keeping the good will of the labor leaders. "The Administration," he says, "is still—in wartime—paying its debts to the labor politicians." Although Hoffman occasionally professes to be concerned with the progress of our war program, he has tried to block most Administration measures for the prosecution of the war. He has denounced Leon Henderson and his Office of Price Administration because they "would make slaves of the farmers, compelling them to cultivate the soil with a wooden plow and second-hand hoe, and to market their products either by mule or horse-drawn vehicle, wheel-barrow or on their backs. He would put all those engaged in the motor industry out of business." He has attacked Donald Nelson's labor-management committee plan as an effort by the Administration "joined with certain labor leaders, to force the management of our industrial plants to turn over their property, the property of their stockholders, to the tender mercies of the labor leaders."

Hoffman's post-Pearl Harbor record has been so damning that Michigan's Fourth Congressional District, in which he has been firmly entrenched, partly because it is blanketed by the Chicago Tribune, may turn against him. For the first time since his election in 1934, he will face a strong opponent in the Republican primaries. J. T. Hammond, a liberal Republican state senator, whose legislative district covers 45 per cent of the Fourth Congressional District, has announced his candidacy. Hammond, who ran ahead of Hoffman in the last election, will have the support of A. F. of L. and C. I. O. unions, and of important Republican groups which are tired of being represented by the Allegan isolationist.

The Hoffman camp, moreover, has suffered serious losses. Social Justice, which called Hoffman a "good American," has ceased publication. Elizabeth Dilling, who early this year told American patriots to thank God for Hoffman's "integrity and courage," is busy preparing for her sedition trial. William Dudley Pelley, who praised Hoffman as a "fighting patriot," is in an Indiana jail awaiting sentence for the same crime. Possibly Hoffman may win without these ardent supporters, but not if his opponents do an effective job of getting his record before the voters.

In the Wind

GERALD L. K. SMITH, whose Bible-thumping is so much a part of his politics that he calls his magazine the Cross and the Flag, wrote and published an article in the July issue entitled "Crucifixion [sic] Cannot Kill."

ADD PATRIOTIC CELEBRATIONS: National Donut Week, to be held in October, will be especially significant this year, says the Donut Institute, because "October marks the 25th anniversary of the making of the first donut by Salvation Army lassies in France in World War I . . . the traditional association of Doughboys and Donuts . . . and today's war background."

ALTHOUGH THE BEATING of Roland Hayes by city police in Rome, Ga., received a good deal of newspaper attention throughout the country, not one word about it appeared in the Rome News-Tribune, the only local paper.

THE HEAD of a personal-finance company in a Massachusetts city has quit the business since the issuance of the Federal Reserve order restricting the operations of such firms. He says that he has closed up shop not because government regulations cut down his profits but because he always knew he was in a dirty business and was glad of an excuse to leave it.

REVERSING ITS OWN previous ruling, the Federal Works Agency has decided that parochial schools are entitled to receive public works grants for improvements and maintenance. Hitherto such schools have been regarded as private institutions and therefore ineligible to participate in the public works program. The issue has always been a sore point with those who see a danger in any weakening of the traditional American separation of church and state.

ONE OF THE MANY well-intentioned newsletters on war and peace problems that have sprung up in the last few years is called World Community, published in Lyndhurst, New Jersey. It is currently serializing a long essay on socialism as an answer to war by Henry De Man, the Belgian radical who has become a Nazi labor Gauleiter.

[The $5 prize for the best item received in July goes to Richard Milton of Rowayton, Conn., for his story on Westbrook Pegler's meeting with James C. Petrillo, published July 18.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

Peacock

BY LOUIS KRONENBERGER

IT IS to Peacock's credit that he has never flared up into sudden fashionableness or become the idol of a raptly worshipful clan. To be sure, the kind of people who take pleasure in Peacock are exactly the kind who have a horror of cults. But the witty little novels go on being read, I suspect, far oftener than they are written about; which is as it should be, since there is not very much to write. One writes what one does chiefly to discharge a debt—as a kind of bread-and-butter letter. There is little to analyze or elucidate. His shortcomings are so palpable that we court his ghostly laughter simply by venturing to enumerate them; while the virtues are more palpable still.

Somebody has said that for Peacock the world was a salon—which puts in picturesque form what everybody has felt. All but one of his best novels—and I am only concerned with the best novels—bring people together, under one hospitable roof and usually round one Lucullan dinner table, to talk. Since they are cultivated and highly articulate people, they would seem to provide the materials for a symposium. That they do not, that they provide the materials for a farce, lies in the fact that each one, however cultivated, however articulate, is something of a maniac. Each has an obsession—a strident panacea, a gnawing bête noire. One character is convinced that everything in life tends toward progress, another that it tends toward decay; a third reduces everything to inoculation, a fourth to the work of the devil, a fifth to fish. One man's mania is German philosophy, another's is life in the twelfth century, still another's is "the march of mind." The host, generally more rational and always more colorless than his guests, has yet his mania too—that of collecting maniacs.

Peacock's formula is so simple, his efforts to disguise it are so half-hearted—who thinks twice about the insipid romances or trumped-up escapades that adorn his stories?—that one would imagine his mockery to be soon played out. Wherein does "Nightmare Abbey" differ from "Headlong Hall" except that it is more skilful, or "Crotchet Castle" from "Nightmare Abbey" except that it is more mature? The answer, of course, is that the formula is successful just because it is so simple—folly, absurdity, mania spring from it fully formed, and all they need is to be properly clothed. And with each new production Peacock clothed them in brighter colors—the wit sharpened, the satire toughened, the manias grew more lustrous. With each new production the talkers became funnier and their talk more flashing.

Judged mechanically as "novels," these little books are very limited affairs indeed. But it shows hardly more sense than it does humor to judge them so. The minute we damn Peacock's characters as one-dimensional, we have missed the point about them. They are eccentric, off balance, single-track; and their "reality" lies solely in their intensesness. What human traits they possess, such as a love for wine or a susceptibility to romance, are merely human—characteristic, not characterizing. Peacock's real triumph is to make his people interesting without making them human; to endow them, as well as impale them, with wit; to make them so learned, ingenious, energetic, and quick that they expend more vitality on a single obsession than most people do on a wide variety of interests. Some of them, modeled on Shelley, Coleridge, Byron, Brougham, are creatures of caricature; some are objects of satire or victims of irony; but they all wind up as creatures of farce. In his audacious flouting of realism, in the gravity with which he handles the absurd, Peacock is always creating a world of farce, a world of dialectical farce. His "people who talk nonsense logically" are but the highbrow cousins of people who act out nonsense logically—which is what people in ordinary farce are doing.

Again, it is all too true that Peacock is very deficient in plot; and this, unlike his trick of characterization, is a more positive fault. For he does, however grudgingly, attempt to rig something up in the way of story: to bring mysterious strangers on the scene, or develop a wildly romantic love affair, or—as with the Shelleyan Scythorp of "Nightmare Abbey"—to involve a desperate hero with two women at once. But so indifferent is he to building up suspense, so willing to reveal what he pretends to be hiding, so given to hackneyed and highfalutin situations, that it would almost seem as if his plots, too, were conceived as burlesque. In their own right they are duds, but they do contribute something to the farcical atmosphere.

For it is the simplicity of Peacock's method, the light framework, the manageable proportions, that enable him to explore eccentricity without becoming eccentric, and to be erudite in his trifling without being obscure. If we compare a novel of Peacock's with, say, a novel of Aldous Huxley's, we at first decide that in a simpler age even the sophistication was simpler. But we at length conclude that he had the rapid swoop, and the sharp focus, of the unadulterated comic writer: he worked on a single plane, and so achieved a single effect. His romantic touches provide the atmosphere that suited, not him, but his intentions; though they can pass at times for poetry, they exist for satire. Peacock himself was not romantic; he had much more in common with the eighteenth century that gave him birth than with the nineteenth in which he grew up and grew old. From the eighteenth he inherited Reason, in its most Voltairean sense, and he used it to run a rapier through the new era's groping intellectualism. He inherited Enlightenment, which, though less enveloping than those who wore its mantle supposed, was perhaps more waterproof than the newer garment called Progress. In the end, however, we see chiefly a skeptical mind having its sport with dogmatic ideas. Peacock's satire is almost always aimed at theories, beliefs, opinions, philosophies of life—ranging from Rousseau and Kant to the wildest drivel; very seldom at human feeling and human character. It is in this sense that he is really limited, that he lacks fulness and mystery and something that can only be called passion. There are no knaves to go along with his fools; no sins to vary, or even flavor, the silliness; his people have no secrets worth discovering; only the mind is made comic, never the body. (Who ever created so many grotesque characters without bothering to say what any of them looked like?) And a world, even a farce world, that ignores the human heart is too incomplete for a full-fledged novel. But since there are a dozen good novelists for every writer like Peacock, his gifts are perhaps the more valuable, not the less, for being so special.

As a satirist he is special too, since he was in no sense a reformer. He has none of the moral heat or personal anger that animates a whole line of English satirists from Swift to Aldous Huxley, but neither has he the qualities that finally frustrate them. Peacock quite lacked Swift's desire to "make sin and folly bleed"; he had no interest in sin, and he preferred to let folly blow itself up till it burst. If he provides a moral, it concerns outlook, not conduct. Against mania in others he sets up his own belief in moderation; and such things as are said to make the angels weep merely moved Peacock to laughter.

Yet though no reformer, Peacock is not a cynic. If he refused to compromise his comic vision with any squinting expressions of earnestness, if he was, at bottom, no more of a Shaw than a Swift—and the point is important, because Peacock has certain resemblances to Shaw—he had a sound enough sense of values. He may merely have looked on at things, but the very image is proof that he did not turn his back. He belongs, in his own period, with the liberals. In one way or another, he said a good deal about the social and economic ills of his time. It is not for such things that we are persuaded to read Peacock now; but at least they are there.

What we read him for are what people have always read him for: his comic gifts, as they provide not profit but pleasure; the skill rather than the pertinence of his satire; the abounding wit; the polished style. The style, which as narrative and dialogue alike keeps a formal tone—partly from its indebtedness to eighteenth-century traditions, partly from its satiric exhibits of pompous learning—is, above everything else, compact. But it is rapid too, considering the retardations imposed by its wit, and easy, considering the weightiness of its language. Peacock is forever parodying the polysyllabic jargon of philosophy and science, but in his own right, too, he half-humorously admits a good many odd and learned words into his prose. The novels are a forest of Latinity, with an undergrowth of Greek; something like "digladiation" or "excubant" crops up on every page.

The wit, to which one is bound to return in writing of Peacock, and with which one could not better conclude, is plainly the best thing about him. Sometimes it characterizes: "He was an excellent sportsman, and almost always killed his game; but now and then he killed his dog." Sometimes it criticizes: "The state of the public charities, sir, is exceedingly simple. There are none. The charities here are all private, and so private, that I for one know nothing of them." Sometimes it pulverizes:

"Allow me," said Mr. Gall. "I distinguish the picturesque and the beautiful, and I add to them, in the laying out of grounds, a third and distinct character, which I call unexpectedness."

"Pray, sir," said Mr. Milestone, "by what name do you distinguish this character, when a person walks round the grounds for the second time?"

But the wit comes off best in longer and more sustained passages: in, say, the cutting description of the Coleridge-like Flosky, or in the massive utterances of the drunken Seithenyn, the key figure of that novel of Peacock's which stands rather apart from his other successes—the mythical "Misfortunes of Elphin."

Three Personal Histories

NO RETREAT. By Anna Rauschnig. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.75.

FOUR YEARS OF NAZI TORTURE. By Ernst Winkler. D. Appleton-Century Company. $2.50.

THE BEASTS OF THE EARTH. By George M. Karst. Albert Unger Publishing Company. $2.50.

A MAN is known by the enemies he makes. The Nazis probably enjoy the distinction of having made the widest variety of enemies ever bagged by a single political movement. The trio whose books are reviewed here consists of two Catholics and a Protestant; two Germans and an Austrian; one soldier, one journalist, and one Hausfrau. Not one of them was a revolutionary. All were devout Christians. Only one had any strong political convictions prior to his clash with the Nazis.

Both Winkler and Karst—these names are of course assumed—were inmates of Nazi concentration camps, and their books are straightforward and completely convincing accounts of the horrors which they and their fellow-prisoners suffered there. Winkler was arrested because of his activities in the Catholic youth movement, which had been forced underground shortly before he undertook his duties. The reason for Karst's arrest remains a mystery, as does everything about his previous activities. We gather from the preface that he was a Viennese journalist and a Catholic.

Oddly enough, Winkler, the soldier, tells a far better story than Karst, the journalist. Karst is obviously hampered by the necessity of suppressing any information which might reveal his identity, for the protection, presumably, of those whom he has left behind in Vienna. Winkler, on the other hand, gives freely of himself as well as of his experiences, with an instinct for the truths that are stranger than fiction which any journalist might envy. Born of a military family and reared as a devout Catholic, he became an army officer as a matter of course. The conflict between his military traditions and his religious convictions had its crisis when Hitler came to power. Convinced that he could not serve God and Hitler, Winkler resigned his commission, and took the road which led to the concentration camp.

His fortitude under the unspeakable Nazi tortures reveals that Christian heroism still lives. His sympathy with the Jewish prisoners, his friendship with Niemöller, transcending sectarian boundaries, his sense of the dignity of man, never explicitly stated but implicit in his attitude toward his Nazi masters and his fellow-prisoners—all these are eloquent of the fact that a man's religion can be something more to him than a badge of respectability or a passport to a country club.

When the Nazis came to power, Winkler instantly recognized them as enemies, and made his decision at once. Anna Rauschnig, on the other hand, spent years in trying to work out some way of living at peace with them and with herself as well. Her husband has already described the political currents through which the Rauschnigs attempted to steer a delicate course: her own story is chiefly concerned with her struggle to shield her children from the moral degradation of the Nazi new order.

In 1929 the Rauschnigs bought Warnau, an estate in the vicinity of Danzig, and set to work at farming. They hoped to root their young family in the soil. But the fates had other plans for Rauschnig, and in 1933 he was offered and accepted a high office in the new pro-Nazi regime in Danzig. Gradually the sinister outside world closed in upon them. It was not possible for them to keep their son at home indefinitely in the care of tutors of their own choosing; they had to send him to school, where he was taught not to obey his parents and not to believe in God. In time it became impossible for their daughters to remain aloof from the Hitler Mädchenbund, where the "coarse and uneducated daughter" of a local farmer presided. The Rauschnig girls were horrified by the prescribed lessons in "biology" given by this Bund leader, lessons whose chief object, it seemed, was the production of "state" babies.

Frau Rauschnig became frantic. Yet she had no need of her husband's warnings that to remain aloof was dangerous. An uncomfortable feeling that her cook was spying upon her hardened into certainty. Eventually Frau Rauschnig discovered that her children's governess, for years a trusted member of her household, was an informer, reporting her intimate conversations with her daughters. At such moments one is moved to deep sympathy with her struggle against forces too huge for her puny yardstick to measure, and too sinister for her Hausfrau's mind to grasp.

Like them, Anna Rauschnig could recognize the enemy for what he was only when he trained his guns on her own home and children. It is to be feared that her judgment is bounded by the same narrow horizon when she estimates the virtues of her friends. Grateful for asylum in this country, she dedicates her book "To the United States of America, which has opened its arms to the lost children of the world"!

BETSY HUTCHISON

Materialism and Democracy

A GENERATION OF MATERIALISM, 1871-1900. By Carlton J. H. Hayes. Harper and Brothers. $3.75.

AMONG groups opposed to fascism the trend to a metaphysical reaction against the "materialism" of democracy is growing. Such groups hold "materialism" responsible for the crisis of the old order and urge the return to an "idealism," philosophical and religious, against which modern civilization had to fight to make its way. One group blames everything on Marx and Darwin; another belabors the "economic man," who despite his limitations brought a large measure of democracy and freedom while the "political man" of totalitarian statism limits or destroys them; a third calls for an absolute "spiritual authority" within whose tight embrace we shall live happily forevermore. Professor Hayes's book is a synthetic expression of all these views.

As a history of Europe from 1871 to 1900 this book is stimulating and suggestive. Professor Hayes, one of our able, civilized historians, finds his way easily among the sources and piles fact upon fact to make a living picture. Two chapters alone are worth the price of admission—Resurgence of Economic Nationalism and National Imperialism, and Seed-Time of Totalitarian Nationalism. In these chapters you feel democracy moving toward disaster. Revolutionary democratic nationalism is transformed into reactionary economic nationalism; upper-class liberals become conservative and reactionary; democracy fails to use economic forces in the service of welfare and allows them to become increasingly twisted in the service of militarism and imperialism; political conflicts multiply, and as one inflamed nationalism and imperialism clashes with another, a pathological craving for violence grows; racial myths and anti-Semitism are exploited to provide an ideological sanction for reaction. All social forces, including Marxism, labor unionism, and reform, converge to aggrandize the state power, to bring a cult of state worship. Nor is it simply the expression of the interests of one class but a general social and intellectual trend toward statism, which primarily characterizes the power-drives of "élites" from all classes. Hayes conveys an overwhelming impression of the growing economic, political, and intellectual malaise that brought World War I and its aftermath of totalitarian statism.

Yet there is no true understanding in this book of what happened and what to do about it. The reason is simple: this is a tract for the times that offers ready-made prescription for our ills. The prescription did not shape up as the book was written; the book was written to prove the prescription. Professor Hayes calls imperialism and statism the "fruition of liberalism"; he minimizes the new liberal forces opposed to the reactionary transformation and ignores the constructive economic forces and the democratic procedures and values out of which a new free world might be built. Materialism, according to Professor Hayes, is the devil in the piece. And what is materialism? Professor Hayes says much about later scientific work that exploded the mechanical materialism of the nineteenth century. But that is not his dominant idea. He condemns materialism as "a frankly this-worldly pragmatism." He belabors "scientific materialism" on one major point where it was right, in making life "a

HESSIAN HILLS SCHOOL

NEW WARTIME TUITION PLAN

To Enable More Children in These War Years to Share in the Benefits of Liberal Democratic Education—A Sliding Scale of Tuition Based on Ability to Pay. Range of Day Tuition: $125-$425. Boarding Range: $675-$1,200. Write for Details. . . .

Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y.

Croton 514

For Boys and Girls from 2 Years Thru Junior High School
A Modern Day & Boarding School in the Country 50 Min. from N. Y. C.

Use your back copies of The Nation as a reference source. For details, turn to inside back cover.

long series of purely natural steps." It is all an apology for churchism in its Catholic manifestation (whose anti-democratic support of feudal reaction is neglected). Statism is not wrong because it limits and destroys democracy, but because it "put the national state in place of the church as the cement of human society and as the intermediary between man and his salvation." The disunity of Europe came from its repudiation of the universal authority of the Roman church.

From Professor Hayes's analysis it seems that totalitarianism is a result of the "materialism" of democracy, social reform, and welfare! Yet fascism, too, rejects the "materialism" of democracy in favor of final authority and values. In an address he made before going to his post as American ambassador in Madrid, Professor Hayes attacked "pagan totalitarianism." Is, then, "Christian" totalitarianism all right? Franco is supported and blessed by the church hierarchy in Spain, while the hierarchy in Italy made its peace with Mussolini.

Professor Hayes insists that "ultimate truth cannot be arrived at by methods of experimental science." True, for there is no ultimate truth. But neither has ultimate truth been revealed to the church. Neo-Thomists disingenuously argue that no conflict can arise between the church and science, since "true" science must necessarily be in harmony with truth revealed to the church! It is no accident that Neo-Thomism strengthens totalitarian intellectual trends, for the claim to final truth and universal religious authority is totalitarian. It is no accident that some Neo-Thomists—e. g. Jacques Maritain—are not too excited about totalitarianism, for they feel it may bring a revival of the church's universal supremacy. They make the same mistake that big business and communism made in Germany: "We come after fascism." Religion can flourish as a human moral force only in a democracy, where it is one of many cultural institutions.

Fascism is a catastrophe for civilization. Let us beware lest, in an effort to promote cherished dogmas, we strengthen and promote ideas that may strengthen fascism or bring totalitarianism in other forms. Let us look into the real world and among all men of good will for the forces and action of humanist democracy and freedom. The messianic approach, whether conservative or radical, religious or political, is dangerous. For it is not true that our faith must conquer or that it alone offers salvation to man.

LEWIS COREY

Poets and Scholars

PRINCETON VERSE BETWEEN TWO WARS: AN ANTHOLOGY. Edited by Allen Tate. Princeton University Press. $2.50.

BETWEEN 1916 and 1925 three volumes of Princeton verses were published. In those three volumes appeared the work of many men who have gained distinction in the field of letters, though not usually as poets: Edmund Wilson, John Peale Bishop, Raymond Holden, R. P. Tristram Coffin, F. Scott Fitzgerald, T. K. Whipple, and Henry Chapin. In the present collection appears work by eleven men who are now undergraduate students at Princeton and by twenty-five men who have been, at one time or another, undergraduate or graduate students there. Certainly very few of these eleven undergraduates will become known as poets. A few of the more mature contributors, such as Theodore Spencer, Philip Horton, and A. Fleming MacLiesh, have already made some reputation as poets; most of them have already committed themselves to other occupations. But these considerations, like the fact that only a few of the contributors to the earlier anthologies are now known as poets, do not materially affect the significance of "Princeton Verse Between Two Wars."

The collection is significant as a symptom of a tendency to bring the arts, as practiced, and not merely as a subject for scholarship, into closer contact with the academic world. No doubt this tendency, which can be observed in several colleges and universities, has its dangers: there is the danger that scholarship may be infected with dilettantism and that the arts may be infected with academicism and snobbery. But these dangers seem trivial in comparison with the potential gains. The teaching of literature, for instance, could well profit by a fuller understanding of the nature and vital processes of literature. And contemporary writing could well profit, in intellectual depth and technical range, by a more intimate contact with the literature of the past. It is possible that such a tendency may help to raise both artistic and academic standards. It is sometimes said that the true poet or fiction writer and the true scholar can take care of themselves. In one sense this is perfectly right. But the writer or professor is not, after all, working in a vacuum; he is part of a society, and in so far as that society can be made aware of the values both of the arts and of scholarship, and of the relationship between those values, each will profit.

Even if it contained no very good poems, the collection would still be interesting as a symptom. But there are a number of very good poems in the book, and a large amount of skilful and intelligent verse. In this connection it is particularly satisfying to observe the high level of the work by contributors who are still students. Even if none of these eleven young men becomes a poet, it can still be said that poetry is alive in the academic community of which, at present, they are members.

ROBERT PENN WARREN

RESORT

HIGH HOLIDAY SERVICES

OPEN UNTIL SEP. 28

SOCIAL & SPORT STAFFS

SCAROON MANOR
HOTEL 071 SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.

FREE GOLF after LABOR DAY

The NATION'S

New Literary Page

Louis Kronenberger's comment on Thomas Peacock in the present issue, is the second of the informal commentaries on reading and writing which are to be a regular bi-weekly feature. Future contributors will include Lionel Trilling, Irwin Edman, Joseph Wood Krutch, Louise Bogan, Mark Van Doren, Jacques Barzun, James Thurber, and others. . . .

MUSIC

MERELY to use words in metrical patterns, or paints in coherent forms, or musical sounds in coherent progressions—is something which not everyone can do, something which requires specific ability or talent. This is not to say the talent is rare; on the contrary, it is common: a large number of people have this facility with words, paints, or sounds. But only a few produce valuable poetry, painting, or music; for this requires more than mere articulateness in an artistic medium. Involved with this articulateness, operating through it, crystallized in the completed form are the artist's personal resources—what he is in character, mind, feeling, what he has lived through, what his experience has done to him and for him, what understanding and insight it has given him. They give his work of art its meaning, its character, its style; and where these impress us as important or great it is because the articulateness in the medium relates itself, in the artist, to an inner core of important or great qualities, emotions, insights—an inner core which governs the flow of words, paints, or sounds, eliminates what is superfluous, what is imitative or derivative, and produces a style, a form, a content which are concentratedly, homogeneously individual.

The mere existence of Shostakovich's Seventh Symphony is evidence of talent: most of us could not produce an hour and a quarter of symphonic music, or even the first minute. Shostakovich is able to make sounds follow sounds the first minute, the second minute, and every succeeding minute to the seventy-fifth; he is able to produce sounds for every requirement of structure and meaning—every theme, every manipulation, every transition, every climax, every detail of expressive content—of an hour-and-a-quarter-long symphony concerned with the struggle and final victory of humanity over barbarism; he is able to produce sounds that are now in this style, now in that, orchestrated now this way, now that, now loud, now soft, fast, slow, excited, calm, boldly assertive, quietly introspective, dramatic, lyric, ironic, pastoral, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, and in the end Soviet Russian affirmative-triumphant.

But the music that is all these is derivative, eclectic: one hears the conventional pastoral style of the past two centuries; one hears this style melodically and harmonically distorted in the manner of Shostakovich—which is derived from Prokofiev; one hears a long crescendo of repetitions of one theme in the manner of Ravel's "Bolero," including the unceasing snare-drum; among the other things one hears even—surprisingly—a passage for strings in the manner of Sibelius. The music also is diffuse, saying everything at enormously expanded length; it is as pretentious in style as in length; and what it says so pretentiously is feeble, inane, banal. Pretentiousness leaps out at one from that long crescendo of repetitions of one theme—the pretentiousness of the conception, the intention, of the inane theme itself, of the unresourceful, crude, blatant variations in accompanying figuration and orchestration that are devised for the repetitions, of the noise that is resorted to at the end. And these qualities of the music represent the personal resources that are involved with Shostakovich's articulateness in his medium.

One notes, however, that the pretentious banalities, the grandiloquent fervors and affirmations are of the sort to impress an unsophisticated mass audience; that the constant shifting from one striking idea, style, figuration, instrumental combination to another—now pastoral oboe over strings, now this pastoral style melodically and harmonically distorted, now dissonant noise, now a solo bassoon, now a long crescendo of repetitions of one theme, now portentously plucking basses, now a combination of trumpet, harp, and contrabassoon—is a way of catching this audience's ear each time that it is about to be lost. One notes, in short, that the symphony represents not only Shostakovich's resources but the ideas which govern musical composition in Russia.

Shostakovich himself has contended that "there can be no music without ideology. The old composers, whether they knew it or not, were upholding a political theory. Most of them, of course, were bolstering the rule of the upper classes. Only Beethoven was a forerunner of the revolutionary movement . . . [who] wished to give new ideas to the public and rouse it to revolt against its masters." His own end as a Soviet composer is "to contribute . . . toward the growth of our remarkable country"; to write music expressive of the conception of "our epoch as something heroic, spirited, and joyous," music which "lifts and heartens and lightens people for work and effort," music which these people can understand, and which he therefore endeavors to make "simple and expressive." And a Soviet critic, Grigori Schneerson, has described the Soviet composer as one who "plunges into the social currents swirling round him" and responds to "the demands of the wide masses of people, their artistic tastes" by speaking to them "in a new, powerful, and intelligible language." The democratization of music in Russia would, then, have this effect if Beethoven were living there today: not that the masses would be given the privilege of hearing the last quartets in which Beethoven expressed mystical states of inner illumination and superearthly exaltation, but that he would be made to write on the level of emotion and language of the masses. What it has meant in Shostakovich's case is that grandiloquently banal affirmations have been added to the distorted grimacings and grotesqueries of his own inclination.

Actually Mozart's G minor Symphony did not bolster the Hapsburg monarchy and Beethoven's last quartets did not undermine it; these works neither upheld nor attacked any political theory; they did not originate in any external events. Mozart and Beethoven wrote from internal compulsions; they expressed their own unique personal emotions and insights in their own unique languages and styles; they wrote for the listener with educated sensitivities who would be able to understand them. All this may condemn them in Russian eyes almost as much as if they had written to bolster the Hapsburg monarchy; but it produced the G minor Symphony and the last quartets; whereas if Mozart and Beethoven had written in a way that satisfied the Russians they would have produced works like Beethoven's notorious "Battle" Symphony.

And on the other hand Shostakovich can turn from the battlefield straight to his pen and music paper; he can produce an hour-and-a-quarter-long symphony that expresses, in terms which the Russian masses understand, the struggle and final victory of humanity over barbarism as they imagine and feel it; his symphony can move listeners in other countries by its associations with events in which their emotions are involved; but what plays on their emotions about the sufferings and heroism of the Russian people is an excessively long piece of bad music.

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

HENRY HAZLITT, former literary editor of The Nation, is on the editorial staff of the New York Times. He is the author of a forthcoming book entitled "A New American Constitution."

WILL CHASAN has contributed articles on current politics to The Nation and other periodicals.

ESTHER JACK is on the research staff of a national labor organization.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER, dramatic critic of PM, is the author of "Kings and Desperate Men: Life in Eighteenth-Century England."

BETSY HUTCHISON visited Germany frequently during the period of the Weimar Republic.

LEWIS COREY is the author of "The Decline of American Capitalism," "The Unfinished Task: Economic Reconstruction for Democracy."

ROBERT PENN WARREN was formerly on the staff of the Southern Review. He has recently published a new book of verse entitled "Eleven Poems on the Same Theme."

RESORTS

For convenience and conviviality—Come to FOREST HOUSE

Near enough for easy travel—far enough for peace and relaxation, FOREST HOUSE offers every vacation advantage. 2 Splendid lakes. Best of accommodations, food, sports.

50 Miles from N.Y.C.
Phone MAHOPAC 688

FOREST HOUSE
Lake Mahopac, New York

HATHAWAY LODGE

Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Tennis, Handball, Swimming, Pool, Horseback Riding; also Golf nearby. Delicious food. Easy transportation.

Attractive Low Summer Rates

For reservations or further information, write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Tel. Tannersville 299 • N. Y. C. Tel. MU 2-2424

BREEZEMONT PARK ARMONK, N.Y.

A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County

If you choose your hotel with the same care and taste as you would your home, visit this nearby resort. Exclusive. Dignified. Luxuriously furnished. All sport facilities. Excellent cuisine. Less than one hour from New York City.

Phone: Armonk Village 955 Open All Year

BOOKS

BOOK BARGAINS

Our Enemy: James R. Young (paper ed.).....$ .20
Himmler, Nazi Spider Man: G. H. Combs, Jr.,..... .20
Army Inductee's Mental Test..... .25
Valor of Ignorance & Day of the Saxon: Homer Lea, complete (paper ed.)..... both for .50
Supreme Court of U. S.: Charles E. Hughes..... .50
The Thinking Reed: Rebecca West (orig. ed.)..... .50
Russia's Fighting Forces: Capt. Kourmoff (pap.)..... .50
Stedman's Comp. Pocket Guide to Europe (3.50 ed.)..... .50
Moment in Peking: Lin Yutang (orig. $3 ed.)..... 1.25
Six Centuries of Fine Prints: C. Zigrasser..... 1.25
Berlin Diary: William L. Shirer..... 1.35
Ambassador Dodd's Diary: Ed. by M. & W. Dodd 1.85
The Silent Don: M. Sholokhov (comp. 2 vol. in 1) 3.50
Add 10¢ per book U. S. mailing on orders under $2. The following PUBLIO AFFAIRS pamphlets, any 6 for 50¢, plus 10¢ mailing:
The Negro & the War; Vitamins for Health (Borsook); What's Happening to Our Constitution; Government Under Pressure; Prostitution & the War; What the New Census Means (Chase); Read Your Labels: How to Check Inflation; Coming Crisis in Manpower (Stewart); More for Your Money (Moffett); Guns, Planes, Your Pocketbook; Credit Unions—the People's Banks; Homes to Live In; Loan Sharks & Their Victims; Cooperatives in the U. S.
DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR, 212 B'way, N. Y. C.

RESORTS

★STAR LAKE CAMP★

IN THE GLORIOUS ADIRONDACKS

Between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground, 1,800 feet elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Canoeing, Swimming, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Interesting one-day trips arranged. Delicious wholesome meals. Rate $27.50 weekly. New Bungalows, semi-private baths for couples—$30.00 per person. Dietary laws observed.

Send for Booklet—New York Office

116 NASSAU ST., Room 802a, CO 7-2667

Sundays, Evenings, Holidays — PR 4-1390

Auto service from and to New York every Saturday and Sunday

CRANE LAKE LODGE WEST STOCKBRIDGE, MASS.

Informal Adult Camp

RUTH & MURRAY CAPLAN

• Private Lake • Tennis • All Sports

• Social Staff and Dancing

• Excellent Golf and Riding nearby

• Convenient Rail Connections

• American-Jewish Cuisine Booklet N

3 MILES TO BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

N. Y. C. Office: 225 West 34th St. CH 4-6205

HIGH IN THE BERKSHIRES

FOR THE TIME OF YOUR LIFE

Come to gorgeous Plum Point, only 55 miles from New York, with its 70 restful, green acres touching the Hudson. Recreational activities to exercise and relax your muscles. Dancing and entertainment. Heaping courses of appetizing foods. Splendid rooms with sleep-inviting beds.

Non-Sectarian

plum point
ATTRACTIVE RATES FREE BOOKLET
New Windsor, N.Y. Newburgh 4270

Tall Pines

High in the Dutchess County hills 80 miles from New York... land and water sports... a design for leisure. Starlight Summer Theatre nearby.

Attractive Rates.

PLEASANT VALLEY, DUTCHESS CO., N. Y.
Phone 2741

LE HAMEAU on Delaware River. Mountains. 1200 ft. Unexcelled French-American Cuisine. River sports, tennis on premises. Rate $25. Rigaud & Simon, EQUINUNK, Penna.

ADDITIONAL RESORT
ADVERTISING ON PAGE 137
AND INSIDE BACK COVER

RESORTS

GLENMERE

- Easy to Reach — Hard to Forget
- In the Ramapos — Commuting Distance
- 1600 Acre Estate — 51 Miles from N. Y. C.
- Superb Accommodations and Cuisine
- Private Lake; Golf Course; All Sports

SPECIAL RATES

By the MONTH, SEASON or YEAR

CHESTER, NEW YORK

Phone CHESTER 200

N. Y. C. Phone • REctor 2-5047

HILLTOP LODGE

On Beautiful Sylvan Lake
HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.

R. R. Station: Pawling, N. Y.

Tel. Hopewell Junction 2761

Only 65 Miles from N. Y. C.

HILLTOP... Yours for Vacation - Pleasure
• Every Sport and Recreation Facility • Golf Is Free on Premises • Food is TOPS

Reasonable Rates

Paul Wolfson and Sol Rothausen (Directors)
N. Y. OFFICE: 170 BROADWAY Cor. 7-3058

CAMPUNITY
WINDDALE, N. Y. OFFICE: 1 UNION SQ. N.Y.C. ALcove 4-8248

Every Fun for Everyone!

An all star week, every week. 79 different activities to make your vacation a happier success! Join the Fun at UNITY!

SPORTS • SOCIALS • ENTERTAINMENT

Tennis	Chorus	Revue
Baseball	Dramatics	Dancing
Swimming	Hikes	Buffets
Boating	Folk	Movies
Peteca-ria	Dancing	Concerts

And many more for summer fun!
*MAKE RESERVATIONS NOW!*
RATES: $24-$25 WK. — $4.50 DAY

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.

All Sports — Open All Year

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

NEW DELIGHTFUL DIFFERENT OAKWOOD WINDSOR NEW YORK

Tel.: Newburgh 4477. Only 53 Miles from N. Y. C.

Charming Colonial Estate. Spacious Grounds. Unexcelled food. Tennis, Golf, Swimming, Handball, Riding, Canoeing, Badminton. Limited accommodations. Attractive rates.

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes; interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails; Fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping-pong, etc.; Intelligent, gay companionship.
$28 & $32 Weekly Non-Sectarian
OLIVE H. G. BARON, Dir.

POLTER'S WILLOWS, Nanuet, N. Y. Country estate 27 miles from city. Intimate atmosphere, superlative food, $3.50 daily. Nanuet 2224.

Letters to the Editors

Followers of Martov

Dear Sirs: In the July 25 issue of your magazine you published a statement to the effect that I and my friends M. Werner and A. Yugov had been expelled from the Russian Social-Democratic Party.

This statement is totally false. There have been no such expulsions, nor is there in New York any party committee that would be empowered to expel us.

As for the "increasing sympathy for Bolshevism," a characterization of that kind will certainly not give your readers an accurate conception of the views of that theory of Russian Social Democracy which Mr. Werner, Mr. Yugov, and I represent. Our view, called "Martov's theory" after our party leader who died in 1923, emerged in the very beginning of the Bolshevik Revolution. It involved a critical attitude toward the theory of Bolshevism and was even more critical of the terroristic and dictatorial practices of Bolshevism, among the victims of which members of our group happen to be numbered. Nevertheless, we have at no time been blind in our fight against Bolshevism. We witnessed the gigantic transformation of the country's entire economic, social, and cultural existence and recognized that, however great the mistakes of Bolshevism, it could be only on the basis of a consolidation and further development of these genuine accomplishments of the revolution that the dictatorial regime could be replaced by a democratic one.

It is precisely this attitude which enabled Mr. Yugov to predict and describe the growth of the Soviet Union's economic might, and Mr. Werner to disclose the growing military strength of the Soviet Union, which has been such a striking revelation to the world. It was this view, too, which gave our group the faith, during even the darkest period of the German-Russian Pact, that the Soviet Union would inevitably return to the anti-Hitler front, and which enabled us to predict the colossal role it would play within this front despite its dictatorial regime—not alone as a military but also as a political factor.

Our position enables us not only to devote our own strength to the cause of victory for the Soviet Union, but also to call for aid on all those who cherish the highest ideals of mankind. Our attitude is not dictated by "sympathy for Bolshevism," but by our loyalty to the cause of freedom, democracy, and socialism.

THEODOR DAN

New York, August 4

[We are glad to accept Mr. Dan's correction and to publish the facts about his position and that of his associates. As for the expression "increasing sympathy for Bolshevism," it was used loosely and inaccurately. "Increasing sympathy for Russia" would have been more exact and would have expressed our meaning. Needless to say, the comment even as it stood implied no criticism whatever of the men mentioned.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Still for Evacuation

Dear Sirs: I took pains in my article to acknowledge the Americanism of many of our citizens of Japanese descent, and I am sorry if any of them feels that I have complicated a difficult personal situation. I discussed the Hawaiian Japanese at all only because I believed a critical danger affecting the national safety had gone unrecognized.

I cannot accept Mr. Ige's sweeping refutations as an answer to that danger. It takes a large, competent, and ruthless force of secret police, one that is not too squeamish about catching a few boots with its fish, to control a fifth column. Where would the F.B.I. get the men who could so much as find their way around Hawaii's Little Tokyos during a blackout, let alone distinguish between loyal and disloyal?

Mr. Ige's is the customary rationalization for the widespread dual citizenship of Hawaiian-born Japanese. If "many are still dependents of aliens . . . and therefore cannot act independently," why should we assume that they could act independently of the same alien Japanese in other matters—in clogging the road to Pearl Harbor with civilian automobiles, for example, as a captain in the naval medical corps, W. H. Michael, suggests in the August Harpers may have been the case on December 7? Others are not dependents at all, or are dependents of parents who like themselves claim the full benefits of American citizenship without renouncing their loyalty to Japan. It is only fair to point out also that if positive action is necessary on the part of a citizen for expatriation, it likewise took positive action on the part of his parents to establish dual citizenship in the first place, and the attitude of Japanese parents in Hawaii is at least as important in this war as the attitude of Japanese youths.

What Mr. Ige is writing about is the Hawaii of myth. If the islands' Japanese really read American magazines, a good many circulation managers must wonder where they get them. Their purchases certainly do not show up in ABC reports from Japanese-inhabited areas. On the other hand, I always found plenty of Tokyo-published material on Japanese newsstands in Hawaii. The literate Honolulu Japanese, if they do read English, also read the two Japanese-language dailies, each with a circulation of around 10,000, both of which until December 7 got their Asiatic news straight from the Japanese Foreign Office via Domei.

As Mr. Ige acknowledges, the question of Japanese loyalty is the nut of the argument. My point is that there is a good deal of doubt about the loyalty of at least some of a people with enemy racial connections who inhabit an area so vital that we must be sure of all loyalties there. I made it plain enough in my article that we could be sure of some Japanese Americans. But there are also many bits of evidence that others have proved themselves disloyal. I did not use them in my article because I have had no opportunity to verify them, but this one comes from a sufficiently reliable source to bear repeating. It concerns the test that came to three Japanese on the little island of Niihau of the Hawaiian group on December 7, when a crippled Japanese plane landed there. The pilot, with the aid of the three local Japanese, set up a miniature military dictatorship that was broken only when American authorities arrived on the scene. There were only three Japanese on the island, but they were 100 per cent for the emperor. I think we may be excused for asking if there are not at least a few more in the 150,000 of similar sympathies. If we believe that there are, and if we can't find out who they are, only blanket measures will suffice. Of these it seems to me that evacuation is the most efficient and the fairest all around.

ALBERT HORLINGS

Manhattan, Kansas, August 7

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 22, 1942

NUMBER 8

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

141

EDITORIALS

The Indian Dilemma

144

The Trendless Primaries by Freda Kirchwey

144

ARTICLES

Gandhi's Rejected Offer by Louis Fischer

145

Shipyards and U-Boats by Donald W. Mitchell

148

Keep Them Out! VII. C. Wayland Brooks of Illinois
by Dale Kramer and Sydney Justin Harris

150

In the Wind

152

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Tacitus Now by Lionel Trilling

153

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall

154

Democracy Begins at Home by George E. Taylor

155

The Great House by Louise Bogan

156

Essays in Appreciation by Louis Kronenberger

157

The Influence of the Quakers by Odell Shepard

158

In Brief

159

Music by B. H. Haggin

159

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

160

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
L. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON      MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

NOTHING BUT GOOD CAN COME FROM PRIME Minister Churchill's visit to the Kremlin. In the first place, it should go far to allay uneasiness over the failure to date of Britain and the United States to make good their earlier promise to "divert German strength from the attack on Russia." Even more important, the Churchill-Stalin talks have in all likelihood produced the first major plan of military action worked out jointly by the United Nations. This is the beginning of the kind of unified global strategy which must be invoked if the war is to be won. Finally, the Moscow conference serves to intensify the war of nerves which has already produced Nazi jitters in Western Europe. At long last it is the Germans who are obliged to wonder where the enemy will strike. Do the Moscow talks presage an imminent Western front? Possibly. The presence of General Sir Alan Brooke, Chief of the British Imperial Staff, might point in that direction, since he would command any such operation. The opening of a front in Western Europe, however, would have to come this month or next, and it is hardly likely that if this were in the wind Brooke and Churchill would only now be discussing plans in Moscow. More logical is the prospect of immediate military aid to the Russians in the Caucasus. The presence of General Wavell, British commander in India, Major General Russell Maxwell, United States commander in the Middle East, and Air Chief Marshal Sir Arthur William Tedder, Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Air Force in the Middle East, point strongly in this direction. So does the fact that Russia's position in the south has become so critical that even an allied invasion of northern Norway—most probable of all the proposed second fronts—would fail to avert the gravest threat to an area of supreme importance to all the United Nations.

✕

OUR OFFENSIVE IN THE SOLOMON ISLANDS appears to have yielded the first major triumph gained by the United States in this war. Although details are not yet available, it is clear that the marines have done more than merely gain a foothold in the Tulagi area. The Japanese are said to have been ousted both from the spacious Tulagi harbor and the nearby airfields. If the marines can hold these gains—and there is no reason to doubt that they can—the defensive position of Australia is immeasurably strengthened and the possibilities of offensive action against other advanced Japanese bases are considerably heightened. So far there has been no report on losses, but it is possible from the nature of the fighting that they were extremely heavy. The road to Tokyo is still a long one, but at last we appear to be moving in the right direction.

✱

THE EXTENT TO WHICH BIG STEEL BEARS the responsibility for the lag in arms production was brought out clearly last week in testimony before the Truman Committee. It now appears that in addition to resisting expansion of steel production in 1940 and 1941 through the influence of its dollar-a-year men in OPM and WPB, big steel has succeeded in tying up large quantities of important raw materials so that they are unavailable to the smaller companies. Representatives of three small companies testified that their companies were operating at from 67 to 78 per cent of capacity because of their inability to obtain raw materials and alloys from the larger companies. It was also charged that the dollar-a-year men who represent big steel in the WPB have prevented expansion of the steel industry in the vital Pacific Northwest area. The situation is not, of course, a new one. Ever since the United States Steel Corporation was founded by Morgan interests at the turn of the century, it has effectively dominated the steel industry, in time of war as well as peace. With ship and plane production bogging down for lack of steel, this is scarcely an appropriate moment for a general clean-up of the steel industry. But it is vitally important that Mr. Nelson and the WPB have a free hand in drafting a program for remedying the steel shortage free of the influence of men who put their company first and their country second.

✱

ANOTHER SERIOUS RESULT OF THE STEEL shortage is the effect it has had on employment in war industries, principally rolling mills and shipyards. No one knows how many workers have been laid off, but the figure runs into many thousands, and it is likely to grow. This is bad enough in itself; what is much worse is the danger that fear of impending unemployment among men now working will tend to demoralize production. Men who feel that their wages will come to an end when present stocks of raw materials are depleted are hardly likely to work at top speed. Yet speed is of the essence, and we must take whatever steps are necessary to get it. Perhaps the answer is to be found in the system, at present in effect in Britain, whereby men are paid for their time even when bombs or shortage of materials keep them from working.

HOPE THAT THE UNSATISFACTORY TAX BILL will be improved by the Senate Finance Committee is rapidly fading. The Treasury proposals for revising the bill have virtually all been discarded. Among the more important of those rejected in the past week were: (1) a plan under which residents of community-property states would have had to pay individual income taxes on the same basis as other citizens; (2) a recommendation calling for the removal of tax exemption on state and municipal bonds; and (3) a suggestion for eliminating percentage depletion allowances in the oil industry which, if accepted, would have yielded $200,000,000 in taxes. It is doubtful whether Senator La Follette's excellent proposals for increasing the levy on excess profits, high incomes, gifts, and estates will even receive formal consideration by the committee. The committee is much more likely to look with favor on the suggestions for a 10 per cent sales tax and a removal of all exemptions from the withholding tax on wages as brought forward by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and supported, in principle, by the National Association of Manufacturers and other business groups. But despite the ballyhoo by such advocates of increased taxes on lower incomes the chances are better than even that the sales tax will be rejected as "dangerous" on the eve of election. In fact, it is highly probable that for political reasons the tax bill will be reported out of committee at least $2,000,000,000 short of the $8,700,000,000 requested by the Treasury. This can mean only one thing: ultimate collapse of the President's anti-inflation program. For unless the excess funds created by war spending are mopped up in one way or another, there is no power on earth sufficiently strong to maintain the present price ceilings.

✱

SOMETHING NEW HAS BEEN ADDED TO THE Seventy-seventh Congress. Eloquence of sorts has not been lacking in the present House of Representatives, intelligence may be spotted perhaps a little less frequently, and here and there even a degree of courage. But until last week there was small reason to suspect that all three qualities would be displayed on the floor of the House by any one member of the Seventy-seventh. This has come to pass, and the country owes a salute to Representative Elmer J. Holland, Democrat, of Pennsylvania. For many weary months scarcely a day has passed that hasn't seen a Hoffman, a Cox, a Rankin, or one of their fellow-primitives advance to the well of the House to slander the forces supporting the President and a vigorous prosecution of the war. Congressmen who didn't care for this sort of thing simply took a walk or stayed and yawned it out, but they rarely counterattacked. Congressman Holland is made of sterner stuff. In his campaign for election to a regrettably short fill-in term he announced: "The fifth column may expect no mercy nor tolerance from me. I want them exposed—those in high places, in the so-called Cliveden sets—as well as the half-cracked tools of Goebbels's propaganda machine." His surgical analysis of the McCormick-Patterson-Patterson press is the rich fulfillment of a brave promise. "You will see that their net effect," he told a cheering House, "is to preach defeatism among our civilians and mutiny among our soldiers, to spread dismay among our allies, and to create joy in the hearts of our enemies. . . . Daily these publishers rub at the morale of the American people. Daily they sow suspicion. Daily they preach that we are a nation of fools led by rascals into a hopeless struggle." Unlike the Dieses and the Coxes, Mr. Holland documents his charges with the greatest care. His devastating use of the direct quotation has reduced the Pattersons, Captain and Cissie, to spluttering "Liar," but beyond that they have nothing to say.

✱

FEARS THAT THE SPANISH REFUGEES IN France may be made the price of some dirty Vichy transaction are expressed in a cable from London just received by The Nation. According to our informant, the so-called French government is preparing to hand over the Spanish refugees en masse either to Hitler or to Franco and the unbelievable crime may be committed at any moment. The report would fit into the recent statement made by Pierre Laval about the number of French prisoners of war that had been released in exchange for French workers sent to Germany. It is revolting enough to see Frenchmen handed back and forth by their government in such a promiscuous slave trade; it would be still worse if some eighty or a hundred thousand refugees who fled into France for sanctuary were thrown into the balance to satisfy the greed of the Nazi buyer. Unhappily the worst must be expected from a regime that came to life under the disgraceful sign of an armistice which among other things sanctioned the delivery to Hitler of the anti-Nazi Germans who had found asylum in France. We should not, therefore, ingenuously appeal to the noble feelings of the French Chief of State or his Premier. We certainly should demand that our government speak very clearly to Ambassador Henri-Haye. He should be told that the further delivery to the hangman of political refugees, be they Spaniards, or Italians, or Germans—would make it impossible to maintain even formal relations with such a gang.

✱

WE HAVE ALL BEEN LECTURED AT LENGTH by various officials on the necessity of withholding or delaying publication of news that might be of use to the enemy. Officials at Mitchel Field are now being impressed, we imagine, with the even greater necessity of delaying publication of such "news" as the great air marker plot which turns out to have been discovered, and discredited, several months back. As a result of that "scoop" the War Department has reduced its public relations staff in the field and their control has been centralized. Colonel Dache Reeves of the First Ground Air Support Command, who released the aerial pictures of what were presumed to be signs devised by fifth columnists, and Major Lynn Farnol, in charge of public relations at Mitchel Field and formerly a motion-picture press agent, will no doubt be disciplined. We think it would be almost enough to make them read aloud to each other the original wide-eyed account in the New York Times of the "deadly guide posts":

From the air, the innocent looking old pathway and the newly made "V" formed a perfect arrow which pointed dead at an Eastern air base. The "V" in this and another picture does not stand for victory, but means sabotage, the Army pointed out.

The "V," as every knows by now, was a feeding station for those famous fliers, the birds, who are, many of them, foreigners, but have never been known to carry bombs.

✱

POLITICAL WAR IS HITLER'S SPECIALTY. HE has developed it to a point of extreme precision and has geared its strategy smoothly into that of the military war. At all stages of his campaign for the extermination of democracy—from Austria and Spain to the present struggle in the Middle East—he has out-manuevered his enemies. Not only have his own tactics been bold and forehanded; he has been able to count on the unreadiness of the democratic nations: their reluctance to deal with the struggle in political terms, their ineptness in political fighting, their outright betrayal of their own case. Since long before September, 1939, The Nation has stressed the political character of the war and urged the necessity of using political weapons to win it. Today, politically speaking, this country is just beginning to fight. For our delays and our stubborn attempts at appeasement we shall all pay a bitter price. But gradually the people of the United States are beginning to realize that ultimate victory will depend upon our capacity, politically as well as in the field, to snatch the initiative and use it for a relentless offensive. As a contribution to this effort—to help bring the facts before the public and make their meaning clear—The Nation will launch next month a new weekly section on political war to be directed by our Contributing Editor, J. Alvarez del Vayo. The full announcement of the section appears on the last page of this issue. Here we want only to express our confidence that the new venture will greatly increase the value of this journal as a weapon in the fight for a democratic victory, and our satisfaction in adding to the active staff of The Nation a journalist of such profound experience in the political struggle as Mr. del Vayo.

The Indian Dilemma

THE deadlock between Britain and India imperils one important sector, both political and military, of the battle line of the United Nations. It is from this point of view—which places victory over the Axis above all other considerations—that the issue must be judged and a solution pressed. And from this point of view the attitudes and actions of both the British government and the Congress Party seem unreasonable and unrealistic.

The Churchill government looks upon India as part of the Empire and as a vital link in its military defenses against the Axis. Though it has said that, after the war, India will have the "fullest opportunity for attainment . . . of complete self-government," it maintains that India's demand for independence cannot be granted now, because a shift in government would involve at least temporary chaos and, far more important, because the Indians are not themselves united and the country might be plunged into a civil war between Hindu and Moslem. This may make sense from the cautious military point of view. What the Churchill government refuses to realize, as far as India is concerned, is that this is not only a military but a political war and that to meet the Indian demand for freedom and Gandhi's civil disobedience campaign with arrests and other forms of repression was a major strategic blunder.

As for the attitude of the Congress party, there could scarcely be a more vivid and convincing statement of it than is contained in the article by Louis Fischer on Page 145. We sympathize with the Indian nationalists; we can even understand why, to them, the British repression they know at first hand is far more real than the Japanese oppression they have not yet experienced. But our sympathy does not blind us, as their bitterness blinds them, to the cold fact that an Axis victory would not only end India's chances for independence but destroy the freedom of the rest of the world.

These two attitudes are, unfortunately, the fruit of more than 150 years of British-Indian relationship and therefore not subject to easy or speedy change from within either camp. For that reason it is all the more essential that the allies of Britain bring pressure on both sides for a settlement which shall take account of the enormous military and political stakes involved.

Chiang Kai-shek and President Roosevelt are in excellent position to point out to the British that India's demand for independence has become a test of the good faith of the United Nations; and to convince the Indian nationalists that something less than absolute and immediate independence is infinitely preferable to Japanese rule.

Mr. Fischer is convinced that Gandhi, in spite of the arrests and riots, is still willing, as he was before he began his campaign, to accept the form of independence with a reliable promise of the content. Gandhi has rivals to the claim to speak for all of nationalist India, but it seems likely that if he and the British government could arrive at an agreement, he could command sufficient support to bring about a minimum unity, particularly between the Mohammedans and Hindus, which is essential to Indian self-government.

To the disinterested person there seems no reason why the British government should not at this moment formally offer India its independence not "after the war" but on a fixed date. Given a specific promise, morally guaranteed by the United Nations, Indian nationalists would, we feel sure, be willing to participate in a provisional government until a constitutional convention could be called.

Such a settlement would insure the whole-hearted participation of Indians in the war; it would be a tremendous stimulant to anti-Nazi feeling and action throughout the world. Indeed we can think of no single event which would be worse news to the Axis—and to those covert anti-British isolationists who are currently showing such ill-concealed glee over the "tragedy" of India.

The Trendless Primaries

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

THE general tenor of editorial comment on last week's primaries was philosophical. The results, we were asked to believe, were inconclusive and proved nothing. Both isolationists and interventionists were elected; incumbents were generally returned. In many instances issues other than the war governed the decision. The control of the local machine, the record of the candidate as a party man, the resentment of voters against interference from outside the district—all these factors had to be considered in judging the significance of the results. After all, if Hamilton Fish and William B. Barry were nominated in New York, Martin L. Sweeney was defeated in Ohio. So what conclusion could one draw?

The New York Times on Sunday carried a feature story headed Primaries Showed No Trend, in the course of which the writer summarized his conclusions in the following words:

Local issues, and especially the effectiveness and efficiency of a Congress member in handling the problems and complaints of his constituents, appear to be of more concern to voters than the question of his pre-war stand on foreign policy and his attitude on the conduct of the war.

This sort of comment was typical, not exceptional. And to my mind it betrays a political innocence altogether frightening in the context of the world situation.

Just consider, for a moment, the state of mind of Dr. Goebbels when he reads, first the election returns, and then a statement such as that quoted above. He finds the electorate of this fighting democracy recording its bland indifference to the attitude of its chosen representatives on the war and American foreign policy. Had a candidate supported the President and backed measures insuring aid to Britain and preparedness for the United States? Okay; fine. He's nominated—provided the local machine is behind him and his party record is unsullied. Was a candidate on record as opposing lend-lease, hating Britain, insisting that America had no legitimate interest in the war before Pearl Harbor? Had he been a friendly visitor to Berlin in 1939? Had he supported the Christian Front? Well, what of it? He's nominated, too, and the voters are pleased with their demonstration of indifference to all foreign influences. They didn't need Wendell Willkie to tell them how to nominate their Congressman. Voting-as-usual—in a summer when the very existence of this nation may hang on the sort of government we choose to lead us through the months and years of agony ahead. I think Goebbels had a right to smile at "trendless" elections last Tuesday.

But, even more, he would have been justified in issuing a typical sneering commentary on the American commentaries on those elections. When so few of our leading political writers find anything disturbing in a primary in 1942 in which local issues and party regularity decide the outcome, in which the greatest issues that face the nation are ignored or, where they play any role, are as likely to sway the vote one way as the other—this is an even more painful revelation of the political mind of America. The ordinary citizen can hardly be blamed for voting an isolationist into office as long as his act is casually dismissed as an accidental result of local conditions carrying no political significance.

Wendell Willkie said what had to be said after the nomination of Fish. "For the sake of both the country and the Republican Party," he announced, "the fight for his elimination must continue." This is the attitude that should direct all political effort between now and November. Persons like Willkie in both parties must pool their political fortunes to elect a Congress that understands the nature of the war and the urgency of the national crisis. Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of their country—and, if necessary, to toss their party overboard. The primaries which "showed no trend" must be wiped out by an election which produces a landslide in favor of an aggressive, democratic war and foreign policy.

What was it Fish said about insisting on an active commission when the war started?

Gandhi's Rejected Offer

BY LOUIS FISCHER

YOU can, if you wish, say: We are engaged in a difficult war; the Indian nationalists and Gandhi are making trouble for us; therefore down with Gandhi. But that doesn't help you to understand the Indian situation. You have to look at it, first, from the Indian's angle of vision.

India is a miserably poor, hungry, retarded country. Most Indians are half-starved and three-fourths naked. I have known Russia and Eastern Europe in their worst years. They were paradise compared to India today. The population of India is increasing at the rate of five million each year. Between 1931 and 1941, according to the British census, the population rose 50 million; it is now 393 million. But the agricultural and industrial output of India does not show anywhere near such a growth. Although India is 95 per cent rural and much of the added population therefore lives in villages, the area under cultivation scarcely varies. It was 229 million acres in 1930-31, 228 million in 1932-33, 232 million in 1933-34, 226 million in 1934-35, 227 million in 1935-36, and 231 million in 1936-37, the last year officially recorded. Nor has the yield per acre risen sharply. Indeed, the yield per acre in wheat, tea, groundnuts, an important Indian crop, and linseed has dropped. Of industry, the official Fiscal Commission says: "The development has not been commensurate with the size of the country, its population, and its natural resources." The Indians I spoke to blamed this on the British government's policy of deliberately impeding Indian industry lest it compete with goods made in England.

The poverty and stagnation of India are the background against which the present crisis must be seen. The Bombay Journalists' Association invited me to talk to them. I said I would sit down with them and try to answer their questions. In response to one question I made a pro-war statement saying that if the fascists won the war my world would be black or dead. A journalist stood up and exclaimed: "Yes, but for us Indians there is no difference between British fascism and Japanese or German fascism."

"Now look," I replied. "England is not fascist. It is very democratic, and more democratic today than before the war. I know you do not like the terror and repression in India. But you could not hold a meeting such as this if you were under Japanese or German control. Since my arrival in your country," I continued, "almost every third person I meet tells me he has been in jail. I have lived many years in Russia and Germany. In those countries you do not meet people who have been in jail. They are in jail. And many of them are shot."

"The British," another Indian journalist rejoined, "do not bother shooting us. They kill us. When a child is born in India it can expect to live 27 years. In England the life expectancy is 55." These are correct census data. Of every 100 persons born in India, 45 die before the age of 5. The infant mortality in Bombay is 274 per thousand compared to 66 in London. Such figures, plus real suffering, burn deep resentment, hatred, and disloyalty into the soul of India. British rule is an ever-present, unpleasant, close reality to Indians and it often obstructs their vision. They see the world and the war through the thick veil of British domination. That means that they may not see the world and the war at all. They see the British and want to get rid of them.

Indians point to Japan, which started its modern life in 1861 and speedily became a powerful nation. They contend that England has had 150 years to develop India but has not done so. "We have given India tranquillity and order," the British argue. "It is the tranquillity and order of the cemetery," Gandhi said to me. The British empire has made no great effort to convert India into a modern, flourishing, mighty country. That would have spelled the end of the British empire.

All subject peoples dislike their rulers. In India, the dislike is profound. This old dislike has recently been intensified by a new contempt born of British reverses in Hong Kong, Malay, Singapore, and Burma. They shook and shocked India. The sinking of the "Prince of Wales" and the "Repulse" made a terrific impression.

In my talks with Indians they often alluded, peculiarly enough to the Russo-Japanese war of 1904-5. It was the first time, they said, that a colored race defeated a white race, and it gave a tremendous fillip, people told me, to the Indian nationalist movement. But that was thirty-seven years ago, before Indian nationalism had matured under Gandhi's influence. It was fought far from India. Hong Kong, Malay, Singapore, and Burma, on the other hand, are under the very nose of India and important to its safety. Indian soldiers fought and died or were captured in those strategic areas. Out of them 500,000 Indian refugees trekked back to India bringing tales, part true, part exaggerated, of British discrimination in favor of white refugees and against Indian refugees. The Axis radio played up these "atrocities."

Hostility towards the British rose still higher. British prestige had never been so low. "Can England defend India?" Indians asked, "or will it be as unsuccessful in holding India as it was in holding the adjacent territories?" Delight over British defeats mingled with fear of invasion. Indians wished to make a greater contribution to the protection of their country. "But how could we do so in partnership with our British oppressors?" they argued. "Shall we fight for democracy in Germany and Japan when we are not a democracy ourselves?" Churchill has explicitly stated that the Atlantic Charter does not apply to India. Many Indians felt that if Japan conquered India they would merely be exchanging an occupying power they did not know for an occupying power they had known for 150 years and hated profoundly. Free men who do not understand the emotions of colonial peoples may think this attitude foolish; but it certainly exists. "If England will not give us independence now when it is in distress," Indians said to me, "why should we believe it will grant it after the war?"

This was the political climate of India early in 1942. The spirit of Chinese and Russian resistance was (and is) entirely lacking in India. London knew that something had to be done—and quickly. Sir Stafford Cripps, new member of the War Cabinet, was accordingly rushed out to New Delhi, in March, 1942, to negotiate with Indian political parties. Cripps failed. The Congress party, as well as the Moslem League, as well as the old liberals, as well as the ultra-nationalist Hindu Mahasabha, rejected his offer. He had come out to improve a situation. When he failed, the situation deteriorated.

That is the genesis of Gandhi's latest civil disobedience movement. Shortly after the collapse of the Cripps talks, Gandhi announced his "British Must Go" demand. He told me that it came to him suddenly in the night as he lay in his bed under the stars in Sevagram village. This total and unreasonable demand was a spontaneous, instinctive reaction to the fresh demonstration of British military inferiority in the Far East and to the dashing of many fond hopes aroused by the Cripps mission.

However, followers and friends argued with Gandhi and convinced him, and after a brief period he announced publicly that he had altered his views. "Abrupt withdrawal of the Allied troops might result in Japan's occupation of India and China's sure fall," he wrote in his weekly magazine. Therefore, British and American armed forces, Gandhi declared, could stay in India and use India as a base for military operations.

"But Mr. Gandhi," I remarked when he said this to me, "armies do not exist in a vacuum. They need smooth-running railroads, for instance."

"They could run the railroads," he replied immediately. "They could police the docks."

Gandhi is too wise not to understand that in time of war, the military authorities must penetrate into fields that are normally civilian. He knows therefore that Indian independence, if granted today, would be only limited independence. Were the British to yield to nationalist pressure and transfer political power to a coalition of Indian parties, a great deal of power would still remain in the hands of the British or be shared by them with their fighting allies. In such circumstances, there could be no chaos. Gandhi is interested in obtaining the form of independence. Temporarily, he would be satisfied with a minimum of content.

The British government saw Gandhi openly whittle down his demands. It saw he was conciliatory. It made no move to conciliate him.

In many talks and walks with me, Gandhi elaborated on his plans for the civil disobedience campaign. Once I asked him whether he was dead set on launching this movement of passive resistance to the British or whether somebody might induce him to give it up. "You say," I probed, "that you do not wish to harm China and Russia. Suppose your friends in China and Russia appealed to you not to start the campaign?"

"Let them appeal to me," Gandhi exclaimed. "I might be dissuaded. If you have access to men in authority you should tell them this."

"Have I your sanction to say this to the Viceroy?" I asked.

"Yes," he replied, "you have my permission. Let them talk to me and I may be converted. I am a reasonable man."

Before my departure from Sevagram village, Mahadev Desai, paunchy, smiling, fifty-year old private secretary of the Mahatma, urged me to try and arrange an interview between Gandhi and the Viceroy of India, Lord Linlithgow.

Soon thereafter, I was received by the Viceroy in his great palace at New Delhi. He knew I had just come from a week's stay with Gandhi. I told him that Gandhi was in a conciliatory mood and not at all intransigent. I sketched the possible outlines of a settlement, basing my statements on Gandhi's own words. I intimated to the Viceroy that it might be helpful if he would discuss these matters with a Congress leader. The Viceroy, however, regarded such discussions as a question of high policy which would have to be decided on its merits. He did not invite Gandhi or any other Indian nationalist, and the preparations for the civil disobedience movement consequently took their course.

That was in June. Gandhi nevertheless procrastinated until August. He was waiting and hoping that some leader of the United Nations would mediate between India and England. He wrote a letter to President Roosevelt. He said to me: "Tell your President that I wish to be dissuaded." Gandhi was ready, and is ready, to bargain. He wrote to Chiang Kai-shek. His letter is most revealing. It has not yet been published, but I obtained a copy from a Chinese source. "My appeal to the British power to withdraw from India," Gandhi informed the Chinese leader, "is not meant in any shape or form to weaken India's defense against the Japanese or embarrass you in your struggle. India must not submit to any aggressor or invader and must resist him. I would not be guilty of purchasing the freedom of my country at the cost of your country's freedom. That problem does not arise before me as I am clear that India cannot gain her freedom this way, and a Japanese domination of either India or China would be equally injurious to the other country and to world peace. That domination must therefore be prevented, and I should like India to play her natural and rightful role in this. I feel that India cannot do this while she is in bondage."

Gandhi's letter to Chiang not only shows that he is anti-Japanese. It shows that he deeply comprehends why he, as an Indian nationalist, must be anti-Japanese and pro-Chinese. But as an Indian nationalist, he is also anti-British. Remove the cause of his anti-British sentiment, and he and million of followers will become actively anti-Japanese and pro-Chinese. Parenthetically it should be stated that Gandhi, despite his pacifism, recruited soldiers for the British army in the last world war. (He thought the reward would be Indian independence.) He might again support a war.

That is the position. Instead of talking to Gandhi, the British arrest him. Now reports come from India that the riots and disorders are being quelled. This probably creates the impression that Gandhi's civil disobedience movement is abortive. But Gandhi never wanted riots and disorders. He warned against them. He asked for closing of stores, abstention from work, refusal to pay taxes, private manufacture of salt, and, in general, non-cooperation. On this, we have few reports.

It is too early to judge. One thing is certain: the imprisonment of Gandhi, Nehru, and the other Indian leaders, and the civil disobedience campaign will not make Indians more pro-British or more pro-war. But that is our problem. It is an urgent war problem for all the United Nations which are now faced with a catastrophic military situation throughout the Middle East. In the vast area between the Caucasus, Cairo, and Calcutta, disaster awaits us. India is the strategic and spiritual pivot of that region. Somebody must act informally, courageously, and quickly. The only such somebody is President Roosevelt. He must simply bring the British government to a point where it will talk to Gandhi. Gandhi could talk in prison. He doesn't mind. He has done it before. He is very religious and he forgives.

[In an early issue Louis Fischer will contribute an article on the Cripps mission to India and the reasons for its failure.]

Shipyards and U-Boats

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE Battle of the Atlantic has now reached a stage where sinkings offer a threat roughly equivalent to that of World War I when Jellicoe admitted to Admiral Sims, "They will win unless we can stop the sinkings and stop them quickly."

Fortunately the cases are not in all respects parallel. In 1917 England was facing starvation through loss of shipping. Replacements of new ships were a very small proportion of losses and no successful means of defense against U-boats had yet been devised. Today the greatest building program known to history is resulting in vast numbers of new launchings and methods of countering the submarine have been steadily developed. The real threat now is the continued heavy loss of shipping needed to carry supplies to the Allies and transport men and equipment for a second front in Europe. The vast production lines of our factories are useless unless their output reaches the scene of battle. Whereas in 1917 the problem was holding off German victory, the danger today is that the submarine may prevent the United Nations from seizing an opportunity of winning the war. We were able to weather successfully our first great crisis when active United States naval intervention in the Atlantic a year ago helped the British avoid starvation, but we are now in serious danger of failing to meet the second at a time, ironically, when the German submarine campaign is especially vulnerable.

From the relatively limited area west of the British Isles which Nazi submarines were harassing fifteen months ago, their field of operation has been extended until they are striking down victims in seas as far removed from each other as the South Atlantic and the mouth of the St. Lawrence. But by far the best hunting grounds have been our Atlantic coastal waters, the Caribbean and the last stretches of the northern supply line to Russia. Even the methods of the hunters have changed. Fast submarines are quite capable of running down and torpedoing the slower merchant ships. In most cases night rather than day is selected in order to obtain greater immunity from aerial patrol planes. Engineering improvements have made possible long stays in American waters without need of refueling. There are quite possibly secret bases maintained by Axis sympathizers in Gulf or Caribbean waters and these are doubly important in that they may both furnish a resting place for submarine crews and give information of ship sailings.

The comparative absence of criticism of our navy on the part of the public may be due to some realization of the task it faces. A fleet adequate for one ocean has suddenly been given important duties in four. Even for essential tasks the ships have been spread far too thin. They have protected convoys to Australia, Great Britain, the Middle East, and Russia, losing heavily only along the last-named route. Elsewhere—and this has included the Atlantic coastal shipping lanes—naval policy has had to be one of frankly "taking it" while affording all protection possible. Unfortunately, "taking it" in the western Atlantic could be strategically sound only so long as the activity of U-boats remained a nuisance rather than a major threat to the winning of the war. But with losses actually getting out of control, Hitler's front along our coast can dominate possibilities everywhere else.

It is hardly necessary to say that our naval leaders have been extremely slow in perceiving the importance of the coastal shipping lanes and in recognizing the dynamic possibilities for Germany in this new front. The guarded but optimistic pronouncements made at intervals by Secretary Knox can only be likened in their complete inaccuracy and misinterpretation of the true situation to Mr. Hoover's assurances that prosperity was just around the corner.

Even the Associated Press toll of over 400 sinkings between January and August does not convey a complete picture of the situation. It does not take into account heavy losses on the convoy route to Russia, not officially revealed by our navy. Nor does it include ships damaged or even all of those destroyed. In every month but one during this period, the sinkings represented an increase over those of the preceding month.

The navy has been commendably frank in giving loss figures of merchant tonnage but few persons visualize what these losses mean. Instead of making material progress toward building up the 17 million tons of additional ships which the joint board a year ago viewed as being necessary to support a full-sized A. E. F., we are no further ahead in the ability to transport a large expeditionary force than we were a year ago. Losses, outweighing the shipbuilding miracles of our Kaisers, have prevented adequate maintenance of existing fronts. Several months ago Admiral Vickery stated that tonnage was less than 50 per cent adequate to fulfill existing commitments.

Losses alone do not furnish a fair basis for criticizing a naval administration facing unprecedented problems. Nor do we know all the facts concerning the measures for defense adopted by the services. But those facts known are not comforting. Months passed before the navy "got tough" with merchant skippers and insisted on careful fulfillment of regulations. Convoys were not instituted until mid-May and are not in use now in many areas. Very recently the navy has appealed for small ships of all kinds but as late as mid-June it was rejecting many private boats as unsuitable. The perfectionism of the admirals, commendable under most circumstances, has delayed the turning out of anti-submarine vessels in sufficient quantities, and some service die-hards are still opposing the construction of blimps. Newspapermen traveling on patrol vessels have reported that the Pearl Harbor brand of cooperation is still prevalent among the diverse defense groups which play a part in the Battle of the Atlantic. While such indications as we have are necessarily incomplete, they suggest the need of a legislative check-up. One Washington columnist reported a private presidential investigation into this field. The House of Commons has even gone into secret session to consider the seriousness of shipping losses.

What is being done to meet the problem? The R. A. F. has been pecking continually at shipyards and submarine bases all through the war. So far these raids have been no more than a temporary nuisance to the enemy. The management of shipping has been greatly improved, with non-essentials nearly eliminated, better use made of space, and radical reduction in delays. More planes, blimps, and surface patrol vessels are being put into service though progress here has been lamentably slow. The technical means of combating submarines have kept pace with the submarines' offensive development. Strongly escorted convoys are still hard to attack. Recently the British and Canadian navies have been lending ships formerly used in British waters, where sinkings have nearly ceased. But so far all this concentration of force has succeeded only in causing enemy submarines to shift to less defended locations to the north or south. The continued increase in sinkings in the face of greater resistance can indicate only steady augmentation of the number of enemy U-boats.

Since an effective answer to this problem is a prerequisite to victory elsewhere, it must be found—and quickly. Until the ratio between replacements and losses swings strongly in our favor, progress made in shipbuilding is quite meaningless. We must therefore either master the submarine or devise other means of getting materials to the battlefield. And we have no time to waste.

Most students of the American navy believe it will be able to put an end to German submarine warfare as soon as much greater defense forces of sea and air are

U.S. PRODUCTION AND LOSSES OF MERCHANT VESSELS

* JUNE LOSSES INCOMPLETE

GRAPHIC by PICK-S

▲ comparison of United States shipbuilding and losses of the United Nations in the West Atlantic waters. During the second week of July, losses off our eastern coast were the heaviest since the beginning of the war.

made available. Because reinforcements will require a fairly long time, we should not depend upon them as the sole answer. Commercial submarines have been urged by a few, notably Simon Lake, the inventor. The air freighter has many more friends. However, tremendous obstacles will impede our achievement of a commercial fleet of airplanes of sufficient radius to bridge the Atlantic in hops. The airplane has not yet reached a stage of development enabling it to carry 70-ton tanks and rolling stock. The three to five years regarded as necessary by many aviation men is also a stumbling block, though some industrialists believe this time could be reduced 75 per cent. The availability of raw materials is only now being considered. Nevertheless, Germany has demonstrated conclusively the practicability of air transport of many kinds of military equipment. Airplanes are quicker, operate in a more widely distributed element than ships, and, at least for the moment, are far safer. In proportion to cost of materials they have a greater carrying capacity though a much briefer lifetime. We must be ready to take advantage of developments in this field. The recent "go ahead" sign flashed to Kaiser is encouraging but hardly sufficient to meet an extremely critical problem.

Keep Them Out!

VII. C. WAYLAND BROOKS OF ILLINOIS

BY DALE KRAMER AND SYDNEY JUSTIN HARRIS

WHEN Colonel Robert McCormick, publisher of the Chicago Tribune, sits down to eat he tries to calculate what effect the food will have on his energy and disposition. Then he tries to figure out what result the meal, through him, will have on the course of world events. No dinner has yet caused the earth to stop and revolve in the opposite direction, but it is certain that half a dozen bad oysters in the Colonel's stomach on Wednesday will cause Senator C. Wayland Brooks to gyrate rapidly in Washington on Thursday. For the conduct of the junior Senator from Illinois, who is now campaigning for his first full-term election, coincides remarkably with the Colonel's wishes. The Tribune's Washington staff prepares the Senator's speeches and Tribune reporters "covering" Brooks's downstate tours hand out campaign literature to the local papers. Illinois voters are familiar with the relationship and consequently McCormick and the Tribune will, in a sense, come before the electorate this fall.

Brooks as a campaigner has several important advantages. His disruptive efforts before Pearl Harbor and his perfunctory flag-waving ever since are bound to be offset in the public mind by the fact that he was a bona-fide hero in World War I. As a freshman at the University of Illinois he joined the Marines, and he returned, with a string of citations, on a stretcher. During the decade in which he has sought public office his campaign managers have not permitted voters to forget his war record. The one other major asset promoted by his campaign managers is his oratory. His style has always been rather affected and he has never quite risen to the advance notices, but he is not bad as rhetoricians go.

Against these qualifications is a certain over-smoothness. Brooks has the slick appearance of an oil operator or a political contractor, which the average voter does not like. He has a round, heavy, puckered face capped with tight curls which look as though they are held down with a patent hair concoction. Inevitably his campaign managers have presented him as "Curly" Brooks.

After World War I Brooks went back to college, emerged as a lawyer, and was appointed to the staff of State's Attorney Robert E. Crowe, who did not fail to see the advantage in obtaining the support of a young campaigner with a collection of war medals. Brooks soon found himself called on to fill hundreds of speaking engagements. At the same time he specialized in cases involving forgers, embezzlers, and bank robbers. The bankers were pleased with his work, and they interceded to save his job when Cook County elected a new state's attorney.

Brooks's public career almost ended before it was well under way when he was mysteriously suspended in 1927. The facts are not a matter of public record, but it is known that United States prohibition agents, delving into the Chicago liquor situation, held him for questioning at about that time. A year later he reappeared as a part-time member of the staff of the state's attorney.

Brooks's big opportunity came in 1930 when Colonel McCormick was tearing up and down the countryside in an effort to find the murderer of Jake Lingle, a Tribune reporter. McCormick tied in his manhunt with "the freedom of the press" and the Tribune's front page screamed that Lingle was killed because he "knew too much" about Chicago affairs. Chicagoans are certain that he did know a great deal, perhaps more than he should have. Lingle, it seems, received a salary of $60 a week from the Tribune, but when he met his death in the crowded tunnel of a suburban railroad station, he had to his credit a $60,000 bank account. In addition, he had a joint stock account of $100,000 with Chief of Police William Russell, who resigned shortly after the murder, and four other brokerage accounts as well. His scale of living was on the luxurious side. The common belief is that he served as Capone's payoff man in dealing with crooked city and police officials. Insiders knew him as the "un-official chief of police."

Six months after the murder a St. Louis hoodlum named Leo Brothers was picked up in Chicago by investigators for the state's attorney. He was held incommunicado for two weeks in the Congress Hotel, until a chambermaid saw him chained to a door and reported it. Brothers was finally charged with Lingle's murder, and Brooks served as prosecutor, assisted by Charles F. Rathbun, member of the firm of Kirkland, Fleming, Greene, and Martin, counsel for the Tribune. No effort was made to show motivation for the murder. Some witnesses said they saw Brothers at the scene of the crime; others declared that he was not the man.

Brothers was convicted of first degree murder and sentenced to 14 years in prison—the lightest sentence possible under the law. McCormick did not appear seriously disappointed by this easy treatment of the convicted killer of his crusading reporter. Nor did he object when Brothers was paroled after serving eight years. And McCormick is a famous objector. Brothers, who was in possession of a letter from Lingle's mother stating her belief that Brothers was not the murderer, charged that he had been framed by Brooks and the Tribune. The readiness with which Illinois, and particularly Chicago, voters accepted this view proved Brooks's greatest political handicap before his isolationist career in Congress.

A year after the Brothers conviction Brooks made his first essay in state politics as Republican candidate for state treasurer. Despite his promoters' delusion that he was a spellbinder, his stew of platitudes proved no more palatable to the voters than that of other Republicans in 1932, and he was overwhelmed. He tried again in 1934, this time for congressman-at-large, and the result was the same. Nevertheless, when the next election rolled around the Tribune pronounced Brooks the only man capable of turning the state against Roosevelt, and he was made the G. O. P. choice for governor. Again he lost. The electorate simply did not like Brooks.

Despite this dismal record, the party continued to back him, and in 1940 he tried for the Senate seat left vacant by the death of James Hamilton Lewis. It was to be his first victory but hardly one to give comfort. The Republican candidate for governor, Dwight Green, won with a majority of 200,000 votes, while Brooks, despite a whirlwind campaign and the Tribune's fulsome support, crashed through with a bare margin of 15,000 out of a total of 4,000,000 votes. And political wisecracks explained that Green had carried him in.

Brooks's record in the Senate is what might have been expected of Colonel McCormick's man. He fought and voted against lend-lease, against seizure of foreign ships in our ports, and against arming merchant ships, and he dodged the vote on extending the draft. He was a major America First Committee speaker and a supporter of Charles A. Lindbergh. "I've said all along I wanted Britain to win," Brooks told an America First audience. "I wish I knew I was right in wanting that to happen, because she didn't do a very good job with her victory last time." "The draft," he said on another occasion, "only causes confusion. Roosevelt wants to throw us into fear of attack from abroad and lay the foundations for changing American government and drafting industry."

Other statements followed in kind: the Axis powers had no designs on the United States and Roosevelt wanted war for his own aggrandizement. Brooks's speech entitled "This Is Not Our War" was mailed from Washington the day before Pearl Harbor. Illinoisians opened the franked letters the day after the Japanese attack, the day Germany and Italy declared war on the United States, and the impression it left can hardly be helpful to the Brooks career.

On domestic issues Brooks presents the views of McCormick, though, with an eye on his constituents, he hedges wherever possible by avoiding direct votes. Since entering the Senate he has been present at little more than half the roll calls.

It is no credit to Brooks that he is admired by such notorious pro-fascists as Newton Jenkins, who in his news sheet, the Prairie State Republican, made public an exchange of letters in which Brooks had written: "I do want you to know that I appreciate your constructive suggestions and the many fine things you have done for me in the past and that you are now doing. At the very first opportunity I hope you and I will be able to sit down and discuss plans for the fall campaign." Jenkins has made no effort to conceal his admiration for Hitler and Mussolini. His propaganda is best illustrated by the plank of his program which reads: "I will take these Jewish refugees and their cheap noisy false mongering stooges and drive them back into the countries from whence they come, to face the music at the hands of those governments which now await them. Any who refuse to go back will face worse treatment here."

C. Wayland Brooks

The Chicagoans recently indicted for sedition were fervid supporters of Brooks—and he never repudiated their support. Mrs. Grace O'Keefe, secretary of Elizabeth Dilling's organization, told a reporter for the Chicago Daily News that Brooks had sent regrets that he was unable to attend a recent peace conference of the group and asked her "to set a date for a later time."

The campaign is now getting into full swing, and it promises to be a rough one. McCormick is up against opponents of his own size. The Sun, while it hasn't the punch originally expected of it, reaches a wide audience. The New Deal Daily Times and the Republican Daily News are likewise working hard for Brooks's defeat.

Some of the manufactured stories for which the Tribune has long been notorious have done Colonel McCormick's man considerable harm. This spring the Tribune carried a headline, "Brooks Leads Entire Senate in Mail Volume." The Daily News put its Washington staff to work on the story. It developed that Brooks—a loud shouter for economy—had franked out 400,000 form circulars to Illinois farmers suggesting that they check farm bulletins they desired and mail the forms back to him. On another occasion a story headed "United Support Given Brooks by 16 Congressmen" appeared in the Tribune. The item stated that at a dinner of the Illinois delegation Brooks's colleagues had "indicated" their support of his campaign for reelection. A rival paper got in touch with twelve who had attended the dinner. They all denied supporting Brooks and added that the campaign had not been mentioned at the meeting.

Brooks's Democratic opponent is Representative Raymond S. McKeough, an amiable New Dealer who unfortunately lacks fire and color. It is widely believed that the Chicago Kelly-Nash machine has made a deal with McCormick, whereby it will pull its punches in the campaign in exchange for future Tribune support. McKeough, though not personally a Kelly-Nash man, was backed by the machine in the primaries and the connection will not help him downstate. His election will depend on the size of his majority in Chicago; and for that reason the failure of the Kelly-Nash forces to get out their top vote would be a serious blow.

Illinois political observers believe that at present Brooks may hold a slight edge. McKeough's chances to come through depend on the forcefulness with which he blasts Brooks—and McCormick. The Tribune is read out of habit and for its comics. Its editorial policy is not liked and never has been. If McKeough is able to show that the issue is McCormick versus the people, McCormick's man Brooks will be eased out of the Senate.

In the Wind

ALABAMA has for several weeks been the scene of a dispute over the President's order against barring Negroes from jobs in war industries. The man fighting the government's case is John Beecher, grand nephew of the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Opposing him is Frank M. Dixon, governor of the state and nephew of Thomas Dixon, author of the famous Rebel novel, "The Clansman."

THE GOVERNMENT has run into competition in its efforts to purchase guayule rubber in Mexico. An agent of a Chicago candy company is there buying guayule for the manufacture of bubble gum. He has recently signed two contracts calling for a total of 30,000 pounds a month.

HAMILTON FISH is complaining about interference in his campaign by people outside his district. The list of financial contributors to the Fish campaign reveals that of the sixteen persons who gave $25 or more, only one is a member of the Fish constituency.

FIRST AID: The American Red Cross has been acting as an intermediary in the divorce proceedings of a soldier whose military duties prevent him from giving the matter the necessary attention.

ELIZABETH DILLING requests that people who are eager to "maintain our form of government" help to defray the expenses of the defense when she goes on trial for sedition in the fall.

THE LATEST CRITIC of the Chicago Tribune is the Journal of the American Medical Association. It has exposed as completely false the Tribune stories contending that hundreds of soldiers have been killed or made invalids by "faulty vaccines" administered by army doctors.

JOSEPH E. DAVIES, former ambassador to the Soviet Union, may become chairman of a government agency that will coordinate all war relief organizations.

THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR has a section working on post-war planning, but it never uses the term because it is felt that the word "planning" is offensive to most Americans.

UPTON SINCLAIR has written an article for George Seldes's In Fact advocating a second front against Hitler. Tired of arguments about the lack of equipment and shipping facilities, Sinclair writes: "I am venturing what may at first seem a strange suggestion: that . . . we move just one division and see what happens to it."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

Tacitus Now

BY LIONEL TRILLING

TACITUS has been put to strange uses; the princelings of Italy consulted his "Annals" on how to behave with the duplicity of Tiberius; the German racists, by ignoring all the disagreeable things he observed of their ancestors and by remembering only his praise of their chastity and independence, were able to make his "Germania" their anthropological primer. But these are the aberrations; his influence has mainly been in the service of liberty, as he intended it to be. Perhaps this influence has been most fully felt in France, where, under the dictatorships of the Jacobins and of Napoleon, Tacitus was regarded as a dangerously subversive writer. To America, however, he has never meant a great deal. Of course James Fenimore Cooper is an impressive exception, but Cooper was temperamentally attracted by one of the qualities of Tacitus which probably alienates most American liberals, the aristocratic color of his libertarian ideas. Another reason for our relative indifference to Tacitus is that, until recently, our political experience gave us no ground to understand what he was talking about. Dictatorship and repression, spies and political informers, blood purges and treacherous dissension have not been an accepted part of our political tradition as they have been of Europe's. But Europe has now come very close to us, and our political education of the last few years fits us to understand the historian of Rome.

It is the mark of a great history that sooner or later we become as much aware of the historian as of the events he relates. In reading Tacitus—he is now available in a Modern Library edition with an admirable introduction by Professor Hadas—we are aware of him from the first page: we are aware of him as one of the few great writers who are utterly hopeless. Of his own despair he is always conscious; it is nearly a fault in him, the attitude sometimes verges on attitudinizing. Yet the great fact about Tacitus is that he never communicates his despair to the reader. He must always be telling, he says, of "the merciless biddings of a tyrant, incessant prosecution, faithless friendships, the ruin of innocence, the same causes issuing in the same results," and he complains of "the wearisome monotony" of his subject matter. But the reader never feels the monotony; despite his statements to the contrary, Tacitus has far too much power of mind and too much acuteness of moral sensibility ever to become the victim of what he writes about.

His power of mind is not like that of Thucydides; it is not really political and certainly not military. It is, on a grand scale, psychological. We are irresistibly reminded of Proust when Tacitus sets about creating the wonderful figure of Tiberius and, using a hundred uncertainties and contradictions, tries to solve this great enigma of a man, yet always avoids the solution because the enigma is the character.

Tacitus's notion of history was avowedly personal and moral. "This I regard as history's highest function," he says,

"to let no worthy action be uncommemorated, and to hold out the reprobation of posterity to evil words and deeds." This moral preoccupation finds expression in a moral sensibility which is not ours and which in many respects we find it hard to understand. It has often been pointed out that slaves, Christians, Jews, and barbarians are outside the circle of his sympathies; the stoic humanitarianism of Seneca he rather despised. Yet, as he says, half his historical interest is in the discovery of good deeds, and perhaps nothing in literature has a greater impact of astonishment, a more sudden sense of illumination, than the occurrence of a good deed in the pages of his histories. He represents the fabric of society as so utterly loosened that we can scarcely credit the account of any simple human relationship, let alone a noble action—the soldier weeping at having killed his brother in the civil war, or the aristocrats opening their houses to the injured thousands when the great amphitheater fell down, or the fortitude of the freedwoman Epicharis, who, when Piso's enormous conspiracy against Nero was discovered, endured the torture and died implicating no one, "screening strangers and those whom she hardly knew, when freeborn men, Roman knights and senators, yet unscathed by the torture, betrayed, every one, his dearest kinsfolk." Actions like these take place in the midst of a depravity so great that we are always surprised before we are relieved. From these pages we learn really to understand those well-worn lines of Portia's about the beam of the candle, for we learn what Portia meant by a naughty world, literally a world of naught, a moral vacancy so great and black that in it the beam of a candle seems a flash of lightning.

The moral and psychological interests of Tacitus are developed at the cost of what nowadays is believed to be the true historical insight. The French scholar, Boissier, remarks that it is impossible to read the "History" and the "Annals" without wondering how the Roman Empire could possibly have held together through the eighty years of mutiny, infamy, intrigue, riot, expenditure, and irresponsibility they relate. Almost any modern account of the post-Augustan empire is an implicit criticism of Tacitus's methods. Breasted, for example, includes the period from Tiberius to Vespasian in a chapter which he calls The First of Two Centuries of Peace; and Rostovtsev in his well-known work gives us to understand that Rome, despite minor troubles, was a healthy, developing society. Yet Tacitus finds it worthy of comment that a certain man at this time died a natural death—"a rare incident in so high a rank," he says.

It is not, as I gather, that Tacitus lacks veracity; what he lacks is what a few years ago used to be called "the long view." But to minds of a certain kind and sensitivity "the long view" is the falsest historical view of all. It probably never occurred to Tacitus as one of the possible ways of understanding events, but if it had, he would have rejected it. He had no notions of historical development to comfort him; the knowledge that trade with the East was growing or that a more efficient bureaucracy was evolving could not have consoled him for the degradation of his class and nation. He wrote out of his feelings of the present, not permitting himself the luxury of supposing that the pains of the present were to be justified by the peace of the distant future.

What for many modern scholars is the vice of history was for Tacitus its virtue; he thought that history should be "literary" and that it should move the minds of men through their feelings. And so he contrived his narrative with the most elaborate attention to its dramatic effects. Yet more than a scrupulous concern for literary form makes Tacitus so impressive in a literary way; some essential poise of his mind allowed him to see events with both passion and objectivity, and one cannot help wondering if the tragic division which his mind had to endure did not reinforce this quality. He hated the Rome of the emperors, and all his feelings were for the vanished republic; yet for the return of the republic he had no hope whatever: "It is easy to commend," he said, "but not to produce; or if it is produced, it cannot be lasting." And so he served the ideal of the republic as historian; the empire, an actuality, he served as praetor, consul, and proconsul and complied with the wishes of the detested Domitian. The more he saw of the actuality, the more he despaired of his ideal—and the more he loved it; it is a rare and hard thing for a man to do, and perhaps this tension of love and despair accounts for the poise and energy of his intellect.

We see this poise and energy in almost all his judgments. For example, he despised the Jews, but he would not repress a wry appreciation of their stubborn courage and an intense admiration for their conception of God. The one phrase of his that everyone knows—"they make a solitude and call it peace"—he put into the mouth of a British barbarian in revolt against Roman rule, and it will always be the hostile characterization of imperialism; yet Tacitus himself measured Roman virtue by imperialistic success. He makes no less than four successive judgments of Otho—scorns him as Nero's courtier and cuckold, admires him as a provincial governor, despises him as emperor, and praises him for choosing to die and end the civil war. Much as he loved the republican character, he knew that its day was past, and he ascribes Galba's fall to his old-fashioned inflexibility in virtue.

The poise and energy of Tacitus's mind manifests itself in his language, and Professor Hadas tells us how much we must lose in translation. Yet even a reader of the translation cannot help being aware of the power of the writing. When Tacitus remarks that Tiberius was "an emperor who feared freedom while he hated sycophancy," or that the name of Lucius Volusius was made glorious by his ninety-three years, his honorable wealth, "and his wise avoidance of the malignity of so many emperors," or that "perhaps a sense of weariness steals over princes when they have bestowed everything, or over favorites when there is nothing left to them to desire," we catch a glimpse of the force of the original because the thought itself is dramatic. Perhaps arrogantly, we wonder if we need the original when Sabinus is being led to his death through the streets and the people flee from his glance, fearing it will implicate them: "Wherever he turned, wherever his words fell, there was flight and solitude"; or when the soldiers undertake to "absolve" themselves of a mutiny by the ferocity with which they slaughter their leaders; or when, in that greatest of street scenes, the debauchees look out of their brothel doors to observe with casual interest the armies fighting for possession of Rome. And it is out of a thousand details such as these that Tacitus compounds his long, subtle chronicles of the characters of the emperors and their relations with their mothers, wives, concubines, and senates. His power of mind and his desperate love of virtue make Tacitus one of the world's great tragic writers. In other hands, the story he tells would be almost insupportable; in his, it is grimly invigorating.

Notes by the Way

IN "Writers in Crisis" (Houghton Mifflin Company, $3) Maxwell Geismar examines the work of six American novelists against the background of social change from 1929 to 1939. In the first section, which to my mind is the best, he presents the gilded age of 1929 and analyzes the achievement and final predicament of Ring Lardner, Successful Author to the very society he satirized. Like so many talented American writers Lardner "just grew." Unlike most of them he achieved great popularity, thanks to his special gifts—his indigenous humor and his genius for appropriating the American language to the uses of literature. His satires also appealed no doubt to that tendency toward self-denigration which has gone hand in hand with our much more advertised and articulate boasting. But to Lardner this popularity was a source only of bitterness because he made the mistake of identifying himself with the society he wrote about and included himself in the contempt he felt for it. And his self-hatred, which Mr. Geismar thoroughly documents, his failure to achieve "the minimum and basic belief in his own significance" kept him from attaining the minimal serenity of detachment which would have mitigated his personal bitterness and given another dimension to his writing. Lardner, in other words, lacked the cultural perspective to recognize his own worth as an important writer who was popular not, as he assumed with masochistic intensity, because he was one more emanation of the crass and brutal world he had the insight to despise but because he worked in and extended a rich indigenous tradition of humor and story-telling.

In one sense Mr. Geismar's book is a study in the cultural perspective of all his subjects. I use the word cultural as it is employed by Constance Rourke, to denote the whole "configuration" of a society. Mr. Geismar's emphasis is on social attitudes but it is the merit of his book that it bears little resemblance to the "Marxist" criticism of a few years ago which was often revealing but in general provided the narrow distorting gleam of a flashlight rather than the clarity of over-all illumination.

Of Mr. Geismar's six authors—Hemingway, Dos Passos, Faulkner, Wolfe, and Steinbeck are the other five—Dos Passos is the only one who had at the outset any comprehension of the shape of the world he lived in. He has made a consistent advance in knowledge and understanding ever since, and he is today the only one of the six who is culturally adult in the same sense as the Flaubert who wrote the "Sentimental Education." The others, including Faulkner, the romantic reactionary, might well be characters in a contemporary American version of that extraordinary book.

Mr. Geismar traces the tortuous snail's progress by which Hemingway and Wolfe arrived at social awareness—the first by way of Paris, the Spanish bull ring, and the African veldt; the second by tunneling with tremendous labor through the autobiographical mountain in his own back yard. Mr. Geismar seems less appalled than I am by the fact that the social awareness even in Hemingway's latest and Wolfe's last book is so elementary—still limited to the emotions and still devoid of any effective sense of history, our own or any other. Steinbeck's social conversion appears to have been relatively quick and painless, thanks no doubt to the fact that it coincided with the popular upsurge of interest in social questions during the thirties, but it is even more mindless, with sentimentality passing for emotion. In "The Grapes of Wrath" he luxuriated in sympathy for the underdog as in a warm bath. His handling of social subjects has remained naive; he has continued to exploit popular social emotions without offering any but the most puerile resolutions.

Yet, as Mr. Geismar says, what the record of Hemingway, Wolfe, and Steinbeck condemns is not so much the intellectual capacity of these individuals as the "deficiency of cultural thinking" which is characteristic of America as a whole. This deficiency shows itself not only in a lack of knowledge, except of the most superficial and often chauvinistic sort, of backgrounds and traditions, but in an almost defiant non-interest, a kind of snobbism in reverse, which denies their importance and their relevance to the present. The result has been to put upon each individual artist the whole burden of his personal and social integration, whereas his European counterpart is in a fair way to have absorbed, by the time he comes of age, a knowledge of his cultural history and setting and a sense of his own relation to it which provide him with confidence and a point of departure for his particular talents.

In the course of his analysis Mr. Geismar gives critical estimates of his subjects from the literary point of view. On this score I think he takes Steinbeck far too seriously. I feel like quarreling also with his judgment of Thomas Wolfe; I am inhibited because, after "Look Homeward, Angel," I was never able to read more than a few pages of anything else. I will say that I find Mr. Geismar persuasive—until the quotations begin. In general his comments are illuminating and mature. He fulfils one important function of the critic that is too often neglected, in providing a frame of social and cultural reference against which to measure the individual accomplishment. And he shows both sense and courage in recognizing and calling by its true name the cultural illiteracy from which the American writer has not been the only one to suffer. Finally, his style is lively, though he often commits sentences which are, to say the least, queer. Item: "The choice is neither limited nor the passages accidental." And sometimes much worse than that: "Under such auspices and surrounded by such companions, Lardner, so he wishes us to believe, and like John Donne having carried his bitterness beyond the grave, passes to his eternal reward."

MARGARET MARSHALL

Democracy Begins at Home

AMERICAN UNITY AND ASIA. By Pearl Buck. The John Day Company. $1.25.

THIS book is a collection of articles and speeches delivered over the last few months and relating to the issues of war and peace in America and Asia. Through them all runs the fundamental idea implied in the title. It is that there is an essential connection between the unity of Americans at home and their attitude toward their colored allies abroad. The argument follows from the premise that we cannot secure the cooperation of the Chinese and the subject peoples of Asia, a cooperation which is essential to the winning of the war, unless we start with democracy at home. So long as we treat the Negroes as a subject people, so long do our protestations of democracy in the Orient fall upon deaf ears, so long do we provide the Japanese propaganda machine with ready-made fuel. The thesis, illustrated by reference to the treatment of American citizens of Japanese ancestry in the United States, by a powerful plea for acceptance of the Negro as a full member of American democracy, goes with the warning that such peoples as the Chinese may not be interested in our war effort if they cannot trust our war aims. The note of warning is tempered by an appeal to the colored peoples in our midst to have further patience, to understand that American democracy admits the principle of democracy even if the practice leaves something to be desired, while the fascist countries deny even the principle.

Miss Buck is doing a very great service by insisting that the relation between white and colored peoples, between ruling races and ruled, is of enormous importance in the war. You cannot be democratic abroad if you are not democratic at home. She has the advantage, not shared by many of her countrymen, of seeing the West through Eastern eyes. One can agree passionately with her attitude without always following her in the reasons she gives for its support. One wonders if the argument is made stronger by the implication that white and ruling, colored and ruled, are synonymous terms. Asia has been as disunited as Europe, and still is. The Anglo-Saxons may be the race snobs of the world but there has been plenty of competition for the honor, and that not limited to Europe. In driving home her point that American democracy must be extended if it is to survive, the author sometimes gets herself into the position of denying to the Anglo-Saxon powers the long struggle for and experience of democracy that is theirs. The English lily may grow on an imperial dunghill, but no one can ignore the political maturity of the English people, whatever he may think of the stupidity of the English ruling class. It was the people which forced the government to take up arms against fascism. Surely it is a little extravagant to say England's history in democracy cannot compare with China's. If so, how do we explain Sun Yat-sen and the nationalist movement? And is it not possible that if freedom is our common war aim the categories of colored and white are not so clear as they are sometimes made out to be? The powerful movement toward democracy in some Asiatic countries might well have to clear away important obstacles within as well as without. Political independence is one thing, democracy is another.

Miss Buck has raised a banner which must never be furlled; she states her case with sincerity, ability, and courage. There is no disagreement with her general attitude, and the reviewer, for one, agrees strongly that when democracy is in danger the answer is not less, but more, democracy. But the issues are so fundamental that they will bear all the discussion of which we are capable. This book may well be the beginning of great changes in public opinion, part of which it already reflects.

GEORGE F. TAYLOR

The Great House

BOWEN'S COURT. By Elizabeth Bowen. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

QUEEN ANNE and Georgian houses, from the middle to the end of the eighteenth century, began to go up all over Ireland: whole Palladian towns, projected by the greater landlords, streets and squares in Dublin, and "country seats" in the demesnes. This was the first architecture to take hold, since the Gothic castles and abbeys of the native lords. It has been romanticized (even by Yeats), and in a great measure in our own day, abandoned, neglected, and destroyed. Bowen's Court is one of these houses. Characteristically, it was planned on too large a scale. What these buildings signified was the successful, though destined to be brief in full success, working of the rent (and rack-rent) systems. They were the first signs of the alien ruling caste's getting their hand in, and their leg up. Bowen's Court, "high, bare and Italianate," is of limestone. It still has "the startling, meaning and abstract clearness of a house in a print." In spite of its builder's intention of impressive grandeur, it had isolation built into it, and seeming to look out of it. Such houses, set back on their lawns, still have a provisional look. They also look at bay.

Miss Bowen, writing the history of her family and its house in County Cork, has added a chapter to the not-fully recorded history of the Protestant Ascendancy in Ireland. Members of that Ascendancy have written Irish history (Swift, Grattan, and Berkeley through Parnell) and Irish literature (Congreve through Shaw and Yeats). Maria Edgeworth, who influenced both Turgenev and Scott, did acid observations of pre- and post-Union society. The Irish people themselves have recorded their side of the matter not only in print but in action (emigration and the burnings of 1921 and earlier). Miss Bowen's story is of a provincial family, rather "bleak" as she says, and almost pathologically "unhistoric." They did nothing, for or against the country they occupied. They reflected, in a parochial way, the periods they lived through. At the end, in Miss Bowen, they produced an artist of the most sensitive sort; and it is for her sake that we listen attentively to the record she gives of them.

It is perhaps a kind of poetic justice which produced in the "planter" families, from the earliest days, a desire to be Irish. The country worked on them in spite of themselves; in a generation English settlers took on some Irish virtues and were infected with Irish vices. Miss Bowen's ancestor, Colonel Bowen, a Welsh member of Cromwell's army, was granted land after the Cromwellian Irish campaigns. Within a generation, his descendants had taken over enough of "the litigious and encroaching" kind of Irish nature to institute the first of a long series of inter- and extra-family lawsuits which seem to reflect acute nervousness and the suppressed rage of a conquered, not a conquering, class.

And Miss Bowen notes "the kind of Versailles fantasy which came to dominate too many Irish-English people, to cripple their bank accounts and endanger their private lives." The lack of feudal weight was marked. Arthur Young says (1777-1779):

The landlord of an Irish estate, inhabited by Roman Catholics, is a sort of despot who yields obedience, in whatever concerns the poor, to no law but his own will. A long series of oppressions, aided by very many ill-judged laws, have brought landlords into the habit of exerting a very lofty superiority. . . . Speaking a language that is despised, professing a religion that is abhorred, and being disarmed, the poor find themselves in many cases slaves even in the bosom of written liberty. . . .

But the Bowens could not have been the worst of the type. The house was attacked only once, and the family went on, faintly reflecting the world outside. A mild rake was succeeded by a mild absentee. The moral weight of the early nineteenth century, some education (Oxford and Trinity College, Dublin) and "good" marriages, brought in Bowens who led responsible lives. Genteel accomplishments (the harp and the piano) came in. Miss Bowen's grandfather, filled with Victorian mania for success, installed machinery and work-hours, as well as a revived system of rack-renting of his own. Her father reacted "in all ways against his father's success regime." A lawyer, a scholar, and a partial absentee, he lived for long periods in Dublin. Nervous, restless, often ill, Miss Bowen shows him walking the Dublin street, . . . sitting in a tearoom "always, from some inherited landlord instinct, with his back against a wall."

The interests, literary and political, of other Irish estates—Coole (Lady Gregory) and Lissadell (Eva Gore-Booth and Countess Markiewicz) during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries—passed Bowen's Court by. But when Miss Bowen inherited the house, she was already a writer. The house was now a shell and a luxury. Spared from burning, the conditions which had produced it had been defeated. Miss Bowen's description of its present state, bare and open to the Irish weather, can touch us with a pathos which is inherent in monuments of even the most cruel despotism, once it has passed. For these are signs that such rule cannot last. Bowen's Court, ironically enough, has become a symbol, to its present owner, of peace in war-time, and a kind of reconciliation.

Miss Bowen's straight historical sections are rather stiff. What she has accomplished is something more subtle: a sympathetic picture of a class often denigrated beyond its entire deserts, and the results, in human character, of their really tragic isolation. She is, occasionally, slightly blind to the implications of the story. To her, as to Yeats in his old age, power is better when linked up to the idea of property. Disaster, to her mind, comes when power operates "in a void." This is an attitude held over from the past of which Miss Bowen so sensitively speaks. The future will know that not to love power is the essential thing. LOUISE BOGAN

Essays in Appreciation

ESSAYS IN CRITICISM AND RESEARCH. By Geoffrey Tillotson. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

THOUGH the research in these essays is exact and extensive, the criticism is very disappointing. Mr. Tillotson is a man who has a great deal more to tell about literature than he has to say. He is a scholarly man with a delicate literary sense—he would once have been described as a bookish man—and with a minor turn for style. He is drawn to the past by a very strong pull of temperament, and perhaps by a very weak sense of life; in any case, it strikes me that he merely rationalizes when he makes the traditional plea that a knowledge of the past adds to one's understanding of the present. In any living sense, he doesn't think in terms of history at all; it is sources, echoes, allusions, affinities—of words, lines, poems, books—that really stir his blood and quicken his scent. These things he hunts down with a gusto that saves him from being a pedant and turns him into a kind of detective. He appreciates art, but he dotes on bric-a-brac. He admires design, but he treasures detail. The type is recurrent, if indeed in England it is not continuous: the tenuously witty, faintly mannered, highly literary, almost precious, not quite trivial academic. It keeps its own sense of proportion, just as a microscope does. But it ignores the values that go with real criticism.

Mr. Tillotson can write of Bacon, Pope, Shenstone, William Morris, Ernest Dowson and others—a heterogeneous enough crew—without managing to say anything memorable, or even new, or always pertinent. One agreeably suggestive idea is sometimes enough to keep a whole essay in motion. In the case of Dowson there is really no idea at all. In virtually every case, there is a sort of literary analysis which must not be confused with aesthetic criticism, even though Mr. Tillotson's responses are often of an aesthetic sort. The phenomenon is hardly unprecedented, and occurs whenever appreciation tries to do the work of appraisal. But the dominant quality in these essays is one of scholarship, and sometimes of mere scholarly tabulation. Thus we are told that Dryden's verbs "are habitually more energetic than those of any other poet." This is perfectly true, but is no more than an academic way of stating the obvious—that Dryden's poetry is habitually more energetic than almost any other poet's. Again, we are told that "Pope saw more in insects than any other poet except Gray." But we are not told why. The fact is merely noted as one of Pope's claims to be a "nature poet"; whereas what gives it point, and saves it from being the sort of discovery proclaimed in the usual Ph.D. thesis, is that it exactly satisfies an artistic need in Pope, suiting both the scale and the waspishness of his satire. Mr. Tillotson's whole approach to Pope (and Pope is probably the writer he is best equipped to write about) seems to me provincial, belated, almost naive: he assumes that, even today, people must violently take sides about Pope, that Pope still needs a kind of defiant defense, and that the special excellences of his verse need special pointing out. And Mr. Tillotson is certainly capable of some odd reactions. In contending that Pope's hatreds have been overemphasized

Just published—the WHOLE story—

A must book for every Nation reader!

The RIDDLE of the STATE DEPARTMENT

By ROBERT BENDINER

THE CONTENTS:

Three Foreign Policies Equal Zero • Case Study in Appeasement • The Disease in Other Forms • Appeasement Becomes High Strategy • The Institution • At the Top • Who's Who • Why the Cow Is Sacred • What Can Be Done

ONLY part of the material in this book has appeared in the Nation articles. A volume of immediate importance to every one who wants to know whether our State Department is helping or hindering victory, whether it is capable of shaping a real peace after the war.

At all bookstores, $2 • FARRAR & RINEHART
Publishers • 232 Madison Ave., N. Y.

TO GET Your Bigger Nation

(See announcement on back cover)

just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $.....

- ☐ One Year $5
☐ Two Years $8
☐ Three Years $11

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER

to new subscribers only

- ☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name.....

Street.....

City.....

State.....

Extra postage per year: Foreign and Canadian, $1.00

8-22-42

as a source of his inspiration, he suggests that pity is often the mainspring, as in

"Who would not weep, if Atticus were he?"

Well, Pope himself certainly did not weep; on the contrary, he did his almighty best to prove that Atticus was he. Which is not to deny, however, that Pope could show pity on occasion.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

The Influence of the Quakers

THE HISTORY OF QUAKERISM. By Elbert Russell. The Macmillan Company. $3.

JOHN WOOLMAN: AMERICAN QUAKER. By Janet Whitney. Little, Brown and Company. $3.75.

THERE is an ironical though probably an unintended timeliness in the appearance of these two books, both concerned with the western world's foremost advocates of peace. One of them tells the intricate and fascinating story of the Society of Friends from the time when George Fox set forth on his youthful wanderings, just three hundred years ago, down to the outbreak of this our war. The other presents the worth and wisdom of Quakerism in their most perfect American example. Taken together, the two books make sad reading just now. They are a most poignant reminder of the gulf that yawns between our human ideals and our performance.

The gentle and wholly beneficent life of John Woolman has long been vaguely familiar to students of American literature. To the knowledge of the man that we have hitherto been able to deduce from his own writings Mrs. Whitney has now added a great wealth of detail, drawing upon sources of information that are not easily accessible. Her account of Woolman is marred by occasional lapses into sentimentality and by a tendency to underestimate the intelligence of her probable readers, but these minor flaws do not seriously detract from her success in painting a solid and authentic portrait.

Professor Russell's book, a triumph in the art of literary condensation, lives up to its exacting title. In less than six hundred pages it presents a great range of persons and events while also outlining all the main ideas, philosophic and mystical and social, that have actuated Quakerism from its seventeenth-century beginnings. Now that it exists, one realizes that there has long been a need for such a book.

Perhaps because he is himself a Quaker, Professor Russell writes with a quietness that does not always indicate the full significance of the events he is narrating or that of the ideas with which he deals. Indeed one is sometimes left in doubt whether he himself quite comprehends their full significance and value. Thus, in an otherwise ample discussion of the "Hicksite Separation" of 1827-1828, he suggests that the growth of democratic ideals within the Society was due to external events such as the American Revolution and to the thought of outsiders such as Locke and Jefferson. And yet it is clear even from his own account that the basic notions of democracy had been implicit in the lives and doctrines of the Friends from the time of Fox himself. Indeed one may assert that Quakerism owes less to democracy than democracy owes to it. Again, although Professor Russell has spent much time upon the numerous private "journals" in which the Quakers of early days set down their religious experience, he does not suggest that these productions gave the cue to the more literary journal-writers of the nineteenth century. The many remarkable tangencies between Quaker thought and "Transcendentalism" never lead him to mention William Ellery Channing, Bronson Alcott, or Ralph Waldo Emerson, all of whom leaned more heavily upon the Friends than they ever acknowledged—or, it may be, realized.

But Professor Russell has not attempted to write a full discussion of Quaker influence upon the outer world. Such a discussion would make a book perhaps as interesting and valuable as the present one, but certainly much longer. It would deal with stages in the development of democratic theory that have been strangely neglected. It would take us back to the beginnings of the struggle for women's rights. It would show that the anti-slavery movement and our long and tragic effort toward international pacification are as old as Quakerism itself.

The fact is, as Professor Russell's history shows, that the influence of the Quakers has been amazingly more extensive during the last three centuries than their numbers would seem to warrant. This is the more remarkable in view of the fact that they have usually been somewhat withdrawn from the world's work, reluctant in speech and action, and anxious never to "out-run the Guide." Their organization has been loose, their theology has been vague, they have never had an official leadership, and seldom have they made a concerted effort to increase their numbers. When all this is considered it becomes clear that the work they have done must have been based upon something solidly true in their fundamental principles.

ODELL SHEPARD

RESORT

HIGH HOLIDAY SERVICES

Dancing Under the Stars in Beautiful Open-Air
Amphitheatre

*In the Heart of
The Adirondacks*

9 HOLE GOLF COURSE
ON PREMISES

9 Clay Tennis Courts

8 Handball
Courts

OPEN UNTIL SEPT. 28

Earl Carpenter's
14-Piece Orchestra

SCAROON MANOR

HOTEL • on SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.

SPECIAL RATES in September—FREE GOLF after LABOR DAY

Buy Your Books Through the Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

The Readers' Service Division

The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

IN BRIEF

DESERT WAR. By Russell Hill. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

Victory in the North African desert has proved elusive. Both sides have more than once seen it clearly on the horizon but it turned out to be a mirage. This book is an account of the second British advance in late 1941 when General Auchinleck's Eighth Army swept forward from the Egyptian border to the edge of Tripolitana and was then forced to retreat nearly back to where it came from—all in little over two months. Russell Hill of the Herald Tribune, the baby of the war correspondents corps—he is only twenty-three—kept close to the fighting through most of the campaign and his story is detailed and straightforward, although written without especial distinction. He makes very clear the peculiar difficulties of desert warfare in which decisive results can only be achieved by total destruction of the enemy force. But this feat is made next to impossible by the vast empty spaces of the battlefield which inhibit all attempts at envelopment. Some excellent maps and pictures greatly increase the value of this book.

THE COMING OF THE CIVIL WAR.

By Avery Craven. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.75.

This unbiased and well-written study carries a step farther the trend of recent historians to show that the Civil War was far from inevitable. Slavery is analyzed as a labor system, and the South is shown to have divided naturally into three regions until the triumph of the Republican Party in 1860 helped to fuse the Southwest and the Border States with the Old South in a struggle to preserve an institution by then seen as "peculiar." Emotions of various origins distorted the situation until the final breakup occurred.

MUSIC

BEETHOVEN'S Eighth Symphony is a work for the Russians to think about and learn from. The thing to consider is the buoyancy, joyousness, and exuberant playfulness embodied in the work, and their complete lack of connection with the turmoil of Beethoven's daily life at the time he was writing it—the turmoil created by his attempts to break up the intimacy between his brother Johann and Therese Obermayer. And the thing to learn is that the relation between Beethoven's artistic functioning and his experience was not immediate and direct: his articulateness in his medium related itself to an inner core of personal qualities, emotions, insights, which were in turn what were altered and developed by his experience—and not by every daily occurrence, but only by experiences that were relevant to what was developing deep inside him. When that inner development had produced the emotions and attitudes indicated by the Eighth Symphony they pressed for expression in the music of this symphony, unaffected by the external turmoil that was irrelevant to them. Earlier too it was such emotions and insights—concerned now with the heroism which Beethoven himself had developed and learned to know in the face of disaster—that operated through his articulateness in his medium to produce the "Eroica" Symphony, fortified this time by events and ideas outside which were relevant. If there had been no French Revolution and no Napoleon there would have been no torn-up dedication, but there would have been the same "Eroica" Symphony.

Ernest Newman once made much the same point about Mozart, citing the striking differences in the three symphonies which Mozart wrote in approximately two months of the summer of 1788—the last great symphonies in E flat, G minor, and C major—as evidence of the fact that "the creative imagination of a great artist functions too deep down within him to be greatly affected by anything that may happen on the surface of his life or his being. The subconscious is of much more importance in the artist than the conscious; and the subconscious proceeds by its own mysterious inner chemistry and obeys its own mysterious laws. . . . Mozart the man was uniformly wretched throughout the whole of this period; the changes in the moods of the three works were due simply to changes in his aesthetic chemistry with which the experiences of his conscious mind had the minimum of connection."

All this deserves the attention and thought of the Russians who have been over-excited about the relation of art to the conditions—the political and social order, the prevailing ideas and emotional atmosphere—of its time and place, and over-eager to exhibit to the world a music that would show its immediate and direct relation to these conditions in Russia today. By giving so much importance to these external conditions they have created this difficulty for themselves—that it is a Hapsburg Austria from which we have got the music of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, and a Soviet Russia from which we get only the music of Shostakovich. They can escape this difficulty only by recognizing the unimportance of those external conditions in relation to the greatness we are aware of in some music, the importance of the composer's personal and musical resources, the relation of the external conditions to what is quite unimportant in the music. Mozart's time and place are represented in his writing by certain characteristics of emotional content and musical language and style that are to be found in the writing of hundreds of his contemporaries; what is unique in his music represents what is uniquely his in resources of emotion and medium; and it is such resources in Beethoven that produced the music which a hundred others living in the same time and place did not produce. Recognizing all this the Russians may relax their pressure on their composers to write, for all to hear, as Artists of the Soviet Union—recognizing further that this freedom will not cause a facile-minded, pretentious Shostakovich to write anything better than he has been writing, but will permit a man of greater stature, when he does appear in Russia, to produce the music he is capable of.

What made me think of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony was the arrival of Victor's July recording of Toscanini's performance with the N. B. C. Symphony (Set 908, $3.68). As a form in sound the performance has the characteristics that are distinctive and marvelous in every Toscanini performance. As an embodiment of the work's content it is no less marvelous; and I have heard the first three movements played with comparable effect by other conductors, but never the finale as it is played by Toscanini. On these records the sound of the performance is enveloped in the acoustical deadness that enveloped his recorded performance of the "Eroica"; but the sound itself is very good this time; and in addition the breaks in the apparently continuous performance are skilfully managed and there are no long waits at the beginnings of sides (a momentary sag in pitch on the second side must however be mentioned). Music, performance, and recording combine to make this one of the great sets of the year.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Shipley's York Plan

Dear Sirs: In your editorial, Nelson's Fourth Try, in the issue of July 25, you have inadvertently done an injustice to your readers and to at least one important member of the Smaller War Plants Corporation. You said: "Of the five men picked by Nelson for the job, four are nonentities."

What are the facts? One of these four men is Mr. William S. Shipley, chairman of the Board of the York Ice Machinery Corporation of York, Pennsylvania. Have you ever heard of the York plan of contract distribution and plant utilization? It was Mr. Shipley and his able associates who were instrumental in mobilizing the entire industrial community of York, of pressing into service every bit of machinery found within a radius of many miles of their town for the all-out war effort. And this has been going on ever since 1940, long before we entered the actual fight. From all over the country men have traveled to York to study the plan.

As a former Department of Labor investigator, I can testify to the spirit of good fellowship which has been the established tradition of the York Ice Machinery Corporation, the spirit which has moved Mr. Shipley to bring about complete mobilization of men and tools for the war effort.

Not content with his contribution within the York community, Mr. Shipley has tramped the length and breadth of the country, at his own expense and at great risk to his health, lecturing before eager listeners on the work in York. In a day when one needs only to announce a plan, sit home and see the press agents turn out reams of releases to herald the new great hero and patriot, this Mr. William S. Shipley has dared to go about his business without a press agent, without publicity. Maybe that is why even The Nation has overlooked his achievements.

To criticize Mr. Nelson for the manner in which he has launched the Smaller War Plants Corporation is unwarranted. It has come into existence without extravagant prophecies as to what it would accomplish. That is as it should be. Let the public learn of its usefulness through actual deeds and not through press agents. Neither can I see anything wrong with Mr. Nelson's choice of men for service on the Board whose names have not yet appeared in headlines. We have had enough of those men. The real work of the nation is being done by men whose names might never appear in the news columns. That is no indication that they lack the qualifications to do their job well.

J. ANTHONY MARCUS
Washington, D. C., August 2

Twain and Whitman

Dear Sirs: Perhaps some of the readers of The Nation could help me determine whether Mark Twain and Walt Whitman ever met. In all Twain's published writings there is just one mention of the poet—the letter printed in Horace Traubel's "Camden's Compliment to Walt Whitman," Philadelphia, 1889. If they never met it is all the more surprising because they both spent the winter of 1868 in Washington, D. C., Clemens as private secretary to Senator William R. Stewart and Whitman as clerk in the Treasury Department. Exhaustively interviewed while visiting his brother Thomas Jefferson Whitman in St. Louis, October, 1879, Whitman gave his opinions of such contemporaries as J. G. Holland, Bret Harte, and "fops like Howells," but remained strangely silent about the great Missourian. In short, if the two men did meet, neither must have considered the encounter worthy of subsequent comment!

CYRIL CLEMENS
Webster Groves, Mo., August 10

Italian Behavior

Dear Sirs: Writing in The Nation of August 1 on the unfairness of those who expect the Italians to revolt against fascism without delay in order to regain the respect of the world, M. T. Maestro, Italian News Editor, Columbia Broadcasting System, says: "I think that the Italians already deserve the respect of the world because, in spite of having been poisoned for twenty years by a fascism which has been kept alive and prosperous by the reactionaries of the whole world, they have behaved in this war as a civilized people."

Mr. Maestro should be more explicit. What Italians have behaved in this war as a civilized people? Fourteen months ago the Italian army, jointly with the German Nazi hordes, brutally attacked and subjugated the Slovenes, together with the rest of the Yugoslavs, and ever since this unhappy people has been subjected to mass-murder, pillage, and suppression of their language. Perhaps Mr. Maestro would think this Slovenia "incident" should be taken lightly because the Slovene people is one of the smallest in the world and matters little, and because those Slovenes who defend themselves, their wives and children, are called "bandits" and "communists" by their Italian exterminators. But the Slovenes want to live in the land which has been theirs for more than a thousand years, and no honest man who believes in democracy and justice can reproach their resistance.

I wish some honest, democratic Italian in America—and I know there are many such—would speak up and condemn these crimes; I wish some honest and courageous Italian, like Gaetano Salvemini, would tell openly in the American press that those Italians, who are guilty of the mass-terror in Slovenia and elsewhere, behave no better than the German Nazis do and that they merit the same punishment.

IVAN MOLEK, Editor,
Slovene Daily Prosveta
Chicago, Ill., August 3

CONTRIBUTORS

DALE KRAMER has contributed to Harpers, the Survey Graphic, and other magazines.

SYDNEY JUSTIN HARRIS is on the staff of the Chicago Daily News.

LIONEL TRILLING, assistant professor of English at Columbia University, is the author of "Matthew Arnold."

GEORGE E. TAYLOR is at present associated with the Institute of Pacific Relations. He is the author of "America in the New Pacific" and other books.

LOUISE BOGAN, poetry critic of the New Yorker, is the author of "Poems and New Poems."

LOUIS KRONENBERGER is the author of "Kings and Desperate Men: Life in Eighteenth-Century England."

ODELL SHEPARD, professor of English at Trinity College and lieutenant governor of Connecticut, won the Pulitzer prize for biography in 1937.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 29, 1942

NUMBER 9

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 161

EDITORIALS

Inflation Is Here 163

Can Labor Unite? 164

War and Confidence by J. Alvarez del Vayo 165

ARTICLES

Farley Picks a Loser by Will Chasan 166

Germany's Waning Manpower by Fritz Sternberg 167

France's Turncoat Artists by Minna Lederman 169

A British View on India by Norman Angell 172

In the Wind 173

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Silone's Catacombs by Paolo Milano 174

Victory by Air by Ralph Bates 175

Postscript by Rolfe Humphries 176

In Brief 178

Records by B. H. Haggin 178

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 180

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON    MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

WITH THE CONDUCT OF A WORLD WAR ON his hands, it is hard to condemn the President for having bungled the political campaign in New York State. But bungle it he certainly did. Had he gone into the campaign full-tilt from the start, there is no question that he could have had the nominee of his choice. Had he kept drastically aloof, he would have given the nomination to Bennett but he would not have lost a fight to Farley. Unfortunately the President tried to find a middle course and garnered only the usual penalty for being too late with too little. He endorsed Mead days after Farley's hand-picked delegates had pledged their all to Bennett. The result is that such I-hate-Roosevelt correspondents as John O'Donnell of the New York Daily News are able to report gleefully the "astounding fact" that the President "no longer can control or speak for the Democratic party in his own state." Should Bennett win the election, Mr. O'Donnell's wish will indeed have become a fact. Such an outcome is improbable, though we believe not quite as unthinkable as Mr. Chasan asserts in his report elsewhere in this issue. Bennett will have to contend with the hostility of Roosevelt, Governor Lehman, and large sections of Tammany Hall, and his candidacy has cost the Democratic anywhere from 250,000 to 400,000 American Labor Party votes which would have gone to a compromise Democratic nominee in preference to Mr. Dewey. On the other hand, Dewey himself has the opposition of the titular head of his party, and whole areas of the G. O. P., lukewarm to his presidential aspirations, may be expected to pull their punches in his behalf. ✕

AS FOR THE A. L. P., ITS ROLE IN THE campaign is almost as uninspired as the President's. Surely its leaders must have seen a Bennett victory in the offing. Yet when it came, they were caught wholly unprepared. They knew it would be suicide to capitulate and go along with Bennett, yet they had lined up no nominee of their own, and after desperate last-minute attempts to corral a big name they were forced to fall back on an obscure Tammany man who had once campaigned on a joint Democratic-Labor Party ticket for Congressman. What is worse, instead of making the

BURLINGTON
PUBLIC LIBRARY

Democrats pay through the nose for their shameful abuse of the A. L. P. by naming a completely fresh ticket, one that would cut into the Farley organization all the way down the line, the laborites gave four of the six state-wide nominations on their slate to Democrats chosen at the Bennett convention. Inept is the word for it, but there is nothing to do now but give Mr. Alfange the biggest vote possible in order to cut down the shadow which Jim Farley even now casts over the Democratic convention two years hence.

✱

BRAZIL'S ENTRANCE INTO THE WAR WILL encourage everyone who realizes how important it is, both now and for the future, to have all the Latin-American countries standing shoulder to shoulder with the United Nations. Brazil's first great task will be to deal rapidly and energetically with the large army of fifth columnists and saboteurs that has for so long infested its soil. In this the government can count upon the active assistance of the people who are fundamentally democratic. In fact, it was the effective expression of the masses against the latest outrages of the Nazis that left the Vargas administration no alternative but to declare war. Brazil's answer to repeated German attacks on its shipping will undoubtedly have healthy repercussions in the rest of South America where the complacent diplomacy of notes of protest and excuses is rapidly being discredited. Already Uruguay is displaying impatience and may not hesitate long before following the example of its great neighbor. Among the first to fight against the Axis, both in the political and diplomatic field, Uruguay would long ago have gone to war with Germany and Italy had it followed its own inclinations. According to our information it was on the advice of representatives of Great Britain and the United States, who were anxious that certain measures of defense be first established in the country, that the Baldomir government has refrained so far from declaring war.

✱

THE GERMAN ADVANCE ON STALINGRAD has reached a point where the possibility of holding the city is in grave question. For weeks the Soviet defenders along the Don, both to the northwest and southwest of Stalingrad, held firm against all Nazi attacks. But once the Germans succeeded in crossing the river in force at several points, there remained no natural obstacles to aid the defense. Although the city is reported to be strongly fortified, its dependence on the Volga as its chief supply route makes it vulnerable to the German pincer strategy. In the Caucasus the Nazi forces have advanced to within less than a hundred miles of the Grozny oil fields. Although there seems little danger that they will reach Baku before winter sets in, the British action in establishing an independent army command for Iran and Iraq suggests that preparations are being made for any eventuality. But whatever happens in the south, it seems certain that there will be a Russian front in the north again this winter and next spring. Despite the losses in the south, Moscow, Leningrad, and the Ural industrial areas are capable of provisioning the Red Army for another winter campaign. Thus, although Hitler has made great gains, he has failed in the primary objective of his 1942 campaign, which was to put Russia out of the war.

✱

DONALD NELSON'S LATEST REPORT ON production shows that the lag which first became apparent in June persisted in July. The fact that production as a whole fell short of announced goals by 7 per cent is not in itself serious. In a period of rapid advance some delays are almost inevitable. What is really important, as Mr. Nelson is well aware, is to keep the production program in balance and to make sure that its emphasis is where it should be. Mr. Nelson acknowledges that the program has gotten somewhat out of balance, but assures us that every effort is being made to correct the situation. The record is wholly satisfactory with respect to shipbuilding and the output of tanks—and these are crucial items. But it is highly disturbing that our June production of planes, according to Elmer Davis, was well below expectation while the July output reflected a gain of only 6 per cent over the June figures. In answer to the storm of criticism which has arisen against the WPB in recent weeks, Mr. Nelson announced that he was going to "get tough" with any one obstructing the program. It is ironic, to say the least, that his first move after his fighting statement was to dismiss not the dollar-a-year men who are responsible for the steel shortage but an employee, Frederick S. Libbey—because he had talked to a newspaper reporter before filing with his superiors a report on the shortage which contained severe criticism of big steel and the steel branch of the WPB. Perhaps the most significant statement in the Libbey report, as published by PM, is that "the principal criticism of the branch by operating personnel in the [steel] industry . . . is that the consultant staff is composed largely of sales executives whereas they feel that engineers are needed to plan production."

✱

CHINA HAS BEEN MAKING RAPID PROGRESS in the past week toward wiping out the last remaining gains of Japan's early summer offensive. The important South Chekiang port of Wenchow has been retaken for the second time within a month—this time, apparently, for keeps. Wenchow is peculiarly vital to the United Nations because it is only 200 miles from the strong Japanese naval base on Formosa and only 600 miles from the main Japanese islands. The Chinese have also succeeded in reoccupying 140 miles of the strategic Hangchow-Nanchang railways which the Japanese won at such cost in July. In this counter-drive the Chinese have managed to recapture several potential United Nations air bases from which raids may eventually be made against Japan and, at last report, were within 20 miles of Chushien, where one of the largest of Chinese air fields is located. This rather unexpected success may well change the whole strategy of our campaign against Japan. Instead of a long and costly drive from island to island, it may be possible for the United States to undertake a direct aerial offensive against Japan from Chinese bases.

✱

CHINA'S SUCCESSES HAPPEN TO COINCIDE with the anniversary of the Treaty of Nanking which inaugurated special rights for foreigners in the Middle Kingdom. It was signed August 29, 1842—just one hundred years ago. Within two years of the signing of the treaty both Britain and the United States obtained extra-territorial rights in China. In view of China's magnificent contribution to the cause of the United Nations, what could be more fitting than for the United States to mark the anniversary by formally relinquishing extra-territoriality and all other special privileges in China? Both the United States and Great Britain have indicated their intention to negotiate new treaties with China after the war. But why wait until the war is over? Action now would have a highly beneficial effect on morale not only in China but throughout the East, including India.

Inflation Is Here

BEFORE many weeks have passed the country is going to wake up to the fact that our elaborate price-control mechanism has failed to achieve its purpose. Already serious cracks are appearing in the price ceilings. A fortnight ago the OPA removed all restrictions on the price charged for twenty-five services, including watch repairing, shoe shining, and shoe repairing, and eased the restrictions on the charges for a number of other services. A day or so earlier Henderson had announced that food wholesalers and retailers would be permitted to use an "alternative pricing method," a euphemism for higher prices. A week later the OPA warned that the ceiling prices for some canned vegetables would have to be lifted. The ceiling on canned fruit was raised some time ago so as not to discourage canning during the present season.

On many other items the price ceilings have not yet been tested for the very significant reason that quality has been permitted to deteriorate. In some instances, the OPA has been accused of writing its specifications in such a way as deliberately to force down quality. Such an accusation might be very difficult to prove, but every woman knows this year's $17.95 dress is inferior to last year's regardless of price ceilings. All of this, of course, is just a beginning. Despite controls, basic commodity prices have risen to the level of October, 1926. Farm products are 6 per cent higher than in 1926 and nearly 25 per cent higher than last year at this time. Food prices in the primary markets are 16 per cent higher than a year ago. Uncontrolled food prices rose 7.3 per cent between mid-May and mid-June. The recent price increase in basic commodities is bound to have its effect before long on wholesale and retail costs. Unless the upsurge is stopped, the present ceiling must collapse, leaving us without any effective check against inflation.

Washington dispatches indicate that the President will soon make another effort to stem the inflationary tide by setting up a seven-man Economic Stabilization Authority with broad powers to coordinate federal policies on prices, wages, taxes, and savings. Such an integration of federal policy is badly needed and may bring forth some significant recommendations. But the country must be made to recognize that there is little that any administrative agency can do at this late date. Mr. Henderson and his associates have gone as far as the law allows in carrying on a skilful rear-guard action against inflation. Congress, and Congress alone, is responsible for letting the situation become as serious as it is. Congress alone has the power to forge weapons to meet the peril, and most Congressmen appear to be too busy preparing for the elections to do their jobs.

As Mr. Henderson predicted, the provision in the Price Control Act prohibiting the establishing of farm price ceilings below 110 per cent of parity has greatly weakened the whole price-control mechanism. Since "parity" is not a fixed point but a ratio between farm and industrial prices, the provision probably precludes any ceiling on farm prices, regardless of how high prices may rise. Reversing his earlier position, Secretary Wickard has urged that the 110 per cent limitation be repealed, thus placing responsibility squarely on the doorstep of Congress.

Far more serious, however, than any weakness in the price-control mechanism is the failure of Congress to heed the Treasury's tax recommendations. For there is no way in which prices can be held down if the amount of money in people's pockets greatly exceeds the value of the goods on the shelves of the country's stores. The war bond campaign is draining away part, but only a small part, of the excess purchasing power created by the war. It is now recognized that the Treasury's original $8,700,000,000 tax bill would have been inadequate even if it had been adopted and put in force several months ago. The House bill, now before the Senate, fell short of the Treasury's goal by approximately $2,500,000,000. A sales tax is still being urged in some quarters as a means of filling the gap but it is sheer hypocrisy to describe this class measure as anti-inflationary. A sales tax would serve only to limit the buying of the poor; by its very nature it could not tap the surplus unused funds in the hands of the middle and upper income groups. If inflation is to be checked, these surpluses must be put to work. The Treasury has suggested several ways by which this can be done. But only Congress can levy taxes.

Can Labor Unite?

THE new unity negotiations between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. will not begin until late September. Delay in inaugurating the conferences reflects the mood in which they are being approached by most of labor's leaders. There have, of course, been pious statements from both sides voicing their eagerness for a united labor movement. But these notes of hope have invariably been overshadowed by gloomy admonitions not to "expect miracles" and doleful recitations of the obstacles that stand in the way. Some of labor's statesmen seem to feel that optimism would create an upsurge of rank-and-file sentiment, unduly embarrassing the negotiators as they go through the motions. Cynicism over the new peace talks is not universal, but it is unmistakably dominant. And it is bad news for the country as well as for labor.

We do not pretend that the problems cited are imaginary. There are innumerable jurisdictional quarrels to be settled. There are familiar personal incompatibilities that mar the vision of one happy labor family: Joseph P. Ryan, reactionary boss of East Coast longshoreman, and Harry Bridges, West Coast ruler, dramatize the gap. The peace committees include William L. Hutcheson, hard-boiled Tory czar of the A. F. of L. Carpenters, and Julius Emspak, shrewd party-line secretary of the C. I. O. Electrical Workers.

The case can be documented in even more lugubrious detail. It is no anti-labor myth to suggest that personal ambitions are at stake, that some officeholders will have to be pensioned, that redistributions of power must be painfully devised. The real difficulty is that key leaders in the A. F. of L. and C. I. O. are viewing these problems not merely as serious but as insoluble; they seem unable to weigh the sacrifices they must make for unity against the cost—to the war effort as well as to labor's private status—of continued civil war.

Meanwhile, labor continues to protest—justly—that the war effort is gravely hampered by the lack of adequate labor representation in high production councils. As this is written the handful of labor representatives in the War Production Board are heading for a showdown with Donald Nelson over the WPB "freeze-out" of labor men and labor's ideas. Labor has an urgent and compelling indictment. Yet the division in its ranks, the incessant jockeying for position, the determination of both the A. F. of L. and C. I. O. to curb each other's power and prestige has immeasurably aggravated this situation. It was because the A. F. of L. and C. I. O. were unable to agree on a genuine labor spokesman that they finally agreed on Paul V. McNutt for Manpower Commissioner; how can labor raise its voice now over the current inadequacies of McNutt's performance? It is because of inter-labor rivalries that Walter P. Reuther, labor's foremost production expert, still occupies no effective post in the production setup. It is an open secret that appointments of all labor men in the government must be cleared with the A. F. of L. and C. I. O.; but almost inevitably the Administration must select two men—one from each camp—or find a spokesman from outside labor's house. This is no apology for Donald Nelson and others in high government posts who have shunned effective labor appointments. Labor is not the prime villain in the piece; but that does not make any less real its guilt in furnishing ammunition to every foe of labor participation in the war program.

A clear demonstration by labor's heads that they can see beyond the labyrinth of jurisdictional hocus-pocus could reinvigorate the whole mental climate of the war effort. It could—if carried through with full appreciation of its dramatic value—stimulate the spirits of men in Washington and outside who are dismayed by the politics, double-talk, and bureaucratic rivalry which still inhibit the war drive. Unity would be a way of serving notice that labor has terminated unionism-as-usual, and is prepared to assume a role of leadership in the war against fascism.

Only a handful of men in labor's camp have so far seen the affirmative meaning of unity. Sidney Hillman spoke out forcefully last week in a plea for successful prosecution of the unity talks. His statement was apparently inspired by fear of the pessimism and lethargy in high labor places. We hope that Hillman will soon return to an active place in C. I. O. councils. But more than anyone else Philip Murray can change the atmosphere of the unity meetings. Murray is widely respected in both the A. F. of L. and C. I. O.—and by labor's rank-and-file. He has never been accused of narrow personal ambition. He has fought—and licked—John L. Lewis for control of the C. I. O., achieving dignity and eloquence in the course of the struggle. He proved that he was alive to the nation's danger at a time when Lewis was leading the isolationist labor front. Will he recognize as plainly the course of statesmanship in uniting labor's ranks?

For there have been enough speeches about this being "labor's war." It is. And each day of labor's failure to emerge as a decisive factor in guiding that war—on the production front, in political warfare, and in many other areas—will be costly in men and materials and morale.

War and Confidence

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

WHILE the general staffs study the military, naval, and air lessons of the attack on Dieppe, two conclusions can already be drawn in the political field: the immense desire for a second front was overwhelmingly demonstrated and the possibility that it may be established has inspired evident fear in the ranks of the enemy. Nothing more was needed to electrify the people on both shores of the Atlantic than a headline announcing that Allied soldiers, and especially American soldiers, had landed in France. No Gallup poll, no demonstration in Trafalgar Square, no press campaign ever proved so eloquently the will to take the offensive against the Nazis as the enthusiasm that swept through New York when the news of the raid broke.

I had just seen a striking single expression of this general state of mind. A couple of days before the Dieppe attack I had met casually in the street an old Spanish Republican resident of New York. With him was a man equally Spanish in appearance. He was the last Spaniard to have escaped from Spain who had succeeded in crossing the ocean—without papers, without a ticket or money, as a stowaway on one of the infrequent ships sailing from Portugal. Although visibly wasted from lack of food, he was one of those tough, big-framed men that northern Spain produces. "What's going on there?" I asked. "Much hunger?" This time the word hunger failed to provoke the reaction usual in people who come from Spain. He spoke scarcely a word about his own experience or the sufferings of his people. "There," he said, with an indescribable gesture showing faith and strength at the same time, "everyone is only waiting for these people to attack." "And if they attack, what?" "If the British, and especially if the Americans, land in Spain, along with them will go a million Spaniards—like that." And he thrust out his arms to show the advance of a solid mass. "Like that—along with them—all the way to Berlin." Gladly I would have handed him over to the State Department. The light in his eyes was worth a dozen embassy reports.

Fears that a second front might wipe out the advantages already won in the sweep through Russia have been evident in the way the Axis propaganda service has handled the raid on Dieppe. Its whole effort has been concentrated on creating the impression that the raid was a genuine and carefully prepared attempt to establish a Western front and that its failure had doomed the whole project of invasion. It is to be assumed that the Allied agencies in charge of war information will study the political aspect of the attack with the same zeal that the staffs are devoting to its military aspects. But a casual examination of the handling of this latest incident suggests that, in spite of recent undoubted improvements in Allied propaganda, the Axis still holds the offensive on this crucial front.

This is a situation which will be difficult to change as long as the political position of the United Nations is impaired by so many internal contradictions. Among all the observations on India made by Louis Fischer, the most disquieting is his report of the lack of confidence among the Indians in the promises of the British. And similar doubt exists in other parts of the world as to the Allies as a whole. It is a distrust based not only on the memory of failure to fulfill the promises made during the last war, but also on the presence in the government apparatus of the United Nations of officials who have demonstrated their contempt for the democratic principles enunciated by their leaders.

This has been said a hundred times; it must be said a hundred times more. When the people consider Allied policy toward Vichy, toward Spain; when they see the appeasers and defeatists—who in case of a major military setback would hurry forward to revive the "realism" of Munich—continuing as ministers and ambassadors and advisers, the people ask themselves what kind of a war for democracy is this? To overcome this distrust is as important as to settle the problem of supremacy in the air or the problem of shipping. Even the worst defeats on the military front, even the most disappointing political decisions, would be accepted without protest if the people had full faith in the democratic integrity of their governors. Without such faith no Allied propaganda will be effective in laying the necessary political basis for the gigantic effort which will be required to assume the offensive against the Axis powers.

Most military experts today insist upon the urgency of achieving unity in the direction of the war. They show without difficulty the pressing need of a Supreme War Council supported by inter-Allied commands in the fields of military, economic, and political warfare. Such unity is essential. But it must be created not only in formal or bureaucratic terms; it must be the expression of a clear political purpose accepted by all the United Nations.

It is time to free the people of the world from the tragic conflict involved in fighting a war under colors not their own. If this is a war for democracy the most urgent thing to do is to restore confidence to the peoples of the earth. And this can be achieved only by placing the whole conduct of the war, political as well as military, in the hands of leaders whom the people trust—whether they sit in a cabinet discussing the problem of India, whether they sit with generals and admirals discussing a second front, or whether they sit in a committee of experts laying the foundations for the international society of tomorrow.

Farley Picks a Loser

BY WILL CHASAN

JIM FARLEY scored a momentary victory over President Roosevelt at the New York State Democratic convention last week, but in doing so he deliberately scuttled his party's chances of electing a Democratic governor. For the politically astute ex-Postmaster General must know that John J. Bennett, the drab and undistinguished Attorney General whom he made the Democratic candidate, has not the slightest hope of defeating Republican Tom Dewey.

Farley obviously was less concerned with Democratic victory than with pushing his personal fight against the President. To the delight of the anti-New Deal press, which after years of denouncing him as an unscrupulous machine boss suddenly found him to be a person of shining integrity, Farley converted the convention into an anti-Roosevelt demonstration. In this he was aided by the Kings County and Queens delegations, in both of which there were strong isolationist and some Coughlinite elements.

Under the influence of these forces, the convention was one of the rowdiest in Democratic Party history. Bennett's supporters came to the nominating session Thursday morning quite certain of victory and rudely eager to get it over with. They listened with noisy indifference to the report on resolutions by Lieutenant-Governor Charles Poletti, following with shouts of "We want Bennett!" Thereafter every speaker for Mead, including Governor Lehman, was heckled and jeered. References to Roosevelt, which had been applauded perfunctorily in the preceding session, were booed. Special Federal Prosecutor Oscar Ewing, who declared that he was "fortified" in his support of Mead by the fact that Roosevelt had declared for him, was booed so insistently that he could not be heard.

The convention majority was unimpressed by the knowledge that Bennett would not have the support of the American Labor Party, which provided Lehman with his margin of victory in the last election. Many delegates were intensely bitter at the A.L.P.'s attempt to influence their choice of a candidate, and unprintable comments on the laborites were heard on all sides in the lobby. The convention received in silence several indirect references to labor support. Representative William Byrne of Albany, the one person who openly urged Mead's nomination on the ground that he would have Labor Party backing, was interrupted so frequently that he required a half-hour to complete a five-minute speech.

Bennett's victory by 623 votes to 393 caused wild enthusiasm among his delegates, but one Tammany leader caustically observed that they were "cheering their own funeral." "They've just thrown 400,000 labor votes out of the window," he said. Several delegates who had been bludgeoned into supporting Bennett by Boss Frank Kelly of Brooklyn were equally pessimistic. One of them said disgustedly, "Farley may be smart, but it doesn't take much brains to pick a loser."

Farley's insistence on Bennett was plainly bad political strategy, inexplicable except in terms of his desire to humiliate the President. The Mead forces, taking their lead from the White House, had offered to accept any "compromise" candidate suggested by Farley and approved by Kelly. They pointed out that both Roosevelt and Lehman had indicated they would not support Bennett. But Farley would not budge. Toward the end it seemed that Bennett's chief virtue, aside from the fact that he was born in Brooklyn, was that he was the one person whom the President had openly opposed.

Actually the Bennett nomination was the President's own fault. Farley was able to name the next Democratic gubernatorial candidate only because Roosevelt failed to commit himself to Senator Mead's candidacy until it was too late. The President, according to one Brooklyn leader, "could have nominated Jim Mead or Joe Doakes if he had spoken soon enough. But he sat on the fence until too many county leaders were sewed up."

As it was, Farley dominated the proceedings. He dictated the nomination, over the courageous but futile opposition of Lehman and Wagner, and in every way was the hero of the sweaty, boisterous convention at the Hotel St. George in Brooklyn. He sat on the platform, pink and smiling, while the crowd heckled New Deal speakers. That the most violent heckling came from questionable elements did not detract from his pleasure.

His triumph, however, is destined to be brief. The estrangement of the A.L.P., which has since named its own candidate, and the bitter disunity which the convention brought to the Democratic Party itself, appear to guarantee the election of a Republican governor in New York for the first time in twenty-two years. The only hopeful aspect of such an eventuality is that Bennett's defeat would probably break Farley's hold on the New York Democratic organization, thus thwarting his ambition to lead a solid New York bloc against the New Deal in the national Democratic convention of 1944.

Germany's Waning Manpower

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

AS GERMANY stands on the threshold of the fourth year of war, its high command faces the urgent problem of a shortage in manpower. At the outbreak of World War II Germany had approximately 20 million men in the age classes between 18 and 48. Of this number 1.3 to 1.5 million were in the army and 18 to 19 million in industry. In the first two years of war, that is, until the German assault on the Soviet Union, the strength of the German army fluctuated between a low of 4 and a high of 6.5 million during the decisive weeks of the campaign in France. To maintain this average of 5 million, German industry had to yield to the army about 4 million men.

It was the task of the German economic general staff to replace these 4 million. More than 1 million women were absorbed by production during this period; foreign "volunteer" workers supplied more than 2 million. In addition, 1.5 million war prisoners were put to work. Thus the 4 million men who had gone into the army were more or less replaced. Furthermore, in the course of the second year the industries of the conquered and occupied regions were more and more drawn into the German war economy, and Germany's production expanded.

The war against the Soviet Union fundamentally changed this state of affairs. In the first place, the army sent against the Soviet Union had to be much stronger than that dispatched to France, Belgium, and Holland. The power of the Soviet armies, the tremendously extended fronts, the far-flung supply system necessitated, according to a conservative estimate, a German army of 7 to 8 million. In addition the Third Reich has been forced to maintain occupation armies, numbering between 1 and 2 million. Casualties, including the wounded, are placed by German sources at about 150,000 a month, or 1.8 million a year, a figure probably below the actual losses.

These figures reveal that the German economic general staff was forced to draw another 5 million men from industry in the second and third years of war and to place them at the disposal of the army. In other words, of the 20 million German men in the most productive age classes, between 18 and 48, only half, at best, are still in industry. The others are either in the army or among the dead, wounded, and missing. Since the war in Russia is exacting such a tremendous sacrifice in blood, the 10 million Germans between 18 and 48 who were left to operate the industrial machine must be constantly diminishing. This is the background against which all German reorganization measures must be viewed.

Germany has done everything to raise the number of foreign "volunteer" workers, but its efforts have not been crowned with any impressive success. The majority of Germany's foreign workers were in the Reich before the Russian drive began, and since then their number has risen by less than 750,000. The large number of Russian prisoners taken, especially in the first few months of the campaign, must be used with caution for fear of their "bad influence" on German workers. Aside from agricultural purposes, they have been of limited use. According to all reports, the performance of foreigners and war prisoners lags far behind that of German workers, and the implication is that they fill hardly 20 per cent of the gap created by the loss of 5 million men to the army.

Tremendous efforts have been made to find substitutes at home and to raise the workers' productive capacity. More and more married women are used in industry, if not by the entire day, then at least by the hour. The age limit too has been relaxed: old-age pension recipients have been put to work again; children from ten to fourteen are employed, not only in agriculture, but in industry as well. For men working hours have been substantially increased, to nine, ten, and even twelve hours.

The German economic general staff realizes clearly that the substance of human productive capacity is being drained, and that such extended working hours can be imposed only for a few months, but it starts out from the assumption that if this drain can bring about great military successes in the decisive summer and fall months of 1942, then the health of industrial workers must be risked, just as the lives of soldiers are risked on the battlefield. A sharp decline in production during the winter of 1942 due to the strain of the past spring and summer must likewise be risked.

This increased pressure on the industrial front has become necessary for still another reason. Since the Polish and French campaigns lasted only a few weeks, the German military general staff could grant millions of soldiers furloughs for extended periods of time to work in industry. Afterwards these men were again placed in active service, together with the younger age classes. The Russian campaign has put an end to this procedure. During the summer and fall offensives of 1941, and in the period of last winter's defensive fighting, the situation was so precarious that there was no thought of extended furloughs.

Thus, quite aside from the problems caused by the use of foreign workers, war prisoners, and many newly-employed women, old men, and children, a complete change in the economic structure of the Reich is imperative. The German economic general staff is trying to accomplish just such a transformation through further rationalization and centralization of production.

Here again the situation has changed since the early days of the war. In the first two years the process of concentration of plants had been slowed down in Germany because the economic general staff was then bent on incorporating the industries in the conquered and occupied regions into the German war economy and it knew that any steps toward further concentration at home were bound to be strongly resisted by German private business. It felt able to do without such concentration in any case because in the first phase of the war the procession of military victories was resulting in a steady absorption of Europe into Germany's war economy and thus in a growing production of war material. In the beginning of the Russian war there was little change, for a rapid victory was still taken for granted. It was not until the winter campaign against the Soviet Union, and America's entry into the war, that the Germans realized they would have to reckon with a long-drawn-out war. To avoid a sudden decline in arms production and, on the other hand, to turn over additional troops to the army, the economic general staff has been forced to take further measures toward the rationalization of German industry. Despite resistance, smaller plants have been closed down in large numbers and steps taken to assure greater efficiency of operation.

In a recent article in the Economist, entitled The Latest Gamble, a London writer analyzes the situation:

The chief bottleneck is labor. The labor force of Europe is working beyond capacity. A further intake of women is impossible without greatly extending day nurseries and kindergartens—which themselves swallow up more labor; the temporary demobilization of soldiers to work in war factories has not been possible this winter because of the strongly sustained Russian pressure; to bring in more foreign workers would strain factory discipline to the breaking point—its unsatisfactory state can be inferred from the greatly increased severity of the penalties imposed for absenteeism and slacking. There is only one possibility—to increase the efficiency of the war-industries; but the slack that can be taken in here is probably small, and there is a point at which extra planning from the center and extra directives to industry defeat their objective by destroying flexibility and local initiative. . . .

To rationalize industry further and to introduce a new nationwide drive to root out marginal inefficiency would arouse resentment and opposition in the managerial grades and probably frustrate its own purpose. All these and a host of other dilemmas spring from the fact that the Nazis are trying to make an instrument—in this case the productive capacity of Europe—do more than it can do.

One of the methods designed to concentrate production in plants with the greatest capacity is the new method of regulating prices. Until recently a system of cost-plus-profit prices, by which the German state conceded a level of prices within an elaborate set-up of price controls, guaranteed individual enterprises a market for their products at normal profits. Within that system there was room for the smaller enterprises. But now there has been a marked and growing tendency toward a system of "fixed prices," especially in the field of arms production, a system which works independently of individual costs. It is evident that a system of this kind is bound to lead to the throttling of numerous medium-sized and smaller enterprises.

Reorganization of the German economic structure is being carried out by a group of new appointees. Today a former Gauleiter of Thuringia named Sauckel is responsible for labor supply. A Professor Speer has been made minister for armaments and munition, and one Herr Werlin, the new head of the transport system. Werlin is now personally responsible to Hitler, since along with manpower, transportation is one of the greatest bottlenecks in the German economy.

In the field of railroad transportation the Third Reich was far less prepared for war than Hohenzollern Germany had been on the eve of the first World War. In 1939 the rolling stock was 80,000 pieces less than in 1929, and the bulk of the railroad cars was more than twenty years old. To meet the acute difficulties, a large-scale building program was adopted, calling for the construction of 6,000 locomotives, 10,000 passenger cars, and 112,000 freight cars during the years 1939 to 1942. The work began in June, 1939, but when the war broke out everything stopped. Nazi Germany won in the West, and the booty in rolling stock yielded approximately as much as the four-year building program had provided for. The relief lasted until the war against the Soviet Union began to drag along at ever-increasing distances from German industrial centers.

Internal difficulties in Germany have clearly multiplied during the second and third years of war. The manpower problem cannot be completely solved; per capita labor output can be increased only up to a point without producing grave consequences. Nevertheless, any analysis of Germany's economic problems which ignores comparable difficulties facing other belligerents can lead to fatal and false conclusions. There is evidence that Soviet Russia has suffered far more severely than Germany; that proportionately, therefore, Germany's position in Europe has not deteriorated. On the contrary, the danger exists that it has grown even stronger. Russia has suffered losses in manpower much greater than those of the Germans and has probably given up close to half of its industries. Regardless of whether, or to what extent, Germany can utilize the industrial regions it has captured, the fact remains that Soviet Russia no longer has them.

In World War I Germany was able to concentrate about 80 per cent of its armies on the Western Front and required only 20 per cent on the Eastern Front. This distribution was possible because German industry out-produced the Russian many times over. Since then the picture has basically changed. Soviet Russia gradually caught up with Germany's industrial production, and also with its arms production. This is why, after its victories in the West, Germany had to throw 80 instead of 20 per cent of its armies against the Soviet Union and yet was unable to win a complete victory. If Germany manages, however, to seize the oil of the Caucasus, to cut the Russian forces in the Northern and Central Fronts from those in the South, then even though the Red Army may still remain in the field, the Nazis could withdraw millions from the Eastern Front and concentrate them at the various potential invasion spots of Europe.

Any discussion of the second front must take into account this possibility. We have been asking too many questions and talking too much about the tonnage, troops, planes, and tanks available for opening a second front. True, month by month, our resources increase. But the main point is this: Nazi Germany is no static enemy. With a major military success on the Russian front it may find 50 per cent of its forces, or even 30 per cent, adequate for Eastern operations, instead of the 80 now required. Millions of German soldiers would then be released for other theaters of war.

To be sure, a second front is a risk, but failure to create it may be by far the greater risk.

France's Turncoat Artists

BY MINNA LEDERMAN

SOME weeks ago the New York Times ran a picture of Mistinguette, Parisian music-hall star of lo these many years, taken arm-in-arm with Georges Carpentier and Max Schmeling. Giving her Nazi companion the glad eye and a toothy smile, she was valiantly making publicity for Franco-German Kultur. As a scene in conquered territory it was brutally effective. As a symbol of the new cultural tie it was an understatement, since that front now extends far beyond the level of the night club and the sports arena. When distinguished men of arts and letters lend their prestige to the New Order, "collaboration" assumes a more profound dimension, and Paris, to whose great traditions all the Western world is in debt, takes on the aspect of a city captive not only in body but in heart and mind as well.

The recent visit to Germany of several well-known French painters and sculptors has by its very irony been an extraordinary tribute to Hitler. During the furious years of the war on Kulturbolshevismus, the School of Paris was one of his favorite whipping boys. Cubism, surrealism, even impressionism were branded as "excrescences of lunatics or degenerates." In 1938, after the Munich show of "decadent art," the canvasses of Picasso, Van Gogh, Matisse, Laurencin, Gris, Braque, Derain, Vlaminck, even Pissarro, Gauguin, and Cézanne were stripped from the German museums. But when Hitler beckoned, only a few months ago, five painters—André Derain, Maurice de Vlaminck, Dunoyer de Segonzac, Kees van Dongen (Dutch by birth but French by long residence), and Othon Friesz—and the famous sculptor Charles Despiau, left Paris to make a specially conducted Studienreise through the Third Reich. Unmentioned of course was the expulsion of works by Vlaminck and Derain (Derain's Valley of the Lot at Vers was salvaged in 1939 by New York's Museum of Modern Art). After visiting a number of cities, the group wound up in Berlin and posed for pictures to be distributed all over Europe with captions about Franco-German cultural ties.

Not more than six weeks old is a letter from Banyuls, in southern France, which reports the departure for Paris by the sculptor Aristide Maillol, on the first leg of a similar journey to Berlin. Maillol is of course no modern; his serene "healthy" nudes have long been popular in the Reich. But since he is now over eighty and has been living and working peacefully in his own home in the comparative security of the unoccupied region, news of his decision comes as a shock.

Shortly before the tour of the French artists, the Germans staged a traveling musical show. Composer Florent Schmitt, his seventy-two years giving him the prestige of a dean, and two Swiss musicians whose careers are closely associated with France—Arthur Honegger, composer of the Group of Six, and Robert Bernard, editor of the new, German-authorized, Parisian review L'Information Musicale—led a body of respectable publishers and academy chiefs to a Mozart festival in Vienna, where they were welcomed as guests of Richard Strauss at a grand reception in honor, again, of Franco-German cultural relations.

Collaboration, however, is not all parties and junkets. Long before the war, France had its own fascist intellectuals: Abel Bonnard, the essayist, Alphonse de Chateaubriant, whose La Gerbe des Forces saluted Hitler at the time of Munich, Jacques Chardonne, novelist and publisher, and Alfred Fabre-Luce. (For such figures there is no counterpart either in the United States, where the openly fascist press is demagogic and illiterate, or in Britain where, if more aristocratic, it has been exclusively political.) Convinced, didactic, learned, elegant, these Frenchmen now dominate the Parisian world of letters. Around them and Drieu la Rochelle, who has transformed the once great Nouvelle Revue Française into a medium for every dubious and reactionary opinion, revolve all the lesser writers whose sympathies have long been suspect, and many an aspiring new careerist who sees a future where none was offered before. As leaders, they supply the spinal column to a policy that might otherwise be purely opportunist and fluid. They give the New Order its Parisian accent.

The Germans, too, make a major contribution to this front. They have rigged up a stage-set of "Paris-as-usual" in the midst of a France despoiled by war which is a triumph of Nazi advertising techniques. Forty houses of the haute couture are now subsidized so that they may operate freely, unrestrained by the drastic textile rations imposed elsewhere. This supplies the necessary "tone" for visiting Nazi big-wigs, and for the local bankers and big motor and steel men, collaborationists from way back. Hostesses for the Franco-German set are easily flushed from cover. The Marquise de Polignac (of the champagne family that once employed Ribbentrop) and the Comtesse de Noailles have reopened their salons. Heavy culture jobs are awarded to discreet scholars and artists. The distinguished painter, Georges Braque, becomes director of Les Gobelins. The opera, going full blast, enjoys the enthusiastic services of the French Wagnerian star, Germaine Lubin, whose Mercedes limousines are conspicuous on the not very crowded boulevards. Serge Lifar, Diaghilev's famous legacy to the ballet, is once more packing them in. The pianist Henri Février plays for the troops of occupation. Government-regulated bookshops display the novels of Louis Ferdinand Céline in gaudy covers. Glamor girls and glamor boys are all over the place, when they are not in Berlin: Corinne Luchaire, daughter of the newly-made publisher and already the past amie of the Nazi ambassador, Otto Abetz; Danielle Darrieux (once of Hollywood), Yvonne Printemps, Sascha Guitry, Pierre Fresnay, Raimu (of "The Baker's Wife"). Harry Bauer who accepted an invitation to Berlin was imprisoned there on discovery of his non-Aryan ancestry; Maurice Chevalier, not a collaborationist but ardent for Pétain, at last report, refused to go and now confines his tours to unoccupied France. And with a poetic sense of timing, Jean Cocteau, perennial Ward McAllister of Paris social-artistic life, bobs up again, a piece for Chateaubriant's new magazine La Gerbe in one hand and in the other the key to his old night club, Le Boeuf sur le Toit.

Paris even has Picasso, which is perhaps Hitler's shrewdest touch. By every expectation Picasso should have been turned over to Franco with other Spanish anti-fascists caught in France after the Civil War. His political sympathies are irrevocably on record in the mural, "Guernica," which is a piece of surrealism to boot. But as a prisoner of war Picasso would be an international embarrassment both to Spain and Germany. Living unmolested in the French capital, on the other hand, he is a demonstration to all the world of the new Nazi tolerance and sophistication. Thus he visits his old cafés, is courted by Abetz himself, and sees his pictures going, at prices fabulously beyond their pre-war level, to the new German "tourists" who buy French paintings as an investment against possible inflation at home.

"The season is excellent," wrote Georges Auric, a composer of Cocteau's circle, in last year's Nouvelle Revue Française. His only regret was the monotony of musical programs, the absence of new works. But, as the emigré composer, Arthur Lourié, pointed out, since that complaint has been fashionable for many a year, "one gets the impression that 'nothing' has happened except that the Germans are there!"

This noisy parody of yesterday's world is of course no faithful mirror of contemporary French culture. It does not even reflect Vichy's contribution to the New Order. Grouped around Pétain, whose "official" magazine is appropriately the ancient Revue des Deux Mondes, are Academicians like André Chaumeix and Henri Bordeaux, the famous pianist Alfred Cortot, now attached to the Department of Education—not one of them a day under sixty-five—and Henri Massis, of the Revue Universelle. Vichy is more "correct" than Paris (unlike Février, for instance, Cortot will not play for the German army) and on the whole far duller; the volatile novelist Paul Morand and some of the younger men attached to Radio Vichy—Hugues Panassié (of Le Jazz Hot) and a few members of La Jeune France are rare exceptions.

Many of the most impressive of France's intellectual leaders live outside the orbit of the capital and have drawn away from Vichy. André Gide on the Riviera conducts a subtle rear-guard action against Paris. Paul Valéry is philosophically remote at Montpellier. Paul Claudel, no lover of the pre-war order, after paying his respects to Pétain, has publicly protested some of Vichy's more fascist decrees and retired to live at Brangués (Isère). André Malraux, at work on a new novel, remains obscurely in the south, and so too does Louis Aragon, whose poetry is now being translated and published in the United States. Francis Poulenc, another composer of Les Six, lives and works in Marseilles. Henri Matisse, Pierre Bonnard, and Raoul Dufy continue to paint in the unoccupied zone, despite the prevailing shortage of pigment and canvas. Under the conditions of military conquest, most of these men have been rendered politically inarticulate. Even more effectively silenced are two brilliant writers in the occupied region—Georges Duhamel and Francis Mauriac.

In America the number of famous personages coming from France grows steadily larger. Musicians here now include the composers Igor Stravinsky and Darius Milhaud and the great harpsichordist Wanda Landowska. Among the writers are the Catholic leader Jacques Maritain, the surrealist poet André Breton, the novelists Jules Romains, Antoine de Saint-Exupéry, André Maurois, and the playwright Henri Bernstein. The artists include Fernand Léger, Yves Tanguy, Ossip Zadkine, André Masson, Marc Chagall, Pavel Tchelichew, Eugène Berman, Marcel Duchamps, and the sculptor Jacques Lipchitz. Among the cinema lights are the directors René Clair, Jean Renoir, Jean Benoit-Lévy, and Henry Diamant-Berger, and the actors Michèle Morgan and Jean Gabin. There is also the emigré press, notably Geneviève Tabouis's paper Pour La Victoire, for which the ex-deputy, Henri de Kerillis writes his weekly political essay, and La Voix de France, of which Henri Torres, the famous lawyer, has just been made editor. In Buenos Aires, Roger Caillois has founded a magazine-in-exile, Lettres Françaises. (Jean Paulhan, former editor of the N. R. F., was imprisoned by Abetz after the armistice and is now marooned in Paris.)

This is an impressive assembly of the great, the near great, the talented, the skilful. But it is in no sense a fighting front coordinated in opposition to the Franco-German line. For almost ten years artists and intellectuals in exile have borne witness against fascist doctrine, their very presence being in itself a powerful indictment. But the enormous prestige of distinguished Frenchmen living beyond their own borders has not yet been fully exploited against the order that excludes them.

America and, to some extent, Britain have greatly underestimated the influence of such figures in the strategy of psychological warfare. The Germans, on the contrary, have shown complete mastery in manipulating this power. All up and down Europe, in conquered and even in enemy territory, they have felt out the soft spots. Though the Netherlands government is in exile, Willem Mengelberg makes regular visits to Germany, conducts orchestras in Berlin and Munich, takes part in political conferences. Kirsten Flagstad, leaving America after many years to rejoin her husband, now a member of Quisling's government in Oslo, is routed through Germany by the helpful Nazis, and stops off in Berlin to make a widely broadcast speech of appreciation. P. G. Wodehouse, a prisoner of war, finds himself at the Adlon and obligingly goes on the air to tell millions in Britain and America how comfortable is life in a German hotel.

To these artistic-political maneuvers American reaction has been curiously antipathetic. Stories about European artists who play the Nazi game, even those with a large popular following here, are inadequately treated in the press. There is a tendency to write off the political activities of celebrities as casual and irresponsible, something it is more sporting to forget than to remember. Public opinion, however, can be aroused in this field as in any other. It can be made articulate and conveyed as a warning, by radio, underground press, or any other of our elaborate propaganda mechanisms. A campaign to enlighten France, traditionally sensitive to American reaction—and to the American market—would have its own realism. Even in Paris today, among men of arts and letters, there must be many not yet completely indifferent to their prestige beyond the German sphere of Europe, and not without some concern for their "historical position." To reach the mind of France is an effort worth making for more than immediate reasons. The obliteration of Paris as a focal center of culture and humane civilization would be an irreparable loss, not only to France but to the whole post-war world.

"Reports trickling through from neutral sources say it was quite a raid."

A British View on India

BY NORMAN ANGELL

[The two past issues of The Nation carried articles by Louis Fischer strongly supporting the position of the Congress Party in the tragic political struggle now proceeding in India. The following statement is a dissent written from a British point of view by a distinguished liberal who, like Mr. Fischer, is a contributing editor of The Nation.]

WHEN, somewhat over two years ago, the government of France surrendered, retired to Vichy, and abandoned the cause of the Allies, it is very doubtful whether the elderly and religious Pétain or the less elderly but even more religious Weygand, or, in fact, most of the Vichy men, felt, or would have admitted for a moment that they were, guilty of treachery, either to their country or to mankind. They were, by all accounts, honestly convinced—as were so many in other countries, including the United States—that Britain would fall within a matter of weeks, or at most months, and that for France to make a stand in Africa, using that territory and the French navy for further resistance, would be merely to expose the French people to fruitless torments, and to aggravate the terms they would finally have to accept.

The more nationalist of the men about Pétain doubtless argued that their first duty was to France; that they had no obligation, indeed no right, to consider what might be the effect of surrender upon the fate of Britain or of other nations, much as another high-minded nationalist, Mr. De Valera, has consistently argued since the war started that however perilous to the allied cause the battle of the Atlantic may become, Eire should do nothing to help win it by the lease of bases unless and until it is allowed to incorporate the recalcitrant Protestant North into the Catholic South. Such is the normal nationalist scale of values, such is Mr. De Valera's. No one has ever doubted the moral rectitude, the saintliness, of this champion of Irish rights.

When Pétain opened negotiations with Hitler, the French people may have wanted to continue resistance. But it made no difference. For, despite their long tradition of self-government, freedom, republicanism, and revolutionary action, the people were at that moment helpless in the hands of a tiny clique at the center, a few politicians who held the powers of government. It was this political collapse, the political impotence of the French people, which brought about military surrender—the refusal to continue the war from Africa—a fact which, just previous to surrender, Churchill realized. To forestall what he saw coming, he offered France a solemn Act of Union with Britain, feeling that if the two governments could be merged, the influence of the British policy of continued resistance might carry the French section of the common government along.

That offer of course came too late. Suppose it had come earlier, at the beginning of the war, and had been accepted. We can say with unqualified certainty that many Frenchmen would have bitterly resented it. Anglophobia has always been a weapon of certain political groups in France. Even if the Union had been achieved we should have had strong demands, as soon as things went badly, for its dissolution, as necessary for the strengthening of French morale; so that the French could "once more fight for their own country."

Britain would then have been presented with a very pretty political and moral problem, an exceedingly difficult choice of military risks. It would have been compelled either to insist upon retention of existing ties, even against the weight of (possibly) majority opinion in France; or to dissolve the new Union with the risk of there occurring precisely what has occurred.

It is the kind of dilemma which will present itself under very varying forms, but embodying the same fundamental choice, again and again as the war goes on over the world; particularly perhaps in the Near and Middle East. Indeed it has already presented itself in a relatively mild form in Iran, Iraq, Syria, and Egypt. It is the kind of situation now confronting us in a tragic and perilous form in India.

The main dispute there is on the matter of timing. When should political changes affecting every function of government be instituted? During war, or after? That the British will in any case leave India at no distant date, continuing there the process of de-imperialization already carried out in the Dominions, no informed Indian or Briton really doubts; and if there were doubts, complete guarantees on that score by the governments of the United Nations could be given. Is the increased tempo of agitation due precisely to the fact that both of the main Indian communities are now fully convinced that Britain will most certainly leave India, and that each side desires to use the special powers of war to crystallize the particular form of constitution it desires; or to prevent the other side from doing the same?

It serves no purpose to discuss this problem in terms simply of Mr. Gandhi's sincerity. His sincerity, his saintliness are not in question. Indeed, it is precisely his sincerity and his saintliness, his fanaticism, if you will, that is so big a part of the problem.

Here is a leader who sways millions, and who for most of his long life has urged passionately the effectiveness of pacifism, of non-violence as the best means of defense; who, as late as the beginning of this month, defended the proposal (which, he said, would be one of the first acts of a free Indian government) to send a mission to Japan and Germany to reason with the government of those states. To recall this is not to "smear" Gandhi; it is, on the contrary, to assume the deep sincerity of the convictions he has professed throughout his life, convictions which must, precisely because of their depth, affect—even though it be unconsciously—the course of his policy, and consequently the policy of the party he dominates.

Gandhi is ready, we are told, to give the military a free hand. But war is primarily a political act, in the sense that the decision to begin it or end it, is made, not by the soldiers but by governments, by politicians, who control the means of war—the voting of the necessary funds, their collection, the passing, or extension, of selective service acts, the mobilization of material, the whole complexity of civil functions.

The Congress demand is that in the midst of a world war in which the fate of some two score nations and all hope of democracy anywhere is at stake, all powers of government in the vast Indian sub-continent be handed over to a single party, dominated by a mystic, hypnotic, and incalculable personality, subject to changing moods.

No one with any knowledge of Indians can doubt the genuineness (however one may question the reasonableness) of Moslem fears of any form of constitution or government which threatens to crystallize Hindu domination. It no more meets the Moslem case to offer the Moslems guarantees within a state predominantly Hindu, than it met the Irish case to offer guarantees within a state predominantly British. The Irish could have complete equality with Englishmen within a British state. They did not ask for equality; they asked for separateness, independence, on the ground that they made a separate corporate body, a nation. Moslems and others, far more distant from Hindus than Irish are from English, or Catholic from Protestant, make similar claims with respect to Hindus. Jinnah has just declared that Moslem India would regard it as a gross betrayal of Moslem rights and a breach of faith with Moslem India for Britain to accede to the Congress demands. A Holy War against Britain in India, even though it be for having yielded to Hindu demands, would help the Axis to light fires throughout the Moslem world.

The question is not whether the misgivings are one hundred per cent justified, but whether we shall get anywhere by ignoring them, either with the British or the Moslems. Efforts now should be directed toward (1) full negotiation between the Moslem League and the Congress Party; (2) between the British and both Indian groups; (3) release of Gandhi and other Congress leaders on their undertaking to cease sabotage of the war effort through deliberate paralysis of industry and transport (not to exact this would be militarily a crime); (4) securing American and United Nations guarantees for the promise of post-war independence; with, possibly, but more cautiously, (5) the setting up of a United Nations Political Council or Commission whose functions would be conciliatory, or arbitral, to facilitate the largest measure of wartime independence compatible with the effective prosecution of the struggle; this last condition to be the sine qua non of any change to be made during the war.

In the Wind

SAMUEL PETTENGILL, the ex-Congressman from Indiana who was recently appointed chairman of the Republican Finance Committee, is not only a former member of America First but is today chairman of the League for Constitutional Government, which is as reactionary in domestic affairs as America First was in foreign affairs. Pettengill's appointment was the second of its kind made by Joseph W. Martin; last year Martin appointed Clarence Buddington Kelland, another America Firster, as publicity director of the Republican National Committee.

DESPITE ALL THE TALK of impending labor unity, the C.I.O. moved into its new Washington headquarters on August 22.

SINCE THE NAZIS have adopted and neutralized the V-for-Victory campaign in occupied Europe, anti-fascists have been using the letter F, which stands for Frieden—peace. According to current reports, the campaign has met with some success, particularly in Germany.

IN AN INTERVIEW with a Hearst reporter, Senator Taft of Ohio listed three phases of recent government activity which he views with alarm. They are, 1) the indictment of twenty-eight individuals on sedition charges; 2) the investigation of the Chicago Tribune; 3) the speeches of Archibald MacLeish.

AT THE CONVENTION of the United Auto Workers, the communists argued in committee against the union's ban on Nazis, fascists, and communists, which was inserted in the Constitution last year. However, the constitutional committee held its ground, and the communists quickly retreated. The issue never came to the floor.

A GOOD MANY Russian actors who left the country in 1917 are now fighting for the role of Stalin in the movie version of Mission to Moscow. But, according to Variety, the part will probably go to an American.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.
—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

Silone's Catacombs

THE SEED BENEATH THE SNOW. By Ignazio Silone.
Harper and Brothers. $2.75.

BREAD AND WINE" was the Exile's return. Pietro Spina had fled back to Italy, in escape from the nightmare of émigré-life, from the hallucinations of the theorizers with their paradigmatic revolutions. Back in his country, he discovered that party lines, underground networks below, and slogans from above, had very little to do with the day-by-day calvary of an Abruzzan village; but he also found that his hunger for truth and his kinship for "the insulted and the injured" converged to the same point as the libertarian instincts of an old parish-priest, and the chaste boldness of an intensely religious girl. The puzzling last chapter of that book described a flight into the mountains, a blind man's buff between fascist police, the girl, and Pietro, almost dying but still undefeated.

Silone's new novel resumes the tale where it left off, but is more than a sequel. It is an attempt to deepen the meaning of Pietro's road to Damascus and point toward a solution. The plot is deliberately thin. As in the other book, Silone's dual approach combines felicitously the grotesque and the pathetic. On one side is a mural of the villagers, some of whom, like Zia Eufemia, are more bitterly picturesque than even their crudest prototypes in Fontamara's gallery. Silone's chief target is the eloquent, pushing village-lawyer—a type that has plagued Italy immemorially. Man of petty affairs, fixer, and self-appointed spokesman of whatever ideology happens to be in power, now Spanish Jesuitism, now the "immortal principles of 1789," now the dictatorship of the proletariat—Silone shows him in his latest incarnation, fornicating with the gospel of Rosenberg and Goebbels.

On the other side, there are the positive characters. Donna Maria Vincenza, Pietro's grandmother, tries to secure him an official permit to "live"; but vigorous Christian that she is, she is soon convinced that the whitewashing would not be worth the degradation of begging for it. The Catholic Signora in her eighties and her prodigal grandson join together in a calm refusal to compromise with Mammon or Caesar. Pietro leaves his grandmother's home for a Tolstoyan refuge in a stable, with Simone-the-Polecat, a fellow-rebel, and Infante, a deaf-mute peasant and the village idiot. They find a new life in friendship and simplicity. They don't fight fascism any more, they ignore it. Here is the first of the new and joyous catacombs of Italy. Patiently and cheerfully, Pietro teaches Infante a few words: pane, compagno, letizia. They stammer and respell together the small dictionary of man's brotherhood. They call on forgotten acquaintances throughout the region, not to discuss politics but to reaffirm human ties. Pietro feels more responsible for Infante than for a child of his flesh. Infante has a father, who, having abandoned him decades before to look for work in America, now reappears, almost penniless but repentant.

Infante dislikes him and fears that he may separate him from Pietro and Simone. One morning, on entering a shelter, Pietro discovers that Infante has killed his father—nobody could say exactly why. But when the police come, Pietro declares: "I killed him." He is led to jail.

What is the seed then that lies beneath the snow? What is ripening under the frozen fascist earth? Toward the end, partially against the author's will, the novel turns symbolic. The stable with its ass is indeed a symbol, and a quite evangelic one. Liberation from fascism, Silone seems to imply, has very little to do with politics, and even less with resounding words. It is a deaf-mute covenant between simple friends, against a society more unreal even than oppressive. And against the church too, but in a very Christian way. It is indeed a revolutionary Christianity, hiding itself again in catacombs.

Why does Pietro go to jail in the place of Infante? Because salvation is not in new laws, but in a new pact of friendship; and in friendship the stronger is always responsible for the weaker, the articulate for the inarticulate, the intellectual for the proletarian, whatever the latter may do. And the only way to root out people's crimes is to share—or even take entirely upon oneself—their consequences.

"All right," said a friend to whom I had been giving my interpretation of "The Seed Beneath the Snow," "but what about its art? Is it a great novel?" I really wouldn't know. To me it is so appalling a document of what Italy's nondescript "underground" is slowly and mysteriously aiming at, that I am unable to judge it as a novel from a purely formal point of view. I wouldn't be surprised if some good critic called it dull, or naive, or incoherent. To me it reads like a letter from friends in distress and hope.

Strange things are happening to Europe. Our movie-goers are already familiar with streamlined commandos and their auxiliaries on the Continent; our official blue-printers for day after tomorrow are dreaming of antediluvian laissez faire, or neatly interlocking new Leagues; but meanwhile Europe, disregarding these versions of herself, is going her own way. The new wind is stirring in Italy, more, I guess, than anywhere else. There fascism will be twenty years old this fall; which made Borgese remind us the other day that a dog, at twenty, has exceeded his proper term of life. It is literally a new seed that is ripening abroad. To define it hurriedly is to betray it. The only thing one can say is that of the three holy words, neither Anglo-Saxon liberty nor Soviet equality is first: the accent is on fraternity.

Like Italy's future, Silone's novel is an unknown quantity. Perhaps it will take on more shape and weight with the coming events. Today's day-dream may be hailed tomorrow as a prophecy or a masterpiece.

PAOLO MILANO

P. S. I cannot help adding a few words about the book's jacket, which is touchingly true to the title in a triumph of bad taste. There is a tree, green on the top, in spite of a Hollywoodian snowfall, and there is the seed, botanically

August 29, 1942 faithful to the point of looking like an acorn—or a capsule of explosive. Silone, however, is more likely to get angry at the sensational statement in the biographical notice that he was born "of an aristocratic Italian family."

Victory by Air

THE COMING BATTLE OF GERMANY. By William B. Ziff. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. $2.50.

GLOBAL WAR: AN ATLAS OF WORLD STRATEGY. By Edgar Ansel Mowrer and Marthe Rajchman. William Morrow and Company. $1.

EVER since the first World War theorists in all countries have insisted that the latent striking force of the air arm is so great that it ought to become the principal weapon. The Italian Douhet, for example, came to regard the land army as a mere protective garrison for the air ports. As in Douhet's case, the idea was not always well adapted to the capacities of the theorist's country. But since the fall of France there has risen in Britain a small but competent school of thought which urges that whatever may be the truth about the revolutionary potential of air power in general, the systematic demolition of Germany by air bombardment is the only form of warfare left available to Britain. It is noteworthy that Lieutenant Colonel Garsia, the most persistent advocate of this idea in Britain, did not change his opinion when Russia's entry into the war readjusted the balance of land forces. The American Mr. Ziff who, unlike Garsia, is an aviation expert, does not consider that his country's belligerence has in the least altered the case. Mr. Ziff, one feels, would make out a powerful and persuasive brief for considering all other arms as adjuncts whatever the strategic and tactical problems confronting the United Nations. As it is, however, he follows both lines of argument. The airplane has revolutionized war, he says; in any case, he adds, in our present predicament what else can we do but put our trust in planes? We cannot expect to land so large and good a force on the continent that victory might appear certain. Only when industrial Germany has been destroyed and her army and her people partially demoralized can we hope to do that. Let us make up our minds once and for all then, Mr. Ziff demands, and concentrate upon the air force, for not even the United States can build so vast a fleet of planes and at the same time equip a land army of the magnitude apparently contemplated.

Whatever one may decide, "The Coming Battle of Germany" is a virtuoso performance in advocacy. Its propositions are fundamental and clearly stated, they are embodied in brilliantly worded and lucid trains of thought and the conclusions reached are positive and final for the author's thinking. The result is a book one can stand up to and reckon with, in which there is no trace of querulousness, humbug, or vagueness.

Caution is sometimes absent, too. It is, one may remark, the Air Enthusiast rather than the Strategist in Mr. Ziff who provides the pungency of style and the fervor of conviction. It is the Air Enthusiast who, noting that a four-month turn-round is required by a ten-knot freighter in

"It is not too late to learn the lesson that Constance Rourke's life and work taught. For it is only by drawing on the roots of American culture that we shall gather the toughness and courage and self-confidence that will enable us to live through the menacing days that lie ahead."
—LEWIS MUMFORD,
The Saturday Review

Constance Rourke

THE ROOTS OF AMERICAN CULTURE

Edited and with a Preface by VAN WYCK BROOKS, $3.00

THE JUST AND THE UNJUST

"Has a theme as big as the main issue of World War II . . . An image of democracy, something far more effective and heartening than a hundred hortatory novels."
—John Chamberlain

JAMES GOULD COZZENS

$2.50

DOLLAR COTTON

A novel of the Mississippi Delta by the author of "MEN WORKING."

$2.50

JOHN FAULKNER

A new weapon from Russia The Film Sense by EISENSTEIN

Authorized translation by JAY LEYDA
Illustrated, $3.00

"Eisenstein's penetrating comments have the power to make the motion-picture seem no longer the merely entertaining product of a lot of celebrities in Hollywood but one of the most tempting, most fruitful ways of influencing men and of communicating thoughts and sensations."

—IRIS BARRY,
N. Y. Herald Tribune

HARCOURT, BRACE & CO.
383 Madison Avenue, N. Y.

servicing a depot in the Red Sea, adds that a modern cargo plane, which can carry 20 tons, "could easily make seventy trips a year . . . delivering 140,000 tons of cargo." The Air Enthusiast can lick ten, it would seem, or ten times ten. The Strategist, on the other hand, is a level-headed fellow with a powerful conception. Sometimes he opens a really big window on the theater of war.

As long as the Soviet giant existed he [Hitler] did not dare expand all his energies in the construction of an unfettered air fleet which could attack Britain frontally. . . . By wrecking the potential menace of the Soviet Army the Nazi leader hoped he could free himself from the tyranny of voracious land establishments . . . so as to be able to concentrate his efforts on the creation of that unlimited [air] power he needs to bring the British to their knees. . . . If and when the Nazis beat their Muscovite adversaries down, we may prepare to be shocked by the sudden springing of a gigantic air fleet which will sweep all before it and will allow us no further time for recuperation.

German reconnaissance flights, one may note, have been far more numerous this year than last while bombing operations have not been heavy. This at least suggests that the German Air Intelligence is preparing its own scheme of destruction for Britain. Therefore, on any theoretical basis, we must rush every available plane into the British base and step up the air offensive now. At this point, the reviewer would point out that if the reader belongs to the orthodox Second Front Now School he may find a powerful argument in Mr. Ziff's conception. He might argue that if the Soviet collapses the new Luftwaffe will be able to blast every factory and every man-Jack off the British deck. Only a land invasion, he might continue, can prevent Hitler from building that air power. Mr. Ziff, of course, would meet the danger by stepping up the rate of bombing at once. As for production he would have Britain concentrate on fighters and America on heavy bombers which do not need surface portage to the Isles. That, one may remark, is an idea that the two countries have yet to agree about. The British, with a strategical problem quite different from that which dictated the type of American planes, are not prepared to accept American models exclusively.

If Mr. Ziff had his way our other fronts would be held defensively until Germany collapsed. Strategy and tactics as hitherto understood would be reduced to a comparatively unimportant study. In that case Mr. Mowrer's and Miss Rajchman's excellent book would not need to be written. As it is, however, rarely has the amateur war student been offered such honest-to-God value. What the authors set out to do is first to describe exactly what moves are dictated to or made possible for each country by its fundamental geographical features and then to show the relation between the various fields of battle. The simplicity of the ways of war rather than their complexity is what emerges.

Short as the book is, it really does explain the logic behind about nine-tenths of the past and present action of the war. You will not remain indifferent to the Japanese occupation of islands in the Aleutian Archipelago if you will look at Miss Rajchman's map. You will not consider the occupation of Iceland and Greenland as mere political devices, as the isolationists once told us they were, if you will forget maps drawn upon plane projections and study the Arctic as here represented. "Global War" is a brief introduction to a subject that can only be studied in extenso in the history of all previous wars. But the layman who is prepared to straighten out a few confessed contradictions will find in this book all the geo-strategical knowledge he will need. It is all the more a pleasure to recommend "Global Strategy" because the basic simplicity of its maps makes it impossible that the book should date.

RALPH BATES

Postscript

AMONG his other laudable activities, Carey McWilliams finds time to read articles on poetry, including my own series of remarks in these columns several weeks ago. I am thankful to him for calling my attention to the work done by Alan Swallow in Albuquerque, New Mexico. The Swallow pamphlets are issued in limited editions of 200 copies, priced at 25 cents each, attractively made, with excellent typography and paper. They include "Verse, 1931-38" by Clayton Stafford, "The Well" by Barbara Gibbs, and "Morning Rise, and Other Poems" by Lincoln Fitzell. Except for the title poem in Mr. Fitzell's collection, a certain sameness about this verse suggests a school guided and formed by an impressive master of apprentices. Perhaps the clue is to be found in the verses which Mr. Stafford entitled A Word to Critics. Firm metrics and formal precision are good things, but one would like to find, in younger writers especially, a little more passionate assertion of individuality. Miss Gibbs includes, in addition to her own work, three translations from Valéry; the second of these, The Spinner, is particularly fine.

Mr. Fitzell is also represented by a longer collection, "In Plato's Garden." This book, 97 pages, is priced at $1; one would like to see more books of poetry as good-looking as this available for the same price. Mr. Fitzell has the indorsement of Yvor Winters, to whom he seems "surely one of the memorable poets of our time"; and in turn Mr. Fitzell considers "the Fugitive group of poets and critics, and the group headed by Yvor Winters as most fruitful of good work in this country." This reviewer's enthusiasm is somewhat less, but he is willing enough to accept the statement as a definition of limitations—his own or somebody else's. Mr. Fitzell's poetry seems to me frail, cold, and elegant, with such emphasis on elegance that in time one comes to suspect even the apparent inelegancies—the split infinitives, the false rhymes, the wrenched accents, the excessive declarations—of being manifestations, probably, of super-finesse. Perhaps one can dwell too long in Plato's garden, admire too much the flawless marble, the face without storm or "sign of beauty, terror, or of pain."

Bound in paper, for the same price as Mr. Fitzell's book, is a pamphlet by Richard Lake called "Fool's Fable"; a similarly bound collection, "Score for This Watch," by James Franklin Lewis, costs 50 cents. As between the two, Mr. Lake is the better buy.

Mr. Swallow has also published a 72-page, 50-cent pamphlet edition of three Spanish-American poets. These are Carlos Pellicer (Mexico), Pablo Neruda (Chile), and Jorge Carrera Andrade (Venezuela). The translators are Mary and C. V. Wicker, Joseph Leonard Grucci, and Lloyd Mallan. A brief account of each poet's life and work is given, and the translations do not sound too much like something you have to read when you are correcting homework. Neruda's political phase might have been more fully presented, but Hispanophiles and good neighbors in general should not overlook this collection.

James A. Decker of Prairie City, Illinois, takes exception to some of my earlier remarks. He seems to think it was ungracious to his firm to wish Clark Mills a book all to himself, not merely a selection in the Laughlin series of "Five Younger Poets"; Mr. Decker points out that his firm has already published three books by Mr. Mills, and that more than half the material in the Laughlin edition was taken verbatim from the Decker series. This reviewer pleads to some negligence in not noting these facts, but there seems to be some difference of opinion between Messrs. Laughlin and Decker as to what constitutes a book. A translation of Mallarmé is hardly a book "all to himself," and my main point, anyway, was that Mr. Mills should not be in too much of a hurry. When I said that the appearance of the book by Winfield Townley Scott was inferior to the quality of its content, Mr. Decker thinks that I thereby "destroyed quite a few sales which might have developed into a growing audience for the poet in question." I do not see how Mr. Decker can prove this, and I would be sorry if it were true. He makes a sound point when he urges that books of poetry should be judged rather for content than for pretty get-up. The lot of the independent, unsupported, operating-on-a-shoestring publisher of poetry is indeed hard and full of disappointments and frustrations. The literary world, like the rest of the universe, is unjust, and its arrangements are one-sided; but before he can convict editors and reviewers of a conspiracy of silence against him, the poor "poetry publisher" (again the quotes to which Mr. Decker objects) must assume the burden of proof that beyond any shadow of doubt he is not, even partially, an entrepreneur of verse.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

CONTRIBUTORS

WILL CHASAN is associated with the publicity department of a national labor organization.

FRITZ STERNBERG, an authority on the economics of war, is the author of "Fivefold Aid to Britain."

MINNA LEDERMAN is the editor of Modern Music, published by the League of Composers.

NORMAN ANGELL, a member of The Nation's Board of Contributing Editors, won the Nobel peace prize in 1933.

PAOLO MILANO, an Italian writer and dramatic critic, is now teaching romance languages at Queens College.

RALPH BATES, distinguished English novelist, served in the Spanish Republican army and has written extensively on political subjects.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES has recently published a book of verse entitled "Out of the Jewel."

HIGH HOLIDAY SERVICES

OPEN UNTIL SEP. 28 SOCIAL & SPORT STAFFS

SCARROON MANOR
HOTEL 777 SCARROON LAKE, N.Y.

FREE GOLF after LABOR DAY

We CAN Win India as an Ally NOW!

H E A R

Paul Robeson - Michael Quill
C. H. Tobias - Max Yergan

Other Speakers to Be Announced

Mass Rally

"Towards a Free India through an Indian Government of National Unity in a fighting alliance with the United Nations."

MANHATTAN CENTER

34th St. West of 8th Ave.

Wednesday, SEPTEMBER 2, 8:30 p.m.

Admission (tax incl.): 83c, 55c, 28c

AUSPICES:

COUNCIL ON AFRICAN AFFAIRS

1123 Broadway New York City

Tickets available at Council, and Bookfair, 133 W. 44th St.

Don't Miss An Issue!

To Keep THE NATION coming regularly
just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $.....

☐ One Year $5

☐ Two Years $8

☐ Three Years $11

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER
to new subscribers only

☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name.....

Street.....

City.....

State.....

8-29-42

Extra postage per year: Foreign and Canadian, $1.00

IN BRIEF

FOLLOW THE LEADER. By Clyde Brion Davis. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.75.

Like so many novelists Mr. Davis seems to exhaust his creativity on the childhood of his central character. The section of his book that deals with Charles Martel as a puny, sniveling youngster in a small city in Missouri is so superior to what follows as almost to be different in kind; once Charley returns from the war (the First World War) and becomes a power in the community he begins to read like a smooth-paper success story.

THE DRUMS OF MORNING. By Philip Van Doran Stern. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.00.

Another battle in the War between the States as fought on the literary front, this time the North getting in its licks. Although Mr. Stern's story about the Abolitionist movement is carefully documented, told with loving detail, and laudable in its passionate stand for freedom, literarily it isn't up to its purpose. Jonathan Bradford is the hero and a pretty bloodless sort, and the three women in his life are as stock, each in her own way, as the usual Civil War heroine; even the historical figures seem to have had the juice squeezed out of them. But a Civil War novel written in seriousness, whatever its lack of inspiration, is at least a relief from Miss Scarlett and the old plantation.

YOUNG PANDORA. By Ann Chidester. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

This is an inflated novel, surely autobiographical, about a little girl in a Western town who grows up to write a novel. Miss Chidester is young; her talent is precocious rather than distinguished. Most importantly, she needs, like many older writers, to learn that words are not designed chiefly to glorify their author.

THE SUNDOWNERS. By Ward Dorrance. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

With some editing, Mr. Dorrance's novel about a boy who grows up on an upper-class Missouri farm and his grandfather who is his chief mentor could be a progressive school textbook in nature study. Written con amore, its prime interest is its lore of the outdoors: dogs, horses, coon and fox hunts are a few of the items on which the old man instructs his grandson—and the reader. A well-written book but insufficient diet for adult readers.

A PLACE IN THE SUN. By Frank Fenton. Random House. $2.50.

This is the meager and pretty dull story of a crippled young man who is twenty-five and sounds like seventeen; he reads, fishes, wants the right girl, and is full of meaningless sensitivity to the arts. One of those inside-the-mind novels that hasn't enough mind.

RECORDS

THE great finale of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony is astounding in many ways, not least of which is the fact that the structure—tremendous in size, emotional implications, impact—is built up out of two initially insignificant bits of thematic material. This material was used by Beethoven in a work dated a year earlier than the symphony—a work written not for orchestra but for piano, and not as a triumphant conclusion for the earlier movements of a dramatic four-movement progression but as a set of variations structurally and emotionally complete in itself. The style, the emotional connotation of this earlier piece are different; though it is longer its implications, its impact are not tremendous; but in it the variation process is already, for Beethoven, the expressive medium that will eventually produce the "Diabelli" Variations (to say nothing of the sets of variations that conclude the Sonatas Op. 109 and 111); and even in this early example the emotion that operates through his technical resourcefulness and daring produces not only individual variations of exquisite lyric beauty or impressive dramatic force, but in the end a work that is large-scale in structure and content.

This work, the Variations Op. 35 for piano (sometimes called the "Eroica" Variations, and sometimes the "Prometheus" because Beethoven used the material also in his "Prometheus" music) is at hand on five sides of a Victor set (DM-892, $4.73), played by Claudio Arrau with easy, unobtrusive technical mastery, with impeccable plastic sense governing a somewhat rhetorically expansive style, and with admirable insight into the meaning of the music. On the remaining three sides is a work composed at the same time and yet astonishingly different—the Variations Op. 34, which are early Beethoven in their feeling, their style, their smallness of scale, but as such ingenious, melodious, and mildly charming. They too are excellently played; and the performances are recorded with amazingly lifelike fidelity to timbre, spaciousness, and cleanness of definition.

Recorded in the same amazing way are E. Robert Schmitz's performances of two of Debussy's most popular piano pieces—"La Cathédrale engloutie" and "Claire de lune" (11-8240, $1.05). The second is early and sugary Debussy; the performances are over-deliberate but otherwise good.

But it is the recording of an orchestral work—Milhaud's sonorous arrangement of an Overture and Allegro from Couperin's "La Sultane," well performed by the St. Louis Symphony under Golschmann (11-8238)—that is most impressive. Arrau, Schmitz, the Chicago Symphony, the St. Louis Symphony have been newly added to the Victor list; their recordings, made during the past season, and in the case of the St. Louis Symphony as recently as April, are evidence of a great advance in Victor's recording technique; and this St. Louis recording, like the Chicago ones, shows that without Stokowski to gum things up the Victor engineers are able to produce not only the fidelity and beauty of the sounds of individual instruments and choirs, not only the cleanness of definition, the balance of these sounds in the rich, warm, spacious over-all sound, but the amazingly lifelike placing of the individual sounds in relation to one another in the orchestral space. So far we have had their skill only in recordings of this moderately interesting work of Couperin and the even less consequential pieces recorded by the Chicago Symphony; and these cause one to look forward impatiently to the recordings that Toscanini has made recently of some of the greatest works of the orchestral literature.

Khatchaturian's Symphony, performed at the Stadium, is a patchwork of themes in the idiom of Soviet-Armenian folk music which are placed in the unsuitable harmonic contexts, subjected to the unsuitable manipulation, carried to the unsuitable climaxes of European symphonic music. As for Khrenikov's Symphony, also performed at the Stadium, its fast sections are in the nose-thumbing style of Shostakovich, but its slow ones, which are melodious and melancholy in the old Russian way, are more impressive.

B. H. HAGGIN

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- America in a World at War.* By William B. Brown, Maxwell S. Stewart, and Walter E. Myer. Silver Burdett. $1.80.
- The Mother.* By Pearl Buck. Penguin. 25 cents.
- A Conrad Argosy.* Doubleday, Doran. $5.
- How War Came: An American White Paper; From the Fall of France to Pearl Harbor.* By Forrest Davis and Ernest K. Lindley. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.
- The Complete Roman Drama: All the Extant Comedies of Plautus and Terence, and the Tragedies of Seneca, in a Variety of Translations.* Edited by George B. Duckworth. Random House. 2 vols. $6.
- The Guilt of the German Army.* By Hans Ernest Fried. Macmillan. $3.50.
- The Short Stories of Ernest Hemingway.* Modern Library. $1.45.
- Two Survived: A Modern Epic of the Sea.* By Guy Pearce Jones. Penguin. 25 cents.
- Until That Day.* By Taylor Kressmann. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.
- New World Horizons: Geography for the Air Age.* Edited by Chester H. Lawrence. Maps by Ray Ramsey. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.
- The War on the Civil and Military Fronts.* By Major General G. M. Lindsay. Macmillan. $1.50.
- Disraeli: A Picture of the Victorian Age.* By André Maurois. Modern Library. 95 cents.
- Thinking for Every Man.* By A. Gordon Melvin. John Day. $2.
- Strategy at Singapore.* By Eugene H. Miller. Macmillan. $2.50.
- Complete Poetry and Selected Prose of John Milton.* Modern Library. 95 cents.
- The United Nations of the World: A Treatise on How to Win the Peace.* By Haridas T. Muzumdar. University Publishing Company. $2.50.
- What's the Good Word? A New Way to Better English.* By Maxwell Nurnberg. Simon and Schuster. $2.
- The Collected Stories of Dorothy Parker.* Modern Library. 95 cents.
- Lincoln and His Party in the Secession Crisis.* By David M. Potter. Yale. $3.75.
- Pastures of Heaven.* By John Steinbeck. Penguin. 25 cents.
- World Organization: A Balance Sheet of the First Great Experiment.* A Symposium of the Institute on World Organization. American Council on Public Affairs. $3.75.
- A Weath for Europa.* By Paul Tabori. Ives Washburn. $3.
- Christianity and Social Order.* By William Temple, Archbishop of Canterbury. Penguin. 25 cents.
- Fire and Ice: The Art and Thought of Robert Frost.* By Lawrence Thompson. Holt. $2.50.
- Gas Warfare: The Chemical Weapon, Its Use, and Protection Against It.* By Colonel Alden H. Waitt. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.

RESORTS

Your Private Estate for Glamorous Vacationing

Make this 1600-Acre Vacationland your year-round country home . . . Only 61 miles from N. Y. C.—high in the Ramapos . . . Grand new golf course; famous pro. "Doug" Turnesa . . . Magnificent lake; 12 miles of bridle paths; all sports facilities. Superb accommodations, cuisine and social life. . . .

Easy to Reach
Hard to Forget

Special rates by Week.

Season or Year

Phone Chester 200

Glenmere

CHESTER, N. Y. N. Y. C. Ph. REctor 2-5047

SOCIAL STAFF • HORSEBACK • BICYCLING • SWIMMING • TENNIS

31 WAYS TO HAVE FUN

For a vacation of action or relaxation Chester's offers an unbeatable value. Big parade of all-star attractions, including fast clay courts, private lake and large, filtered swimming pool, badminton courts, handball, bicycling, 25 other outdoor and indoor sports. Gala evenings, featuring a brilliant theatre group. Table treats in three magnificent performances a day. Unusually reasonable rates. Write, wire or phone your reservations

N. Y. OFFICE: TEL. LO-5-5857

WOODBORNE, N. Y. TEL. WOODBORNE 1150

CHESTERS

ADDELIGHTFUL HIDEAWAY IN THE MOUNTAINS

★ STAR LAKE CAMP ★

IN THE GLORIOUS ADIRONDACKS

Between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground, 1,800 feet elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Canoeing, Swimming, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Interesting one-day trips arranged. Delicious wholesome meals. Rate $27.50 weekly. New Bungalows, semi-private baths for couples—$30.00 per person. Dietary laws observed.

Send for Booklet — New York Office

116 NASSAU ST., Room 802a, CO 7-2667
Sundays, Evenings, Holidays — PR 4-1390

Auto service from and to New York every Saturday and Sunday

CRANE LAKE LODGE

WEST STOCKBRIDGE, MASS.

Informal Adult Camp
RUTH & MURRAY CAPLAN
Private Lake

Tennis Dancing All Sports
Excellent Golf and Riding nearby
Convenient Rail Connections

Families Accommodated

American-Jewish Cuisine Write for Booklet
N. Y. C. Office: 225 West 34th St. CH 4-6205

BERKSHIRES

WALTELL HOUSE on FRANKEL FARM

MT. BETHEL PENNSYLVANIA

The Only Modern Farm Hotel combined with a Children's Day Camp. All sports.

Your hostess: Ella Frankel

For booklet, Write or Phone

Bangor 62T3. N. Y. C. phone: MU 2-3970

ADDITIONAL RESORT
ADVERTISING ON INSIDE BACK COVER

RESORTS

HILLTOP LODGE

On Beautiful Sylvan Lake

HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.

R. R. Station: Pawling, N. Y.

Tel. Hopewell Junction 2761

Only 65 Miles from N. Y. C.

HILLTOP . . . Yours for Vacation - Pleasure
• Every Sport and Recreation Facility • Golf is Free on Premises • Food is TOPS

GALA LABOR DAY WEEK-END

Open through the Jewish Holidays;

Labor Day, Sept. 7;

Rosh Hashonah, Sept. 12, 13.

Reasonable Rates

N. Y. OFFICE: 170 BROADWAY CO 7-3958

Paul Wolfson and Sol Rothaus (Directors)

For convenience and conviviality—Come to FOREST HOUSE

Near enough for easy travel—far enough for peace and relaxation, FOREST HOUSE offers every vacation advantage. 2 Splendid lakes. Best of accommodations, food, sports.

50 Miles from N. Y. C.
Phone MAHOPAC 688

TOP OFF THE SUMMER WITH LABOR DAY WEEKEND at the BERKSHIRE PINES

Friday Sept. 4—Monday Sept. 7

Three hours from the city—the small resort at its best—all sports including, golf, tennis, swimming, dancing, special entertainment. Address:

PEARL CHEIFETZ

West Copake, New York

or Phone: Copake 46

OPEN THROUGH ROSH HASHONAH

CHI-WAN-DA ON THE HUDSON

ULTER PARK, N. Y. Phone Kingston 1329
On the Mountain Lake Esopus, overlooking the beautiful Hudson River. Social staff, dancing, all water & land sports. Fine cuisine, most modern improvements.

Directions:—Train • Bus • Boat to Kingston

LABOR DAY WEEK-END

3 days $12.75 — 2 days $9.00 — 1 day $5.00

Open for Rosh Hashonah & entire month of Sept.

WEEKLY RATE $22.00

J. I. DOROSHKIN, Director MURRAY Hill 2-4217

Send Your Reservations Directly to Camp

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes; Interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails; Fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping-pong, etc.; Intelligent, gay companionship.
$28 & $32 Weekly Non-Sectarian
OLIVE H. Q. BARON, Dir.

Timberland POTTSVILLE, N. Y.

AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
LIMITED TO 100 — OPEN IN SEPTEMBER
MUSIC • LECTURES • CONCERTS

Under the direction of George Kleinsinger

MORDECAI BAUMAN, Executive

ALL SPORTS — PRIVATE LAKE

N. Y. OFFICE: 35 W 42 St. Longacre 5-3874

Directors: Harry N. Boardman • Louis A. Rothblatt

"The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group"

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Letters to the Editors

India: Danger and Duty

Dear Sirs: A year ago Franklin D. Roosevelt and Winston Churchill signed the Atlantic Charter, pledging their countries to "respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live." Today all the peoples of all the United Nations are menaced by the tragic conflict between an alien government and an unfree people which has been allowed to break out in India.

The British decision to outlaw the Indian National Congress at a time when no overt act of disobedience had taken place and Gandhi was preparing an appeal to the Viceroy and to the United Nations for further negotiations is regarded by many as justified. Leopold Amery defends the decision as necessary to "save India and the Allied cause from a grave disaster," threatened by the "wicked folly" of the Mahatma and his colleagues. Yet even those who accept this view know in their hearts that there could be no graver disaster than what has happened in India and no folly more wicked than the folly which seeks to save India from her enemies through a policy of terrorization indorsed by her friends.

All Americans have a solemn duty to themselves, to demand that this road to ruin be abandoned at once, regardless of responsibility for past mistakes. To "wait and see" will be to commit once more the crime of "too little and too late" in an arena of battle which is the home of one-sixth of the human race. An India ruled by force and torn by rebellion is an India mortgaged to the common enemy.

A sullen and beaten India will never be saved by British or American troops. To lose India tomorrow by American default today will be to doom China to subjugation, to deliver all the Middle East to the Axis, and to force the armies of Russia behind the Urals, regardless of any second front. The sequel for Britain can only be invasion. The sequel for America can only be an all but hopeless war against opponents who will rule the world.

These strategic consequences will flow inexorably from the moral blindness of those who believe that the armed coercion of subject peoples, however misled they may be, is compatible with a world-wide fight for freedom.

The Tory mind which once courted catastrophe by meeting Nazi violence with non-violence is now courting an incalculably greater catastrophe by meeting Indian non-violence with violence. Every Indian who languishes in a British jail, who screams under a British lash, who dies before a British gun, will become a symbol of despair for millions of the colored peoples of the earth. These silent and waiting multitudes will conclude, wrongly no doubt but nonetheless irrevocably, that Western white men offer them only fair words and foul deeds, that the darker peoples have no stake in a war between rival oppressors, and that Axis arrogance may be more tolerable than democratic hypocrisy.

The time to act is now. A year ago a group of Americans privately urged upon Lord Halifax and the Department of State American mediation between Britain and the principal Indian political groups. Events have confirmed the impossibility of successful negotiations limited to Britishers and Indians. "We have tried our best to agree," said Sir Stafford Cripps last April. "We have failed. Never mind whose fault it is." Agreement through outside action has now been rendered much more difficult and infinitely more imperative by the obstructive policies of the Congress leaders and, in even greater measure, by the rash action of London in imprisoning those leaders and shedding Indian blood in the name of India's defense. These difficulties cannot conceivably be resolved either by the forcible suppression of the Congress nor by the forcible overthrow of British rule. They can only be resolved by all the United Nations insisting upon an immediate settlement under United Nations auspices. "Our allies," writes the Manchester Guardian, "—the United States, China, and Russia—should help us to compose a quarrel which injures every one of them."

This is America's opportunity, for only America enjoys the confidence of all. Let Americans everywhere ask their President to join with the leaders of China and Russia in proposing arbitration of the Indian conflict. Let the proposal expressly contemplate the preparation by a United Nations tribunal of a plan for the establishment within the next three months, of a provisional government of an independent India, linked in war and peace alike to the British Commonwealth and the United Nations as a free and equal partner. This will be no more than the British Government has promised for the future and no less than the Indian leaders have asked for the present. Let the tribunal include an American, a Britisher, a Russian, and a Chinese, plus representatives of the Moslem League and the Congress. Let all pledge themselves in advance to accept whatever plan may be proposed by the tribunal. A settlement acceptable to all can be realized only by pooling the wisdom and good will of all. As a pledge of good faith, let the present government of India cease all repression and release all political prisoners, and let the Congress leaders suspend their campaign of non-cooperation. No leader anywhere will dare to reject a proposal for such a tribunal. No leader anywhere will dare to reject its conclusions. In no other way can India be saved.

India has become the acid test of our fitness to survive.

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN
Williamstown, Mass., August 12

Shostakovitch and Haggin

Dear Sirs: Bravo for Mr. Haggin! Obviously he must realize that he has joined the band of a most unpopular minority, commenting as he did on the Shostakovitch Seventh Symphony. My own hesitant opinions—it is difficult to resist herd emotion—made to a radiant Shostakovitch Seventh enthusiast, were entirely echoed in Haggin's statements, in which he pointed out the eclecticism, the sterility of inventiveness, the repetitious rhythmic and distorted harmonic patterns of the work.

Would it not have been more salutary for Shostakovitch if his symphony, written though it was under the most extraordinary circumstances, had been presented without all the advance ballyhoo attendant on its arrival? Some listeners, lured by the extravagant praise to expectancy of "a work surpassing Beethoven's Ninth," were sadly discouraged. How much better it would have been for the work to be heard and judged for its musical merit alone, giving evidence as it does of a great talent still in its formative period.

ETHEL S. COHEN
New York, August 18

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 5, 1942

NUMBER 10

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

181

EDITORIALS

China Comes Back

184

India Means It by Louis Fischer

185

ARTICLES

The Facts About a Second Front

by Donald W. Mitchell

186

War and Cheap Money by Harold Mager

188

A Gallery of Quislings by Joachim Joesten

190

In the Wind

193

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Unhyphenated American by Jacques Barzun

194

The Diplomacy of Nemesis by Frederick L. Schuman

195

From America South by Diana Trilling

196

Jennie Lee by Keith Hutchison

197

In Brief

198

Records by B. H. Haggin

198

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

200

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor

RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

IT IS NOT PLEASANT TO QUESTION THE President's good faith; it is equally painful to question his good sense. But we are not surprised that some of the news men at his press conference last week betrayed doubt of one or the other when he told them about the plan he and Ambassador Hayes had concocted to restore the damaged art treasures and historical monuments of Spain in order to preserve a noble culture and, incidentally, to encourage Spanish tourist trade after the war. Was this move intended to brace the tottering stage-set of Spanish neutrality? The President waved the question aside as unworthy. Might not some people feel reluctant to give aid of any sort to the Franco dictatorship? Matters of culture, the President responded, transcended political differences. If this kind of talk were genuine it would reveal an innocence we would never impute to Mr. Roosevelt. And so we are driven to the conclusion that our appeasers in Washington have something up their sleeve which the President is helping them to conceal. But we hate to see our Chief Executive supporting a new scheme for buttering up the unspeakable Franco under cover of an obvious pretense.

✱

AND EVEN THE PRETENSE IS DISGUSTING. Spain's culture will be restored when Spain is free. Not before. Spain will be free when the Spanish people have been given an opportunity to smash the fascist regime now held in power by hunger and the arms of Hitler. To restore the material substance of the nation's culture while leaving intact the tyranny that chokes its very life is an affront to the people of Spain, in and out of Franco's jails. The scheme fits neatly—too neatly—with the rumor printed in these columns four weeks ago of the planned restoration of another historical relic—Don Juan, heir to the Spanish throne. And both harmonize with the happy dream that bemuses both Whitehall and the State Department—the dream of a safe, sober, clerical fascism, which, if nurtured during the war with dollars and oil, may serve to dispel the nightmare of revolution in post-Nazi Europe. Meanwhile Franco's Blue Division crusades for Christian culture on the eastern front.

BUT POLITICAL MANEUVERS CAN BE AS intricate as the design on an archbishop's robe. The appeasement of Franco has always had its practical aspects. Not only have we built up a nice little trade with Spain but we are attempting, as in France and formerly in Italy, to hold in power those elements which might possibly favor the Allied cause in the war. That the German command keeps several divisions on the Spanish border and an army of some 150,000 technicians and officials inside Spain is not enough to discourage our appeasers. They hope against hope—and against the crude rebuffs of the Spanish government—that Spain may be friendly or at least neutral in the great approaching showdown. It is likely that the imminence of major action in North Africa is playing a part in Washington's latest overtures to Franco. Whether our government really believes that in return for some restored monuments and the expectation of future profits Spain—and Hitler—will allow Allied troops to sweep through Morocco and Tangier to attack Rommel in the rear, or whether it merely hopes that Spain will remain immobilized, one can only guess. But it is safe to say that North Africa is at least one of the loops in the intricate pattern that lies behind Mr. Roosevelt's too innocent proposal.

★

NO SPECULATION IN FUTURE FAVORS, however, can counteract the immediate effect of that proposal in Latin America. There the friends of the United States and the United Nations will receive the news with a mixture of confusion and discouragement. It will take more subtlety than young Mr. Rockefeller has ever demonstrated to explain to Latin American democrats why the United States should promote the cause of Franco's Spanish culture, which already has its many spokesmen, members of Franco's phalanx, working more directly: they expound Spain's cultural mission to oust North American influence and spread the blessings of the New Order in Latin America. As for turismo, it is already well established between Latin America and Spain, but the flow of travel is the other way and it is monopolized by the agents of our enemies.

★

THE BATTLE OF STALINGRAD IS TAKING A grave turn after several days in which the Russians succeeded in holding their line. Not only had they roused the city itself to the pitch of popular heroism which proved so effective at Leningrad, but General Zhukov's timely attack in the north had created an important diversion. It looks now as if the Russians were throwing into the battle both around Moscow and in the Caucasus all their reserve forces. Whether or not this supreme decision is the result of a combined plan drawn up during Prime Minister Churchill's visit to Stalin nobody knows. It may be that the Russians are coming to the conclusion that the talk about a second front in the west is likely to remain talk and that as a consequence they had better open a second front in Russia itself. But if it seems dangerous, from a military point of view, to rely exclusively on the relief that such emergency operations as that of Rzhev may bring to the main Russian armies, from a political point of view it is even more risky. Already comment in Russia on the chances of an early western front is becoming more bitter every day. Reliable American reporters agree that even if help is given them this fall, the Russians will not easily forget the price in strength and millions of lives they paid for the privilege of fighting Hitler alone in Europe. We understand that bitterness and we share it. As we watch the Russians fighting with the admirable élan and ability they have shown all this last week, we ask ourselves where we would be today if since May, when the Germans renewed their attack in the east, a British-American expeditionary force had been attacking in the west. Three valuable months have been lost. But there is still time for a major drive on the part of the United Nations that will save the Russian armies and restore confidence in the unity of action of the Allies.

★

DONALD NELSON HAS AN EXCELLENT opportunity to exhibit his much-publicized "toughness" by undertaking a wholesale reorganization of the iron and steel division of the WPB. Frederick S. Libbey wrote a report to show what was wrong with this vital department and was fired for mentioning the matter first to the press. He may well feel vindicated, however, by the subsequent resignations of Reese H. Taylor, head of the division, and his deputy, R. C. Allen. It is now up to Mr. Nelson to appoint successors who can be relied upon to clear out the high-powered steel sales executives who at a dollar a year have proved an expensive bargain for the people of the United States. There is no need to search for ulterior motives; the present shortage of steel is itself proof that these gentlemen have failed in their job. And in war time we cannot be tender of the feelings of those who fail. Mr. Nelson has rightly said of the WPB, "It takes too damn long to get things done around here"—a theme on which The Nation and other liberal critics have been harping for many months. It has taken too long to shut down unessential industries which were absorbing precious raw materials, and it has taken too long to correct the maldistribution of steel which is now so serious a bottleneck in war production. By depriving army and navy procurement and contract officers of the power to assign preference ratings to individual contracts Mr. Nelson has taken a step toward obtaining a smoother flow of materials. But more heads will have to roll if excess inventories are to be jimmied out of favored firms and materials allocated to the places where they are most needed, without regard to the wishes of the suppliers.

★

WITH THE THREAT OF INFLATION GROWING despite the comparative stability in the cost-of-living index over the past five months, the President has promised to announce on Labor Day new steps to keep prices within bounds. At a press conference last week he made it clear that wages as well as farm prices would have to be controlled, since it was impossible to restrict one without the other. We are in entire agreement with this general proposition but eagerly await details. Mr. Roosevelt hinted that the matter was too urgent to allow for new legislation, and it is believed that he contemplates taking measures under his general war powers as commander-in-chief. The inability of Congress to grasp the problems of war economics in their larger aspects and its spinal weakness when subjected to group pressures certainly do not encourage the hope of speedy action on Capitol Hill. Nevertheless, the by-passing of Congress on such a question cannot be regarded as a desirable precedent. In order to effect a genuine stabilization of farm prices the President must abrogate specific provisions written into the Price Control Act—a challenge to Congress which might well provoke a prolonged constitutional struggle. The only apparent alternative would be the wholesale use of subsidies in order to bridge the gap between "ceiled" food prices to the consumer and actual farm prices as permitted by the present law. This obviously would not mean genuine stabilization and would pave the way to a demand for subsidies by all sorts of other interests.

★

TO HEAR ARTHUR KROCK TELL THE STORY, the Germans had little to do with Brazil's entering the war. They only torpedoed six Brazilian ships within nine days, with a loss of more than 600 lives. According to Mr. Krock and "a Washington official" whom he cites without quoting in a special dispatch to the New York Times, what really made Brazil a belligerent was the faith of Getulio Vargas that the Axis was doomed and the far-seeing eye of our State Department, which "refused to oppose the totalitarian forms of government he introduced" despite the foolish clamor of "American opponents of any kind of dictatorship anywhere." Of course, Krock concedes, "the economic dependence of Brazil on the United States and the loans and other concessions that we have made belong in the outline" and "finally, the provocations to war furnished Brazil by Germany." But by and large it was "the strength and convictions of Vargas" and the sympathetic attitude of Hull and Welles toward his regime that produced such happy results. Aside from mild surprise that Mr. Krock should frown on "American opponents of any kind of dictatorship anywhere" (remember the Four Freedoms?), our feeling about this curious dispatch is that someone is trying pathetically to pull a diplomatic victory out of a hat. Of course the Good Neighbor policy helped to carry Vargas along, but before getting too maudlin about Sumner Welles's "sympathetic public discussion" of the Brazilian dictatorship, to which Mr. Krock attributes so many good results, let's remember that not long afterward Vargas reciprocated in a speech studded with references to "the sterile demagoguery of political democracy."

★

THE OPERATIONS AT MILNE BAY AND THE Solomon Islands during the past week have been overplayed in the press, but they are definite and important successes. The Milne Bay action seems to have resulted in a clear-cut victory for the United Nations forces. For the first time since the beginning of the war, nearly nine months ago, a carefully planned Japanese attack has been frustrated by land troops. The success of the United States aerial and naval forces in sinking or badly damaging three destroyers and beating off two more air raids on the Solomons is perhaps less impressive. But even these limited triumphs may be taken as evidence that the Japanese are not so irresistible as they appeared three or four months ago. They also indicate rather clearly that Japan is not massing for an all-out attack on Australia. But it would be folly to conclude from these minor skirmishes that Japan is weakening or has given up its traditional strategy of attack. On the contrary, the apparent withdrawal of Japanese troops in China and the failure of the Japanese to regain the initiative in the Southwest Pacific can only mean that Japan is planning a new offensive elsewhere.

★

THIRTY THOUSAND HUMAN BEINGS WHO also happen to be Jews have been seized in France in the past two months on orders from Hitler. They include all non-French Jews who have entered France since 1936. The men have been sent in cattle cars to Eastern Europe to perform forced labor for the Germans; the women and children have been put in concentration camps. Once more Vichy has "yielded to German pressure," and the good Catholic, Pétain, rather than give up the pretense of being head of the French state, has "collaborated" in the latest Nazi man-hunt—despite protests from the Pope himself, from emissaries whom he sent to Vichy, and from the archbishops of Paris and Lyons. Moreover, Vichy has refused permission to Catholic, Protestant, and Quaker organizations to feed the victims. According to one dispatch, if this forced migration does not meet the need for farm and mine labor, the Germans intend to "ask" that Vichy gather up all expatriates who arrived in France after 1933. Hitler not only wants a fresh labor supply; he is determined to take into Nazi custody all Germans, Jews and non-Jews, who emigrated after his rise to power. This fresh and terrible evidence that Pétain and Laval are merely the French agents of Hitler demonstrates anew the folly of the State Department in acquiescing in Vichy's pretense of neutrality and independence; but since it persists in that policy it should at least enter a vigorous protest.

★

NOT QUITE A YEAR AGO NEWSPAPERS ALL over the country were pleased to give hundreds of columns to a story about 1,121 government employees who had been branded as Communists by the Dies committee. The Department of Justice has spent ten months and $100,000 checking on the accuracy of the charges. It has just completed its researches, but this time only PM has given the story the attention it deserves. For the investigation shows that the Dies committee was right in exactly 2 cases and wrong in 1,119. In other words, on the basis of this survey the Dies committee is accurate .0017 per cent of the time. J. Edgar Hoover, himself an experienced red-baiter, says that he has had better luck in ferreting out subversives when he has relied on the random letters and telephone calls of persons, generally cranks, who carry on their own private investigations. Out of 3,000 unofficial tips from such individuals, 40 were substantiated. Attorney General Biddle will soon submit his department's full report to Congress. We hope it will lead to the end of the Dies committee.

China Comes Back

THE unexpected success of the Chinese army in Chekiang and Kiangsi provinces during the past five weeks must be regarded as one of the most significant triumphs achieved by a United Nations force since the United States entered the war. It is unquestionably the most important victory achieved by Chinese arms in more than five years of fighting. In late June and early July the situation on the Chinese front was desperate. Ignoring heavy casualties, the Japanese had succeeded in pushing westward through the rich province of Chekiang, occupying all the seaports not already in their hands and taking over the whole of the Hangchow-Nanchang railway. This force effected a junction with another pushing southeastward through Kiangsi from the city of Nanchang. Japanese propagandists spoke exultantly of the prospect of opening up through railway service from Shanghai to Singapore, utilizing the newly captured rail link. The Japanese also gloated over the capture of the modern airports at Chuhsien, Lishui, and Yushan—the only airports from which raids on Tokyo were believed possible.

Then, in the latter part of July, the Chinese counter-attacked and gained a foothold on the strategic railway line. They made slow progress at first, but in mid-August they reoccupied Shanjao and Kweiki. By the end of the month all the air bases had been retaken, and Nanchang itself was under attack. Nearly 250 miles of what had once been an important railway were again in Chinese hands, and the Japanese were still retreating. The speed of their retirement and their ruthless destruction of all towns and villages along their route suggest that it was a planned withdrawal and that the Chinese attacks only hastened it. This is quite possible; the Japanese have made strategic withdrawals before, although none on this scale. But while they may have decided to withdraw part of their troops in this area for use elsewhere, and in the process evacuated some of their outlying posts, they can hardly have surrendered voluntarily such cities as Lishui and Chuhsien, which could be used as bases for bombing Japan, or the important port of Wenchow, a bare 200 miles from Formosa.

If we have made proper preparations, the recapture of these cities permits a fundamental reorientation of United Nations strategy in the war against Japan. The attack on the Solomons suggests that in the absence of a more direct way of striking at Japan the United States had decided in favor of a costly island-to-island approach. It is now possible to strike at the concentrated industrial centers and "paper cities" of Japan from the air. This will not be easy. Planes, fliers, and technicians will have to be diverted from other zones. Getting the necessary planes and supplies into China from India over the Himalayas will be a formidable task. Fighter planes for protection as well as bombers will be needed. The planes now in China are but a fraction of the number that must be sent if we plan a serious aerial blow against Japan.

The technical obstacles to an all-out aerial offensive against Tokyo, Osaka, and the other Japanese industrial centers are tremendous, but they are not likely to prove as difficult to overcome as the political obstacles. Despite its heroic achievements China has been a stepchild among the United Nations. We deliberately chose to concentrate our forces for the defense of Australia instead of protecting Burma and the route to China. Although China has been seeking planes for years, our Army Air Force planes and pilots did not actually reach China and go into action until July. Reports indicate that many of the transport planes originally intended for service between India and China have been diverted for use within India. The Chinese have suffered from our failure to provide aid, but we too have paid a heavy price for our neglect. There was a period of seven months during which we could have used Chinese bases to bomb Tokyo, but we did it only once. Quite unexpectedly and undeservedly, another opportunity has been given us. This time we must make full use of it.

India Means It

BY LOUIS FISCHER

ON FRIDAY, August 21, 50,000 Indian workingmen demanded the release of Gandhi and went on strike at the Tata munitions works, which embrace the biggest steel mill in the British Empire. This has not been reported by the press anywhere. The strike wave in India is spreading. The most disturbed areas are the vital mining and factory region of Behar, Madras, the United Provinces, the Central Province, and the Bombay Presidency. In many places the tearing up of rails has completely disrupted railroad traffic. Telegraph service is frequently discontinued and always quite unreliable. Riots and sabotage throughout India are on a much larger scale than the British government in India had anticipated, the semi-official daily Statesman of New Delhi admits.

The civil-disobedience movement, Indian nationalist circles in India believe, is only starting. They expect that soon many Indian officials of the British government in India will quit the service. It is reported, but not officially confirmed, that two Indian members of the Viceroy's Executive Council have resigned.

Mohammed Ali Jinnah, president of the Moslem League, told me recently in Bombay that if the Indian National Congress launched a civil-disobedience movement, there would be violent clashes between Hindus and Moslems. No such events have been reported. The fact is that almost all Indians desire their country's independence, and no Indian party or leader dares to interfere with an attempt to bring it about. Congress leaders in India declare that many Sikhs, Communists, and Moslems are supporting the civil-disobedience movement. It is difficult for an Indian not to.

The British inside and outside India are adamant in their refusal to negotiate with the Indian national movement. They want to crush the civil-disobedience campaign. They say any readiness on their part to conciliate India would undermine still farther British prestige, already so seriously weakened by the military reverses in Hongkong, Malaya, Singapore, and Burma. But will it not be much worse for the British to have to climb down a month or six weeks from now in case the disorders grow? The British close their minds to this gloomy eventuality and plead for time to suppress the Indian trouble. The difficulty is that even if the British succeed they fail. Suppose shootings and whippings cow the Indian people for another interval of uneasy quiet? What the United Nations need is the active support of India's population.

They could get it. Throughout India the word I heard most often used to describe Indian sentiment at the present juncture was "frustration." I heard it from Congress leaders, from Indian industrialists, from teachers, students, and soldiers. Frustration results from a difference between one's desire to act and one's ability to act. The Indians would like to defend their country. But they cannot do so as partners of their British masters. The Cripps negotiations are revealed by official statements to have been a struggle between Indians demanding greater participation in India's defense and Cripps who opposed it. If Indians were free to fight this war, there would be an end to frustration and an upsurge of joy and an outburst of energy which would be assets to the United Nations.

The Chinese are supremely worried by England's attitude. India is the only channel through which Anglo-American supplies can reach China. Moreover, knowing the East, the Chinese understand how disastrous the suppression of a great Asiatic independence movement would be to the morale of anti-Axis Asia. China is therefore pressing for mediation by the United Nations.

It is interesting to observe how various nations react to the Indian crisis. The Chinese, as Asiatics who have themselves fought to throw off foreign yokes, can easily put themselves in the skin of Indians; their sympathy with Indian independence and with Indians in their present predicament is complete.

Americans intuitively respond in favor of the freedom of colonial nations. But the fear that Indian behavior may prejudice the conduct of the war has somewhat adulterated the natural reaction of Americans to India's struggle for release from imperial domination. At present our instincts are gaining the upper hand again, especially since many persons in this country feel that the British should not have rejected Gandhi's conciliatory request for talks. The mail of Senators and Representatives in Washington is heavy with complaints about British intransigence in India. The danger is that the Indian issue will be exploited by professional Anglophobes, appeasers in pro-war clothes and American friends of the Axis. This must be prevented. I criticize England's attitude in India because I am a friend of England and hope it will be saved from its own stupidity. There can be no objection to private expressions of American opinion about India, but any resolution in the Senate or House of Representatives would probably irritate the British government without advancing the cause of India. If there is to be American official intervention, it must be discreet and informal. For the moment, however, the United States government is deferring to British obstinacy and refraining from extending its good offices to adjust the Indian quarrel. Such delicate handling of a delicate situation is diplomatic and polite. It may prolong the war for several years and lead us into disaster. It should be possible to give a friend a strong scolding without endangering the friendship.

The British know that Washington would like to do something but is not sure that Anglo-American relations could bear the strain. India is, in fact, our business, and the Administration is worried about India. But we hold our hand out of consideration for Britain's imperial sensibilities. This is an unhealthy state of affairs which should cause concern to London.

The British think of India in terms of the maintenance of their "face" and authority. They contend, of course, that to maintain their authority in India by crushing the current civil-disobedience movement is to consolidate the defense of India. I think the reverse is the case.

The Facts About a Second Front

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE urgent need of creating a new battleground in Europe has become the most-discussed aspect of the war, and agitation for a second front both here and in England has wide popular support. Hitler's recent transfer of eleven divisions from Western Europe to the Russian front is not so much a gesture of bravado as an attempt to settle the Russian affair before an invasion of the Continent can become a reality. In this he is assuming that the slowness of an Allied reaction will permit his success, an assumption which the facts in the Norwegian campaign and elsewhere justify him in making. Far more clearly than many of their leaders the British and American peoples recognize that a vigorous attack in the west while Russian resistance is still strong may offer the only remaining opportunity of winning the war. It certainly presents the only chance of achieving a speedy victory. Not only must the obvious military advantages of attacking now be considered, but also the attitude of mind of our Russian allies and of the conquered millions of Europe whose long-cherished hopes of a Continental invasion have alone saved them from despair.

Unfortunately, the opening of a second front is not a question of desirability. Even Churchill, haunted by the tragedies of Gallipoli, Norway, Greece, and Crete, has been quite willing to concede, in principle, the need of launching new campaigns while the Wehrmacht is deeply entangled in Russia. The United States, before Pearl Harbor, had worked out plans for an invasion of Europe in the event of its involvement in the war, and it has reaffirmed the principles of offensive action many times since. But the United Nations High Command, in making its decisions, must be guided primarily by practical considerations; any military move must have a reasonable chance of success. We must take the offensive in the present war if we are to win, but it must not be a quixotic offensive based on nothing more substantial than wishful thinking or despair. While waiting may well mean the difference between facing a million German troops today and six million a year from today, action now will not necessarily be wise unless we have sufficient forces available to meet those million troops and the necessary transportation to supply them as well.

In all likelihood the time has already passed when a diversionary attack in the west could prevent Germany from getting the Caucasus. Russia is badly weakened, though it has not been knocked out of the war and Hitler will not be able immediately to exploit his gains. The opening of a new front in Europe has not lost any of its importance, but as Soviet resistance weakens, the scale of any Anglo-American offensive must be proportionately increased to be effective.

WHAT IT TAKES

The first problem, then, in connection with a second front is to determine what is needed and how it can be transported. In the last war a minimum of from six to eight tons of shipping was considered necessary for the transportation and supply of each doughboy in France. Today, although a certain amount of aviation material and personnel travels by air, thus reducing the burden on shipping, mechanization has so increased supply needs that from ten to fifteen tons per soldier—some authorities say twenty—is a closer approximation of our transport needs. Since the opening of a real second front in Western Europe would relieve Russia to a greater extent than the limited amounts of supplies we are now able to send it by way of the White Sea and the Persian Gulf, we could probably divert vessels from these routes. Some additional ships now serving other needs might also be drafted for second-front purposes, but the total number of these diverted ships would not be great. The transportation to Europe of a million men and their supplies—and a million men is a very small army—would probably require eight to ten million tons of new shipping. That only in the last month have we held our own in the race of ship construction versus sinkings is common knowledge. The limited American and somewhat larger British forces available at present for an invasion of the Continent might be adequate to effect a diversion. But it will be a long time—a year under the best conditions and much longer if sinkings cannot soon be reduced—before significantly larger bodies of men can be transported and supplied from America.

Nor is shipping the only limiting factor. Until our army training program was recently speeded up, it was designed to produce four and one-half million troops by the end of 1942. Many of these will necessarily be green. Garrisons are now maintained in Alaska, Hawaii, Australia, the Canal Zone, Newfoundland, Iceland, Bermuda, Eritrea, India, British and Dutch Guiana, West Africa, Egypt, the West Indies, continental United States, and half a hundred other points, essential and non-essential. In a mistaken effort to produce strength by multiplying weakness perhaps a million troops have been drained off in this fashion. In addition there are the cadres of veterans who must be reserved for the training of new units. When these exemptions are made, the striking force available by early 1943 will not be more than two and one-half to three million men. Our early war plans did not contemplate a full-scale offensive much before the latter part of 1943, and it seems evident that the five-million-man army in Europe—the absolute minimum with which we should undertake a full-scale offensive—will not be ready before that time.

Of the greatest importance, then, is the army now stationed in the British Isles—probably two million Britishers, plus Free French, Poland, Canadian, and American contingents. This army must be the vanguard for any Continental invasion. Its quality is not easy to gauge. The courage of the men and their eagerness to fight can be taken for granted. But their training—until recent months that of protecting against invasion—their military experience, and their leadership are also vital factors. The British, who make up the main body of these troops, have had consistently poor leadership and suffer from the psychological handicap of having experienced repeated military defeats. All told, therefore, the troops in Britain are not an ideally constituted expeditionary force. Nevertheless, some of the units are of high quality, and altogether the army is perhaps considerably larger than the German army that would oppose it. The Russians, however, may soon be defeated to an extent that will permit the main body of the German army to be sent west for Continental defense. If time were permitted, the quality as well as the quantity of the United Nations forces in England could be raised by American additions. The American army has increased enormously in both size and striking power in the past year, and it is the only one belonging to the United Nations which has been formed mainly for offensive action.

WHERE?

The locale of an invasion attempt has long been a matter of debate. Our democratic ethics probably bar striking through Turkey or Spain, though the latter area has been studied by our war planners. The three main fields suggested to date are Italy, the Channel coast of France and the Low Countries, and Norway.

An Italian campaign is urged by Lieutenant Colonel Kernan in his popular "Defense Will Not Win the War." Unfortunately, in detailing Italy's weaknesses he does not mention the bases from which an attack could be made. No such bases are in the hands of the United Nations. Until North Africa or the Balkans are cleared of Axis troops, any campaign against Italy will necessarily have to be waged by air and from distant bases.

The Channel coast is very different. Here the British have thoroughly familiarized themselves with the terrain through hundreds of reconnaissance and bombing flights. They have air superiority over the Channel and northern France and, unless their bombings have been singularly ineffective, have considerably softened the German coast fortifications. The native population here is probably as well prepared to aid invaders actively as in any section of Europe. Furthermore, the quartermaster's problem should be simpler here than anywhere else, and no vastly increased number of ships would be needed. Allied control of both sides of the Channel would also complicate the problem of German submarines in getting to sea. Balancing these advantages are the known strength of German coast defenses and the fact that reinforcements can be rapidly poured in.

Norway is another likely battlefield. Here the Germans have the advantage of land-based air power, as opposed to the ship-based air power which we should have to use in the early stages of an invasion. A rugged and inhospitable coast favors defense. On the other hand, northern Norway in particular is vital to the Germans in that it provides a passageway for the Kiruna iron and also a base from which our northern supply lines to Russia can be harassed. Since the Germans would find it extremely hard to bring up reinforcements from southern Norway, a determined attack here might lead them to invade Sweden and result in that country's joining the Allied cause. A Norwegian attack, unless made on a country-wide scale, should start in the north in order to permit close cooperation with the Soviets. It is safe to say that if a diversionary attack on a limited scale occurs soon, northern Norway will be the sector chosen.

WHEN?

The second-front problem uppermost in most minds is, When? While many of the factors upon which an answer can be based are known only to the High Command, certain generalizations can be made from the information we have. In the first place it is evident that the United States is not now able, and will not be able for at least a year, to transport and supply an army large enough to fight single-handed against Germany. Secondly, large enough forces of United Nations troops are available to undertake a limited campaign for the purpose of affording a diversion, but neither their quality nor the provisions for supplying them are first class. Thirdly, on the basis of available information the Channel coast seems to offer the best promise of reward for a fairly large-scale attack, though northern Norway, despite certain drawbacks, is the logical place for launching a limited offensive.

There is another way of trying to discover the answer. According to the war plans which were allowed to leak out through the Chicago Tribune just before Pearl Harbor, the Joint Board a year ago believed that the following conditions would have to prevail prior to the undertaking of a Continental offensive.

1. The surface and sub-surface vessels of the Axis must be swept from the seas, particularly in the Atlantic waters contingent to Europe.
2. Overwhelming air superiority must be accomplished.
3. The economic and industrial life of Germany must be rendered ineffective.
4. The combat effectiveness of the German air and ground units must be weakened by dispersion and the shortage of materials, including fuel.
5. Popular support of the war effort by the peoples of the Axis powers must be weakened and their confidence shattered by subversive activities, propaganda, deprivation, and the destruction wrought.

It is obvious that this preparatory softening up will be accomplished, if at all, mainly by our anti-submarine and aerial campaigns. The first has so far failed. The second is making some, but insufficient, progress. To be sure, the R. A. F. is doing a thorough job of blasting the industrial centers of western Germany, but it has scarcely touched other vital areas. Our own Army Air Force, eight months after Pearl Harbor, has just begun to fight, mainly because of its insistence on operating separately from the R. A. F. Nevertheless, the United Nations now have air superiority. The margin may be increased, but not if a lessening of Soviet resistance permits the Luftwaffe to return to Western Europe.

The large-scale commando raid on Dieppe is cheering but does not necessarily indicate any immediate attempt to establish a second front. In fact, it was hardly a large-scale dress rehearsal. Yet both psychologically and militarily such raids are valuable. They give badly needed combat experience to green troops, afford an opportunity for testing enemy resistance, and inflict large losses. One result of the Dieppe raid was the knowledge that the German defenses are not invulnerable but that their demolition would prove costly. Raids also serve to keep hope alive among the conquered and to create a feeling of insecurity among the conquerors. Not least in importance is the development of cooperation between land, sea, and air units which their execution necessitates.

The facts regarding the second front are not cheering, for they suggest that Hitler has already won the battle of time. Every month from now on will probably see him able to devote more force to repelling a possible invasion attempt in the west. The United States and Great Britain are becoming stronger, but their forces, largely inactive, are unavailable at a time when active Russian resistance is being worn down.

War and Cheap Money

BY HAROLD MAGER

THE Treasury has exhausted its bag of tricks, and this fall, probably in October, will inaugurate a major change in its war-financing program with the flotation of a huge long-term bond issue of between $5 billion and $10 billion of fully negotiable securities, eligible for purchase in unlimited amounts by everyone—individuals, banks, corporations, and all types of institutions. Similar major securities offerings, according to the plans of the fiscal authorities, will take place three or four times a year, the amount of each flotation to depend upon the requirements of the government at the time.

This can only mean that the Treasury's anti-inflationary program is in grave danger of foundering, that it has been brought to the brink of disaster by Secretary Morgenthau's buoyant but wholly unjustified optimism, as expressed in his testimony before the Senate Committee on Finance concerning the Public Debt Act of 1942, and by Congressional fears—in spite of the reassuring Gallup polls—of reprisals in the November elections. Since March the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee have been at loggerheads with the Treasury over an estimated $2 billion in taxes—a tempest in a teapot that has kept the headline writers busy and put the public to sleep. If the contemplated change in Treasury borrowing takes place, the rumpus over the $2 billion will be a case of straining at a gnat only to swallow a camel.

In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942, the federal deficit in round numbers was $20 billion. This year the deficit will be $50 billion. "The logic of the situation," declared Marriner S. Eccles, chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, "calls for government policy designed to draw back into the Treasury out of . . . expanding national income an amount equal to what the government is spending." Unfortunately, it is politics, not logic, which is apparently determining the course of events. Instead of drawing back into the Treasury either in taxes or in borrowings from current income the $75 billion the government will require this year—thus obtaining from the pockets of the people an amount equal to what the government will spend—the Treasury is contenting itself with a haul of barely half that amount, relying on the banks to manufacture the rest and praying, no doubt, that this net addition to the purchasing power of the country will not increase to the point of collapse the already terrific pressure on the OPA's price structure, the NWLB's wage structure, and, last but not least, the nation's moral structure.

The Treasury's problem is not simply to raise enough money to finance the war. Any government that has a mind to can eschew taxes and borrowing altogether and adopt the simple expedient of meeting its obligations with neat, crisp bills right off the printing press. The Treasury's problem is to get the money by methods that will not set off a ruinous inflation. And to prevent this the Treasury must concern itself with the sources from which its revenues come. If inflationary financing is to be avoided, the funds required to finance the war must be drawn from the current income stream, and any funds injected to swell that stream, either by increasing the income-velocity of idle money or by manufacturing new money (bank-credit and printing-press money), must be kept to an absolute minimum. To date the established pattern of war financing leaves little hope that these principles will be adhered to. For the current fiscal year estimated tax receipts will provide less than one-third of the $75 billion of estimated expenditures. The prospective deficit of $50 billion can be met by borrowings from the following sources only: (1) current income, (2) idle hoard, (3) commercial banks. Borrowing from the last two is unquestionably inflationary.

In its non-inflationary borrowing the Treasury has relied mainly on its various war-savings issues, of which it hopes to sell $12 billion this year, an increase of 100 per cent over the previous year. It is highly improbable, however, that the $12 billion will represent a corresponding absorption of current income, much less a measure of reduced consumption. The statistics of sales for last year are illuminating on this point. Of the $6 billion sold, half was bought by investors with idle cash—individuals, fiduciaries, corporations—in denominations of $1,000 to $10,000; the other half was sold in denominations, for the most part, of $500 and $1,000—the so-called "people's bond." What proportion of total sales represented honest-to-goodness reduction in consumption, the sine qua non of an anti-inflation program, the reader can imagine. If Mr. Morgenthau could be persuaded to abandon his program of voluntary savings in favor of a system of compulsory savings, the government would obtain sources of non-inflationary revenue which have hardly begun to be exploited.

In addition to the non-inflationary war savings the Treasury has access to the institutional savings of insurance companies, savings banks, corporations, and fiduciaries. Its recent "tap" offerings have been designed to attract funds from these sources. Such borrowings are for the most part of a non-inflationary character; unfortunately, they can never provide more than a minor share of government requirements.

The bulk of federal borrowings, perhaps as much as $35 billion in the current fiscal year, will therefore be of an admittedly inflationary character. The funds will originate in the vast money-creating potentialities of the commercial banks, a source not to be distinguished in present circumstances from the government printing press itself, though its use is less generally understood and therefore psychologically less disastrous. The banks create new money by the simple expedient of writing up on their books a deposit to the account of the government, a process that can be repeated until a bank has reached the legal minimum of its fractional cash reserve, and that can be repeated even then if reserve requirements are lowered by legal action. Other methods, somewhat more complicated, are also used by the banks, but the effect is the same: the government comes into possession of new money, a net addition to the supply already in existence.

That the Treasury intends to dispose of the larger share of its new $5 billion to $10 billion issues to the banks can be deduced not only from the size of the deficit and the government's inability to tap on a voluntary basis the vast, still unexploited sources of non-inflationary funds but from actual developments in monetary policy. The passage in July of Public Act 656, amending the Federal Reserve Act, has enabled the commercial banks to strip their decks for action. It gives the Federal Reserve Board express authority to change the reserve requirements of the New York City and Chicago member banks without altering the requirements in the other districts, and relieves directors of liability for approving loans made while their banks are temporarily deficient in reserves. To some extent the amendment is designed to afford relief to the New York and Chicago districts for the drain on their funds caused by the flow of money to outlying centers of war production, but it is also intended to enable the banks in these important financial centers to continue to absorb large quantities of government securities. The lowering of reserve requirements—the first reduction was made on August 18—represents a complete reversal of the policy announced only last year for combating inflation.

The problem with which we are confronted can be put in a nutshell. By December of this year the government will be spending $6 billion a month—an estimated maximum which will go on for the duration of the war. It will be collecting $2 billion a month in taxes and $1 billion from the sale of war-savings bonds. Each month after December, therefore, it will have to rely primarily on the banks to provide the remaining $3 billion. Mr. Morgenthau made this painfully clear in his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee last March: "Not to leave any possible misunderstanding from my testimony, what we cannot get from the people's savings, after we have used every legitimate means to attract the savings and earnings of people to invest in government securities, when we have exhausted all of that, then we have to go to the banks." Is it reasonable to suppose that the American economy can withstand the terrific inflationary pressure that will be exerted by such a net addition to total purchasing power every month?

It is difficult to believe that the Administration is unaware of the explosive possibilities of its war-financing program. Yet Mr. Morgenthau gave that impression in his testimony. When he was asked point-blank whether he was satisfied that existing arrangements would provide the government with the necessary funds, he answered, "Senator Vandenberg, as far as I can see of today, I can do the job." And when Senator Taft suggested that a compulsory-savings plan would keep the government out of the toils of the banks, he contented himself with the remark, "That would be an alternative." It may be that the Secretary did not wish to reveal the Administration's fears to Senators who were obviously on a fishing expedition, ready to exploit any slip he might make. But with the situation what it is in Congress, I am inclined to believe that the Administration has decided that an adventurous and opportunist policy in public finance, while it may court economic disaster, is still preferable to an attempt to impose a program of compulsory savings, which might bring political disaster.

If all that matters is the military defeat of the Axis, that can probably be brought about just as well by inflationary as by non-inflationary financing. But it will make a great difference in the new world we hope to build whether the national debt is owned by the people or by the banks.

A Gallery of Quislings

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

THE unhappiest people in Europe today are Hitler's friends, not his victims. No browbeaten Jew in Warsaw's ghetto, no tortured prisoner in Dachau, no innocent hostage awaiting death in a Paris jail could be quite so wretched as the Quislings. They are doomed men and they know it. No power on earth will be able to protect them from the fury of the people once their master is beaten, and every day of the year they die a hundred deaths. Most of them suffer doubly because, like their Führer and idol, they are psychopathic cases, neurotic, plagued with inferiority complexes, victims of early frustrations.

Most pathetic of all is the man who has given his name to the whole breed of puppet rulers, Major Vidkun Quisling, who last February reached the goal of his ambition and by grace of Adolf Hitler became Premier of Norway. Yet even now Quisling is not triumphant. He has the looks, the posture, the behavior of a doomed man. His face is haggard, with bulging eyes, baggy jowls, and deep furrows. The Hitler lock hangs limp. The blond hair has turned gray. The ruddy complexion is blanched.

Foreign observers who have seen a great deal of Quisling in recent months say that the man is mad. Showing paranoiac tendencies early in life, he is said to have become completely deranged as the result of a malarial disease contracted during his twelve years of diplomatic service in Russia. Even casual observers describe him as a nervous wreck, moody and irritable. After the attempt on Laval's life last year, Quisling nearly committed suicide by taking a heavy dose of veronal. Only with great difficulty was his life saved by an eminent specialist of Oslo University, Professor Klaus Hansen. When Quisling wanted to reward the professor by making him dean of the university, Hansen declined the honor, refusing to take the place of Rector Didrik Akup Seip, whom the Nazis had sent to a concentration camp.

It is reliably reported that at least two or three attempts have been made on Quisling's life, but details are not available. A few months ago his personal bodyguard—made up of picked hoodlums under twenty-six years old and at least five feet seven and a half inches tall—was first doubled and then tripled. Quisling's car is preceded and followed by police cars, each carrying four heavily armed birdmen, or storm troopers. Shortly before last Christmas Quisling moved into new headquarters on the island of Bygdö near Oslo. His new home, Grande Villa, was built during the last war by a man who made millions through profiteering. When Quisling moved into his fortress, eight private homes nearby were forcibly evacuated and a permanent cordon of twenty-four armed guards was strung around the turreted, bomb-proof building.

There are good reasons for Quisling's assassination complex and his shattered nerves. He is well aware that he has 98 per cent of the Norwegian nation against him, and the repeated successful commando raids have given him stern warning that his country has a priority for the coming second front. To this prospect Quisling recently replied with the threat of a "most horrible civil war."

Perhaps even more than he fears his enemies, Quisling fears his friends. He knows that the commander of the German forces in Norway, Colonel General Nikolaus von Falkenhorst, hates and despises him; that the arch-schemer, Josef Terboven, Hitler's governor, is jealously watching his every step; and that one of his own sub-leaders, Victor Mogens, who tried to snatch the premiership for himself, is again intriguing against his Führer.

More than anything else, however, it is the world-wide degradation of his name that torments Quisling. It is his special misfortune that his name, instead of being the ordinary Continental jaw-breaker, fitted perfectly into the English language. The London Times, on April 19, 1940, dealt interestingly with this linguistic phenomenon: "... to writers the word Quisling is a gift from the gods. If they had been ordered to invent a new word for traitor . . . they could hardly have hit upon a more brilliant combination of letters. Actually, it contrives to suggest something at once slippery and tortuous."

A fine example of the abnormal lack of scruples that characterizes the Quisling's way of getting ahead is afforded by the early career of Anton Adrian Mussert, the little Führer of Holland. The undersized son of a poor village schoolmaster (he is only four feet ten), Mussert was born May 11, 1894, at Werkendam, South Holland. At school and in college little Anton was an unsociable, hard-working boy with an overweening ambition. He had few friends, but there was one person who liked him, shunning neither effort nor cost to help him get on in the world—the sister of his mother.

When young Mussert was eighteen, his aunt put up the money that enabled him to enter the Technical University at Delft. Having got his degree as civil engineer in June, 1918, he entered the government service and in nine years worked himself up to the position of chief engineer of the province of Utrecht. In 1922, when it had become fairly clear that Mussert was on his way to a solid state position, the generous aunt claimed her reward. At the age of forty-six she asked her twenty-eight-year-old nephew to marry her. Young Anton, whose only hope was that Queen Wilhelmina would refuse the required consent to legalize this union, was forced to accept.

The couple was among the first in Europe to sense the wind of Nazism as it began to blow over the Continent. As early as December 14, 1931, Mussert founded his National Socialistische Beweging, the Dutch Nazi party through which he hoped to play first fiddle in the country. From the beginning, Mussert's N. S. B. made close contacts with its more powerful and financially better equipped counterpart in Germany. Soon the Dutch would-be dictator no longer needed the money of his aunt-wife. He got enough in Berlin and Rome. Dismissed from the government pay roll in 1935, he found the time to build up his party and to organize a band of storm troopers. He went about surrounded by huskies bent on street fighting and always carried a riding whip. While Mussert's program on most points followed the Hitler line, he at first disapproved of anti-Semitism and even invited Jews to join his party. But after a few years he fell in line, and when the German invasion came in May, 1940, he was a full-fledged Quisling who welcomed the invaders.

Vidkun Quisling

Though Hitler hesitated long to put in charge of the Netherlands a man whom he knew all Dutchmen loathed, Mussert, according to latest reports, is now slated for early elevation to the puppet premiership, under the supervision of that other famous traitor, Arthur Seyss-Inquart, German High Commissioner for the Netherlands. But if Mussert is ever to enjoy a few days of glory in the Ridderzaal at The Hague, he should ask his boss to speed the inauguration, for the time is growing short.

"If the English invade Holland," he publicly admitted last year, "the Dutch rabble would exterminate all N. S. B. men." More recently Mussert whined in an address to young storm troopers: "The arch-enemy may attempt to strike at the heart of Germany across this country, situated at the mouth of the Rhine—and I wish I could tell the German people, 'Don't worry, we Netherlanders are ready to beat them off.'"

The story of the Belgian Fascist leader, Léon Marie Joseph Ignace Degrelle, is no less distasteful. This handsome, boyish-looking adventurer used religion, women, and the money of his country's enemies to build up his so-called Rexist Party.

Born in 1907 at Bouillon in southern Belgium, Degrelle began his career as a Catholic stump orator and a fomentor of bigotry by way of popular stories. He made hundreds of thousands of francs through the commercial exploitation of alleged "miraculous apparitions" of the Blessed Virgin at Beauraing. Later in Spain, in search of fresh religious wonders, he produced sensational reports about miracles at Esquioga, in the Basque country. Again he did a brisk business until the local bishop publicly branded the "apparitions" a vulgar deception.

Pierre Laval

In the end, Degrelle's religio-commercial ventures led to bankruptcy, in which his printers lost over a million francs. Degrelle tearfully declared himself to be so utterly destitute that he even had to sell the belongings of his daughter Chantal, but his insolvency was fraudulent, for he had shrewdly transferred all his property to his wife in ample time.

At any rate, Degrelle soon had enough money again to found and build up his Rexist Party. In 1936 the party had a boom year, winning 21 seats in parliament out of a total of 202, but at the next general election, in 1939, it was to lose all but four of them. In September, 1936, Degrelle made a secret trip to Berlin, and a month later he attempted the abortive "march on Brussels" which sank the remnants of his prestige. That the dashing, boisterous Degrelle was really an inflated nonentity was eloquently attested by the French deputy Philippe Henriot, himself a Fascist, who said of him in 1937: "For fifteen minutes I thought he was a great man. Then I knew he was crazy and Rexistism a joke." The full extent of Degrelle's venality was bared last December by the underground paper La Belgique Loyale, whose editor is a former Rexist deputy. According to this report, Degrelle in 1936-37 received 19,000,000 francs (about $600,000) from Mussolini alone, not to mention heavy subsidies from Nazi sources.

After the invasion of Belgium Hitler refused to honor his earlier promises to Degrelle. Politically bankrupt and desperate, the Rexist chieftain last August joined the anti-Soviet "crusade" at the head of a "Walloon Legion" which he had recruited. In March Radio Berlin announced that Degrelle had been wounded in Russia "while warding off an enemy air attack." Shortly before, a reporter of Goebbels's Angriff had written a graphic story of how he found the handsome Léon in an inn, "busy dancing the tango with some Ukrainian girls who could hardly be described as shy."

A few weeks ago the Nazi authorities in Belgium made their first serious attempt to foist a Degrelle Cabinet on the captive King Leopold III. The King, who once had described Degrelle as a "scoundrel," spurned the suggestion.

Pierre Laval is the most notorious of all Quislings. Born poor, the son of an Auvergne butcher, he started his political career as a Socialist agitator but soon became France's most crooked public figure, a politician whose views and influence were always for sale to the highest bidder. With the proverbial tenacity of the Auvergnat, Laval always combined an utter disregard for moral concepts with a marked gusto for horse-trading. A lawyer in private life, he managed to milk millions out of Nick Zographos, a professional gambler, and out of Citroën, prominent as a tax evader as well as an industrialist. As a lucrative side line Laval for years owned and operated a chain of maisons de rendezvous. It is characteristic of the man that although he was closely associated with two Jewish lawyers right up to the fall of France, he abruptly turned anti-Semitic, and now, as Premier, has appointed the rabid Jew-baiter Darquier de Pellepoix as Commissar of Jewish Affairs.

At the height of power, Laval today is, in the words of his friend and fellow-Quisling Marcel Déat, "terribly alone." He has publicly proclaimed his desire to see Hitler win the war. But in the streets of Paris even the children chant "Laval à la lanterne," and no one familiar with the history of France will be surprised if a lamp-post is indeed the next milestone in Pierre Laval's career.

In Hitler's ample collection of Balkan henchmen two men deserve special mention: the stocky regicide Ante Pavelich, who despotically rules the puppet kingdom of Croatia, and the white-haired Professor Bela Tuka, Prime Minister of Slovakia.

Poglavar (leader) Pavelich, fifty-two years old, a lawyer by profession and a devout Catholic, first made headlines in 1929 when he was condemned to death for plotting against the national unity of Yugoslavia. Five years later, as head of the secret revolutionary society Hrvatska Ustasha, he planned and directed the assassination at Marseilles of King Alexander I and of Louis Barthou. Both before and after this crime Pavelich and his chief aid, Eugen Kvaternik, enjoyed Mussolini's hospitality in a sumptuous villa near Turin, Italy. In April, 1941, they repaid Il Duce's generosity by heading the Croat rebellion against invaded Yugoslavia. Now one as Premier and one as Chief of Police, they are trying vainly to suppress the open guerrilla warfare of the Zeleni Kadre (Green Army), the Croat allies of Draja Mihailovich.

Bela Tuka, the "strong man" of Slovakia, is not much better off. He has to defend himself both against the constant intrigues of his fellow-Quislings, State President Josef Tiso and Propaganda Minister Sano Mach, and against the rising tide of popular disaffection caused by the country's participation in the war against Russia.

As a young man, Tuka followed the tide of Magyarization in what was then a province of Hungary. He even forgot his Slovak mother tongue and changed his original first name of Vojtech to the Hungarian Bela. After the war, however, Tuka became intensely conscious of his Slovak nationality and bitterly opposed the union with the Czechs. In 1921 he lost his position as professor of international law at the University of Bratislava, and seven years later he was arrested on a charge of high treason. He served ten years of a fifteen-year sentence in the penitentiary. Tuka has worked hand-in-glove with the Nazis since the days of the Munich beer-hall putsch. In March, 1939, he saw his dream of an "independent" Slovakia come true by the grace of Hitler. After the invasion of Russia he brought his country into the war and signed the Anti-Comintern Pact in Berlin on November 25.

Perhaps the greatest curiosities in Hitler's gallery of Quislings are two men who are playing the role of Germany's puppets for the second time, serving the Führer today as they served the Kaiser twenty-five years ago. They are the burly Cossack Hetman (leader) Paul Skoropadsky, sixty-eight, and Denmark's cynical sixty-four-year-old Foreign Minister, Eric Scavenius.

Ever since his puppet government in Kiev collapsed, after six months, in November, 1918, Skoropadsky has lived at a villa near Wannsee, on the outskirts of Berlin, where he became a good friend of Göring. After the partition of Czecho-Slovakia, in 1938, he attempted to lay the foundations of a new "independent" Ukraine at Chust, Ruthenia, but Hungarian troops seized the town and sent him scurrying back to Berlin. He then helped to work out plans for the German invasion of the Ukraine, but failed to reap his promised reward when the conquest was completed. Skoropadsky's present whereabouts are unknown, and it may well be that he has been liquidated.

Eric Scavenius, who in August, 1914, violated Denmark's neutrality by closing the Belts and the Sound at Germany's behest, returned to the Foreign Ministry in July, 1940, following the Nazi invasion. He is, with Gunnar Larsen, Minister of Transportation, the chief exponent of active collaboration with Germany in the present Danish Cabinet. Scavenius signed the Anti-Comintern Pact, against the will of most of his colleagues, and took the initiative in the formation of a Danish Volunteer Legion (Frikorps Danmark) to fight with the Germans in Russia.

The amazing thing about Scavenius is that he has all his life professed to be a liberal. He is chairman of the board of directors of the influential Copenhagen daily Politiken, organ of the Radical Party. An unscrupulous opportunist, he prides himself on his understanding of Realpolitik. In his eyes the Danish patriots who prefer silent resistance to abject collaboration "live in the moon." To Eric Scavenius anyone who doubts an ultimate German victory must be a fool. That was his opinion during the last war, and it is his opinion today. History probably will record him as the man who twice in a lifetime bet on the same wrong horse.

In the Wind

THE INQUIRING FOTOGRAPHER, a column in the New York Daily News, has acquired a reputation among the paper's readers as a casual but fair sampler of public opinion. On August 22 it asked, "What do you think of this paradox—Every nation in the world seems to be fighting except the fighting Irish?" Five of the six Irish Americans to whom the question was put sympathized with Eire's position, and no one could read the column without concluding that they believed neutrality to be a blessing not only to Ireland but to any nation. Sample phrases follows: ". . . they [the Irish] are doing their best to maintain their sanity . . . have sanely decided to stay neutral . . . too sportsmanlike and too fair to become involved in a war that is no concern of theirs . . . the Irish are not too easily led . . . the Lord help any leader who tries to plunge them into a war that is not of their choosing."

A NEW YORK PUBLISHER'S house organ points out that in building Camp Joyce Kilmer in New Jersey the army is showing no mercy to the trees on the site.

JOSEPH P. KENNEDY, the former isolationist and ambassador to Great Britain, is negotiating for the purchase of the Boston Post.

THE STRICTEST PRONOUNCEMENT on secular education ever made by a member of the Catholic hierarchy in this country came recently from Bishop Karl J. Alter, of the Toledo diocese. He said that parents or guardians who enrol children in public schools or colleges without consulting the church will be refused the Sacrament as recalcitrants. Bishop Alter, incidentally, has been a vigorous supporter of the Pétain and Franco regimes.

THE DAILY WORKER has started a campaign against General Mihailovich, the Yugoslav guerrilla leader. A recent story was headlined: "Rome Radio Admits Mihailovich Is Ally." Another Daily Worker story said that, according to reports from Istanbul, the guerrillas were fighting on, but their leader had deserted them. Short-wave monitors tried to check both stories but found no verification.

[The $5 prize for the best item received in August goes to Clarence Senior of Washington, D. C., for his story about a "bubble gum" company that bought up large stocks of guayule rubber in Mexico.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

Unhyphenated American

BY JACQUES BARZUN

MY HEADING refers not to nationality but to speech. We owe it to the greatest lexicographer since Dr. Johnson, to wit, H. L. Mencken, that the language spoken in the United States is known as American—an offshoot of English developing freely according to the genius of the American people. Today, with the vast number of visitors to our shores, both English and Continental, the influence of American takes on new strength and, as I see it, suggests a new responsibility. We cannot of course undertake to change our pronunciation or diction on a national scale for the sake of union now or hereafter; nor can some of us be persuaded to utter pure vowels, long disused, for the sake of making ourselves understood by educated foreigners who have learned to say "carry" and not "cairey," "moral" and not "mawrl." But there is one thing we can do. We can do something about the habit, quite recent among us, of dropping our h . . . hyphens.

You must have noticed, rather lately, the close clinch of our compound words in print and the shameful birth of single words out of double adjectives. Formerly the legal union was signified by that modest little dash which the French rightly call trait d'union. But now the hyphen is hunted to death like the last heath hen on Martha's Vineyard—or perhaps I should write "heathen." In a recent book by Max Eastman, for example, the eye running smoothly over the author's lucid prose crashes into "ultraaustere." In Mr. Dos Passos's "The Ground We Stand On" every opportunity is taken to turn English into a sort of elegant Eskimo by such compounds as "picturegallery," "hardshelled," and "fifteenyearold." In its latest style sheet a famous university press furthers the drive to agglutination. It calls not only for "cooperate" and "reestablish" without hyphen or helpful two dots over the second vowel, but for the writing of compounds with "non" as one word, so that we read "nonessential" and "nonaggressive."

Or rather, we read no such thing: we read "none-ssential" and "nona-ggressive," then on a second try we go back and take apart what the Printing Interests have decreed shall be joined. I charge the Printing Interests—which include editors, publishers' readers, and other sticklers for form—because it has long been one of their tenets that hyphens are ugly and spoil the page. They also boggle at italics, parentheses, dashes, and sometimes at double quotation marks. Of all these there mustn't be "too many" on a single page or else they cannot lift their heads at the annual prize day of their guild. It is the middleman again; it is boss rule. Why not exterminate semicolons? They are dreadfully asymmetrical, and so are letters that stick out above and below the line. Given world enough and time, those who print will make prose into one long 0000000 of beauty.

The underlying cause of all this regimentation is the desire for consistency. Apparently it is impossible for the ordinary secretarial mind to distinguish between the consistency that makes him walk straighter to his goal and the consistency that pinches his toes like an undersized boot. Consistency of spelling and punctuation is of the latter sort. Hand in a manuscript to a publisher, and an expensive damsel with a ferret eye will point out that whereas on page 12 you spell "western" with a small "w," on page 138 you capitalize it. The notion that apart from clerical error there might be a reason in usage or rhetoric for the two spellings neither occurs to the censor nor stays her hand. Indeed, the firm probably has a policy about capital letters and a list of words that must begin big or little. The firm is sure to have a rule about commas and seeks to instil grammatical logic at the expense of the reader's comfort and the author's rhythm; the foolish assumption being that a good sentence will always scan without commas. It is this presumptuous folly that Baudelaire quietly exposed in the famous instruction to his publisher, "Remove the paragraph if you must, but not the comma in the middle of it."

Among other things, the rule of consistency applied to hyphens deprives the reader of one valuable aid. Suppose an author discussing economics uses the phrase "socially necessary labor time." It usually needs no hyphen. Hence, says the editor, it must never take one. But among the repetitions of the phrase one occurs in which the end of the line comes after the word "labor." On reading proof the author, cherishing consecutive thought, will stick in a hyphen so that the reader will follow through to "labor time" and not halt at the incomplete and misleading "socially necessary labor." But no. The hobgoblin eats up the hyphen, and the orphaned word "time" dangles by itself at the head of the next line.

To be sure, Donne writes—and spells—"interanimates," but this looks suggestively like what it means. In ordinary print nothing makes up for the gear shifting required to make out the author's meaning. Already with "cooperate" so spelled we shorten cooperative store into "Coop," pronounced as if it were a chicken house, and we find more and more educated people speaking of "zu-ology," as if the origin of the word were to be found in Bronx Park.

Abstractly considered, this typographical change may seem trivial and my complaint merely that of conservative habit. But this is not so. The combining of words in English follows very subtle rules which people who work by style sheet will never grasp. Richness of expression, and clarity as well, depends on unforeseen yet natural uniting of words. We may indeed get used to "reestablish" and "nonaggressive" if these two words recur often enough in their welded form, but what will prepare us for even such simple collocations as "premedical student" and "harddrinking lot"?

In German itself, where movable prefixes accustom the eye to word splitting, the longer compounds are neither slightly nor convenient. In English, of which one great virtue is the speed of its unit-meanings, the merging of movable parts is an offense to the underlying spirit of the language besides being a hindrance to rapid reading. Now it is a well-known fact that rapid reading is best from the point of view of both understanding and reflection. The less the actual letters stand out as things in themselves the more the mind can concentrate on what they stand for. But concentration is impossible when at every turn a puzzle or a false start trips you up. If you see the letters "premed" your mind at once leaps to "premeditate" or "premeditation": "premedical" is a hybrid that wrecks rhythm and sense, since in it "medical" is the main idea and "pre" secondary. It is a false parallel to say that "meditate" is the main idea and "pre" secondary, because usage makes "premeditate" a single notion very different from simple "meditate," while "pre-medicate" has no meaning at all. The very reason why "pre-medical" is, and of right ought to be, written with a hyphen is that it is an artificial combination for a special purpose—the classification of college students—and the same reason should prevent it from becoming a single word in common use.

The opposite reason shows why "nevertheless" has rightly been made into one word. So have "churchgoing" and "railroad": they are single notions in current use and are unmistakable at sight. As for "picturegallery" and "midsummermadness," which are also single notions, they are so much more comfortable with a little breather in between that nothing short of "typographical science" could think of denying it to them and to us. The descendants of Gutenberg are presuming on their control of the means of production to turn his movable type into immovable words, forgetting that books are to be read, not solved. With their present logic, enforced through that very dictatorial form of legislation known as the style sheet, we may expect any day the spaghettiparagraph: "Fourscoreandsevenyearsago our fathers broughtforth onthiscontinent anewnation conceived-inLiberty anddedicated totheproposition that allmenare-createdequal."

The Diplomacy of Nemesis

THE RIDDLE OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT. By Robert Bendiner. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

ALL alert citizens have long suspected that their Department of State leaves much to be desired as an arsenal of democracy and as an instrument for the realistic conduct of foreign policy. They have perceived from the tragic course of events through the wasted years that among all the agencies of the Roosevelt Administration no group of bureaucrats yields priority to the State Department in lack of imagination, imperviousness to the forces of liberalism, preoccupation with obsolete formulas, and positive genius for being wrong time after time without suffering any of the consequences of wrongness. They know, albeit vaguely, that all the other war services in Washington are constantly engaged in dubious battle against the blind conservatism of the men under Hull. Of late more and more voices have cried from the housetops that total war cannot be waged successfully unless it is also waged on the diplomatic front and that the Department of State is not only incapable of waging diplomatic warfare but is the chief obstacle to effective operations in all other spheres of combat.

Under these circumstances an adequate analysis of what is wrong with State is an important weapon of victory. No book on the department has appeared since the pedestrian apologia of Bertram Hulén, issued in the spring of 1939. This new volume by the managing editor of The Nation comes very close to filling the bill. Robert Bendiner has performed a difficult task with distinction. To him and to the Union for Democratic Action, which inspired this study, are due the thanks of all who work and fight for freedom.

The book, let it be said at once, is not a denunciation but an explanation. Its strength and its weakness lie in its dispassionate moderation. At all points the author tempers justice with mercy and studiously avoids any quest for scapegoats.

He does not record, for example, that in the spring of 1938 Mr. Hull publicly justified arms exports to Germany on the ground that the peace treaty with the Reich merely forbade German imports of arms from America but did not forbid American exports of arms to Germany. He refrains from quoting the President (July 24, 1941) on the policy of selling war supplies to Japan: "It was very essential from our selfish point of view of defense to prevent a war from starting in the South Pacific. The policy has worked for two years." He says nothing of the decision to preserve full diplomatic relations with Hitler's puppet rulers of Finland, nor of the vacuity of the Atlantic Charter, nor of the disastrous policy of "hands off" with regard to India, nor of some other ways in which the department is helping to lose the war.

Instead of an indictment Bendiner presents first a brief résumé of the diplomacy of appeasement, with ample facts and figures. He gives considerable attention to the department's policies toward Franco and Pétain, noting in passing how the department last summer broke the British blockade of Vichy North Africa. Since the book has come off the press Elmer Davis—horribile dictu!—has announced that shipments to North Africa have again been resumed, and the President has outlined his new plan to appease El Caudillo by varnishing paintings and sending tourists to the Spanish fascist paradise. Ambassador Hayes is obviously a worthy successor to Ambassador Weddell, whose wife gave the Falange a new clubhouse—not out of sympathy for fascism, says Bendiner, but out of "political innocence."

These pages show how and why the department has consistently discouraged the defenders of democracy everywhere and given repeated aid and comfort to the fascist Caesars. The larger and more valuable part of the book is devoted to a detailed treatment of the department at work—its traditions, its atmosphere, its leading figures, its methods of recruiting and promotion, its smug irresponsibility, its peculiar relations with the White House, and its relative immunity to criticism.

Although it is safe to guess that the higher-ups in the department will be unappreciative, Bendiner treats most of them with sympathetic insight. He carries very far the old French proverb: "Who understands all forgives all." He recognizes that the tangled dilemmas of America's diplomats are in part a product of the incapacity of the American public to emancipate itself from past illusions and in part a product of the inevitable limitations of social climbers and clubmen. Despite his revealing comments regarding the Georgetown Foreign Service School, he plays down the growing influence of clericalism among the higher personnel. He likewise minimizes the new role of the "old school tie" and the old role of inherited wealth. Hull he sees as a well-meaning old man, at worst addicted to "compromise, procrastination, and wishful thinking" and prone to "perilous caution, evasion, and paralyzing contradictions." Welles he shrewdly evaluates and rightly praises for his Arlington address. The lesser figures are judiciously weighed. The President's relations with the department are brilliantly analyzed.

As for "What Can Be Done?" Bendiner is not optimistic. "There is no quick and easy way." The disease is not treachery nor yet stupidity but the dry decay of mid-Victorian minds in a world in which—alas!—Queen Victoria is dead. A Congressional investigation might help to remove the moth balls and sweep away the cobwebs, but Bendiner doubts its feasibility. Short of this, he urges increased appropriations, a public foreign-service training school, a better liaison with Congress, and, above all, an awakening of the citizenry to the need of a new diplomacy of democracy.

This balanced evaluation raises the issue of whether the department, as now constituted, is likely to lose the war of today and the peace of tomorrow as it helped to lose the peace of yesterday. "Do we feel confident," asks the author, "that men who have made an outmoded diplomacy the be-all and end-all of their official lives will readily abandon that diplomacy. . . ? To assume an affirmative answer is to take a long risk." A comparison with Downing Street under Baldwin, Chamberlain, and Churchill and with the Quai d'Orsay in the last days of its decadence would throw light on the question. A critique of the department's policies toward the United Nations as the basis of a free world order would also be relevant. But this partial solution of a fateful riddle does make it clear that the department is what it is and acts as it acts because it is committed not to the creation of a living future but to the preservation of an international system which has become an anachronism. With all its vices and virtues, the department has not yet grasped the import of Lincoln's words in another time of testing: "The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present. The occasion is piled high with difficulty, and we must rise with the occasion. As our case is new, so we must think anew and act anew. We must disenthrall ourselves, and then we shall save our country."

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

From America South

FIESTA IN NOVEMBER. Stories from Latin America Selected and Edited by Angel Flores and Dudley Poore, with an Introduction by Katherine Anne Porter. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

THERE is no biographical or historical apparatus in this collection of eighteen Latin American stories and novelettes; except for a few facts dropped by Katherine Anne Porter in her introduction, we are not told whether the writers are young or old, professional literary men, workers, or diplomats, successful or still unknown. But whatever the background of their authors, only two of the stories are about people of education and social privilege. Fiesta in November, the title piece by the Argentinian Eduardo Mallea, is an impressionistic study of a decaying upper-class family, symbolically interwoven with the account of an incident of fascist violence; it has considerable emotional power but it is turgid and forced in the writing and sentimental in its choice of detail. Brother Ass, by Eduardo Barrios of Chile, is a subtle, clever, almost brilliant story of the making of a latter-day saint, told through the mind of a sophisticated fellow-Franciscan. For the rest, these are stories of simple people—Negroes, Indians, and halfbreeds, fishermen, woodcutters, and peons.

These people live either in the country or on or near the sea. They are hot-blooded and reckless, generous and superstitious. Miss Porter points out the absence from their lives of all the familiar paraphernalia of civilization: there are no electric lights, radios, automobiles, or airplanes. But in our own fiction, too, it is the fashion to write about the periods of our history and the sections of our country in which life is still unmechanized. There is this difference: these Latin American stories have none of the self-conscious virtue and false innocence of our own "primitive" writing; they don't patronize their subjects. They deal with a primitive society, but their level of worldliness is very high. When we in the United States write about simple people we implicitly pay homage to modern industrial urban life by reducing man's stature quite in proportion as we strip him of machinery, but these Latin American writers know that man is no less complicated and dignified for living in a simpler culture. This is a true worldliness, and it is the sense in which I can agree with Miss Porter when she says that artists lie less than other people. The point seems to be that good artists lie less than other people—bad artists probably lie rather more than less—and these are good artists.

And what is striking, although it might have been expected, is that all the stories, not excepting the two sophisticated novelettes I have already mentioned, have in common the theme of the struggle between the individual and a hostile environment. Miss Porter speaks of the amount of "weather" in these stories, and certainly storms and cold and drought rage through their pages. But by the opposition between man and his world I do not mean merely this reiteration of "man pitted against the elements." Weather is only one of the hard conditions of these people's lives, a reality, of course, but also the symbol, in nature, of the fierce, almost unbroken circle of enslavement in which they all have their being. When the fleeing peon in The Fugitives meets his death in a torrential downpour, nature is only paying off with the last blow, and his companion who survives is inevitably returned to serfdom; the monk in Brother Ass is the prisoner of his vows, and the wealthy Ragues of Fiesta in November are enslaved by their class; in Country Girl the bondage of Vicenta to her family tradition is represented by the little hoard of gold and jewels stored in her father's cupboard, just as in Rain the bondage of the old couple to their dry soil is dramatized by the freedom of the child to wander at will into and out of their poor lives.

But it is the economic bondage which is the master-bondage of them all, and how could it be otherwise in a land with such a history of economic exploitation and oppression? These stories are the stories of economic prisoners and, read with conscience, they should make any white man feel the guilty burden of his race and any North American blush for our good neighborliness. "I have no master, nigger. Slavery came to an end long ago," says a character in The Sloop Isabel Arrived This Evening, and she is answered, "But how about the belly? Live without eating and I'll call you Queen!" The quotation from one story might be the epigraph for the whole book. For it is the belly that chains these people to their fate and makes the weather so tragically important for them.

I don't know what Miss Porter means when she says in her introduction: "Of 'social consciousness,' which has been a fighting issue between writers all these years in the United States, there is almost none in the explicit sense. The wrongs committed by one class of society upon another are touched upon obliquely, by inference, in sorrowful little stories of evils endured in silence or rebelled against without hope." Does she mean that the disease has not been recognized because these writers don't give it a label or name its cure? True, these stories are about people and not about victims, and they are constructed not of attitudes but of understanding and insights; there are no slogans or parties, there is not even very much hope. But they are as explicit and effective as any stories written by our own most socially conscious and fighting writers of fiction; they are just better stories. DIANA TRILLING

Jennie Lee

THIS GREAT JOURNEY. By Jennie Lee. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

JENNIE LEE was only twenty-four when she became a member of the House of Commons, but her maiden speech—a blistering attack on the budget proposals of Winston Churchill, then Chancellor of the Exchequer—showed her astonished colleagues they had something more than an extremely pretty schoolgirl to reckon with. If she then seemed politically experienced beyond her years, it was because she had begun her political education at a tender age. In the miner's home which she describes in her autobiography with illuminating detail and warm affection the ugly facts of a class society were quickly assimilated.

Since her Parliamentary debut Jennie Lee has traveled widely and mingled in cosmopolitan and bohemian circles in the Old World and the New. But her spiritual home is still in the bleak villages where her grandfather fought and suffered to build up the Fife Miners' Union and where as late as 1926 her father was penalized after the general strike. And her faith in the integrity of the common man and his ability to create a better society remains undaunted.

In the last war Jennie's parents as Socialist pacifists were among the local leaders of a small and unpopular minority, a fact which for a short time outraged her natural childish instinct for the conventional. A historical parallel came to the rescue when she saw the despised and sometimes persecuted opponents of the war as "the modern Covenanters . . . fighting for conscience's sake." Today she is no longer a pacifist, but while working for the defeat of Hitler she remains a critic of the class structure of Britain and questions the ability of the government to win a struggle the revolutionary implications of which it is unable to grasp. Nor has she any faith in the Labor Party, dominated as it is by trade-union bosses whose timidity and lack of imagination she again and again castigates.

Her hopes, rather, turn toward Sir Stafford Cripps, like her an outcast from the ranks of official Labor. In him she sees a possible leader of a third party which would attract the numerous progressive independents in Britain and the many malcontent members of the older parties. But as Jennie Lee realizes, Cripps is "in a dangerously exposed position." In a postscript to her book at the end of May she suggests that the coal crisis provides an opportunity for him to challenge the old order by insisting that the mines be taken out of the hands of the mine owners. "The time has come," she writes, "when he must either do what he was put into the Cabinet to do or resign." But a compromise solution for the coal problem has since been adopted.

And then there is India. However bitter Cripps may feel about the intransigence of the Congress leaders, he can hardly approve the old-fashioned coercion tactics now being used against them. But he remains in the Cabinet. Has the polished technique of the British Tories for taking dangerous opponents into camp once again succeeded?

KEITH HUTCHISON

Hermann Rauschning says:

"This book surpasses by far the general level of the flood of anti-Nazi literature. The author speaks from living and practical experience."

DANZIG offers the conditions of a clinical laboratory for students of the Nazi experiment. Events that took months in the Reich took seven years in Danzig, and being the one democratic region in the German sphere of influence after Nazism came into power, it was the only place where democratic German reaction to National Socialism could be accurately measured.

The author of this book, a former Danzig lawyer now living in the United States, charts the events between 1933 and 1939 which led to the nazification of Danzig, ~~step-by-step~~—from suppression of trade unions and stifling of the press to assaults on private persons, intimidation and violence. In miniature, here is a problem of world organization such as will confront the leaders of tomorrow. $3.50

Nazi Conquest of Danzig

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

BY HANS L. LEONHARDT

IN BRIEF

THE GLOBE PLAYHOUSE: ITS DESIGN AND EQUIPMENT. By John Cranford Adams. Harvard University Press. $5.

Long after the Elizabethan drama had become a favorite subject of literary study little was known about the stage and theater for which it was written beyond a few vague notions involving the "bare stage" and the wooden "O." During the past thirty or forty years, however, an immense amount of time has been devoted to the effort to construct from the evidence, largely circumstantial, a more or less detailed picture of what the stage was like and what went on there. The author of the present book reexamines all that relates to the Globe, Shakespeare's own theater during the most important part of his career, adds some evidence of his own, and attempts to draw a somewhat more precise and particularized picture than any previous one. Other scholars have often used surviving stage directions and relevant bits of dialogue as clues to stage methods, but Mr. Adams is apparently the first who guarantees that he has examined every extant play and considered every such bit of evidence. He also uses contemporary building practice as a basis for discussion of what the general dimensions of the whole theater must have been and gives us the very few figures for which there is documentary justification. In general, he may be a bit too confident that the implications of his evidence can only be what he thinks they are, but his study is certain to take its place with the earlier standard ones. The description of just how a big scene in "The Tempest" must have been staged is very ingenious.

STRETCHING YOUR DOLLAR IN WARTIME. By Ruth Brindze. The Vanguard Press. $1.75.

Here are many useful suggestions to the housekeeper for meeting the rapidly rising cost of living. Miss Brindze's advice on the care and buying of food, clothing, all sorts of household equipment, and even automobiles is detailed and eminently practical, but few housewives, especially those who have outside jobs, will have the time or patience to shop quite as carefully as Miss Brindze apparently does herself. And very few men of the millions who select their own shirts will want to be bothered with counting the number of stitches in a seam to test the quality. Despite a few limitations of this sort, the book is admirable and should form a part of every efficient housekeeper's equipment in these days of rationing and shortages.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

What Is Your Name? By Louis Adamic. Harper. $2.50.

Mill and Mansion: A Study of Architecture and Society in Lowell, Massachusetts, 1820-1865. By John Coolidge. Columbia University. $3.75.

Billy Mitchell: Founder of Our Air Force and Prophet Without Honor. By Emile Gauvreau and Lester Cohen. Dutton. $2.50.

George Spelvin: American, and Fireside Chats. By Westbrook Pegler. Scribner's. $2.50.

Parachutes. By Herbert S. Zim. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.

Submarines: The Story of Undersea Boats. By Herbert S. Zim. Harcourt, Brace. $3.

RECORDS

OUTSTANDING on Columbia's August list is the third of Beethoven's "Rasumovsky" Quartets Op. 59, played by the Budapest Quartet (Set 510, $4.73). The work is one of the greatest of the "Eroica" period of Beethoven's career, both in what is characteristic of the period and in what is not—that is, in the triumphant finale, breath-taking in the relentless drive of its concentrated energy, and on the other hand the mysterious opening of the first movement, which points to the works of later years, and the wonderful slow movement, which is like nothing else in Beethoven in its strangeness, its "remote and frozen anguish." I cannot imagine a more effective statement of the work in living sound than the Budapest performance; but I can imagine a better reproduction of this sound than the cold, harsh, coarse one that comes from these records.

Also on the August list is one of Brahms's finest works, the Variations on a theme by Haydn: to the two superb and beautifully recorded performances of this work that have been available—Weingartner's on Columbia records, Toscanini's on Victor—Columbia adds the performance of Mitropoulos with the Minneapolis Symphony (Set X-225, $2.63). Having had occasion to object to what Mitropoulos has done with most of the music I have heard him conduct, I am surprised by the excellence of this performance. For the most part he has the work proceed along customary lines; only in variations 6 and 7 are there striking departures from custom—in each an unusually fast pace. In each the unusual conception of the music is, for me, valid and interesting; what is unsatisfactory in variation 6 is the roughness and lack of clarity which may be a result of driving the orchestra faster and harder than it can go with ease, or of unskillful recording: the sound of the orchestra throughout this side is dull, muffled, cloudy. On the other sides it is brighter; but either in the performance or in the recording (and I suspect it was in the performance) there seems to have been an attempt to make all the strands of the polyphonic texture heard without any care to lift the more important ones into greater prominence than the less important—with the result that the important melodic lines in variations 3 and 4 are difficult to follow, and there is not the balanced clarity of the Weingartner and Toscanini versions. These older versions, therefore, are to be preferred to the new.

The music of Wagner's "Ring," on the other hand, is, for me, part of his worst; and that goes for "Dawn," "Rhine Journey," and "Siegfried's Death" from "Götterdämmerung" (Set X-224, $2.63). A friend for whom I played the first side without a preliminary word listened for a while and then remarked: "A tired old man's performance." As it happened it was the performance of the over-seventy-five-year-old Weingartner with the Paris Conservatory Orchestra; and what prompted the remark was not any feebleness in the playing—since Weingartner, as always, has the orchestra under control—but the perfunctoriness of the performance, its complete lack of the rhetorical expansiveness and power that makes Toscanini's performances of the two excerpts in the recent Victor set so magnificent. A person who cares for the music will, I think, prefer the Toscanini performances; he will also prefer the expanded versions of the excerpts that Toscanini conducts—with the additional first-act music with which he bridges the gap between "Dawn" and "Rhine Journey," the music of the dying Siegfried with which he leads up to "Siegfried's Death"; and he will prefer the greater richness of the recorded sound of the Toscanini performances—though the sound of the Weingartner is good. (Tovey, who objects to concert performances of "bleeding chunks" of Wagner, and for whom "Siegfried's funeral march, out of its context, is nonsense," observes further that "of its four main themes . . . two are among Wagner's most obvious lapses. . . . If we are to regard such a fragment as this funeral march as an independent composition, it is a serious defect that one of its main themes should be the very awkward and mechanical transformation of Siegfried's juvenile horn-theme into a sophisticated grown-up affair in learned syncopations, and that another should be the theme of Brünnhilde as a mortal woman, a theme which descends markedly below Weber's most suburban [spießbürgerlich] style.")

The second act of "Tristan and Isolde" is part of Wagner's best; and Columbia gives us an excerpt which Tovey would object to—the beautiful passage in which Tristan replies to King Marke and then asks Isolde if she will follow him. It is sung by Melchior as well as Melchior is capable of singing these days, with an orchestra conducted by Leinsdorf. On the reverse side is the prayer from "Rienzi"; and the two excerpts are well recorded (71388-D, $1.05). On another single disc (71389-D, $1.05) Melchior sings two superb passages from Verdi's "Otello"—"Dio mi potevi scagliar" and "Niun mi tema."

On another single disc, finally (11817-D, $1.05), is Rodzinski's performance of the Overture to Weber's "Freischütz"—erratic in pace, nervous, and on the whole not effective, and recorded in a way that makes a fortissimo in the middle of a side less loud than a forte at the beginning.

Two readers have questioned my giving all the details of the reproducing equipment on which I play records. But I do this because records sound different on different machines, and I consider it my obligation to report the sound which they have (1) on wide-range machines—including light, sensitive pickups—such as a few readers have, and (2) on limited-range machines such as most readers have. I owe it to the first group of readers to report the defects of recording or surfaces that wide-range equipment reveals; and the second group should know to what extent these defects are concealed by limited-range equipment. The surfaces of nearly all the records I have discussed in the present article were unusually quiet with the wide-range Brush PL-25 pickup; only the first four sides of the Beethoven Op. 59 were bad; and they were quieter with the limited-range Astatic Tru-tan.

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER, one of The Nation's contributing editors, has recently returned from India.

HAROLD MAGER was formerly engaged in research for the New York State Board of Housing and the Laura Spelman Fund. He has contributed articles to the New Republic and other journals.

JOACHIM JOESTEN, for six years a correspondent in the Scandinavian countries, is now on the staff of News-week.

JACQUES BARZUN, assistant professor of history at Columbia, is the author of "Darwin, Marx, Wagner."

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN, Woodrow Wilson professor of government at Williams College, is the author of "Night Over Europe: The Diplomacy of Nemesis."

DIANA TRILLING reviews fiction regularly for The Nation.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is Indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

MOVING?

If you are a Nation subscriber and expect to move soon, please give us two weeks' notice and your old address as well as new address.

Write to The Nation
55 Fifth Avenue New York City

LANGUAGES

Speak . . . read
JAPANESE
CHINESE, SPANISH, RUSSIAN
Quickly, Easily, Correctly

The Linguaphone Method enables you to speak any of 29 languages—by LISTENING to voices of native teachers in your own home. Amazingly simple, thorough, sound; no smattering. SEND FOR FREE BOOK.

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
3 R. C. A. Building, N. Y. C. • Circle 7-0830

WANTED TO BUY

LINGUAPHONE. Any language. Indicate condition, language, number of records and books. Room 804. 18 W. 41st St., N. Y. C.

FOR RENT

BROOKLYN HEIGHTS: Small house, sunny through floor, living room, 13x19, fireplace, bookshelves. Bedroom 13x13, complete kitchen, bathroom, automatic heat, hot water. All Boro Hall subways. Lease $45. Crawford, MAin 4-3491.

114 St., 508 W.—Arizona, $5 and up. Opposite Columbia, luxurious studios, house-keeping; 24-hour elevator, switch-board service; special monthly rates.

WEARING APPAREL

IMPORTANT REMOVAL NOTICE: After Labor Day, Sept. 8, Miss Goodman will reopen with her new and lovely Fall showing of model dresses, coats and suits at 244 Lexington Avenue, near 34th Street. Telephone, MU 5-0670.

BOOKS

IT MAY BE HARD TO GET SOME THINGS—

BUT THERE'S NO RATION
ON FOOD FOR THOUGHT

BOOKS will give you more than your fill of ideas, information and stimulation during these days when our work often forces us into intellectual blackouts.

See your bookseller
today for the reading vitamins you need.

AMERICAN BOOKSELLERS ASS'N
Members Everywhere

Letters to the Editors

Bertrand Russell on India

Dear Sirs: The Indian situation is dangerous, and if it is to be wisely dealt with, clear thinking is very necessary. I find in some quarters a lack of clear thinking which may increase the dangers that we all wish to diminish.

There are some points about which we are all agreed. First, the Indian difficulty must be handled in the way most likely to help in winning the war. Second, as soon as the war is over, India is to have independence—as complete, at any rate, as Great Britain or any other country will have. The only practical question at issue is: what is to be done during the continuance of the war? I feel that neither the British government nor the Congress Party is treating this question in the way most likely to lead to victory. Many people in America seem to feel that Gandhi must be in the right since he stands for national independence; others feel that loyalty to an ally makes criticism of the British government impolitic. Both seem to me mistaken. On the one hand, insistence on immediate independence, with all the confusion resulting from a transfer of government in the middle of a war, would probably end in the enslavement of both India and China to Japan. On the other hand, the problem of India, since it is part of the problem of victory, is a problem on which all the United Nations have a right to a voice.

The question of India is much more complex than it appears to many American liberals. They do not know that one of the points on which the Cripps mission broke down was the unwillingness of the Hindus to admit that Moslems have the same right to independence from Hindus as Hindus from British. They do not face the difficulties of a complete change of government when a Japanese invasion is imminent. They profess to think that Sir Stafford Cripps's promises are not to be trusted. They imagine that if the demands of the Congress Party were granted, India would become enthusiastic for the war, although the example of Ireland should suggest the contrary. They attribute the poverty of Indians to the British, in spite of the fact that the poverty of China has always been at least as great. Mr. Louis Fischer, in The Nation of August 22, mentions that the infant death rate is 274 in Bombay as against 66 in London, and remarks that "such figures burn deep resentment, hatred, and disloyalty into the soul of India." The implication that the higher death rate of Bombay as compared with London is entirely the result of British misgovernment is most unfair. Bombay has a hot climate and a high birth rate; London a low birth rate and a temperate climate. I have no doubt that the British government could have done more than it has done to reduce the high infant death rate, just as the government of the United States could have done a great deal more than it has done to reduce the death rate among the children of Southern Negroes; but there is no reason to suppose that fewer children would die in Bombay if British rule were to be succeeded by a government headed by Mr. Gandhi. Some years ago Mr. Gandhi stated that the earthquakes then troubling India were sent as a punishment for sin. This attitude has never been very effective against a high infant death rate. And Mr. Fischer should remember that there is every reason to think that the death rate in China, before the beginning of the war with Japan, was at least as high as in India.

Above all, American liberals refuse to face the difficulty of establishing Indian independence overnight when every scheme hitherto suggested, whether by Indians or by the British, is vehemently rejected by a large section of Indian opinion.

The British government has been gravely at fault in the past, and Mr. Churchill has been even more reactionary than the government, as appeared in his opposition to the Government of India Act. In these circumstances it is not surprising that Sir Stafford Cripps's promises were not received at their face value. This difficulty, had it stood alone, could have been easily overcome: his promises could have been guaranteed by the United Nations. But this difficulty did not stand alone. The demand that India should be given full independence here and now is incompatible with victory, and would not be made by the Congress Party if it thought the defeat of Japan more important than immediate emancipation from England. It is this demand that creates the apparently insoluble difficulty. I believe, however, that a solution is still possible, though at some cost to British amour propre.

India, as an imperial possession, is lost to England; everyone in England, including Mr. Churchill and Mr. Amery, knows this. The problem is to make the transition to self-government without handing India over to Japan. This problem concerns China and Russia just as much as it concerns England. It should be dealt with, not by England alone, but by the United Nations jointly. There should be appointed, with the consent of the British government, a commission of four men, chosen respectively by the British, American, Soviet, and Chinese governments, with full power to negotiate with all sections of Indian opinion and to make recommendations keeping in mind two objectives: first, that the war must be won; second, that Indian independence should be granted as soon as it can be granted without hindering this first objective. If, as I believe, complete independence cannot be granted now without retarding the conduct of the war, the commission would probably find that some of the functions of government could be transferred without delay. There should be, at the earliest possible moment, interim measures to produce an armistice in the present Indian conflict and, later, considered proposals for a permanent settlement. The British government should undertake to accept the findings of the commission provided the other three governments did so. If any section of Indian opinion rejected them it would be in effect siding with the Japanese and would have to be treated as a hostile force.

The measure should be regarded as a first step toward the establishment of an inter-Allied authority for deciding questions of common concern; and such an authority, in turn, should be viewed as the nucleus of a future international authority for the preservation of peace. Complete national independence, even for the strongest nations, has become an anachronism, since it can only lead to successive enslavement by predatory powers. For the same reasons a private imperialism, such as that of England in India, is equally an anachronism. But those American liberals who think that insurgent nationalism is right while imperialist nationalism is wrong are still living in the nineteenth century.

BERTRAND RUSSELL

Malvern, Pa., August 27

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 12, 1942

NUMBER 11

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

201

EDITORIALS

No Man-Power Policy!

203

The President's Message

204

Franco Changes Guard by Freda Kirchwey

205

ARTICLES

The Geopolitical Front by G. A. Borgese

206

Greater Loyalty Hath No Man by James Henle

209

Short-Wave Artillery by Stefan J. Rundt

210

Hollywood Belligerent by Ezra Goodman

213

In the Wind

214

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

C. B. S.—Berlin the Third by Ralph Bates

215

The Progressive Psyche by Lionel Trilling

215

Bon Voyage, S. V. B. by Frank Jones

217

Three German Poets by Rolfe Humphries

218

Records by B. H. Haggin

219

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

220

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor

RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

NAZI SOURCES NOW DESCRIBE ROMMEL'S attempted advance in Egypt as a mere "reconnaissance in force," but the nature of the attack and the fact that the whole Afrika Korps was thrown against the British left wing suggest that a full-fledged offensive had been planned. In any case Rommel is now back where he started from, minus a considerable number of troops and with a nasty dent in his armor. The new British command in Egypt has come through its first test with honors, but it remains to be seen whether it can turn from the defensive to the offensive and inflict a smashing defeat on the Axis forces in North Africa before new supplies reach them. Until Rommel's panzer units are mauled much more thoroughly than they have been in the past week the optimism voiced by Wendell Willkie at Cairo must unfortunately be considered premature. The fighting on the Alamein front demonstrated once again the vital importance of air superiority, and this time it was definitely on our side. The German tanks, after making their way to some depth through the British mine fields, were stalled by our armor and artillery and were then subjected to severe handling by the air force. Constant effective attacks were also made on the enemy supply lines all the way from the front back to Tobruk and beyond, and a heavy toll was taken of Axis shipping in the Mediterranean.

✱

THE DEFENDERS OF STALINGRAD DESERVE, perhaps, part of the credit for the Axis setback in Egypt, for according to some reports German aircraft were diverted to that front from Africa. Certainly the German High Command is throwing everything it has into the effort to capture the great city on the Volga. But although some days ago Berlin was claiming that all would be over in twenty-four hours, the prize still eludes the Nazi grasp. Pouring out of the factories, the workers of Stalingrad have marched to join the Red Army in a desperate effort to turn back the enemy. Every recent German gain has been followed by a savage counter-thrust, but according to latest dispatches, a dangerous wedge has been driven into the Soviet lines directly west of the city. Stalingrad's defenders, however, are determined to make it a "red Verdun," and Hitler has not yet finished paying the price of its conquest. In the direction of the Grosny oil fields the German drive also seems to have been held up, but there is reason to fear that the Germans may have succeeded in taking Novorossiisk—the last first-class Soviet naval base on the Black Sea. It is encouraging that despite their preoccupations with defense the Russians have been able to make a number of long-distance raids on eastern Germany. It is to this region that the Nazis have been attempting to remove their industries to take them beyond the present range of the R. A. F. These Soviet bombing attacks appear to have been carried out with remarkably few losses, which suggests that German air defenses have been concentrated in the west. The synchronization of aerial attacks from both directions is an important development, and we hope before long to hear of Russian, British, and American airmen joining hands, figuratively speaking, over Berlin.

★

THE SHAKE-UP IN THE JAPANESE CABINET involving the resignation of Foreign Minister Tojo and of several of his subordinates has been widely interpreted as forecasting an imminent attack on the Soviet Union. Such an interpretation is fully justified by past Japanese political behavior. An even more drastic shake-up, it will be recalled, preceded Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor. Although Tojo could scarcely be considered a friend of the Soviet Union, he was identified with the negotiations that led to the signing of the Soviet-Japanese non-aggression pact in the spring of 1941. It is quite conceivable, therefore, that his resignation signifies an intention to violate that pact. On the other hand, the Japanese government may have wished to give just such an impression in order to conceal its plans for an attack elsewhere. There seems to be little doubt that the Japanese have a surprise of some sort up their capacious kimono sleeves, and the extent of the recent withdrawals from China suggests that it will be a major undertaking. Since weather conditions will shortly become unfavorable for an attack on Siberia, a drive against a weak and divided India appears more probable.

★

THE REACTIONS OF THE SENATE FINANCE Committee to the Treasury's spending-tax plan were so generally negative that it appears likely to be still-born. This will be unfortunate if as a result attention is diverted from direct measures to curb spendable income and shifted back to the sales tax. But it must be admitted that the Treasury plan is a good deal better in intention than in construction. Its great virtues are that, unlike the sales tax, it avoids the erosion of incomes on the subsistence level and retains the progressive principles of the income tax. Its outstanding fault is its complication, which would place a grievous burden of additional paper work on the citizen and would make an adequate check by the Internal Revenue Department an almost insuperable task. Another major objection to the plan is the fact that it taxes spending after instead of before the event, which weakens it as an implement for curbing inflation. We agree with Mr. Morgenthau that fiscal measures to reduce the pressure of expanding incomes on a contracting supply of goods are due and overdue. But the Weinstein scheme, summarized by Keith Hutchison in The Nation of July 11, seems to us to be both simpler and more flexible than the Treasury plan. Mr. Weinstein, who gives a full account of his proposals in the September issue of Taxes, suggests that certain categories of goods and services shall require the presentation of purchase coupons, which, after the exhaustion of a specified exempt amount during a fixed period, will be obtainable at a progressively increasing premium payable in advance. This plan would clip spending power prior to its actual exercise, lend itself to decentralized administration, and avoid the public and private accountability problems created by the Treasury spending tax.

★

"WE ARE SO AFRAID OF WRONGING OTHERS that in doubtful cases we prefer to wrong ourselves." The speaker is Joseph Goebbels; the "we" refers to the German people. The sentence is from an article recently published in a Nazi weekly in which Dr. Goebbels told his countrymen that they were too unbiased toward their enemies. On the contrary, he said, they should acquire a "sound national ego" which would make them turn upon the British the hatred they deserve "because they wish to keep us prisoners in the narrowness of our national existence. . . ." "One cannot imagine what our people would do to a government that would tell us as many lies as Mr. Churchill tells the British people [it is still Goebbels speaking]. Nevertheless, there are still people among us who are prone to accept this as a kind of political style." It is difficult to stop quoting, but we have only enough space left to decode the Goebbels sermon. Its text is, Hate thy neighbor as myself. Its key sentence runs, "We do not want to experience another such catastrophe as in 1918." Obviously the Germans have been listening to British and American broadcasts. Obviously they are alarmed at the prospect of defeat; but because they are sick to death of war, they are pinning their slim hopes for the future on the miracle of a decent peace. Nazi propaganda on the home front must be more than ever directed toward making the German people fear the future peace more than they hate the present war.

★

AMONG THE AMERICANS ON THE GRIPSHOLM none is more deserving of honor from his fellow-countrymen than J. B. Powell, for many years editor of the militantly anti-Japanese China Weekly Review. Powell knew no fear and pulled no punches. He fought against all who obstructed progress, whether they were British diehards, American super-nationalists, or Japanese militarists. No American in the Far East has been a more consistent friend of the Chinese. In recent years he has repeatedly risked his life in an effort to arouse the United States against the Japanese menace. As a result several attempts were made to assassinate him. On one occasion a Japanese threw a hand grenade at him; fortunately, it failed to explode. He was arrested on December 9 and thrown into prison. After months on starvation rations he contracted pellagra; his feet were frozen and gangrene set in, causing him to lose all his toes. His weight fell from a normal 160 to 75 pounds. If Powell were in the army, he would be given a D. S. O. for bravery and cared for at government expense. But although his exploits as a civilian are no less worthy of honor, his return has scarcely been noticed in the press. Obviously, there should be some public recognition of his years of foreign service. Preferably, it should come from the government. If this is impossible, why should he not receive a Pulitzer prize for his outstanding contribution to American journalism abroad?

No Man-Power Policy!

THE recent conflicting statements on the draft issued by Representative May of the House Military Affairs Committee and Brigadier General Hershey illustrate the confusion which still surrounds our national man-power policy. The question of whether we should draft eighteen- and nineteen-year-old youths or married men with families is, of course, but a minor aspect of the general problem of making the most efficient use of our rapidly dwindling supply of man-power. Surveys made recently in several war-production centers indicate that many industries are already beginning to feel pinched for workers as a result of stepped-up inductions into the army. Five large airplane plants in Southern California, for example, are reported to be losing 7,000 workers a month to the services. Serious labor shortages are expected to become general by the end of the year if the present rate of inductions is continued. And according to General Hershey, an even greater expansion in the armed forces is planned for next year. By the end of 1942 the army is expected to number some 4,500,000 men and the navy possibly 750,000. Some observers are predicting a combined army-navy strength of 11,000,000 by the end of 1943. A more conservative estimate is 9,000,000.

Since most of the men who will be called into service will come from higher age groups than heretofore, it is obvious that the drain on war industries will be severe. The situation is made worse by the fact that the plants themselves will demand a huge number of additional workers in the coming year. At present about 12,500,000 persons are employed in war industries. The number is expected to rise to 17,500,000 by the end of this year and to 20,000,000 by the end of 1943.

In theory, the responsibility for properly balancing military and production needs and making certain that the man-power demands of the war industries are met with a minimum of disturbance rests with the War Manpower Board. But although the board has now been functioning for about five months, there is little evidence that these basic questions of policy have even been tackled. On the contrary, several government departments are still pursuing independent and sharply conflicting policies. It is difficult to believe, for example, that a decision to raise an army and navy of 11,000,000 men in 1943 was taken after a careful survey of the amount of production needed to supply not only this force but the men already under arms in England, Russia, and China. The evidence suggests rather that the army and navy determined on this figure without considering the larger questions of United Nations strategy, and that the WPB has pursued an independent course in handing out contracts regardless of the man-power potentialities of the areas concerned. Instead of serving as an over-all planning agency, the War Manpower Board appears to have been occupied with technical problems, such as preventing labor piracy and improving the efficiency of the United States Employment Service.

Despite the acute shortage of labor in certain areas, no plan has yet been worked out for using the selective-service machinery for distributing workers where they are most needed for the war effort. No effective use has been made of the information collected through the occupational questionnaires sent to selective-service registrants. Although it is apparent that a large proportion of the 7,500,000 additional workers that will be needed in the war industries before the end of 1943—not counting replacements for men who are drafted—must be women, little is being done in preparation. British experience has shown that women are fully capable of replacing men in most jobs but that a great many things must be done before they can be utilized. Special training courses must be set up. Day nurseries must be established in connection with the factories to care for younger children. Rearrangements of shifts are necessary to provide for part-time work. Special attention has to be given to personnel work and the improvement of working conditions in order to reduce excessive turnover and absenteeism. After much blundering and lost production, Britain has made most of these adjustments. We hope that the women's policy committee just appointed by Mr. McNutt will seize its opportunity to draft a program which will save us from similar blunders.

The President's Message

WE HOPE Congress will not allow any feeling of hurt pride to stand in the way of immediate legislation making possible the stabilization of all prices as requested by the President. In more normal times it might rightly object to the ultimative quality of Mr. Roosevelt's message, but now that we are fighting "the toughest war in history" there is no more justification for amour propre as usual than there is for politics or business as usual. The unprecedented nature of the President's message is warranted by the urgent need for action if the price situation is not to get entirely out of hand. Controlled prices have held steady for the past five months, but farm prices have been rising at the rate of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent a month—a leak in the ceiling which is endangering the whole structure.

The proposals put forward by the President are by no means unfair to the farmer. A ceiling on farm prices equivalent to 100 per cent of parity or recent prices, whichever is the higher, should give him both his fair share of purchasing power and an incentive to increased production of commodities for which there is an especially large demand. Moreover, the President is also proposing to put a floor under farm prices with a view to protecting agriculture from any sudden slump either during or after the war.

If the cost of living can be held at its present level, labor should not object to stabilized wages. The President did not indicate exactly what steps he proposed to take to this end, but there is reason to suppose he plans to generalize the WLB's "Little Steel" formula, which seeks to maintain the purchasing power of wages at their January 1, 1941, level. Stabilization of pre-war incomes does not and cannot mean the maintenance of pre-war standards of living, let alone standards of comfort, as the President might have emphasized even more strongly. All of us, except those on a bare subsistence basis, must expect to contract our accustomed way of life severely. Up to now most of us, apart from families whose men have gone into the services, have had to accept only minor sacrifices. But if inflation is to be headed off, stabilization of wages and prices is not enough. Drastic curtailment of individual spending power by means of taxation and compulsory saving is an urgent necessity.

Here again Congress has been laggard in its responsibilities, and it is still wrangling over a tax bill which ought to have been completed months ago. Further, it seems more interested in easing the burdens of various interests than in jacking up taxes to an extent commensurate with the Treasury's requirements. The President

FOR EVERY

WE SPENT ON FOOD IN AUGUST 1939
WE HAVE TO PAY NOW:

 $1.32	 $1.32	 $1.33	 $1.33
DAIRY PRODUCTS	SUGAR	MEATS	CEREALS and BAKERY
 $1.42	 $1.43	 $1.47	 $1.62
FATS and OIL	EGGS	FRUITS and VEGETABLES	FISH, FRESH and CANNED

SOURCE: U. S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

GRAPHIC BY PICK-S

has also asked for action on this front and has again urged that income-tax rates be adjusted to insure that no individual has a net income, after taxes, exceeding $25,000. We anticipate a new howl of anguish from the well-to-do and a spate of arguments to prove that the war cannot be financed by soaking the rich. This is perfectly true, but it is also true that we cannot expect to take one-third or more of the income of persons in the lower brackets—as we must—while leaving those in the upper brackets with the means, after paying taxes, to maintain a high standard of luxury.

Franco Changes Guard

By FRED KIRCHWEY

IT IS easy to understand why Washington officials—and not only the congenital appeasers—are watching developments in Spain with anxious hope. Much is at stake. As we said last week, the President's announcement of a plan to restore Spain's battered cultural monuments and to boom its tourist trade after the war was no mere exercise in benevolence; so bald an overture to Franco proclaimed a major political maneuver. Coming immediately after it, the Spanish Cabinet upset has produced almost the effect of a diplomatic coup, and many commentators have allowed themselves the risky satisfaction of counting up the still unhatched chickens of appeasement.

This is a natural impulse. Ahead lie months of dark uncertainty. While the Russians hold nine-tenths of Hitler's armed force locked in desperate conflict in the Caucasus and the Volga valley, many observers see the Allied center of gravity moving toward North Africa and the Middle East. If this theater is to provide the only major second front, if a great Allied drive is in the making there, then our relation with Spain will become more and more critical. Spanish Morocco borders French North African territory on the west; and it would be of crucial importance to Allied forces operating against Rommel and the Italians from that direction to be able to count on a friendly neutral across the straits from Gibraltar.

And so it is easy to sympathize with the hopes of those who read into the Spanish Cabinet shuffle a move away from the Axis. Such a shift would go far toward offsetting the nasty political effects of appeasement. But unfortunately nothing that has happened offers any valid excuse for castle-building. If the prospect of a successful North African campaign depends on such risky speculations as the purchase of Franco's favors, we view the coming months with added apprehension.

What are the facts?

It is true of course that relations between the Falangists and the army, always strained, have lately been growing worse, and that this situation precipitated the Cabinet crisis. But the same thing has happened at least twice before. As early as 1939 Franco was forced to resolve a similar conflict. Then as now he patched up the quarrel by getting rid of a few troublesome individuals on both sides and installing men whom he could trust. Then as now the shift was widely interpreted as a defeat for the pro-Axis group. Now as then the interpretation is based on superficial appearances rather than underlying facts.

From the start the Falangists have been trying to establish its power in the army, as did the Brown Shirts in Germany and the Black Shirts in Italy. About three months ago the walls of Madrid were plastered one night with posters announcing that the Falangists and the army were bound in an indissoluble brotherhood and together were masters of Spain. Next day General Varela, the Minister of War, stepped out of his car before one of the posters and tore it down. That night the posters reappeared. This time Varela ordered army officers to remove them; they did it, all but precipitating an open conflict in the process. The situation grew more tense until, at a recent ceremony at Bilbao attended by the War Minister, a bomb was thrown; it was charged that the attack was a Falangist attempt on Varela's life.

Obviously, Franco had to act. Such incidents endangered the regime itself. General Varela not only was Minister of War. He is the only officer ever to have been decorated twice with the Cruz San Fernando, Spain's highest military honor. His prestige is enormous in the army, and he is hated in equal measure by the Falangists, which has looked upon him as a chief instrument in the effort to restore the throne. Franco moved with decision; he took the most striking step possible, tossing his own brother-in-law, the Foreign Minister and head of the Falangists, to the army. And then in a dramatic counter-move he threw Varela himself to the Falangists.

The balance in the government has not been visibly changed. Jordana, the new Foreign Minister, is, it is true, a monarchist. But a monarchist is not necessarily and by definition a partisan of the democracies. Jordana was Franco's Foreign Minister all through the rebellion and in that role helped establish Hitler and Mussolini as the real dictators of Spain. The new Minister of the Interior, Blas Gomez Perez, and the new Minister without Portfolio, Manuel Mora Figueroa, are both Falangists, "old" Falangists whose adherence to the party and to fascism long antedated the Spanish war. Perez has already announced a policy of "repression with unswerving energy of all provocation or acts of sabotage."

The Falangist organ Arriba described the Cabinet shake-up as merely a "change of guard." This much was quoted in the American press, but the dispatches omitted Arriba's comment on attempts to find other political meanings in the incident. "The speculations of a gang of foreigners," it said, "supported by an internal gang of Free Masons and intriguers, are well known to us. We have had a large experience of their interpretations, and as in other cases in the past we merely take note of them now." And it went on to proclaim the permanent, unchanging, and silently heroic nature of the Franco government's policy—foreign as well as domestic.

One need not take Arriba's word as gospel, but at least it represents the official Falangist position: nothing has happened, and those who expect a change are fooling themselves as they have done before.

I hope our own government is not fooling itself. Whatever Spain's internal divisions, a majority of the men in power, fascist or monarchist, want and expect an Axis victory. They have bet their lives on it. And even if they were disposed to risk their lives by helping defeat the Axis, Hitler has ways to discourage them. Germany's two leading diplomats are von Papen and von Stohrer. The first is in Ankara, the second in Madrid. Von Stohrer has a major job to do: he has to prevent the final decomposition of the Franco regime. To this end he must support both the army and the Falanx and help keep the conflict between them within bounds. And he has at his disposal the persuasive power of a force of technicians and police and actual military elements which have been spread throughout Franco's army; not to mention five or six divisions of the German army on Spain's border. Can Ambassador Hayes match that? I'm afraid that he could varnish all the paintings in the Prado without visibly modifying the pro-Axis policy of Franco.

The Nation has bitterly opposed the appeasement of Franco, not only because it is a betrayal of the Spanish people and of our own democratic pretensions, but because it has proved futile. Never for a moment has the Spanish regime wavered from its pro-Axis position or wriggled out from under Axis control. The only dependable pro-Ally force in Spain is the Spanish people—an element unaccountably ignored in Washington and London. Just as Hitler uses the fears and reactionary interests of Spain's ruling groups to cinch his control on the country, so we should use the powerful democratic impulses of the people to break that control. Only when our foreign policy is based on the realities of the political struggle will it become either strong or successful.

The Geopolitical Front

BY G. A. BORGESE

HIGH-SCHOOL graduates who had some Latin may remember a prelude to geopolitics in the opening sentences of Julius Caesar's "Gallic Wars," with the clear-cut outline of the region implying concepts of politics and strategy which had guided the conqueror and now illumine the historian. But the Italians, unsurpassed in their role of forgotten forerunners, would claim geopolitical primacy in the description of their peninsula as designed by Dante and Petrarch and colored by later writers—a country unique, bastioned against foreign offense by the Alps and the sea, prosperously articulated along the backbone of its inner mountains, and perhaps called to world supremacy by its location at the center of the world. Indeed, discussions of the climatic and geographic prerequisites best fitted to enable a commonwealth to survive in freedom or expand in power have been commonplace among the political observers of all ages; and there is small wonder in chancing on another sample of geopolitical preview in "Richard II," where John of Gaunt extols the natural conditions which singled out his England for the manifest destiny of splendid isolation:

This fortress built by Nature for herself against infection and the hand of war, this happy breed of men, this little world,
this precious stone set in the silver sea . . .

However, we shall be content with the handier genealogy provided by Strausz-Hupé.* Its farthest branches do not reach beyond the 1820's, when the first German pathfinders of geopolitics proper walked heavily under the influence of President Monroe's hemispheric postulate. But it was for a Britisher, Sir Halford Mackinder, one-time director of the London School of Economics, to lay much later the systematic foundations of the new science. This he did at first in a short lecture, "The Geographical Pivot of History," delivered before the Royal Geographical Society and published in 1904; whence the doctrine, transplanted and adapted to Germany by Major General Professor Doctor Karl Haushofer and cultivated by a numberless aggregation of disciples, grew to its present vigor and renown. It is now the science of the day, with many also in America daily seeing the light. Haushofer, the septuagenarian in Munich, omitted until a short while ago from current encyclopedias and dictionaries, is a power behind Hitler's throne, the father of the myth of Lebensraum, spiritual fuel for the Nazi divisions rolling eastward.

Puzzled reviewers of Strausz-Hupé's excellent book have been asking what in geopolitics is science and what is hoax. The answer becomes obvious as soon as the enduring elements of the problem are dissociated from its transitory projections on the screen of propaganda. That the nature of the earth and the fortunes of the human beings who inhabit it are related is so true as to sound like a truism—which nobody was naive enough to copyright as his own invention; and it is a legitimate assignment for science to investigate the coordinations of territory and history. Historiography in the last century and ours has advanced by sudden strides; emphasis, long overdue on a neglected component of history, has carried with it a passionate overemphasis, until a reasonable level is reached between the defects of ignorance and the excesses of fad. This is valid for the Marxian stress, and overstress, on the economic factor of history; it is valid for the Freudian exploration of sex; and the measure could be almost automatically applied to geopolitics as well. It is quite possible that sufficient thought had not been given in past ages to geography as the scaffolding of history; hence it is understandable that the tutor and promoter of an adolescent science striving to interpret history and politics in the frame of geography should be driven to fits of inconsiderate fervor. This might be the case even if the tutor and promoter were other than a Nazi general.

* Geopolitics: The Struggle for Space and Power. By Robert Strausz-Hupé. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.75.

Being what he is, Haushofer blatantly makes a point of converting his science into an implement for racial world conquest. All static blueprints of lands and peoples—such as Petrarch's or Shakespeare's—each allowing for the existence of others, are thrown off with derision, and every frontier is a battlefield. Thus the first term of the binomial falls out, and geopolitics shrinks to crude politics—or hoax. Its disqualification as a science, all make-up notwithstanding, is compellingly evident in the master's posture—as self-assured as it is indecent—between the two stools of materialistic determinism and mystic voluntarism. The first and basic assumption is that the ground, or territory, in its objective structure and explicit opportunities, determines to an enormous extent the destiny of man. But together with this we are taught that man, or at least the German, is the master of destiny, and that the earth is his for the asking if he asks in earnest. In fine, the direction prescribed to the supra-romantic omnipotence of the German will circuitously points anew to the materialistic determinism which we thought we had left behind. There is on this earth a certain land, contained within certain degrees of latitude and longitude, that is the land of destiny. The keys of world empire lie there—and nowhere else. Who gets that land gets the world. Its name—unheard by most laymen before Strausz-Hupé's book—is Heartland.

Here again we are confronted with a double-faced theory, as self-evident generically as it is specifically open to discussion. It is self-evident that in the vicissitudes of any battle there is a hill, or a river, or a trench which we may dub, ex post facto, the hill or the river or the trench of decision. It is equally apparent that in most phases of the struggle for power through the centuries there has been a province or region whose control or loss affected the outcome of that whole phase of the struggle. But the Heartland of Cyrus was in one place, and the Heartland of Napoleon was somewhere else. The Heartland of the German emperors in the Middle Ages was northern Italy; the Heartland of the Spanish kings a few centuries later may have been the Netherlands. The problem as it emerges from the speculations of Haushofer and of his precursors and followers is whether there really exists in the present circumstances somewhere on the map one definite zone out of which the opportunity for world control should flow as a stream from its fountainhead—and if there is, whether ahead of telltale events we can reasonably agree on the whereabouts today of that shrine of power.

Strausz-Hupé, if I understand him correctly, remains noncommittal. One of his chapters is entitled Heartland and Hokum. It is a merit of his book that the scholarly neatness of the information and the quiet transparency of the style are not sacrificed to impulsive indorsements or to the hurry of competitive results. It is probable, however, that stripped of pseudo-scientific pomp and translated into the factual terms of the present situation, much of the geopolitical theory acquires validity.

The shrine of power, as envisioned by geopolitics, is capacious. First Mackinder identified it as the huge central land mass of Eurasia.* Haushofer followed suit. This Heartland—broadly heart-shaped, with the tip northeastward—includes but sections of European Russia west of the Urals; neither does it comprise the Maritime Provinces of Siberia; it stretches from the Caucasus to the Lena and beyond; the Himalayas and the other mountain ranges border it to the south, the Icy Ocean to the north. Self-sufficient in commodities and military resources, this empire atop the kingdoms of the earth stands secure from sea-borne attacks; while as for air power—whose rise casts so large a shadow on the picture of present and future—one can reasonably presume that if London and Malta have weathered those storms, Tashkent and Irkutsk might survive bigger storms equally well. It is fair to assume that the terrific display of air forces—whose alleged ultimate decisiveness perhaps intoxicates unruly imaginations no less damagingly than the inherited rules of sea power made drowsy many a military academy—has not shaken Mackinder's views. "Who rules Eastern Europe," he wrote,

* A first-hand outline of the Heartland has become available in Mackinder's "Democratic Ideals and Reality" (Henry Holt), reprinted from the first edition of 1919. The book, however, does not contain the lecture of 1904, which was basic for Haushofer as it is for Strausz-Hupé, and consists largely of an attempt to translate a great discovery into the mediocre terms of the "balance of power."

"commands the Heartland. Who rules the Heartland commands the World Island [that is, the totality of Europe, Asia, and Africa]. Who commands the World Island rules the world." At any rate we know for sure that Haushofer has not changed his mind. Undisturbed by the rumbling air, he contends more firmly than ever that the Heartland is the roof of the world. From its vast height the architecture of the universe can be mastered.

Mackinder was first moved by the British worry over the chances for world domination by Russia or by a Russo-German alliance operating from the Heartland. He did not think that the fragmentary crescent of British sea power along the margins of the World Island could long withstand the pressure from the central land mass of Eurasia. He did not go so far as to propose, if possible, the conquest of the Heartland by the British Empire. It was for Haushofer to carry the theory straight to its conclusion. If the Heartland is the world, let the Germans have it. Two roads lay hypothetically open: a German-Russian agreement, with Russian administration of the Heartland under German control; or outright conquest, with thorough annexation or without it, but in either case with visible vassalage of whatever should remain of Russia to German overlordship. The first road was tried with the pact of August 23, 1939. It reached a dead end in Russia's recalcitrance. The second is being tried in the present campaign.

The military gist of the Mackinder-Haushofer doctrine is that it is land power that will finally prevail. An illustration from the past will largely confirm, while partially qualifying, this view. Rome learned from Carthage the lesson of sea power. Hannibal in turn learned from Rome the lesson of land power. But he did not march from Cannae to Rome. Scipio, wielding both sea and land power, won the war. The analogies with the present situation need not be elaborated; they visibly apply to all three sides of the military triangle—sea, air, and land. It is credible, however, that land power will emerge at last as the hypotenuse of the changing triangle. Land power is infantry, motorized or not. Infantry is by definition the common people. It is the passion and the belief of the common people that will win the war.

Although the geopoliticians of the Mackinder-Haushofer school are strict politicians and strategists, with a less deep-seated interest in social and ideological issues, their disclosure of the Heartland has none the less at the present moment stupendous implications of a social and ideological nature. The attic on the roof of the world seems roomy enough to harbor, besides the keys to strategic world control, other implements of miscellaneous significance. One among them may be the melting-pot, or witch caldron, for the revitalization of the crossbreed that was still-born in 1939 and bore the name of communazism. Another might be the crucible for the blending of universal socialism with universal democracy. The Heartland might develop into an infernal machine for world destruction or into a laboratory for world redemption and reform.

Says Strausz-Hupé: "Haushofer and his disciples started from the fair assumption that the strategic implications of the Heartland would be overlooked by the Western powers." It was a fair assumption indeed. "They started from the much less plausible premise that these strategic implications would remain hidden from the very power which controlled the Heartland." How much less plausible this premise was we are unable to state. Had the Russians been fully awake to the strategic implications of the Heartland, they probably would have been less insistent in asking for a second front in Western Europe and most resolute in wanting—together with America and China, and against both Germany and Japan—the other front, the global front. The focus of the global front is in Siberia.

We have been instructed of late on the "valor of ignorance." If the global plan as published in The Nation of April 11 (A. E. F. to Siberia!) had been prompted by a substantial knowledge of the Mackinder-Haushofer geopolitics, its authority would not soar far above that of a deductive application. Here is, however, the frank avowal that the very name of Heartland lay deep at that time in our Sea of the Unknown. The valor of ignorance in the present case is in the singular circumstances that made Siberia the meeting place between the lead-footed advance of a ponderous "science" and the quick flight of inspirational strategy.

The argument from the half-factual and half-imaginative view describing the history of civilization as a progress from the southeast to the northwest—and therefore pointing to the Arctic shore of Asia as the terminus of the march which started, let us suppose, from Mesopotamia—is not weighty enough to support the thesis. But it is relevant to refer again to the knowledge, now rising at last to popular favor, that this is a total war, a global war—as no other war ever was—whose stake is the control of the globe either by the system embodied in the Axis or by the system maturing in the United Nations. Hence it is plausible to assume the existence of one platform of power, or core of strategy, the control of which will decide this fight. Faust asked: How shall I grasp thee, infinite nature? Our question is: Where shall we grasp this slippery earth-ball?

In the meantime the German armies are crowding the Russians toward the outskirts of the Heartland, and Japan, at the opposite end, quicker-witted than we, has grasped with fog-gloved hands—and bends against ourselves—the point of the Aleutian scimitar which we should have swung at her. The language of the current map is plainer than the cerebations of geopolitical science. It also is stronger than the counsels of intuitive strategy. And perhaps the price we shall pay for the combined sluggishness of the Western and of the Russian mind, and for the conflict, latent or open, between their war aims, will be a staggering one, but still it is conceivable that a coming phase will be a race from west and east to the northern accesses, and that in spite of delays and detours the field of final decision will be in Asia, with defeat or victory hanging on whether the Heartland will be in German hands—or Russian hands with German chains—or whether it will remain to Russia with the help and presence of the United States and the United Nations.

It was a Roman dictum that fas est et ab hoste doceri—it is right to be taught even by the enemy. Haushofer paraphrased it in the tenet that "military understanding passes from the victor to the defeated." We have been defeated enough. The time for learning has come.

Greater Loyalty Hath No Man

BY JAMES HENLE

WHEN the social scientists of a succeeding age begin their examination of the attitudes and the mores of the first half of the twentieth century, they are certain to be impressed—perhaps astonished—by the loyalty that the corporation has been able to inspire in its more highly remunerated servants. This loyalty, it must be observed, does not prevent an occasional executive vice-president or purchasing agent from accepting a little polite—and personal—baksheesh when dealing with the smaller fry swept within the corporate orbit, but it does mean that on all larger, vital issues he is devoutly faithful to his trust. Reading the correspondence of business officials, as exposed by three decades of Congressional and legislative inquiries, one is immediately struck by the spectacle of men of some sense of honor willing, even eager, to perform for their stockholders acts they never could be induced to undertake for mere personal gain. One searches the record in vain for another case like that of John B. Sheridan, propagandist for the National Electric Light Association, who in letters made public by the Federal Trade Commission in the late twenties disclosed a mounting sense of shame at the tasks his job imposed on him. Mr. Sheridan, whose sins affected only utility rates and not our national safety, apparently decided that the only proper atonement was self-destruction.

But such a case is not only atypical; it is unique. At the other extreme we may cite the $4,500 employee in the auditing department of a railroad. For years this road had paid dividends of $8 a share, of which a substantial portion went to a wealthy young yachtsman, reputed to hold some 500,000 shares. When the depression forced the railroad to pass its dividend for the first time in many years, thus depriving the yachtsman of his usual $1,000,000 quarterly payment, the auditor is reported to have burst into tears.

Not every auditor takes so deeply to heart the plight of the stockholders who—theoretically—employ him, but in the ranks from "junior executive" upward loyalty is the rule and, furthermore, does not vary with the salary received. For $5,000 or for $50,000 a year, a good and faithful servant is willing to bribe legislators, suborn perjury, obtain the dismissal of honest but/and hostile school teachers and college instructors, ruin independent newspapers, snuff out competitors by a colorful assortment of illegal means, and, briefly, do anything and everything short of betraying his country.

"Short of?" Precisely how short, you may ask. Short, as the Persian poet pointed out in his quatrain upon infinitesimal differences, may in certain cases be very short indeed. In fact, many persons are inclined to believe that in some recent instances it has reached the vanishing-point.

Let us stress here what must be clear from the foregoing. There is no question, there is no charge, of personal gain, of personal motive, of personal disloyalty. If there is any charge, it is of too much loyalty, of loyalty directed toward the wrong—or the lesser—institution. Such excessive loyalty, it would seem, has led corporation officials in Washington to retard the production of the essential materials of war by (1) opposing necessary plant expansion (because of a well-justified fear of excess production after the war); (2) attempting to keep within their own plants secrets of industrial processes, though the output of these plants has been demonstrated to be insufficient for our war effort (the basis for this is obvious and natural, from the corporate point of view); (3) preventing smaller plants, the "independents," from obtaining war contracts (no business men, except the "independents" in question, will doubt the wisdom of this).

Thus the only three charges that can be brought against these corporation executives in Washington—dollar-a-year men and others—fall of their own weight when tested by sound business judgment. Nevertheless, they cannot be dismissed so easily. For it must be apparent even in the holiest and best-guarded of corporation sanctuaries that, for better or worse, the world is being remade, and that precepts and practices which won wealth and honor before this war may during this war bring only dishonor and death.

Let us revert for a moment to the undoubted and unchallenged loyalty exhibited by corporation executives—to their corporations. Apparently it has never occurred to anyone to ask whether this loyalty is what in happier days was called one-sided but now must be termed unilateral. Perhaps the answer was too obvious to require the question, for of course such loyalty is a strictly one-way, not a round-trip, affair. Can you imagine the embattled stockholders of General Hydrocarbons marching on Washington to the song:

And shall Trelawney die?
Here's twenty thousand Cornish men
Will know the reason why.

No, gentlemen's gentlemen of industry, put not your trust in stockholders. But perhaps you are counting upon your Board of Directors to protect you? Never was hope more vain! Your directors will take the profits you bring them—but wash their hands of you at the first intimation of real danger. They are as loyal to the corporation as you are; they will point out to you that IT cannot be compromised by too vigorous efforts in your behalf. And they will insist that the policy you have pursued was not only unauthorized but in direct violation of their instructions. Do you doubt this? If you do, you have only to call to mind the men who make up your board; ask yourself, "Which of these individuals will endanger himself for me?"

Nor is the matter of "danger" altogether fanciful. The American public has just begun to get into this war. Soon there will scarcely be a household that has not given one or two young men—or men not so young—to the armed forces. To date—excluding the disaster of Pearl Harbor—our own army and navy have been extraordinarily successful; whenever they have met the enemy on anything like even terms they have been victorious. We may hope and we do hope that these successes will continue, but in war there must be defeats just as there are victories—and even victories are costly. As casualty lists lengthen, the mood of our people will change. We shall demand to know why—and why—and why.

These questions will produce answers. And some of these answers may point to you.

Short-Wave Artillery

BY STEFAN J. RUNDT

TWENTY-THREE short-wave transmitters are now used for broadcasts from the United States to foreign countries. Fourteen of these are international transmitters, licensed by the government and used twenty-four hours a day. Nine are commercial (code) stations, used occasionally for certain voice broadcasts.

The Nazi High Command and Dr. Goebbels have never told how many short-wave stations they have, but it is known that at Zeesen near Berlin, alone, they muster at least fifteen transmitters. In Germany proper, Luxembourg, the "Protectorate" (formerly Czecho-Slovakia), and the "Government General" (Poland) they have about thirty stations, many of them high-powered. If one includes stations in Holland, Belgium, occupied France, Norway, the Baltic countries, Greece, occupied Russia, and Serbia, the Reich Radio Company operates or controls a minimum of fifty stations of various range and power. With Italy, Slovakia, Hungary, Finland, Croatia, Bulgaria, and Rumania thrown in, the Axis controls in Europe some seventy-odd short-wave stations—possibly, with recent additions, close to ninety—as against our fourteen regular and nine part-time transmitters. More than twenty of these Axis stations are among the most powerful in the world. Italy alone owns just about as many "Big Berthas" as we do. Even when all English short-wave transmitters are counted, the enemy in Europe maintains a superiority of at least three to two. With Japan, which controls about fifty stations, included, the Axis powers outnumber the United Nations two to one in high-powered, long-range senders. For short-wave transmitters of various power the ratio is at least five to three (this includes Allied international stations in Australia, India, Chungking, and the Soviet Union).

Not only does the Axis have the advantage on the short-wave front; it also has several hundred medium-wave transmitters—comparable to local stations in the United States—that can be used for broadcasts to nearby countries. The United Nations have such stations only in the British Isles. The Axis has the geographical advantage of being able to broadcast propaganda from stations of comparatively limited range.

Over each transmitter several frequencies may be broadcast. Our American installations cross-fire with fifty-odd frequencies. Great Britain broadcasts with nearly sixty. The Axis in Europe uses 125 frequencies or more—Germany 65, Italy 30. In Asia the Broadcasting Corporation of Japan operates on not fewer than 50 wave lengths. In international multi-language transmissions the Axis employs, on a conservative estimate, wave lengths that aggregate some 280 against the scant 190 of the United Nations. (These figures do not include Vichy stations in unoccupied France, Dakar, Morocco, Algiers, or Martinique, or Franco's Spanish broadcasts, all of which must be considered anti-democratic.)

American stations broadcast regularly in two dozen languages, occasionally in others. The B. B. C. broadcasts in forty-two idioms, Berlin in thirty-nine, Rome in thirty, Japan in thirty-one. While Japan instructs the world in Esperanto and Fukienese, we do not broadcast even in Persian, though the attitude of Iran is extremely important now because of the Caucasus situation. Radio Helsinki goes on the air in fourteen languages over short and medium waves. The threat of the Vichy navy hangs like the sword of Damocles over our heads, but we have not as yet begun to broadcast in Breton, the language of a large proportion of the French naval personnel.

Not a single American short-wave broadcast can be picked up on more than four dial positions. Radio Berlin, on the other hand, often sends out regularly scheduled programs which may be tuned in on seven loggings of a reasonably good home set in the United States. A layman "cruising" over the short-wave bands will catch Berlin on so many points that he will hardly be able to escape its broadcasts. Here it must be pointed out that all comparisons were even more in the enemy's favor a short time ago.

Our overseas programs still cling to fifteen-minute newscast periods or commentary schedules in one given language. The B. B. C. has successfully introduced five- and ten-minute broadcasts. Radio Roma has raised its geographical coverage by using ten-minute shows. Our coverage could be improved 50 or 75 per cent by the change. The high lights of the latest news can easily be presented in five minutes.

Our enemies consider psychological warfare of the utmost importance in this total struggle. More than 15 per cent of all Nazi broadcasting time, both short-wave and standard, is reserved for non-German programs. A reliable expert estimates that Japan apportions fully 30 per cent of its total time on the air to broadcasts in foreign languages.

Since our radio arsenal is on the whole smaller and less powerful than the enemy's, we must compensate for our kilowatt and quantitative inferiority by a superior psychological approach. In other words, we must prepare the best broadcasts possible. Most persons acquainted with the full picture of our international transmissions agree privately that we have a long way to go before we discover the right words, the best methods of presentation, the most dynamic speakers. Some believe that our broadcasts to Latin America do full justice to American ingenuity. Others hold that despite our comparatively long experience there, and despite Nelson Rockefeller's hard-working organization, our broadcasts directed south of the Rio Grande are far short of what they should be. But in any case our efforts to reach Europe do not yet approach adequacy. Several weeks ago, for instance, one company seriously considered broadcasting a German version of the Hardy Family serial "to exemplify life in America" for listeners in the Reich. Similar bright ideas are constantly cropping up. Often the obvious truth that listeners in Himmler's domain, who risk their very lives every time they pick up a democratic transmission, want mainly facts seems completely neglected. It is true that 75 per cent of our broadcasts to Europe are now newscasts—these have proved to be the best weapon—but the percentage could well be increased. As for talks, a concise, technical lesson on how to sabotage ball bearings does more good than all the eulogies of democracy, however noble.

Scripts for international broadcasts should be prepared by professional experts only—that is, by those who have an intimate knowledge of the ethnic and psychological characteristics, the historical, social, and geographical background, the emotional reactions, and even the dialects of the people to whom the broadcasts are aimed. We have no time to train hastily hired amateurs. Perhaps in our presentation of news we should emphasize more the fact that we are actual participants in the war—and not only in production. "British lose Bardia" seems to imply that we are bystanders. Why not "We lose Bardia"? And why not admit losses sooner? Listeners will believe us more readily if we do. Script writers should listen more frequently to Axis transmissions to know specifically whom and what we are fighting. We may also learn a great deal from the B. B. C. Since 1939 London broadcasts in many languages have reached a high level of excellence. Lindley Fraser, talking to Germans from Britain, and Colonel Harold R. Stevens, former British military attaché in Rome, addressing Italians, are master tacticians. The many underground "freedom stations" can also teach us new ways of approach. Terminology and technique must be studied. A closer liaison between monitors (listeners to foreign broadcasts) and script writers of outgoing material would be beneficial. The accuracy of scripts should be checked and double-checked as rigorously as bomb loads for our flying fortresses are checked before their take-off. Enemy lies should be replied to more quickly—within the hour, not the next day. "Last Monday Berlin claimed . . ." is not nearly so effective as "Forty minutes ago we were surprised to learn from the Rome Radio that Mme Litvinov is a prisoner in Siberia; actually, she is having luncheon at the White House and is just finishing her coffee at this moment." In turn, our own assertions and denials must become more fool-proof than they are now. Goebels wastes no time in kicking back to us every little boner. The least discrepancy in our broadcasts is fuel for the Axis propaganda machine. If N. B. C. and Radio Schenectady differ in the slightest in the reporting of an item, the Axis stuffs our carelessly uttered words down our throat. Often a phrase that comes naturally to us may contain a hidden insult to the very audience we are trying to reach and hold. Often a piece of advice given by us in the complete safety of an air-conditioned studio must sound like sheer madness to an anti-Nazi listener in Gestapo-ridden Europe.

Many of the analyses of Axis broadcasts prepared in this country indicate the enemy's weakness and the points which our transmissions should make. For example, the Nazi radio says that two departments of the Berlin Food and Agriculture Ministry have just been taken over by the S. S. "in agreement with Himmler." Hitler has promised special premiums to German farmers who deliver (not who produce) more dairy products. Why not immediately stab into this obvious breach with special broadcasts to German farmers? Virtually all princes of the Catholic church in Germany are under house arrest. Why not, then, provide more programs of religious news for the millions of Catholics in the Reich? The B. B. C. constantly aims its German transmissions at special groups—workers, housewives, the army, navy, or merchant marine.

The material we now broadcast to Europe needs a great deal of pruning. A Dane in Nazi-held Copenhagen does not care to learn—at the peril of his life—how the New York Herald Tribune reacted editorially to Churchill's second visit to Washington. He will draw his own conclusions about the meeting. He would much rather hear when we expect to overcome the U-boat sinkings along our shores—or whether it is true that cholera is raging in Bombay. When special speakers, the foremost American commentators, are presented or quoted, this same Dane may not know who they are. On the other hand, he would like to hear Karin Michaëlis or Jean Hersholt.

To broadcast to Germany doubtful reports of "20,000 killed in Cologne in R. A. F. raid" can do us more harm than good. If we just say, in conformity with the known facts, that 1,036 planes raided that town and that large fires were still burning thirty-two hours later, we shall score better and, what is most important, establish greater trustworthiness.

Our regular English-language programs, which total nearly 20 per cent of our transmissions to Europe, could be cut, and many could be eliminated. We hardly need to communicate with our English-speaking allies quite as much as we do. Broadcasts to the conquered peoples in their own tongues are far more important. To be sure, many Europeans understand English, and it may have a certain lure for them, but the average man still gets more when he listens to his mother tongue—for all the static and the "jamming" of Berlin's interference.

Our news broadcasts for Norwegians, Frenchmen, Poles, and other nationalities are generally translated from the same English material. But the main interests of these audiences are very different. Even Germans and Austrians want different kinds of news and want it given with a different choice of words and different German inflections.

Speakers who address Europe in the name of America should be more carefully chosen than they are now. Berlin maintains a special school to train all speakers in technique and "mike manner." Many of our commentators read their scripts and are obviously unable to speak naturally in the language they are using, say, in colloquial French. There should be preparations and rehearsals for certain feature programs. If 20,000,000 American consumers are to be urged to buy a nationally advertised product, is not the show rehearsed?

The expressions used must be idiomatically correct and up to date, not a literal translation of English. If military reports use the terms current in Germany today, they will be more readily understood. The Nazi Supreme Command, for instance, is the "OKW" (Oberkommando der Wehrmacht) to a German of today; its daily communiqué is the Heeresbericht—and nothing else! New York must be Nuova York for Italians. No Slovak will grasp MacArthur's name if we lisp the th and slur the ur. Less well-known names or names difficult for foreigners could be spelled out, as is frequently done, for example, by Radio Melbourne or the B. B. C.

Many of our broadcasters to Europe still suffer from various émigré complexes. Others have come so much under the spell of America that they must sound like foreigners—though not like Americans—to those in their home countries. Many of these speakers are professorial in their approach. They have either learned to speak the language at Harvard or they have been at Princeton so long they have forgotten it. Often their remarks are so letter perfect that they sound like a recitation in a dead language. Not long ago a professional short-wave listener was asked by an overseas speaker whether "the B. B. C. in its service for Holland reads daily the complete Jap communiqué." How, one wonders, could such a man be intrusted with the task of correlating factually or emotionally our war aims with the mentality of his audience? Mere eloquence about human dignity, civilization, or liberty cannot, in the long run, hold and enlarge our radio audience abroad. We must also give the leaders of a future revolt the news and information they need.

A year ago our short-wave offensive was qualitatively and quantitatively many times weaker than it is today.

Through the efforts of Elmer Davis and his staff a great deal has been accomplished. But we must improve still farther and above all more consistently. Haphazard selection and duplications of material must stop. Our ideological campaign must be planned and executed with the precision of a commando raid. Our strategy must be centrally directed. We must catch up with the enemy and then beat him. Organization of the war of words equals in importance any other government function. If effective, it may save millions of lives and billions of dollars and shorten the conflict by years.

[This discussion of short-wave techniques is to be followed in early issues by articles suggesting specific propaganda approaches to the German and Japanese people.]

Hollywood Belligerent

BY EZRA GOODMAN

Hollywood, August 31

HOLLYWOOD, long one of the most insular communities in the country, has been shaken by the war out of its cultural and political isolation into a sharp awareness of world events. It has felt the impact of the war more directly, perhaps, than other sections. It is surrounded by army encampments, anti-aircraft and balloon barrages, and plane and arms factories. It has experienced a large influx of refugees from Europe. Many of its directing spirits—John Ford, Frank Capra, Darryl Zanuck, William Wyler, Garson Kanin—are working with the armed forces, and the number of its actors in uniform increases every day. The production schedules of the major studios are featuring war films ranging from "Mission to Moscow" to "The Moon Is Down."

Not so long ago Hollywood was turning out films like "Ninotchka" and "Comrade X," which aroused ill-will in Soviet Russia, "Gunga Din," which precipitated riots in India, and "Down Argentine Way," which was hissed off South American screens. Today its point of view has changed. "Mission to Moscow," Warner Brothers has promised, will be a fair and square treatment of the subject. Erskine Caldwell, author of "All Out on the Road to Smolensk," is writing the screen play, and the production is in the hands of Robert Buckner, former Moscow correspondent of the London Daily Mail. Ex-Ambassador Joseph E. Davies has turned over his private files and papers to the studio for research material. The characters, it has been announced, will include many real persons, such as Voroshilov, Timoshenko, Molotov, and Litvinov. Other studios are pursuing the theme with "Scorched Earth," "Song of the Red Army," and "The Road to Moscow."

Under the aegis of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, most of the major studios are turning out shorts about various phases of life in the United States intended for South American consumption. Walt Disney and a staff of artists visited South America recently and made several animated cartoons featuring Donald Duck and Mickey Mouse in typical Latin American settings. The Mexican screen villain is definitely out.

Lillian Hellman's bitter, anti-fascist drama "Watch on the Rhine" is being transferred to the screen with the assistance of Herman Shumlin, producer of the play, and five members of the Broadway cast. Practically no changes have been made in the original play except to take advantage of the wider scope of the camera. Ben Hecht is producing his own "China Girl" with a contemporary Chinese background. "The Edge of Darkness," William Woods's novel about the Nazi invasion of Norway, is being filmed by Lewis Milestone and will be one of the more important productions of the season. After some casting trouble Hemingway's "For Whom the Bell Tolls" is being brought to the screen with Sam Wood, creator of "Our Town" and "Goodbye, Mr. Chips," directing, and Gary Cooper and Ingrid Bergman playing the principal parts. John Steinbeck's "The Moon Is Down" will go into production soon under the supervision of Nunnally Johnson, who made "The Grapes of Wrath." The film version will avoid the criticism directed against the novel and the Broadway play that they presented the Nazis in too favorable a light. Paul Muni is to appear in "The Commandos Come at Dawn," with production supervised by Lieutenant Commander John Farrow.

"Random Harvest," James Hilton's novel of a shell-shocked British soldier, has been completed by Mervyn LeRoy, with Greer Garson and Ronald Colman in the cast. An ambitious saga of Flying Fortresses and Pearl Harbor is now being filmed by Howard Hawks in cooperation with the United States army, under the title of "Air Force." "Desperate Journey," about an R. A. F. bombing expedition, "Casablanca," about the underground passport trade in the refugee melting-pot of French Morocco, "Clear for Action," a navy drama, and "Thunder Birds," an aviation odyssey, will soon be shown. "Wake Island," dealing with the heroic American defense of that Pacific bastion, has already made its appearance and been widely commended.

Not dealing directly with the war but reflecting current problems are Leo McCarey's "Once upon a Honey-moon," a comedy-drama with a European setting, and "Talk of the Town," which finds its climax in a lynch scene and trial. The latter is directed by George Stevens, who made "Woman of the Year." Stevens will next do a film version of Kaufman and Hart's "The American Way." Franz Werfel's "The Song of Bernadette" is in preparation as a parable on modern intolerance. "The success of "Yankee Doodle Dandy," based on the career of George M. Cohan, and "Pride of the Yankees," about Lou Gehrig, has turned the attention of producers to indigenous American themes and personalities, and "The Adventures of Mark Twain" and "The Ox-Bow Incident" are receiving lavish production.

The studios are avidly purchasing stories dealing with such subjects as Bataan, the underground movements in Europe, army nurses, and the paratroops. The enthusiasm accorded "Mrs. Miniver" has confirmed Hollywood's belief that moviegoers want either bold and forthright films about things that matter today or pictures completely divorced from current events. The public has indicated its apathy toward productions that take vital themes and reduce them to the level of vapid entertainment. "Escapist" film fare is, of course, still being produced; musicals, comedies, and spectacles fill out the production programs. One of the pictures doing the biggest business at the moment is Cecil DeMille's "Reap the Wild Wind," a Technicolor spectacle of the Florida keys, and such musicals as "My Gal Sal" and "Holiday Inn" and excursions into romantic fiction like "Tales of Manhattan" are extremely popular.

The activity at the studios is spurred by the executives' recognition that no one knows what the next few months may bring in the film industry. Raw film stock, which uses many elements that go into explosives, is now under government priority regulations, and the use of film has been drastically restricted. The ceiling for the cost of construction of a set is $5,000, and much ingenuity is being exercised in adapting standing sets to new stories. It is practically impossible to obtain any new cameras, lights, or other mechanical equipment. Location trips are being eliminated to save tires. Realizing that future production may be still more restricted or even suspended, Hollywood is trying to accumulate a backlog of completed pictures.

By making bold and courageous pictures about the war the film industry is demonstrating its emergence from its mental shell. It still has a long way to go. It has yet to realize the essential seriousness of the war as a theme; it has yet to remove the last blonde from the bombers. England, Russia, and China are far more skilful than Hollywood in using the screen as a weapon of persuasion and propaganda, but the propaganda pictures of today when compared with those of the last war,

"The Beast of Berlin," for example, show that there has been progress. The screen can be a most effective medium for creating understanding between the peoples of the United Nations and for affirming the democratic ideals that we are fighting for. It is a responsibility that Hollywood cannot afford to shirk.

In the Wind

THE COMMON TOUCH: At the meeting of one hundred scholars called last week at Columbia University, Professor Harry A. Overstreet, the popular philosopher, said: "As the ordinary man might say it, a pluralistic civilization might not be a civilization all of one kind, but a civilization of many kinds cooperating among themselves."

J. B. MATTHEWS, the Research Director of the Dies committee, recently asserted that his enemies had broken into his house in New Jersey, ransacked his files, and destroyed 2,000 books. According to the Associated Press, "Matthews recalled that he had been in the house about three days before several boys in the vicinity noticed the damage."

ALTHOUGH CONSTRUCTION on two new war plants in Flint, Michigan—A. C. Spark Plug and Chevrolet—has been indefinitely postponed because of the materials shortage, the War Production Board has given permission to J. C. Penney and Company to build a large department store in that city. J. C. Penney had the necessary materials on hand, and the WPB apparently did not choose to freeze them.

A NUMBER of conscientious objectors have been selected to join a group of army and navy officers who are studying to become administrative officials in occupied countries. The pacifists will be trained as civilian aides to the military men.

LARGE STORES of rubber set aside for the manufacture of gas masks are being released for other needs. The army has found that the butyl substitute is a much better resistant to mustard gas than natural rubber. It is also unaffected by oil and gasoline.

THE WORKERS' DEFENSE LEAGUE reports that for the first time since the defense program began employers who file their requirements with government agencies are specifying racial and religious preferences. The W. D. L. believes that efforts to prevent discrimination by employers have noticeably slackened since the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practices was made responsible to Paul V. McNutt.

GERMAN SHORT-WAVE PROPAGANDA on Brazil's declaration of war has pointedly refrained from attacking President Vargas, directing most of its attention to the machinations of the United States and Great Britain.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Berkeley, Calif.

C. B. S.—Berlin the Third

LAST TRAIN FROM BERLIN. By Howard K. Smith.
Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

NOW here, thank heaven, is a book about Germany with an out-and-out anti-fascist point of view, and that view a clear-cut Socialist one. And here, thank heaven again, is an author who does not miss his one big opportunity. Mr. Smith, the latest in the long line of C. B. S. Berlin correspondents to be published by Mr. Knopf, gives a precise answer to the one important question.

The only purpose a convinced anti-fascist can have just now in reading yet another book about Germany is to discover, if he can, some clue to how the regime may be brought down. One cannot expect to find military information of any importance, but it is reasonable to hope that one may obtain a clear vision of the structure of German morale, into which our propaganda may be able to thrust its levers. There is no shilly-shallying about Mr. Smith, who left Germany the day of Pearl Harbor. He knows perfectly well that we shall read him only if he tells us about the effects of the Russian campaign on the German people. He does tell us, with clarity and in detail, and with frank appraisal of the sources of his information. Yes, the terrific cost of that campaign and the repeated lies and blunders of German rulers have almost totally discredited Nazi propaganda within the Reich and irreparably damaged German morale. The malady is a progressive one. C. B. S.—Berlin the First told us that the German people felt no joyful enthusiasm at the defeat of France. C. B. S.—Berlin the Second (Harry Flannery) scored a good point in telling us that though the German folk had no special reason to doubt the first few broadcasts about stupendous victories in Russia, they were unmoved or openly disgusted because of the obvious propaganda technique utilized. The bacillus of the disease had long ago begun to produce its anti-bodies in the blood stream of the nation. To live in an enduring dictatorship, it has been said, is to be condemned to perpetual enthusiasm. Rather one would say that it is to be sentenced to universal skepticism. I dare say a German, the day after world victory, would glance nervously at the unvanquished moon.

C. B. S.—Berlin the Third (Mr. Smith) describes a later stage of the process and confirms his report in another way. Most of the Germans he met hated the Russians, though not with the deformed and embittered hatred they had for Americans. Their hatred became pathologically violent after the Red Army had made its weight and valor felt. It requires little psychological insight to see the significance and the use of this information.

President Roosevelt's policy of stepping up the degree of our hostility stage by stage was dictated by internal necessity. Mr. Smith makes one believe, however, that no better way of sawing at German nerves could have been discovered. The Nazis were being handled with their own morale-destroying technique of intervention short of declared war. Until the Russians had given the German people the telescope they needed to see the end of this war, the American intervention was the source of an anxiety that was not so powerful that it was bound to create a neurosis. But afterward, with possible victory already shown to be a long way off, American intervention began to give the Germans a will-destroying sense of parallel with World War I.

Here, one believes, is guidance for our propaganda effort. The German people, one sadly confesses, are not likely to believe our talk about a just peace. As a whole they are not likely to have a lively affection for our sort of democracy. What we must do, then, is to intensify their sense of parallel between this war and the last in so far as the effects of American belligerence are concerned. Their nerves are weak because of that last experience.

There is one classic source that all readers of contemporary books about Germany and our propagandists in particular ought to have in their hands. That is the report of the Reichstag Inquiry into the German Collapse of 1918. For this writer that inquiry, more than any work on the Russian Revolution, established four propositions as scientific truths. So long as there is belief in victory great losses do not shatter a major nation's nerve. When once the belief in victory has been shaken, the effect of losses grows by leaps and bounds. It is the resultant desire for peace which causes revolt. If peace is instantly obtained, the revolution does not go deep, which is to say that people revolt to obtain peace, not to transform society.

Mr. Smith's report, illuminated by these propositions, suggests such interesting thoughts that one must urge its reading. One may not attribute the same importance to palace revolutions as he does. One may believe his description of the Nazi regime as merely the dictatorship of capital to be a misleading simplification. One may dislike his occasional excesses and be jolted by the unevenness of his writing. But there is no doubt that Mr. Smith has written an extremely useful book. Look, there is Mr. Shirer with two companions. "How do you do, Mr. Shirer; how do you do, Mr. Smith!"

RALPH BATES

The Progressive Psyche

SELF-ANALYSIS. By Karen Horney. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

READERS of this review, like its writer, will be diffident of judging the technical grounds on which Dr. Karen Horney has forced a schism in the ranks of American psychoanalysis. But Dr. Horney is not only a clinical physician; one of the few psychoanalytical writers of recent years to capture the imagination of the general public, she has established a philosophy of human nature and society on the basis of her divergence from Freud and has become, not one of the seminal, but surely one of the symptomatic minds of our time. Her work, therefore, may be judged not merely in a professional but also in a cultural context.

In her latest book Dr. Horney carries her rejection of Freud's theories about as far as it can go short of an explicit denial of the unconscious mind; she propounds the belief that by adapting the techniques of regular analysis a neurotic person can effectually psychoanalyze himself. Judging by the criteria available to a layman, it seems to me that Dr. Horney makes but a weak case for her belief. The evidence she adduces is, in point of quantity, not adequate; in all propriety, so important an idea—important because it controverts one of Freud's fundamental concepts but important too because it is sure to raise hope in so many hearts—should be advanced on a wider and firmer ground of fact. Dr. Horney cites but four illustrative cases of "occasional self-analysis"—that is, of people who, equipped with some degree of psychoanalytical knowledge, were able by their own efforts to gain insight into and relief from some simply motivated psychic disturbance. Of systematic self-analysis she gives but a single example, and the case of Clare, a young woman who ventured into self-analysis after a year and a half of analysis with Dr. Horney, is possibly suggestive but not convincing. This patient no doubt advanced her understanding of her unconscious motives and thereby won a measure of emotional freedom; yet it is not entirely clear why her discoveries about herself—they are not remarkably deep—were not in large part her belated, developing realization of insights to which she had been helped by Dr. Horney in the course of her regular analysis.

In place of evidence Dr. Horney gives us argument and moral exhortation. The argument is dashing but verbalistic and prestidigitary; I shall touch on some of its assumptions below, but I cannot help feeling that, in a popular book like this, exhortation is even more important than argument and that the exhortation is a little irresponsible. When Dr. Horney suggests that one of the advantages of self-analysis is the pride that comes from getting out of neurotic difficulties all by oneself, she implies assent to the popular feeling that there is something "humiliating" about psychoanalysis; and it is hard not to contemplate the even greater pride we might get from bringing ourselves up. When she tells us that, after all, a neurotic lives with himself all the time and therefore knows himself better than anyone else can, I do not understand her. When she tells us that "life itself is the best therapist," I find her trivial.

Then, too, I am disturbed by Dr. Horney's inconsistency in her own statements of the scope and value of self-analysis; she insists on its feasibility, says that some self-analysts have "dealt with problems that are generally deemed inaccessible even with the help of an analyst" and that some have succeeded where analysts have failed, questions whether self-analysis may not be conducted even without the occasional help and supervision which, as a general rule, she feels to be necessary; but when she commits herself to a summation of the possible effectiveness of self-analysis, she is far from sanguine: "Therefore after a period of common work with an analyst even patients who started with severe neurotic difficulties may in some cases be able to continue on their own, if necessary." I feel that a conclusion so tentative on a matter so important should have been confined to a scientific paper, not communicated with enthusiasm and more than a hint of promise to a general public always avid for new ways of psychic self-help.

For psychoanalytical theory the crucial point of "Self-Analysis" is its substantial denial of Freud's theory of "resistance." According to Freud, the neurosis, however painful, serves a certain purpose; the very symptoms which are so painful cloak impulses which the patient fears and cannot cope with. Even when they are pointed out to him by the analyst, the patient is likely to deny their existence because they are repulsive to his morals and pride; indeed, for a long time he will not even perceive them, for, perverse as the idea may seem, there are powerful forces in the unconscious mind which desire the unhappy neurotic status quo. Dr. Horney does not, to be sure, explicitly reject the theory of resistance which is so basic to the theory of the unconscious, but she does everything possible to minimize the fierce stubbornness Freud attributes to it. She insists that with the right spirit and a sufficient will (knowledge is of far less importance), the patient will be able to bring to light the hidden elements which the unconscious is at such pains to hide. No doubt it is the easier for Dr. Horney to maintain this because in her present book there is no slightest mention of those unconscious drives which are so horrifying to our conscious minds, such as homosexuality, sadism, masochism, Oedipus feelings. (Of course, many educated persons nowadays are willing to admit finding these elements in themselves, but their perception is at most a "novelistic" one, far short in intensity of a psychoanalytical realization.) The effect of Dr. Horney's position is that, though she continues to affirm her belief in the unconscious, she actually denies it by making it an unconscious so easily accessible to an untrained person working on himself; she seems to be talking rather of an "unawareness" or of what, by popular habit, is so often and so significantly substituted for unconscious, a "subconscious."

I have spoken of Dr. Horney as one of the symptomatic minds of our time; she is symptomatic—and most notably in her latest book—of one of the great inadequacies of liberal thought, the need for optimism. It seems to me that her denial or attenuation of most of Freud's concepts is the response to the wishes of an intellectual class which has always found Freud's ideas cogent but too stringent and too dark. They have always wanted a less tragic and strenuous psychology, a more reasonable, decent, and cooperative psyche, and Dr. Horney, in all her three books, has given them what they want.

The basis of Dr. Horney's divergence from Freud is an emotional one; her protest is always that Freud sets gloomy bounds to man's nature, that he is negative, cynical, without "faith." In her present book she quotes with approval a passage from Max Otto: "The deepest source of man's philosophy, the one that shapes and nourishes it, is faith or lack of faith in mankind." But there is no such simple alternative and it is dangerous to suppose there is—as we see when we understand what "faith in mankind" means for Dr. Horney. It means the belief that man is "free" and "good"—she has revived those old, absolute simplicities of eighteenth-century liberalism. To assert man's "freedom" she attacks Freud for finding man's psyche biologically determined; she often speaks of Freud as an old-fashioned dualist (it is clear that he is quite the opposite), but actually her own passionate rejection of the biological determination of mind constitutes a dualism of the most sterile sort and puts the attributes of body in a "lower" place. Further, in attacking Freud for his biological orientation, she makes the tiresome old mistake of confusing mind with the determinants of mind. Then, in the place of Freud's biological determination she puts a determination by culture: there can be no doubt that Dr. Horney has done psychoanalysis a service by forcing the cultural issue; Freud's views of culture, though suggestive, are surely not adequate. But Dr. Horney's view of culture is both vague and formalistic. Sometimes culture is a norm by which we judge whether or not a certain way of action is neurotic, but then again a culture may itself be neurotic, though by what norm we judge the culture (possibly a biological one?) we are not told. In Dr. Horney's hands culture becomes as much an absolute as she claims biology is in Freud's; but Freud saw a complex and passionate interplay between biology and culture, whereas Dr. Horney sees the individual infant as a kind of box into which culture drops this trend or that. The Freudian man may not be as free as we should like, but at least he has insides.

Then, in order to affirm that man is "good," Dr. Horney, like Erich Fromm, attacks Freud's theory of morals for representing morals as arising from forces themselves not virtuous. This Dr. Horney calls a fallacy of genesis, which of course it is not. She represents Freud as implying that virtue is not virtue because it springs from destructive or anarchic origins, but this Freud never does imply—Dr. Horney, by the way, is not the most reliable expositor of Freud; indeed, if anyone has committed the genetic fallacy, Dr. Horney has done so by implying that virtue can only be virtue if it springs from innate (biological?) virtue.

If we are to talk of faith in man, in the realistic rather than the sentimental sense of that phrase, it seems to me that of the two psychologies it is Freud's that demonstrates faith by daring to present man with the terrible truth of his own nature. When Dr. Horney speaks of faith, she does not mean faith so much as optimism, that emptiest of words. The psyche she has described has won wide assent in liberal, progressive circles exactly because it is a progressive psyche, a kind of New Deal agency which truly intends to do good but cannot always cope with certain reactionary forces. It is a flattering view of the mind and Freud's is not, but Freud's has the advantage of suggesting the savage difficulties of life.

LIONEL TRILLING

Bon Voyage, S. V. B.

SELECTED WORKS OF STEPHEN VINCENT BENÉT.

Farrar and Rinehart. Two Volumes. $5.

WHEN an author advances to meet posterity in the full panoply of a collected edition, it is up to the critic, posing as posterity, to inspect the basis of his reputation. Mr. Benét is now best known as the author of "John Brown's Body," which receives pride of place in this edition. How is it possible for a writer to achieve his greatest fame by the least satisfactory of his works? Perhaps there is no generally valid answer; each case must be explained as it occurs. In that of "John Brown's Body," which is now fifteen years old, posterity is just around the corner, which helps. After all the nostalgic charades and illiterate paeans to Main Street flung at us by Hollywood and others, resistance is high when we are asked to reread an epical interpretation of the Civil War in terms of 1927. And that very resistance makes it clear that "John Brown's Body" is no more profound in message or perceptive in the reading of history than "Gone with the Wind," and less interesting as a story. This despite the earnest interpretative intentions, the "quest of the American Muse" announced at its outset. Mr. Benét aimed high, and felt his subject as an ancestral tragedy; but tragedy must be a conflict between equally credible forces, and his presentation of the South merely exploits the commonplaces about overblown romanticism ill concealing the crime of slavery—as if they had ever thrown any light on the subject. Moreover, its whole appeal of plot and character rests on figures too obviously chosen to illustrate history like pictures in a textbook. One gets very bored with "Jake Diefer, the barrel-chested Pennsylvanian," "Luke Breckinridge, the gawky boy from the hills," and all that crowd of purely regional, not psychological, types, symbols of a superficial topography of attitudes. But—and here we approach our answer—these vague emotional reactions to the Civil War coincide with certain publicly felt demands. Still uneasy about the meaning of the conflict, folk-memory has not yet transmuted it into myth, so that imaginative evocations of it are especially welcome if they appear to facilitate shared

Learn to Speak

SPANISH

FRENCH, GERMAN or ITALIAN This Easy Way

Know a second language for better business or social position; read foreign books; really enjoy travel. Speak like a native. Now FUN to learn quickly, easily at home as thousands have! Write today for free book "The Cortina Short-Cut." State language interested in.

CORTINA ACADEMY, Suite 589, 105 W. 40th St., N. Y. City

SPECIAL

Class Room Rate only 25¢ monthly per Student for orders of ten or more copies to be sent to one address.

Desk Copy Is Free!

ADDRESS YOUR ORDERS TO

THE Nation

55 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK CITY

opinions on its historical significance. With the lessening of such topical demands, the past can be poetized as story. Meanwhile only lyric poetry can universalize it permanently (Whitman's Lincoln elegy is an example), but an artistic anomaly, a subjective epic like "John Brown's Body," may give a convincing temporary imitation of that function.

Yet Mr. Benét, when not writing hundreds of pages of flat free verse, can be a poet, and can tell a first-rate story when not wrestling with attitudes toward history. I think posterity will treat him much like Stevenson. Some will ignore him; the young will treasure his adventure tales, especially "Spanish Bayonet"; and most people will like his ballads, love poems, and prose fantasies. At his unpretentious best he is a writer of sure skill and singular charm. But his efforts as interpreter of the American scene and the world crisis will be tactfully forgotten. No matter how fertile their imagination, little of worth results when writers who do not feel prophetically the power of ideas attempt to express social and historical truths. They succeed only in reflecting the prevalent prejudices of a changing social structure. It is significant that although "John Brown's Body" hardly mentions American problems of capital and labor, in 1936 Mr. Benét suddenly intones an Ode to the Austrian Socialists. Distance and Hitler lend unforeseen enchantment. Heights of platitude, too, are reached in "Tales of Our Time," which regale women who read women's magazines by catering to their stuffiest notions about The Home. I like to imagine D. H. Lawrence commenting on The Story About the Ant-Eater, in which a young couple who begin with ideas ("They had heard of Freud") happily end as dull as dull can be. He would probably consider it obscene. No, decidedly posterity will not approach Mr. Benét for intellectual reasons. But it was a great thing to write "Spanish Bayonet" in 1926 and "O'Halloran's Luck" in 1938, because posterity will thank its stars that someone in this grievous century could produce entertaining stories that are not murder mysteries and can be read twice.

FRANK JONES

Three German Poets

THREE POETS AND REALITY. By Ruth Hofrichter. Yale University Press. $2.

THE beginning and end of Professor Hofrichter's provocative little book seem, curiously, more satisfactory and substantial than the middle. In her study of a German, an Austrian, and a Swiss contemporary lyricist she was prompted to compare the consciously conceived image of the world with the representation of that world as it emerged in the poet's actual work, colored, modified, or completely altered by the forces of the unconscious. This formidable task, which Professor Hofrichter approaches with sympathy and insight, was further complicated by the fact that Carossa and Weinheber have remained poets at peace with, and honored by, the Nazi regime. These two, and the Swiss Albert Steffen, Professor Hofrichter believes to be the most significant poets in German literature today, and that not faute de mieux: "among the exiles I do not find their equal."

When it comes down to cases, Professor Hofrichter seems more convinced than convincing. Perhaps the trouble lies in her book's scope; she needs more room to demonstrate. Confronted more by paraphrase than by extended quotation, the reader lacks direct evidence to judge the poets' talent. Carossa appears a man of integrity, entitled to respect; the case for Weinheber is more dubious. In some ways he seems a good deal of a charlatan, or at best an artist manqué, become a rather weird and repellent neurotic. On the evidence, with all due respect for Professor Hofrichter and her thesis, the reader is forced to conclude that there is nothing in all these three poets together which one would not find, in fuller and more rewarding measure, in Rilke, whose garment they seem to have divided among them, to pull about their own inadequate shoulders. Or perhaps the mantle is really Goethe's, a thing of shreds and patches, after having been run through the mangle of Oswald Spengler and the decline of the West.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- The Principles of Power: The Great Political Crises of History.* By Guglielmo Ferrero. Putnam's. $3.50.
Food: A Weapon for Victory. By Bertram Fowler. Little, Brown. $1.50.
The Pre-Raphaelite Tragedy. By William Gaunt. Harcourt, Brace. $3.
The Hidden Civil War: The Story of the Copperheads. By Wood Gray. Viking. $3.75.
Commando Attack. By Gordon Holman. Putnam's. $2.50.
Nazi Conquest of Danzig. By Hans L. Leonhardt. Chicago University. $3.50.
Brazil Under Vargas. By Karl Loewenstein. Macmillan. $2.75.
Stalin. By Emil Ludwig. Putnam's. $2.50.
India Without Fable: A 1942 Survey. By Kate L. Mitchell. Knopf. $2.50.
There Were Giants in the Land: Twenty-eight Historic Americans as Seen by Twenty-eight Contemporary Americans. With an Introduction by Henry Morgenthau, Jr. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.
Admiral Sims and the Modern American Navy. By Elting E. Morison. Houghton Mifflin. $5.
The New Invitation to Learning. Edited by Mark Van Doren. Random House. $3.
Van Loon's Lives. By Hendrik Willem van Loon. Simon and Schuster. $3.95.
Economic Problems of War and Its Aftermath. Walgreen Foundation Lectures. Edited by Chester W. Wright. Chicago. $2.
Webster's Dictionary of Synonyms. G. and C. Merriam. $4.

CONTRIBUTORS

G. A. BORGESE, professor of Italian literature at the University of Chicago, is the author of "Goliath: The March of Fascism." A previous article, "A. E. F. to Siberia," was published in The Nation for April 11, 1942.

JAMES HENLE is the president of the Vanguard Press.

STEFAN J. RUNDT was formerly assistant supervisor of the N. B. C. short-wave receiving department. He is now on the staff of the United Press Listening Post.

EZRA GOODMAN is the film critic for Common Sense.

FRANK JONES, now teaching classics at Yale, has contributed articles, poems, and reviews to the Partisan Review and the New Republic.

RECORDS

FROM the beginning, six years ago, there have been occasional letters from readers of this column who have sighed over what a good music critic I would be if I didn't have that prejudice against Brahms. "Dogmatic" and "opinionated" are other words they have used; and I have also been told that attitudes like mine toward Brahms were something to keep to myself, not to express in print.

Those readers will forgive me for being amused by their assumption that only an estimate of Brahms as high as theirs could represent rational judgment of experience, and that an estimate as low as mine must represent prejudice in the face of experience. Actually, since I have repeatedly expressed my love for certain works of Brahms, my dislike of others cannot represent a prejudice against him. And actually both my likes and dislikes in Brahms are the product of more than twenty-five years' listening to the music, study of it, thought about it; for about half that period it was the music I cherished most; and then I began to be aware of qualities in the First Symphony, the concertos, the chamber music, that made me dislike these works which I had loved, while I continued to love the sets of variations on themes of Haydn and Paganini, the Fourth Symphony, some of the songs, which were not labored and pretentious and saccharine in the way I found the others to be.

My long experience, study, and thought have crystallized in my reasoned judgments of Brahms's music; my correspondents' experience, study, and thought have crystallized in their reasoned judgments; and their contention, in effect, is that where our judgments differ and I refuse to give up mine and accept theirs I am prejudiced, opinionated, dogmatic, and should have the decency to be silent. But a long developed and reasoned judgment, even when unfavorable, is not a prejudice; and while it is likely to be a strongly held and strongly expressed conviction, a man whose strongly held convictions are long developed and reasoned judgments cannot be called opinionated, and even his strong statements of such judgments cannot be called dogmatic. Moreover, he must be granted the right to the reasoned judgments he has arrived at through years of listening, study, and thought; and his function, his duty, his sole usefulness as a critic, if he is one, is to state them—to state, that is, the reasons with the judgments. For criticism is not the mere opinion that this piece of music is good and that one is bad, or this is a good performance and that is a bad one; it is the reasons for the opinion, in which the writer applies to what he has heard the illuminating insights that constitute his value to his readers.

From Bost Records, 29 West Fifty-seventh Street, New York, comes Volume 1 of "The Evolution of Piano Music" (Set ES 2: four 12-inch records in album; $6.25), which is devoted to music from 1350 to 1700, played on the harpsichord by Sylvia Marlowe, with a booklet of notes by Curt Sachs that begins with this paragraph: "The music in this album is not 'ancient music'; stale, dusty, and at best a curio for historically minded snobs. It is no more 'ancient' than Rembrandt's paintings or Gothic cathedrals. It is music, and excellent music, too. It is written in the style of generations past, but in a spirit that has not changed and will never change; the spirit of solid workmanship, pep, and genius."

As a person for whom a piece of music is something to be experienced as a work of art, not something to learn history from, I find only Frescobaldi's "La Frescobaldi" on 107-A and Froberger's Toccata on 107-B impressive in what they convey, in the substance and structure through which they convey it, and in their mere size—for they are the only pieces that take a whole side. The others range from mildly pleasant to dull; and many are so short—three or four to a side—as to range from unsatisfying to irritating (the irritation coming partly from the fact that the sides are not grooved to connect one piece with the next, so that one has to raise the lid and place the needle several times for one side). They are, in fact, so slight in all respects as to make Dr. Sachs's reference to Rembrandt's paintings and Gothic cathedrals extravagant and absurd (there is a great deal more that needs to be said about the attitudes behind that aggressively defensive paragraph; but it will have to wait for an occasion when I have more space).

Others may feel sufficiently compensated for the dullness of an English dance dated 1350 by the knowledge that it "is in four parts, or puncti, either a Stantipes, Ductia, or Nota, the melody of which is written in the angular sings of mensural notation, while an accompanying part is marked out in letters—g, a, d—under the notes" and "the simple accompaniment in fifths, octaves, and occasional thirds . . . shows what kind of counterpoint the minstrels improvised when they fiddled with a singer or player." And it may be enough for them to know that "nothing could be more romantic" than Dr. Bull's jig "My Selfe"—meant as "a self-confession," and ending with a "half-humorous, half-melancholic question mark"—even if their twentieth-century ears can't hear it in the music.

The pieces are played with much vigor and little sensitiveness; the recorded sound of the performances is good; the surfaces are a little noisy.

B. H. HAGGIN

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BOOKS

BOOK BARGAINS

Army Inductee's Mental Test.....	$ .25
Valor of Ignorance: Day of the Saxon: Home Lea complete (paper ed.).....	both for .50
Stedman's Comp. Pocket Guide to Europe ($3.50).....	.50
Muirhead's "Blue Guides," $3.50 list: French Alps; Southern Spain & Portugal; Normandy; 70 M. Around London (Macmillan).....	each .50
Redemption of Democracy: H. Rauschning.....	.85
Smattering of Ignorance: Oscar Levant.....	.90
Embezzled Heaven: Franz Werfel.....	.80
Ellen Rogers: J. T. Farrell ($2.50 ed.).....	1.00
James Joyce: Herbert Gorman ($3.50 ed.).....	1.00
Mission to Moscow: Joseph E. Davies.....	1.45
Faith for Living: Lewis Mumford.....	1.45
Practice for the Army Tests.....	1.50
A Thousand Shall Fall: Hans Habe.....	1.85
The Tyranny of Words: Stuart Chase.....	1.65
Rise of American Civilization: Charles & Mary Beard (complete, 2 vols in 1).....	3.35
Main Currents in American Thought: V. L. Parrington (complete, 3 vols. in 1).....	3.45
The Silent Don: M. Sholokov (Comp. 2 vols. in 1).....	3.50
Addresses of F. D. Roosevelt. Orig. 5 vols., $19 Random House.....	only 4.85
Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences: Editors Seligman & Johnson, now $45 reg. 8 vol.....	$2.50
Add 10c per book U. S. mailing on orders under $8
DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR, 212 B'way, N. Y. C.

MEETING

THE GROUP FORUM

meets at Hotel Peter Stuyvesant—2 West 86th St.
TUES. EVE., SEPT. 15th, at 8:45 P.M.

JOHANNES STEEL

will speak on:

"The News of the Day"

(Notices mailed on request)

NOTICE to ADVERTISERS

The Dies Committee issue of The Nation, originally scheduled for publication on September 10, has been postponed to October 3.

On September 20, The Nation will initiate a new four-page section on political warfare, to be directed by J. Alvarez Del Vayo. Advertising forms for this issue close September 17.

The Fall Book Number is scheduled for October 17 publication; the Christmas Book Number, for December 5 or 12.

Advertising Department

THE NATION

55 FIFTH AVE.

NEW YORK, N. Y.

Letters to the Editors

What Are You Fighting for, Soldier?

Dear Sirs: I have been in the army about two months. During that time I have seen some fine movies on sex hygiene, first aid, military courtesy, and the art of war. In addition I have heard pep talks by and about our war heroes. The talks were filled with tales of bravery, humorous stories, and daring incidents guaranteed to thrill young America. At no time has anything been said on the subject of "Why America Is at War" or "What Are You Fighting for, Soldier?" No one has stimulated us to really conscientious efforts in training by discussing the facts in the case of Democracy vs. Fascism. The shadow of a fascist victory is far removed. The rich possibilities of a truly democratic world are never allowed to interfere with the day's routine of duty.

The men around me are a cross-section of America. They are farmers, factory workers, and white-collar men from every section of this country. They act in the army just as they did in civilian life—only they dress alike, march in formation, and follow military orders. Those who are naturally sincere and conscientious do their work sincerely and conscientiously as they did in civilian life. Those who took short cuts before they came into the army still take short cuts wherever they can.

At no time have I seen men put any real spirit into their training. No one is inspired to give that extra something which is the difference between man and man out to win a war. As individuals a surprising number have a clear understanding of the alternatives—victory or defeat. But they are politically uneducated, and their feelings find no channels for expression.

Never have I heard a group of men break into song. Gathering in the barracks, standing in line, marching along a road, are all occasions for spirited men to express their feelings in song. The fact that they do not is in itself evidence of the thing that is lacking. When the radio is turned on, it is a battle between popular music and news. That there is a battle shows that there is a group of men who care. Today it is popular music that wins. With the right kind of leadership news would win every time.

Army life without a belief in what a victorious army can achieve is stale and boring. Give these men an opportunity to express their real feelings and boredom would vanish. With this changed spirit, training would be faster and more thorough. Men would take the hardships with a different kind of complaining. They would compete for jobs, for knowledge, and for a chance to be of the most effective service.

Potentially we have a high-spirited army, an army that knows why it is fighting. Let's turn the potentiality into a reality by realistically discussing the kind of world we are fighting for.

PRIVATE S. K.

Repeal the Exclusion Act!

Dear Sirs: Yes, Mr. Fischer, India's trouble is America's business and the business of all of the United Nations, for it raises the whole question of what we are fighting for. "This is a people's war." Aren't we fighting for a "free world"? Are the people of India free? Have all the democracies proved their sincerity of purpose in fighting this costly war. Asia, as well as the rest of the world, has a right to expect proof.

The "Atlantic Charter," Roosevelt's "Four Freedoms," and Henry Wallace's famous speech expressed ideals in which we believe; we want India and China to share these ideals. Quoting President Woodrow Wilson, "We seek nothing for ourselves that we do not seek for all men."

Action on the part of Great Britain now would bring its reward, regardless of the dangers and difficulties involved. However, let the American people first take action at home. Our immigration laws should be revised at once to remove the present color stigma. The cause of democracy is suffering at the hands of our own country because the worthy Chinese are excluded from our shores. Surely nothing could do more to establish the confidence of the Chinese and Indians in the sincerity of American democracy than for the United States immigration laws to be changed at this time. The feeling against the white race in the Orient may be reversed if the American Congress, supported by the people, acts immediately to render this great service of simple justice.

Britain's handling of the India problem is not our direct responsibility. But a law which denies United States citizenship—even shore leave—to our allies is our case.

ROSA NOLTE

Los Angeles, Cal., August 29

Aliens and the War Effort

Dear Sirs: In this time of national emergency, when the dedication of our unity with the United Nations is so vital a part of our mutual war effort, a situation still exists which prevents the utilization of the brains and skill of thousands of persons who, having come from the conquered countries, are as devoted as we Americans are to the cause that fascism shall be eliminated from the earth. I refer to the position of the alien who finds that neither in the government nor out of it is he welcomed as an addition to our war effort.

It is true, of course, that when there are not enough jobs to go around a nation may be justified in offering employment only to citizens, but today there is a surplus not of workers but of work. And not just a surplus, a crying need. And still the Czech or Yugoslav who has declared his intention to become a citizen but who is not yet one because of time requirement is not accepted as a worker in the arsenal of the democracies, even though—if we insist on being technical—he is a member of one of the United Nations. America will perpetuate the name of martyred Lidice. How much more significant and realistic to permit the living symbols of Lidice who are in our midst to help produce the implements of vengeance!

Another reason advanced for the barring of aliens from employment in the defense industries is the fear that the loyalty of these people may still lie with the mother country. But even if we must suspect all nationals of Germany, Italy, and Japan, we are not justified in placing all aliens in the same position. If we are to withhold jobs from one group because we doubt that they have totally estranged themselves from their former loyalties to our enemies, how inconsistent to treat in a similar manner the much larger group who may still feel some kinship with our friends! With one stroke we weaken the morale of millions of loyal aliens and hinder our own war effort.

JACK GELFAND

Philadelphia, Pa., August 31

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 19, 1942

NUMBER 12

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- |   |     |
|---|-----|
| Churchill's Speech by Freda Kirchwey | 224 |
| The Senate Tax Bill                         | 225 |
| Workers of the World—                       | 226 |

ARTICLES

- |  |     |
|--|-----|
| The Baruch Report by I. F. Stone            | 227 |
| The Solomons Campaign by Donald W. Mitchell | 229 |
| Why Cripps Failed—I. by Louis Fischer       | 230 |
| To Nowhere and Japan by Richard H. Rovere   | 234 |
| The Magazines Are Loud by William H. Jordy  | 235 |
| Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison     | 237 |
| In the Wind  | 238 |

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- |   |     |
|---|-----|
| Mythology: Western Imagination in the Makingby Irwin Edman | 239 |
| The Problem of Sovereignty by Reinhold Niebuhr                 | 240 |
| Report from the Near East by Ralph Bates                       | 241 |
| Childe Nicolas by Frank Jones                                  | 242 |
| Four Recent Novels by Diana Trilling                           | 243 |
| Civilian Front by Donald W. Mitchell                           | 244 |
| In Brief  | 245 |
| Records by B. H. Haggin  | 246 |

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON    MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor
RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

THE TRUE VOICE OF FRANCE RANG OUT LIKE a bell in the courageous letter addressed to Marshal Pétain by MM. Edouard Herriot and Jules Jeanneney. The immediate object of these two distinguished elder statesmen, one president of the Chamber of Deputies, the other of the Senate, was to protest against a Vichy decree dismissing the bureaus of both houses of Parliament and thus severing the last thread of parliamentary government in France. This action, as the letter points out, was in direct violation of Pétain's undertaking in July, 1940, when in return for a vote of full powers by the National Assembly he promised that the chambers would not be suppressed. The force of the protest, however, does not depend on this constitutional point alone, for Herriot and Jeanneney seized the opportunity to pen a general indictment of the Vichy regime. "You have," they wrote, "substituted unlimited dictatorship for guaranties that all civilized nations grant to accused persons. You have reestablished lettres de cachet. . . . We cannot clearly see your aims, but if, despite your solemn engagements, you intend to deprive the nation of the right to decide for itself freely its definite regime, or if without authorization of Parliament you try to draw France into war against our allies, which you yourself declared 'honor forbids,' we by this letter protest in advance in the name of national sovereignty." We are glad to note that Mr. Hull, in praising this letter and commenting on its significance, said that the United States government was naturally gratified to be associated with patriotic Frenchmen who had the courage to proclaim all the rights and liberties of the great French Republic. We can only hope this means that, in future, our State Department is going to associate itself less with Vichy and more with the Fighting French.

✱

THE HERRIOT LETTER PROVIDES A MOST timely antidote to Laval's constant efforts to poison the hearts of the French people against America and Britain. This clearly was the real purpose of his two protests to Washington. Speaking of the Flying Fortress attacks on Rouen, the Vichy Chief of Government remarked sourly: "Americans could choose another battlefield if they want to show their friendship for France." And the invasion of Madagascar produced the revealing comment: "I hope that the event will cause the De Gaullists and especially those in Vichy to diminish." Laval's anti-Allied propaganda, however, is hopelessly handicapped by his Nazi friends. As German resources of man-power diminish, increasing pressure is being put on Vichy to conscript the whole of France for the benefit of the Axis war effort. And every step taken toward this objective inevitably intensifies French hatred of Germany and French contempt for Vichy. Laval's miserable bargain to sell French labor to the Reich in return for prisoners of war too ill to work was a hopeless failure. His wholesale shipments of foreign Jews and other refugees to German slave camps has aroused widespread indignation and led to notable protests by the Catholic church. Now Vichy has promulgated a new decree by which all men between the ages of eighteen and fifty and all unmarried women between twenty and thirty-five must show that they have employment that "the government will judge is useful to the nation." Nothing is said in the official text about the dispatch of workers abroad, but a commentary published by the official Havas Agency declares bluntly that it is necessary to meet not only the needs of the country but the demand for workers to be sent to Germany in exchange for released prisoners.

✱

AFTER THE CAPTURE OF DIEGO SUAREZ, THE naval base at the northern tip of Madagascar, four months ago, the British made no move to complete their occupation of the island. It is now clear that during this period they were engaged in painstaking negotiations with the Vichy-appointed governor of the colony, hoping to reach an agreement which would leave him in control of its internal affairs provided that he was willing and able to give guaranties against its use by the Axis. The official statement issued in London on September 10 declares that it has been proved that these requirements will not be met by peaceful means. Consequently, with the full approval and support of Washington, British forces drawn from Africa have made three landings on the west coast of Madagascar and are advancing on the capital. Little opposition has been encountered, and there are hopes that the operation can be concluded with a minimum of bloodshed. Vichy, as was to be expected, is protesting to high heaven that no Japanese ships or planes have been near the island. However, a Tokyo dispatch published almost simultaneously with this protest stated that a Japanese submarine had sunk a British freighter in the Mozambique Channel, which runs between Madagascar and the mainland and forms part of the vital British supply line to Egypt. The appearance of a Japanese submarine in these waters, over 4,000 miles from its nearest acknowledged base, is itself a sufficient answer to Vichy's cries of innocence and a powerful argument against any further delay in securing complete control of Madagascar.

✱

IN THE COURSE OF HIS REPORT TO THE House of Commons Prime Minister Churchill made only one real revelation about his conversations with Stalin. As we are hardly surprised to learn, the Soviet leader said very bluntly that he did not think the British and Americans had done enough to "take the weight" off the Russians, who for two summers now have been withstanding the major part of Germany's armed might. "It was difficult," Mr. Churchill remarked almost apologetically, "to make the Russians comprehend the difficulties of ocean transport. . . . It was difficult to explain fully the different characteristics of the war effort of the various countries, but I am sure we made their leaders feel confidence in our loyal and sincere resolve to come to their aid as quickly as possible." The Prime Minister went on to speak of Stalin in the most flattering terms, but this tribute seems to have been received without enthusiasm in Moscow, which is surfeited with words and impatiently looking for deeds. Meanwhile, with the second front still somewhere around the corner, the Russians continue their tenacious resistance. Outside Stalingrad the Nazis are still gaining ground yard by yard, with every advance paid for in heavy losses. Even if the Red Army is finally compelled to yield the city, its magnificent defense will not have been in vain. The long check before Stalingrad has upset the Nazi timetable, and already the German High Command is turning its thoughts to winter, making preparations by which it hopes to avoid the costly errors of last year's campaign. Three leading Nazi generals have been assigned the tasks of preparing a strong fortified line, of organizing transport, and of gathering the necessary stores, including warm clothing. Intensified air attacks on German supply lines should add appreciably to the difficulty of carrying out these tasks.

✱

THE JAPANESE HAVE BEEN SUSPICIOUSLY quiet during the past week on all of their many fronts except in New Guinea and the Solomon Islands. North of Port Moresby they demonstrated anew their skill in the use of infiltration tactics by outflanking Australian troops in the Owen Stanley Mountain region and advancing to within forty miles of the important New Guinea base. This success has been, in a limited way, an even greater demonstration of Japanese skill than was the fighting on the Malay Peninsula, because, in contrast to the earlier fighting, the Japanese have had to contend with overwhelming United Nations air superiority. In the Solomons their success has been more restricted. The navy admits that some Japanese troops have been landed at night to reinforce the remnants still holding out in the jungles of Guadalcanal. But the number seems to be small, and repeated air attacks on the Guadalcanal airport have been beaten off with severe losses to the enemy. Although the Japanese appear to have sent considerable aerial reinforcements to the Southwest Pacific, the command of the air clearly remains in the hands of the United Nations. As long as this is true, it seems unlikely that the Japanese will undertake major offensive operations.

✱

PERHAPS THE POSITION OF MARTIN DIES could be worse, but we don't see how. On September 2 Attorney General Biddle informed Congress that of the 1,121 government employees branded by Dies as subversive only two had been found to deserve dismissal after an investigation not by Eleanor Roosevelt but by the FBI. That investigation cost $100,000; it wasted the time of who knows how many investigators; we can be sure it had its effect on the nerves of government employees. But it has had one result which makes it worth the price: Martin Dies has forever discredited himself with the FBI; and his demand that Congress reject the Biddle-FBI report because it "gives license to every government employee to engage in any communistic, subversive activity" was not designed to increase his prestige with J. Edgar Hoover. It is true that Dies and the FBI have been at odds all along and Congress may persist in supporting Dies, but after the FBI's damning exposure of the committee's "evidence," public funds for gathering more of it will not be easily granted from now on. Meanwhile the FBI is beginning to press its advantage over the Dies forces. Last month twenty-eight persons were indicted on charges, presumably documented by the FBI, of conspiring to undermine the morale of the armed forces. Several of them had been subpoenaed, but most of these had never been questioned, by the Dies committee. The Nation has been asking why for many long months, and now at last the FBI, just back from the wild-goose chase instigated by Dies, is also wondering. According to Kenneth Crawford, writing in PM, the FBI is not only asking why the Dies committee ignored blatant fascists while it concentrated on 1,119 government employees now exonerated; it is also getting curious about the committee's finances. May its curiosity increase. We are already looking forward to the FBI's report on the un-American activities of Martin Dies.

✱

CONGRESS HAS MADE A BAD START ON ITS new anti-inflation legislation, and there is grave doubt whether it will be able to meet the President's October 1 deadline. In the Senate a joint resolution has been introduced which, so far as farm prices are concerned, roughly follows the proposals outlined by Mr. Roosevelt in his Labor Day speech. It allows the President to impose price ceilings at either full parity or the highest market price between January 1 and September 15 of this year, whichever is the highest. This would enable the farmers to retain all their recent gains. The House bill, introduced by Representative Steagall of Alabama, who steered the Price Control Act along a course laid down by the farm bloc, adopts the same formula but adds a joker to it in the shape of a provision for the recalculation of parity prices. These, it declares, "shall be determined so as to include all costs of production, including the cost of labor, with all labor included and the wage rates used for all labor to be the same as the general average of wage rates for hired farm labor." The exact meaning of this masterpiece of obscure drafting may well baffle both lawyers and economists, but its intention is fairly clear—compensation to the farmers for restricting them to a parity price ceiling by altering the parity ratio in their favor. Mr. Steagall confessed he was unable to say just what the effect of this clause on prices would be, but there is no doubt that it makes the bill an inflationary rather than an anti-inflationary measure. With regard to wages, both Senate and House proposals provide the President with the broad regulatory powers he says he already possesses. This Congressional sop to its own pride appears harmless, though it is hardly impressive as a bid to recapture lost prestige.

✱

ELLIS ARNALL, THE MAN WHO HAS JUST relieved Eugene Talmadge of his governor's toga, promoted his campaign as "a crusade to restore decency and democracy in Georgia." He did in fact have the backing of the President, and there is little doubt that every liberal in the state chose him in preference to the red-gallused primitive from Sugar Creek. Confronted with Talmadge's inflammatory appeal to "white supremacy," his rampant phobia against "foreigners" from beyond the borders of Georgia, and his assumption of dictatorial powers on the ground that "you can't have a democracy unless you can have a head to appeal to" the way the Romans appealed to Caesar, distraught Georgians flocked to Arnall. The youthful attorney general backed the policies of President Roosevelt and pledged himself to free the university system from political degradation. The choice was clear, and the downfall of Talmadge is heartening, but to judge from Arnall's own standards, Georgia still has quite a way to go. The champion of "decency and democracy" rightly resented Talmadge's demagogic raising of the racial issue, but not because he himself is even relatively free of prejudice. "If a nigger ever tried to get into a white school in my part of the state," he told a rural campaign audience, "the sun would never set on his head. And we wouldn't be running to the governor or the State Guard to get things done, either." Arnall is to be preferred to Talmadge, but this is surely a new low in compliments.

THREE YEARS AGO THE GERMAN FILM OF the blitzkrieg in Poland was almost enough to cause a neutral country to surrender even before the "liberating" Nazi army appeared in its capital. "Sieg im Westen" was, as they say, packing them into the Lebensraum. But the newest German film venture indicates a serious decline in Nazi war pictures and their prestige in neutral countries—if we are to judge by the reception in Lisbon and Zurich of "How We Dealt with the British at Dieppe." The critics in Lisbon not only found it a poor show, "which cannot convince even those who know little about movies"; one of them, who didn't refuse to give his name, said outright that it was faked and clumsily faked at that. He pointed out, among other things, that one sequence showed a captured British tank in the heart of Dieppe, though the commentary asserted that no British tanks passed the beach defenses. In Zurich the audience greeted it with irreverent catcalls. We can't help wondering why the Nazis chose the "negligible" Allied attack on Dieppe as a subject anyway. Surely some of the great offensives in Russia, not to mention the magnificent air attack on Britain, would be more photogenic than Nazis on the defensive at Dieppe. Can it be that the Great Director prefers not to mention the Battle of Britain and that the big Russian feature so loudly anticipated in Berlin a year ago is being held up until he can find the happy ending which movie fans, even in Germany, notoriously demand?

Churchill's Speech

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

WHEN I read Churchill's speech on India last Friday, I was struck with the unhappy contrast provided by Britain's treatment of its dissident subjects and of its avowed enemies. And I began to think about the nature and uses of appeasement.

It is an apparent but not a real paradox to say that appeasement is effective only when it is used in dealing with friends. Since long before Munich, Britain has made the all-but-fatal mistake—and America has aped it—of appeasing its enemies and betraying or openly attacking its friends and dependents. Spain fell because Britain and its associates wanted to placate Hitler and Mussolini. Czecho-Slovakia fell for the same reason. Mr. Churchill knows now that this is so; and he has laid the blame on his pusillanimous predecessors. But his government has continued to use the same tactics toward Franco and, to a lesser degree, Pétain. The consistent attacks on Britain by the dictator of Spain have been met by kindness, patience, and supplies of food and fuel. Franco is an enemy, though a weak, exhausted, and spiritless one, but because he is an enemy he must be paid tribute so that he will not strike.

But what is the use of placating a country which is part of the empire and subject to the military might of Britain? The appeasing instinct, so strongly developed in dealings with enemy states, fails when it comes to India. It fails where it could for once impressively succeed. Appeasement in India would be political wisdom, not weakness; it would be magnanimity, not cowardice. Britain has more than a million troops in India. It can certainly crush rebellion. For that reason alone, if for no other, it can afford to be conciliatory, generous. But instead it chooses to be ruthless.

Winston Churchill's speech on India slammed the door on appeasement; it was a declaration of war on the Indian National Congress and on Mahatma Gandhi. It was the speech of an unreconstructed, unrepentant imperialist. Taken together with the statement by Sir Stafford Cripps during the debate that followed, it is the most discouraging thing that has happened since the Cripps mission failed. An irreconcilable, embittered India faces a stubborn unconciliatory British government; and no way of breaking the deadlock seems open.

I don't pretend that all the fault for this situation is on the side of the British. I believe the Indian Nationalist leaders, and Gandhi in particular, were more intransigent than they should have been in dealing with the Cripps proposals. I believe their followers are tragically wrong in allowing fanatical concentration on the relative evils of British rule to blind them to the absolute horror of Axis domination. But the resistance of the leaders and the lack of vision among their cohorts are twin products of imperialism. They may be deplored, but they cannot be shrugged aside. They exist as menacing facts which may influence the course of military events in India as directly as did native disaffection in Burma and Malaya—and with more disastrous consequences.

India needs to be won, not whipped and jailed into sullen acquiescence. But Churchill has vetoed any new attempt to win India. And his speech was proof that even the frankness and blunt honesty for which he is noted disappear when the imperialist begins to speak.

Churchill said, for instance, that "the good offices of Sir Stafford Cripps were rejected by the Indian Congress Party." Louis Fischer's article in this issue recalls the fact, which the Prime Minister conveniently forgot, that every single party in India rejected the Cripps proposals. But it is the Congress Party that has launched the civil-disobedience campaign; and it is against them that Churchill has declared war. Again, he says, "Outside that party, and fundamentally opposed to it, are the 90,000,000 Moslems in British India who have their rights of self-expression. . . ." The dispatches reported that "here a member interjected 'nonsense'"; it was a proper interruption. Many thousands of Moslems are included in the Congress Party, whose president is a Moslem; the Moslem League, which opposes the Congress, itself represents but a small minority of the Moslems; and the Moslem League, as Mr. Fischer explains, also favors an end to British rule, but with independence for the predominantly Moslem states. None of these blurring details found a place in Mr. Churchill's analysis.

Nor is the Prime Minister more impartial in his description of the disorders. He says in this connection, "The Congress Party has now abandoned the policy, in many respects, of non-violence, which Gandhi has so long inculcated in theory, and has come into the open as a revolutionary movement designed to paralyze communications . . . and generally to promote disorder. . . ." Clearly this implies disbelief in Gandhi's sincerity; it implies that the Congress itself has merely awaited the chance to throw off its mask and unleash mass disorders. But no one who has followed Gandhi's career can doubt his hatred for violence; and most dispassionate observers will wonder whether the jailing of the responsible leaders of the Nationalist movement has not inevitably thrown power into the hands of less scrupulous men who are willing to turn the anger of the people to ends of violence and mass sabotage. If a pro-Japanese fifth column is, as Mr. Churchill suggests, directing the disorders against strategic military points, its operations may well have been aided by British measures of repression.

One cannot ask the British authorities to stand by while railroads are blown up and telegraph lines are destroyed. They must use force against force. But one may ask why they refused to negotiate with Gandhi when he asked for a final interview before launching civil disobedience. And, even now, they could, if they were willing, hold out a hand of reconciliation to the Indian leaders with whom, ultimately, they will have to come to terms. They could offer new negotiations looking toward a national all-party government in return for an ending of disorder and civil disobedience. That they will do so is not to be expected. The speech of Winston Churchill, with its willful simplifications and its reliance on force to resolve a complex social-political conflict, clearly announces that no change of policy is contemplated. He promises the Viceroy the full backing of the British government. He minimizes the dangers involved in Indian disaffection. Such a speech makes it extremely difficult for the President of the United States to intervene further and all but dooms the desperate efforts of Indian moderates to find some formula of conciliation.

Louis Fischer's remarkable account of the Cripps mission reveals the willingness of the highest British authorities to risk everything except a transfer of real power. He shows how close Cripps and the Indian leaders came to a satisfactory interim agreement, how small an area of difference remained when Cripps's original offer was withdrawn and the negotiations finally broke down. It is a terrible story when one considers the consequences of a failure that could have been avoided.

The Senate Tax Bill

THE response of the Senate Finance Committee to the President's urgent request for a steep increase in taxes to hold off the threat of inflation has, on the whole, been disappointing. Less than twenty-four hours after the President delivered his message, the committee rejected the Treasury's proposal for a graduated tax on spending by a vote of 12 to 0. The President's renewed request for a war-time ceiling of $25,000 on personal incomes was not even considered by the committee. Senator George, the chairman, declared that such a ceiling was not necessary because "a person would have to have about a $5,000,000 yearly gross income in order to have more than $25,000 left after taxes." This, of course, is utter nonsense. Under the revised Senate bill a single man with a $5,000,000 income—with no allowances for deductions—would have $348,000 left for personal use, and a single man with a $100,000 income would have more than $30,000 after meeting his tax obligations.

In place of the graduated spending tax proposed by the Treasury, the Senate Finance Committee adopted a flat 5 per cent "victory tax" to be levied on all incomes above $624 a year. This new tax has an advantage over the ordinary income tax in that the money is to be withheld at the source; it should also yield a considerable amount of revenue and help close the "inflationary gap" between incomes and the diminishing supply of consumers' goods. The $624 exemption and its simplicity of operation make it definitely preferable to a sales tax. Nevertheless, it is a bad tax because it largely ignores the all-important principle of capacity to pay. A 5 per cent tax on a man with a $1,000,000 income cannot be considered equivalent to a 5 per cent tax on a man earning $2,000 a year. There can be little doubt that the "victory tax" represents a more or less conscious effort to place the burden of paying for the war on the low- and middle-income groups so that the well-to-do shall not be called upon to go without their luxuries. It will be recalled that the Senate Finance Committee had previously rejected a whole series of levies that would have fallen, in the main, on the wealthy or on war profiteers. It had refused to increase excess-profits taxes or the corporation tax in accordance with the Treasury's proposals, and it had repulsed all efforts to correct the shocking injustice of tax-exempt securities.

The chief criticism of the Senate tax bill, however, is that it is "too little and too late." It is quite possible that a tax bill of this size might have sufficed to stem the inflationary tide if it had been enacted last January when the President first urged a steep increase in taxes. But during the past eight months an enormous amount of money that might have helped to pay for the war has been utilized, instead, in bidding up prices for our dwindling stock of goods. As a result, our entire mechanism for price control is in great danger. A disastrous inflation can still be prevented, but more drastic measures are called for than would have been necessary eight or nine months ago. The National Bureau of Economic Research has estimated that at least $22 billion in new taxes will have to be raised in 1943 "if inflation is eventually to be avoided." The Senate bill would yield only about $9 billion. The disparity may represent the difference between complete success in stabilizing prices, wages, and the cost of living at approximately the present levels and the ultimate collapse of orderly price-wage relationships.

The necessity for preventing a runaway inflation—which would wreak untold injury of the low-income groups—overshadows for the moment the far-reaching social implications of the Senate's repudiation of the principle of capacity to pay. Although the Senate bill avoids heavy taxes on the very poor—that is, families with incomes of less than $1,000—it places a crushing load on the middle-income groups—those with incomes ranging from $1,500 to $2,500. Families in this income bracket will be compelled to make a severe sacrifice in living standards. The taxes on the well-to-do are large enough to cut drastically into their ability to save but not large enough, as we may see from the illustrations above, to cause any real discomfort or giving up of luxuries. The effect of this inequality of sacrifice on national morale is apparently not even being considered by Congress. But in disregarding it, Congress may seriously impair the entire war effort.

Workers of the World—

TWO matters of international importance have stood out in reports of the British Trade Union Congress, which has just closed its annual convention. They are the questions of the immediate opening of a second front in Europe and the related problem of international trade-union unity. A resolution demanding an immediate mass sortie was moved by Jack Tanner, the non-Communist left-wing leader of the Amalgamated Engineering Union. More interesting than the voting, which returned a two-million majority against the resolution, was Mr. Tanner's principal argument. There was, he said, an influential section of British political opinion which was hostile to both the U. S. S. R. and to British labor. Since the demand for invasion now means that the mover believes the necessary resources exist, the implication is clear. It is that the Tories are deliberately allowing the Soviet Union to be weakened as a means of checking Communist influence in Europe.

At a remove of 3,000 miles The Nation cannot presume to assess the real force of Mr. Tanner's argument. Doubtless, in Britain as in this country there are still people bent on national suicide in the interests of their class. The Blackpool congress, however, would seem to have decided that this section of British opinion is not influential. For that is the meaning of the General Council's accepted resolution, which declared that the question of when, where, and how a European front is to be reopened is one for the military leaders alone. Apart from the merits of the case, the second-front campaign in Britain has obviously had some undesirable results. There as here extravagantly worded demands may intensify the very suspicions and divisions which the proponents of a second front assume to be operative.

The British labor movement has shown itself to be aware of the danger of anti-Soviet prejudice. The creation in October, 1941, of the Anglo-Soviet Trade Union Committee and the recent efforts of the British movement to induce the American federations to enter that committee are realistic enough. It was a pity that Sir Walter Citrine, who recently visited the United States to promote this project, was compelled to report failure to the Blackpool conference. What he had to say does not entirely coincide with reports current in this country. It is clear, however, that once again the disunity of American labor has stood in the way of international unity. Since the A. F. of L. has long been affiliated to the European Trade Union Federation, the British movement could not very well approach the C. I. O., with which it has no formal relations, without the A. F. of L.'s consent. Once the A. F. of L. had refused to associate with the Russian unions, it became practically impossible for Sir Walter Citrine to make official contact with the C. I. O. Mr. Murray, we understand, as well as other C. I. O. leaders, were displeased at the British delegates' failure to invite them. Quite naturally the C. I. O. itself would not risk a British rebuff.

Mr. Murray is said to have proposed another scheme to Sir Walter, whereby the C. I. O. and presumably the A. F. of L. could join a committee composed of trade-union representatives from every member of the United Nations. It is not hard to see the difficulties, though the idea seems a good one. In any case, outside liberal opinion may reasonably plead with American labor to end its divisions. Perhaps we may also suggest to the older British union leaders that they cease to regard the C. I. O. as a breakaway movement. Labor's demands in the post-war world are much more likely to be met if international trade-union unity has been well cemented during the war. And aware as we are that good sense has not always characterized Soviet leadership, and recognizing that the Russian unions are not autonomous in the sense that the American and British organizations are, the inclusion of the Russian unions in any international committee is still essential.

The Baruch Report

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, September 13

MUCH can be learned from the Baruch report, but not about synthetic rubber. Regarded as a barometer of the war effort, it shows that the temper of our leadership has stiffened slightly, enough to impose new and necessary hardships on the people, though not yet on the trusts. Regarded as practical politics, the report makes it easier for the President to order nationwide gasoline rationing to save tires, a painful task on the eve of Congressional elections. Regarded as scientific inquiry, the report comes to no conclusions which might hurt the endowment funds of Harvard or M. I. T. Regarded as a fortunate bit of public relations for Standard Oil of New Jersey, it takes the edge off the revelations of the Truman, Gillette, and Bone committees. Best of all, from this point of view, while the report attempts to appease the farm bloc, it also leaves the synthetic-rubber program exactly where it was—in the lap of the Standard-Mellon-du Pont interests.

The report is least informative where it should have been most helpful—on the technical questions of the synthetic-rubber program. Presumably Conant was put on the board because he is a chemist; Compton because he is head of an outstanding scientific school, with the best technicians at his disposal. Any corner-store statesman could have thought up the idea of a thirty-five-mile speed to save wear on tires. Any garage mechanic could have given us the Baruch report's chatty discussion of the best way to park a car. Any good hotel detective could have told us that we ought to hire "additional armed guards" for rubber stockpiles. We didn't need two college presidents and twenty-five "experts," kept discreetly and suspiciously anonymous, to tell us these things. Nor did we need them to tell us that priorities are working badly, that there ought to be more facilities for reclaiming scrap rubber, and that we ought to plant more rubber-bearing guayule. None of that is news.

The Baruch board was set up because Congress had passed and the President had vetoed a bill for a separate agency to make rubber from farm products in the shape of grain alcohol and butylene glycol. The board was supposed to tell us whether rubber from alcohol was a pipe dream born of prairie surpluses and the romantic Polish imagination or a scientific reality. This is a subject the Standard Oil crowd would rather not discuss. It is a subject the Baruch report did its best to avoid. Of the report's seventy-three pages, only sixteen are devoted to the synthetic-rubber program. Of these sixteen, less than two discuss rubber from alcohol. The fact that rubber can be made from grain alcohol is left to implication, and there is no discussion of the relative advantages of alcohol and petroleum processes from the point of view of time and materials.

The Russians make their rubber successfully from grain alcohol, and the Baruch board could hardly avoid the Gillette committee's discovery that a Russian offer to exchange technicians and information on synthetic rubber was turned down last February. The report shields the men and motives involved. The People's Lobby reveals that the offer was made to W. L. Clayton, the cotton magnate who is Jesse Jones's Assistant Secretary of Commerce, and George Hill, president of the RFC's Defense Supply Corporation. One would never guess from the Baruch report's description of these Russian processes that they are based on grain alcohol rather than petroleum, much less that the Soviets chose to make their rubber from alcohol after an exhaustive investigation of both raw materials.

"Every effort," the Baruch report says, "ought to be made to obtain this information." What good will it do us when we get it? The men who rejected it in February will still hold the purse-strings of the rubber program. For while the Baruch report recommends the appointment of a Rubber Administrator to centralize responsibility for the program, it leaves Jesse Jones and his men in charge of the financing. This means that authority will continue to be divided, that the new administrator may be as powerless as the highly publicized "rubber czar" who preceded him at the WPB.

In any case, the Baruch report leaves the synthetic program frozen. There would be little possibility of using the Soviet formula even if Jones and Clayton changed their minds. As a grudging sop to the farm bloc, the report recommends that a miserly 30,000 tons be obtained from new grain processes out of a 1,100,000-ton program. This allocation is to be kept on ice for six months, after which it may be canceled by the Rubber Administrator "if the needs for synthetic rubber and the production program are in balance," whatever that means. If not, the administrator may choose between the Polish process and the butylene glycol developed by the Department of Agriculture at Peoria. Presumably the Russian method would be a third alternative for this puny allocation.

Our ignorance of the Russian processes is not the result of Soviet secretiveness. It does not differ from our ignorance of the Houdry process, of what Standard Oil is doing with butyl, or of the tire-making possibilities of du Pont's neoprene. The dollar-a-year chemists from the big oil and chemical companies and their scientific schools have told us only what monopoly thought it convenient for us to know. Before and since the Revolution, Russians figure prominently in the development of synthetic rubber. The Soviet success with rubber from alcohol is no secret to chemists. A bulletin on synthetic rubber published some years ago by the Bureau of Standards lists in its bibliography many articles by Soviet scientists. The dollar-a-year men kept quiet about these possibilities, as about others, because a knowledge of them would interfere with the plans of the monopolists.

The result is a program so lopsided that it invites disaster. The casual reader of the Baruch report may gain the impression that we cannot afford to jeopardize our synthetic-rubber program by experiments. The truth is that every process in the program is more or less experimental, and that the program leans most heavily on those processes which have been least tried. The way to cut down the risk is to diversify the program so that the breakdown of one process will not affect too large a part of the program. The WPB, Jesse Jones, and the interests which use them have chosen instead to put most of our eggs into a few baskets.

Everything is topsy-turvy, idiotic in the eyes of common sense, but shrewdly planned from the viewpoint of monopoly. Most of the rubber to be made in the program is Buna S. The company which knows the most about making this type of rubber is Goodrich, and Goodrich has been given the smallest allocation of any rubber company. This is its punishment for daring to develop a buna-type rubber on its own after Standard and I. G. Farben had refused to give Goodrich a license under their buna patents.

The Germans invented buna, and Standard does not know how to make it. I. G. Farben, after stalling Standard for years, finally handed the patents over but only to keep them from being seized by the Alien Property Custodian. I. G. never gave Standard the know-how. But Standard has another synthetic rubber, butyl. Standard invented butyl and knows how to make it. Common sense would propose that we concentrate on butyl; Standard prefers to have us concentrate on buna: Standard has licensed production of buna but not of butyl. Special plants must be erected to produce the butadiene and the styrene that go into buna. Every refinery in the country in the course of its normal operations produces sizable quantities of isobutylene, the raw material of butyl. No steel or copper need be spent on facilities to make isobutylene. Information found in Standard Oil's files by Thurman Arnold's men showed (1) that there was enough isobutylene at major refineries alone to make 600,000 tons of butyl a year, and

(2) that the Nazis were extremely anxious to prevent development of butyl in this country. The advantage of butyl to the war effort is its disadvantage to Standard Oil. It is so easy to produce, the raw material so plentiful, the cost so low—a third the price of buna—that it could never be controlled if the patents and the know-how ever got out of Standard Oil's hands. So we are to make only 132,000 tons of butyl as compared with 705,000 tons of buna, and the Baruch report recommends another 140,000 tons of buna on top of that. Wouldn't it be wiser to divide the program more evenly?

Within the buna program itself there is the same lopsided planning. There are four processes to be used for making the butadiene. Here, again, the oil company which seems to have the most experience in making butadiene is given a small portion of the program. Phillips Petroleum, Goodrich's partner in the making and marketing of America's first synthetic tires, has a one-step process for making butadiene from the butane in natural gas. It has contracts for 50,000 tons of butadiene. Houdry, with a similar one-step process from butane, managed by the skin of its teeth to get 15,600 tons. The largest allocation in the petroleum field, 283,000 tons, goes to Standard, which has a new and still to be tested process for making butadiene from butylene. Unlike butane, butylene can only be obtained by cracking processes, and it is needed for aviation gas. This possibility of a conflict was one of the most important technical questions the Baruch report should have answered; it weasled and dodged instead. "It is our conclusion," the report says, "that while the possibility of a conflict between the two programs does exist, it need not become serious if . . ." There are big "ifs" involved. Why take chances? Why not divide allocations among the butadiene processes more evenly?

We ought to try several grain processes in our butadiene program instead of concentrating on the cumbersome four-step Carbon and Carbide process, on which we are depending for 242,000 tons. We ought to try the Polish process, the Russian, butylene glycol, and butyl alcohol; the last makes a purer butylene than petroleum. This is not possible until we loosen the grip of the oil and chemical trusts from the synthetic-rubber program. The Baruch report moves in the other direction when it suggests that all butadiene processes be passed on by the Office of Petroleum Coordinator: this office has a worse case of oil-trust dollar-a-yearitis than the WPB. The present program can still be changed; much of it remains on paper. The Baruch report admits that some of these plants have not even been started. There is still time, but not much time. If we had an independent fighting man for Rubber Administrator, if we threw open all patents and processes to exploitation, if we gave enterprise free rein, we could lick the rubber problem. Monopoly never will.

The Solomons Campaign

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE Battle of Midway, the most important engagement in the Pacific area up to the present, accomplished more than the destruction of a considerable number of Japanese carriers. Coupled with the rapid repair of the American ships damaged at Pearl Harbor, it reduced Japan's ability to take the offensive and gave to the United States navy a definite though small margin of superiority. This transfer of the initiative in Pacific sea fighting is evidenced by the recent campaign in the Solomons.

The present state of public information on this operation is far from satisfactory. The British navy has been traditionally termed the "silent service"; yet Admiralty communiqués sound like the proceedings of a press agent's convention in comparison with the meager information vouchsafed to the American people by the Navy Department. This makes difficult either a true reconstruction of the Solomons fight or a sane evaluation of its strategical significance. Yet the Solomons campaign is of peculiar interest to Americans, for it represents, in miniature, the type of combined land-sea-air operations which will be required if Japan is to be dislodged from its strong positions in the western Pacific.

On August 7 American convoys with plane, cruiser, and destroyer protection, probably operating from New Zealand bases, scored a complete surprise on the Japanese garrisons in the southeastern Solomons, knocking out the defending seaplanes while they were still at anchor. Shore landings and the establishment of beachheads were greatly aided by American superiority in numbers of men, by an umbrella of protecting air power from carriers, and by the element of surprise. After two days the American position was relatively secure. In those days the Japanese attacked with land-based air power from New Guinea, but these attacks were lessened in effectiveness by the softening up which the Jap bases had taken from MacArthur's bombers and also by the speed and thoroughness with which the marines established shore defenses and mopped up the defending garrisons.

The attempt of Japanese cruisers and destroyers on the night of August 8 to destroy the American transports, which were defended by a similar force, resulted in a strategic check for the enemy, who was compelled to retreat, though losses may have been fairly equal. The later phases of the fighting have consisted of counterattacks by the enemy designed to dislodge American garrisons from the positions which they had been allowed time to consolidate. With a kind of bullish aggressiveness which is one of their weakest and their strongest fighting qualities, the Japanese chose to use strong fleet units in an attempt to test American resistance and possibly retake what they had lost. Had a large number of torpedo planes been available to the defenders, the outcome might well have been disastrous for the enemy; as it was, American bombers caused considerable damage and defeated the attempt. More recent efforts to get troops to the islands by stealth rather than force have likewise met an alert defense.

In this campaign the American navy took advantage of the fact that the Japanese conquests are so extensive that at many points they are necessarily rather weakly held. American losses were not revealed, but in this type of action they would normally be large, and we should not be surprised if the navy announces the destruction of several warships. The question of whether it is feasible to send a naval expedition against bases held by land planes has received one more answer, but under conditions so favorable to the attackers that the extreme air-power school need not feel dismayed.

The capture of part of the Solomons is cheering news for several reasons. In the first place, the harbor of Tulagi and a completed airfield on Guadalcanal Island are of decided value. They bring American naval and air power closer to Japan's main bases in the South Pacific and may provide valuable springboards for later expeditions against either the northwestern Solomons and New Guinea or, more likely, the Gilbert and Marshall Islands. Technically the campaign was well conducted, especially in the coordination of air, land, and sea elements under naval command. The fact that the Japanese rather than ourselves were surprised demonstrates that their intelligence and reconnaissance services are no longer working with the precision of peace days and that our own are steadily improving. Most important, it is our first real offensive in the Pacific.

However, the Solomons battle cannot by any stretch of the imagination be termed of decisive value. The area and population recovered are not more than a fraction of one per cent of what we lost to Japan in the first few months of the war. If we are now taking the initiative, it is on but a tiny scale. Since a campaign on the mainland of Asia would be essentially military, an American naval offensive through the Pacific islands is not likely to make the Japanese postpone an attack on Siberia. Finally, it will be difficult in the extreme to expand slight gains anywhere in the Southwest Pacific into a first-class offensive. The shorter lines of attack—and all are long—lie much farther north.

Why Cripps Failed

BY LOUIS FISCHER

I

IN INDIA, after a while, I sighed aloud for a person whose statements to me on the Indian situation would not be contradicted by the next person I met. On one question, however, there was complete unanimity: on the primary reason for the failure of the Cripps mission. Yet this reason has apparently remained a secret outside of India, and Sir Stafford Cripps himself contrived to avoid any mention of it in an article about his mission published in the New York Times of August 23, 1942. Englishmen and Indians in India agreed that the Cripps negotiations broke down when Cripps withdrew a promise he had made to the Indian leaders that India could have an immediate national government.

On April 11, 1942, two days after the negotiations broke down, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, Moslem president of the Indian National Congress Party, who had been conducting the talks with Cripps, wrote Cripps a letter in which he recapitulated the course of the negotiations.

What we were told in our very first talk with you [Azad stated] is now denied or explained away. You told me then that there would be a national government which would function as a Cabinet and that the position of the Viceroy would be analogous to that of the King in England vis-a-vis his Cabinet. In regard to the India Office [headed by Leopold S. Amery in London] you told me that you were surprised that no one had so far mentioned this important matter, and that the practical course was to have this attached or incorporated with the Dominions' Office.

The whole of this picture which you sketched before us has now been completely shattered by what you told us during our last interview.

How did Cripps reply to this charge that he had reversed himself? At the end of his letter Azad asked Cripps's permission to publish this and other correspondence. Cripps's reply, dated April 11, was a four-line letter which read:

My dear Maulana Sahib: Thank you for your letter which I have just received in reply to mine of the tenth April. I have no objection to your releasing the Congress resolution and our correspondence whenever you desire to do so.

Yours sincerely,

STAFFORD CRIPPS

If Azad had lied or distorted Cripps's promise, would it not have been natural and imperative for Cripps to say: You may print my letter but I insist that I never promised you a national government free from the Viceroy's veto? Cripps made no such denial. He has never denied Azad's assertion. The correspondence between him and the Congress leaders was accordingly published by Congress in an unbound pamphlet which lies before me.

I had the following conversation in New Delhi with the British official to whom Cripps reported late every evening during his negotiations with the Indians:

"I did what I could," the official said, "to draft a formula for defense. But then they reverted to the question of the Viceroy's rights in relation to the Indian members of the government."

"Is that the issue on which the negotiations broke?" I asked.

"Yes, quite definitely," the official replied.

Azad, Nehru, and Rajagopalachari negotiated with Cripps on behalf of Congress. Each one of them separately gave me an account of the negotiations which coincided with the version of this British official. On June 1, 1942, the New Delhi newspapers quoted a declaration by Rajagopalachari to the effect that Cripps suddenly left India in a hurry, after it had become clear that a satisfactory defense formula could be found but when differences had arisen regarding the relations between the Viceroy and the proposed national government.

I said to a very high British military man in India: "Azad, Nehru, and Rajagopalachari have told me that Cripps offered them a national government not subject to the Viceroy's veto. They have put that in writing. I do not think they would lie and attribute to Cripps statements he never made.

The military man said: "If Cripps promised any such thing he did so without the authority of the British government."

"There is a story," I proceeded, "that after Cripps discussed the national government with the Indians, the Viceroy and General Wavell protested to London against it, or London disapproved on its own; at any rate, Cripps was then instructed to withdraw his proposal, and he informed the Indians that they would have to discuss the nature of the government with the Viceroy."

"The fact is," the General replied, "that Sir Stafford did not have the authority to propose a national government with responsibility."

The General carefully did not deny that Cripps had made such a proposal. In effect, he confirmed it.

Although Sir Stafford Cripps does not mention this essential cause of his failure in India and instead blames the collapse of his mission on Congress and on the Hindu-Moslem difference, the British government and the United States government possess documents and reports which prove that Cripps failed because he promised India a responsible Cabinet government at the beginning of his negotiations and then withdrew that promise. I have heard many people argue that it is impossible to give India its own government now because you cannot make such big changes in war time. The answer is that this is just what Cripps offered to do when he arrived in India.

The Calcutta Statesman, British-owned and an occasional mouthpiece of the British authorities, commented angrily, on April 12, 1942, on the breakdown of the Cripps talks. "It would be easy to blame Congress and the other parties for the failure," it wrote. But "the blame lies with the India Office and the official section of the Government of India." The paper declares unequivocally that "the breakdown is over the interim proposals" about the immediate war-time settlement.

The question therefore to be answered [the editorial continues] is, Was Sir Stafford Cripps empowered to offer a real national government or not? . . . Writing on this subject when he announced the proposals, we interpreted them as meaning that he was. . . . We held that the Cripps school in the British Cabinet had won. . . . It seemed to us that what was proposed was dominion status in action now, but that the diehards were determined to pretend that it was not. Success, we wrote, would elude Sir Stafford unless he was empowered to use very different language, accompanied by striking changes that would make it clear that the old regime is ended, and new men and new methods are at work.

Sir Stafford Cripps was not empowered to use such language. Unfortunately, as the discussions proceeded he was compelled to make it clear that our interpretation was wrong. . . . The India Office, "this undesirable relic of a past age," is to remain, and with it the whole theory that the Government of India is responsible not to India but to the Parliament of Great Britain. . . . How can they know anything about governing India? How can they be anything but an incompetent and unpopular authority in a war? . . . Sir Stafford has been made a dupe. . . . We regret greatly the announcement of Sir Stafford's immediate departure. If the diehard object is that he should return discredited, that will not be achieved. Events can only bring discredit on the reactionaries.

Professor Reginald Coupland of Oxford University, a member of Cripps's staff in India, published a little book several weeks ago entitled "The Cripps Mission." In it he writes; "The decisive factor, as has been seen, was the clash between Congress and British views as to the character of the proposed national government." The Indians wanted a real government. Cripps had agreed. But subsequently "British views" prevailed, and Cripps changed his tone and told Congress leaders the matter was no longer in his hands and they would have to discuss it with the Viceroy.

Something had happened behind the scenes. As one American general who was in New Delhi during the Cripps negotiations said to me, "Cripps was bitched in the back."

If Sir Stafford Cripps had been able to stick to his promise, a settlement of the immediate Indian problem could have been reached to the satisfaction of all parties concerned. There would have been no Hindu-Moslem dispute. If Britain had said: Here is a real Indian national government; come and participate in it and defend your country, it would have been politically impossible for President Jinnah of the Moslem League or anybody else to refuse and say: "No, I do not wish to help govern my country, which now, at last, is free." Jinnah could no more have turned down an offer to enter an Indian national government than Wendell Willkie could refuse to help in the war effort if he were asked. This is the real answer to all spurious arguments about Moslem-Hindu differences and to assertions that the establishment of an Indian government now would let loose a civil war.

Sir Stafford Cripps

I asked Nawabzada Liqat Ali Khan, the secretary of the Moslem League (a Nawabzada is the son of a nawab, and a nawab is a titled big landlord), whether the Moslems would join a real national government. He said: "Yes, if Pakistan [a separate Moslem dominion] were granted. Then as a result of such collaboration we might decide we did not want to divide India." On August 17 the New York Times reported a statement made by Jinnah in Bombay. After much rich verbiage about what terrible things he would do if the British reached an agreement with Congress and the Hindus, he came down to earth and said "repeatedly," according to the dispatch, that he was ready to form a provisional government of India. "Naturally," he added, "it would be necessary to obtain the support of all groups including the Congress." This is direct enough. It means that Jinnah would cooperate with Congress inside a national government. Of course since then Jinnah has seen the Viceroy and may have decided to become more intransigent. But I carried out of India the definite conviction that if the British wished, they could have a working unity in India within twenty-four hours.

I feel sure that Sir Stafford Cripps went out to India with the best intentions and the profoundest wish to succeed. Hongkong, Malay, and Singapore had fallen. On March 7 Rangoon, the key to Burma, was captured by Japan. There was depression and even panic in some British circles. Everybody realized that the military defenses of India were weak and that India could never be held unless far-reaching concessions to the nation's desire for independence enlisted its 400,000,000 in the fight against Japan. Cripps, new member of the British War Cabinet, patriotically and courageously undertook the difficult task.

Cripps carried to India the British government's draft of a declaration it would be prepared to make if the Indian parties approved the text. "Immediately upon the cessation of hostilities," the proposed declaration began, "steps shall be taken to set up in India, in a manner described hereafter, an elected body charged with the task of framing a new constitution for India."

Article B provided that the native Indian states, ruled by princes and maharajas, would participate in the constitution-making body.

Article C read:

His Majesty's Government undertake to accept and implement forthwith the constitution so framed subject only to (1) the right of any province of British India that is not prepared to accept the new constitution to retain its present constitutional position, provision being made for its subsequent accession if it so decides. . . .

These "non-acceding" provinces could unite and draft their own constitution if they wished. The British government would then give them "the same full status as the Indian Union."

Article D stated that "unless the leaders of Indian opinion in the principal communities agree upon some other form before the end of hostilities," the constitution-making body would be composed as follows: After the war elections would take place for new provincial legislatures in British India. The lower houses of these provincial legislatures would then meet as a single electoral college and elect the constitution-making body by a system of proportional representation. The size of the constitution-making body would be "about one-tenth" the size of the electoral college. The delegates from the native Indian states would be appointed by the princes in proportion to population.

So far, the draft declaration which Cripps brought to India dealt with the post-war future. The last article, Article E, asserted that "during the critical period which now faces India and until the new constitution can be framed, His Majesty's Government must inevitably bear the responsibility for and retain control and direction of the defense of India." However, "His Majesty's Government desire and invite the immediate and effective participation of the leaders of the principal sections of the Indian people in the counsels of their country, of the commonwealth, and of the United Nations."

This was the Cripps offer. Within a few days of its publication on March 29 all important Indian parties, groups, and leaders—including Congress, the Moslem League, the Sikhs, the Hindu Mahasabha, and the Untouchables—had rejected it. In his first interview with the Indian press on March 29 Cripps explained that "the scheme goes through as a whole or is rejected as a whole," and since each party disliked a different part of the scheme, all turned it down.

In that March 29 interview Cripps explained that there was a difference between "termination of the war" and "the cessation of hostilities." There might be "one or two years between the cessation of hostilities and the end of the war." After the cessation of hostilities, he said, there would be elections to the provincial legislatures and these would then elect the constitutional assembly, which would then tackle the slow job of drafting the constitution. The new scheme might not go into effect, Indians feared, until about five years after the war.

But that was not their chief objection. The Congress Party contended that if the autocratic princes, who are under British protection, appointed almost one-third of the delegates to the constitutional convention, the British government, which might also exercise some influence over other delegates, would be in a position to control or delay the drafting of the constitution. The Congress, furthermore, felt that the right which the declaration gave to any province not to enter the union amounted to the vivisection of India, which, Gandhi said, was "a sin." India, they maintain, is geographically a compact unit; despite its much-advertised 222 languages and 200 races, it possesses great linguistic and racial homogeneity. Gandhi admits that it would be impossible to keep the Moslems in an Indian Union if they really wanted to secede. But as Nehru and Azad put it to me in a triangular interview at Wardha, they object to divorce before marriage. "If after ten or fifteen years' trial," Nehru said, "the Moslems or anybody else wished to secede from the Indian Union, no one could stop them. But to give them the right of secession at the very start would mean that they would never go in." And many Moslems would resent that.

While welcoming Cripps's offer of dominion status, which, Cripps said, included India's right to vote itself out of the British Commonwealth, Congress therefore rejected Cripps's offer of a post-war settlement chiefly on the secession issue. The Moslem League, on the other hand, welcomed the right of secession and saw in it a theoretical recognition of a separate Moslem state—Pakistan. Jinnah, however, was afraid that in practice he would not get Pakistan because not enough Moslems wanted it. So he too rejected the Cripps offer. The Sikhs, a compact warrior community of six million non-Moslems inhabiting the predominantly Moslem Punjab, feared that Pakistan would take the Punjab out of India and thus "lamentably betray" the cause of the Sikhs. They informed Sir Stafford that they would "resist by all possible means the separation of the Punjab from the All-India Union." The Hindu Mahasabha rejected the offer because it gave too much to the Moslems, and the Untouchables because it gave too much to the Hindus.

These responses to the Cripps proposals prove, not that the Indian situation is hopelessly complicated, but that the offer was inept. The fundamental blunder was that the offer concerned itself almost entirely with the future. But Indians are much less interested in the post-war future than in the immediate present. Congress, rejecting Cripps's offer, stated that "in today's grave crisis, it is the present that counts, and even proposals for the future are important in so far as they affect the present." Promises about the "uncertain future" gave Congress no comfort, especially since they were accompanied by provisions and restrictions as a result of which "real freedom may well become an illusion."

The Congress Working Committee accordingly adopted its resolution rejecting the Cripps offer, and President Azad brought it to Cripps, but then they both agreed not to publish it and to proceed with their negotiations about the interim settlement for the war. "All these provisions for the future," a Congress statement handed to Cripps on April 8 declared, "need not come in the way of a present arrangement. As controversial matter, this might be left out of any proposed declaration at this stage. It will be open to any group or party to adhere to its own opinions in regard to them and yet cooperate in a settlement for present action."

Realizing that this was the only procedure possible, Cripps concentrated on the negotiations regarding the participation of Indians in the war effort. Congress was the only Indian party with which he conducted these negotiations about defense, for he knew the importance of Congress. Despite Congress doubts of the sincerity and wisdom of the British Cabinet's scheme for the future, it was ready to cooperate in the present. "The overriding problem before all of us, and more especially before Indians, is the defense of the country from aggression and invasion," President Azad wrote to Cripps on April 10. "The future, important as it is," he continued, "will depend on what happens in the next few months and years."

HOW MUCH FOR THIS LOT ?

[Part II of this article will appear next week.]

To Nowhere and Japan

BY RICHARD H. ROVERE

ON SEPTEMBER 5 the FBI announced the arrest of three unregistered foreign agents who had published the Living Age, an old American magazine devoted almost exclusively to foreign affairs, on a subsidy from the Japanese government. The nominal leader of the group was Irvine Harvey Williams, an accountant, who was dummy president of the dummy corporation. Williams was born in Japan and educated in Germany. Walker Grey Matheson, the second conspirator, also acquired his fascist sympathies at first hand. He was born in Canada but early in life went to Tokyo with his father, an editor of the Japan Advertiser. While he was working on the Living Age, Matheson, according to the FBI, also served the Son of Heaven as a spy in the Communist Party. The only native American involved was Joseph Hilton Smyth, an alcoholic who was described by the press as "an intellectual of 'lost generation' vintage."

If it were not for Smyth's bizarre character, the story of the Living Age would hardly be worth recounting. As a conspiracy, the enterprise had no chance to undermine anything but the Japanese treasury. Indeed, it was less a conspiracy in behalf of Japan than a racket to mulct that country of as much cash as possible; for while Williams and Matheson may have been earnest partisans of Japan, Smyth was nothing of the sort, and he ran the show. The magazine was dying of inertia when in 1938 Shintaro Fukushima, Japanese vice-consul in New York, gave Smyth $15,000 with which to buy it. During its three years of venality not even its editors claimed a circulation of more than 3,000, and no responsible agency ever checked that figure. It is difficult to imagine who the actual readers of the magazine were, but since the Living Age has always been a ponderously highbrow journal, it is probable that they were thoughtful people who could not have been taken in by the fascist apologetics, which, as a matter of fact, were a very small part of the magazine's contents. For the $125,000 which the Japanese eventually sank in the venture, they got precious little. The magazine's affairs were run with wonderful economy. Printer's bills and staff salaries were small and rarely paid. Articles were either lifted from the foreign press, a traditional and legitimate function of Living Age, or lifted from their American authors by Smyth's half-brother Carlisle, a literary agent who became a fugitive from justice about a year ago when some of his acquaintances accused him of cashing checks bearing their names. The conclusion is inescapable that most of Hirohito's money went into Smyth's pockets and into his other publishing interests, the North American Review, Current History, the Foreign Observer, and a pulp thriller, World Detective.

Few of us who knew Smyth suspected that he was being staked by the Japanese, but none of us were surprised by the FBI's disclosure. What is significant about his case, it seems to me, is that America has at last produced a literary traitor of the type made classic in France since its fall. This country has had remarkably few literary Lavals, and these few were moved by something beyond the need to settle their liquor bills. Lawrence Dennis is an intellectually convinced fascist; William Dudley Pelley is a genuine fanatic; George Sylvester Viereck is a bred-in-the-bone Prussian. But Smyth was none of these things. A political cause, good or bad, held as little attraction for him as a temperance picnic. In his frankly alcoholic way he sometimes wrote and thought brilliantly, and in temperament he was liberal, but he was mentally and spiritually incapable of judging a moral issue. He was not a fascist, but he was perfectly willing to become a fascist agent.

Nothing that one can say about Smyth betrays any confidences, for he has written eagerly of his irregularities in one of the most curious confessionals of our time, "To Nowhere and Return: The Autobiography of a Puritan." Precociously talented both as a writer and an artist, he left his home in Plymouth, Massachusetts, early in his teens to live in a small artists' colony in Boston. After a year of casual study at Harvard, he got a job as press agent for the company of "They That Go Down to the Sea in Ships," and spent most of his time aboard the New Bedford whaler on which the picture was taken with Clara Bow, the "it" girl. After that he returned to Boston, but a breach-of-promise suit sent him scrambling aboard a boat bound for Central America.

He worked for a while as a time-keeper for the United Fruit Company, and then joined in several revolutionary brawls, emerging with a Byronic limp of which he was very proud.

Back from the tropics, he went to New Orleans and became a small part of the local renaissance that flowered in the works of Roark Bradford, William Faulkner, and Hamilton Basso. Moving on to France, his appetite for liquor and erotic experience developing all the time, he became editor of the Riviera edition of the Chicago Tribune. He was fired because he left too much of the work, appropriately enough, to Frank Harris, who introduced him to the then aging Lord Alfred Douglas. He wrote a book of verse, "Tropical Fragments."

In 1928 he returned to this country, and his wife of the moment persuaded him to try for the big money. He became for a while an enormously successful manufacturer of slick fiction. But his penchant for liquor and divorce caught up with him, and he became a Bowery bum. To pay for his nickel whiskeys at Rainbow Benny's he wrote "true confessions" and became as successful in that genre as he had been at Saturday Evening Post fiction. Protracted D.T.'s again, then an insulin cure and a job on the WPA Writers' Project. He wrote a drug-store novel called "The Nuder Gender."

No apparent interlude separated Smyth's term on WPA from his emergence as a publisher of four old and respected American magazines. In his book, which ends at this point, he says blandly that his earnings as a pulp writer enabled him to fulfil an old dream. "For a long time I had harbored a wish for a magazine to edit," he wrote. "I wanted something that dealt with current affairs, current trends in the arts and politics and literature. I wanted something that would be part and parcel of the American tradition, a tradition which was too often forgotten or ignored." So, longing for something deep in the American grain, he went to Shintaro Fukushima and got enough yen to buy the Living Age on condition that it printed propaganda. And then, with the most innocent hypocrisy, ". . . on the morning I finally handed over a check for payment in full for the magazine, I couldn't help but retranslate the sum into the incredible number of words, at three cents a word, that it represented. Too many hundred thousand words, at any rate."

Smyth has entered a plea of guilty and is being held for $10,000 bail, which he has as yet been unable to raise. It is hard to guess what his defense will be, but he might explain himself by his own lie—"too many hundred thousand words." Smyth wrote so much, so cheaply at times and so brilliantly at others, that words came to have no meaning to him. I happen to know, for example, that while he was running the Living Age for the Japanese, he was also engaged in ghost-writing one of the most anti-Japanese books ever published in this country, a book signed by a famous correspondent who is an excellent observer but something less than a felicitous writer. I know also that he was the anonymous author of some exceedingly effective anti-Nazi propaganda in the form of cheap "one-shot" magazines about Nazi atrocities. Somerset Maugham once advised him to take ideas less seriously than the words which expressed them. He has followed that advice.

The Magazines Are Loud

BY WILLIAM H. JORDY

PURCHASERS of the May 30 issue of the Saturday Evening Post confronted a fait accompli. Quietly, with neither advance warning nor fanfare, the sentimental typography of Franklin and Lorimer had been summarily scrapped for a bolder face. The transformation was dismissed in a couple of sentences in "Keeping Posted." And indeed such modesty was completely appropriate, for the typographical face-lifting introduced nothing new. Quite the contrary. As the notable conservative among mass-circulation magazines, the Post served the tradition by being the last to change.

This complacent "American institution" had never realized that the thirties were critical for the magazines, which in those years bucked their strongest competitor in American mass entertainment. The competitor had more glitter. It certainly required less concentration. By 1941 there were 65,000,000 radio sets in the United States. Moreover, millions of American evenings, once presumably spent at home with a magazine, were now spent at the local theater with Clark Gable. And adding insult to injury, late in the thirties, picture magazines skyrocketed in circulation and advertising.

The more progressive magazines recognized the competition as much as fifteen years ago. To outstartle the other startlers, they adopted the obvious strategy of giving the art editor more and more domain. The space given to illustration and title rose from about 40 per cent of the front pages in 1930 to practically 70 today. A consideration of the steps in this evolution will perhaps help us to understand the peculiar characteristics of our mass-circulation magazines.

The Post's renovation was in a sense the end of the evolutionary period. Throughout the thirties the Post's format had dragged along behind the other magazines, with the management resisting changes as long as it dared. For example, it was already 1937 before the Post timidly used a couple of color illustrations regularly on the inside pages. But even such fustiness didn't mean that the American Institution wasn't justified in a little complacency. After all, it did have an individual appearance, and the new should have been grafted on the old, as it promised to be last spring. It was a big mistake for Ben Hibbs, the Post's new editor, to plop a copy of the latest Collier's on the editorial mahogany—with a "like this."

Consider some of the changes: the name of the magazine blocked in the upper left corner; a fatter, blacker type face; blurbs under the titles of all stories and articles; a feature complete on one page; editorials opposite the inside back cover. These are all characteristic of Collier's. What is more significant, they have been for ten or fifteen years. So the redesigning conference on Independence Square aped not only the economics of Collier's but its scheme for a more dramatic typography and format.

To make its format match its clipped journalistic style, Collier's in 1925 hired William O. Chessman as art editor. Up to that time the art editor's equipment had consisted pretty much of a pair of scissors and a pot of paste. His job was to "fit" the illustrations into the text, with the result that every page looked like every other. Chessman began to contrast every page with the next. A triangular layout flipped over into a checkerboard; a series of circles became a couple of thin rectangles running from top to bottom. Collier's covers were posterized with flat areas of color. Collier's illustrators were the kind who could draw a bold line, splash a vivid color, fill an unusual shape, catch an odd angle. Collier's title typography became successively blacker and bolder, with more and more page-space given to it. Cartoons or puzzles in the back of the magazine stopped the reader's eye long enough for him to see the advertising. All these tendencies began to appear before 1930, and while Collier's is certainly not the originator of all of them, it has shown a longer and more consistently progressive development than any other magazine.

The women's magazines played their part in the trend. Overplayed it, in fact. Many innovations were introduced by them. They never used one color where two were possible, or a half-page illustration where a full-page would fit. They used bigger title types. Most important, they pioneered in color photography. The best color photography is still found in them—witness the food spreads, recent Home Journal covers, and especially the "covers" fronting the three sections of each issue of McCall's. But the women's magazines affected magazine practice not so much by their single innovations as by their excesses in every direction; their screaming influenced other art editors.

Title typography is important in the modern magazine. It gets bigger and bigger. In the middle thirties Albert Lefcourt began sprawling its title across the American. The title often stood alone with no illustration. When he had to illustrate, he used a vignetted photograph, sheared of any background, and still makes distinctive use of this today. So successful was Lefcourt that the scissored photograph threatened to become the tricky and rather effete standard for all magazines.

Then 1937 brought Life. Henry Luce wanted no nonsense about his photographs. He dismissed trick photographic make-up as "cookie shapes." And it was good that he did. For no magazine was to have so much influence as Life.

To compete with Life's booming circulation, the other magazines adopted pictorial features in the Life manner. The Ladies' Home Journal has its How America Lives series; the editors of the Companion visit prominent people and report on whether they take one or two lumps in their tea; Liberty has a This Is America series; the Post and Collier's have pictorial features in every issue. But Life has had another, subtler influence. The vigorous geometry of the photograph has come to rule the illustrator. The easygoing vignette, which had tolerantly fitted any column of print, has disappeared almost completely. Collier's, the Journal, the Companion, and McCall's had already begun to banish the vignette, but Life speeded its demise. The vignette was quiet. The magazines were loud.

There are those who think increased illustration space will bring in another golden age in American illustration. It won't come. For the wish to startle leads not to good art but to flashy mannerisms. While the William Arthur Browns and John Lagattas, with their pastel washes and finicky line, will happily disappear, so also will the Leyendeckers and the Rockwells. Good illustration investigates details—frayed carpets, worn shoes, wrinkles. Today's illustrations stem from the photograph: we find the same intense blocks of light and dark, the same use of angles and close-ups, an emphasis on effect rather than on interpretation. More and more, too, photographs are replacing illustrations; usually they occupy as much as two-thirds of a magazine's picture space. Photographic covers, invariable on the American, Redbook, and McCall's, are appearing more and more frequently on the other magazines. Borrowed from the True Confession trade, photographs illustrate fiction. Saddest of all is to see both Collier's and the Post replacing the cartoon, which once accompanied so many of their non-fiction pieces, with photographs bought from the big photographic agencies.

Just as the photograph as used in the magazines now counts less as a single print and more as part of a larger geometric scheme, so the illustrator counts less as an artist. In 1932 Henry Dreyfus, the industrial designer, became art editor of McCall's. Almost immediately he revolutionized the art editor's position by making up a complete dummy. Whereas the illustrators had previously been handed the story and told to choose what to illustrate, they now received the caption that defined the illustration and even a rough sketch of what was to go into it. As a result the magazine presented an integrated layout, with contrasts from page to page calculated to surprise the reader constantly. It meant that the illustrator was pulled from the files for some personal mannerism. He took the caption, he took the sketch—and he "created" a picture with the same idiosyncrasies that he had displayed a hundred times before.

An idiosyncrasy, a mannerism, makes a big splash, a loud bang, catches the eye on the street, catches the dime in the pocket, sells a million copies and a million dollars' worth of advertising. It doesn't make a good illustration. The essence of illustration is a multiplicity of details carefully observed and honestly recorded.

Products of metropolitan slickness, the mass-circulation magazines of today sell America the ideal of slickness. Smartness, glitter, the big noise—these are the virtues they advertise.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

There Ain't No Santa!

SOME of the tax schemes put forward by the Treasury can reasonably be criticized on technical grounds, but in all its proposals for increasing revenue it has stuck firmly to two principles: taxes should be geared to ability to pay and should therefore be levied on a progressive scale; incomes providing a mere subsistence basis should not be subjected to new burdens. These principles are unassailable as the fiscal foundations of a democratic society, but the Treasury's devotion to them has not saved it from constant charges of "playing politics." To my mind it would be much fairer to accuse it of neglecting popular psychology in the interest of social equity.

For instance, the Treasury has resisted tremendous pressure for a general sales tax. Yet, as taxes go, a levy on sales, despite its unfair incidence, would not be unpopular with the majority of citizens. So long as it was at a moderate rate its effects would not be severely felt by the average housewife at the time it was paid. The erosive action on purchasing power of a sales tax is similar to that of a steadily flowing stream, while income tax gullies the purse like a spring freshet and thus appears to be much more damaging even to those in the lowest brackets. Nor did the ill-fated spending-tax proposal make any concession to popular psychology. The fact that it would have required the filing of new and complicated schedules and the keeping of more meticulous personal accounts than the average person is accustomed to keep made it anathema to the public.

Curiously enough, the very newspapers which have been nagging Mr. Morgenthau for playing politics have been the loudest advocates of the Ruml plan, which was certainly packaged with all the merchandising appeal that one would expect from a director of Macy's. Campaigning on behalf of this scheme, the New York World-Telegram sent out reporters to ask the opinion of the man in the street and found his response satisfactorily enthusiastic. Of course it was: who wants to black Santa's eye?

The Ruml plan, if not inspected too closely, gives everybody something for nothing without hurting anybody. It proposes that the taxes we are paying this year shall be considered as taxes on 1942 income though actually they were levied on 1941 income. Then next year we shall start paying 1943 taxes in quarterly instalments calculated on our own estimates of the whole year's income, with adjustments made at the end of the year. Thus taxes on 1941 income are made to vanish. It sounds reasonable enough, and it certainly gets over the awkward hurdle which many people will have to take next year if the withholding tax is finally enacted and has to be met in addition to taxes at enhanced rates on 1942 incomes.

Now there is much to be said for putting people on a current tax basis so that they pay as they receive their incomes and not a year later. In that way spending is checked and the anti-inflationary force of taxation increased. The immediate effect of the Ruml plan would, however, be inflationary, because it would release funds accumulated by prudent citizens in order to meet their tax bills next March. Supporters of Ruml assume that most taxpayers have not finished paying their 1941 taxes and will have to find the cash for next year's levy entirely out of current income. Speaking for myself, I settled in full for 1941 on March 15 last and have since put aside enough money to cover nearly half of next year's probable tax bill. If the Ruml plan went through, I could feel free to spend at least part of that sum, and I would be less than human if I did not use it to insure a more bountiful Christmas for my family than now seems probable. Nor do I think my prudence in this respect is unusual, for an analysis recently published by the SEC shows a sharp increase in individual liquid savings in the second quarter of 1942—that is, after 1941 taxes became due—particularly in the form of bank deposits and cash holdings. This suggests the accumulation of personal tax reserves. Any encouragement to the spending of such savings, particularly at a time when inventories of many consumer goods are running low, could have real inflationary significance.

Nor is this the only count against the Ruml plan. More important is the price which must be paid by the Treasury—that is to say, by the common purse of all the people. For there is a price, though Mr. Ruml and his friends use mirrors to disguise the fact: it is the tax bill for 1941, which is to be forgiven—a mere matter of $8 billion. Now it is perfectly true that the Treasury, since it is on a cash basis, will continue to pull in income-tax revenue without interruption and will feel the loss only as taxpayers die and close their income-tax accounts immediately instead of owing a year's income as they do at present. This may rob death of some of its terrors, but it robs the Treasury of hard cash, and burglary committed in instalments over a generation is still burglary.

There is another point to consider: 1941 was a bonanza year for the high-bracket incomes. Civilian production was still going full blast, returning handsome profits, and corporation taxes had not attained their war-time peak. This year total national income will be much greater, but the proportion received by the higher brackets will be less. Hence there are solid advantages for the well-to-do in skipping taxes on 1941 incomes, advantages which may mean not merely increments to their heirs but the actual refund of moneys previously paid out. Let us consider the case of Mr. X, whose tax on his 1941 income amounted to $100,000. At the end of last year Mr. X liquidated a lot of his investments and put the proceeds into tax-exempt bonds. As a result his tax bill on his 1942 income will be only $10,000, and it would appear that if the Ruml plan were adopted he would be entitled to a refund of $90,000. All the newspapers advocating the Ruml plan that I have seen managed to slur over this point.

Mr. Ruml himself has expressed a willingness to have his scheme amended to take care of "windfalls" if some satisfactory way can be found of distinguishing them. I doubt very much if it can, but even if it could, the plan would still be one for relief of the taxpayers at the public expense—in short, a "gimme" scheme.

At the time of writing, the Ruml plan seems to have died in the Senate Finance Committee, but the high-powered propaganda behind it suggests it may be revived. Or if this proves impracticable, we are likely to see new schemes for rendering tax-paying comparatively painless. Unfortunately, there is no known economic anaesthetic capable of doing that job. Wars can no more be paid for by easy stages and financial short cuts than they can be won without taking risks and suffering losses. We shall have to pay and keep on paying no matter how much it hurts, and if we don't pay enough to the Treasury we shall make up by paying inflated prices for everything and, in addition, shall have a still bigger debt problem to struggle with after the war.

In the Wind

IN A RECENT PRIMARY in Contra Costa County, California, the system of "cross filing" produced a strange result. Two candidates sought the nomination of both parties for the same office. The candidate who had always been a Republican lost his own party's nomination but won on the Democratic ticket. The Democrat lost to the Republican in his own primary but won in the other. Now each will have to run on the ticket of the party he actually opposes.

VICTOR RECORDS announces that the most popular song in Argentina is "En lo Profundo Corazón de Texas."

WESTROOK PEGLER'S column has been dropped from the Washington Post, which has the largest circulation in Washington, and is being published by the Washington News, which has the smallest. . . . Eleanor Patterson, publisher of the Washington Times-Herald and a bitter critic of Mrs. Roosevelt, was hostess to several delegates to the recent International Student Assembly, an enterprise to which the President's wife devotes much time.

UNITED STATES CENSORS apparently have orders not to let any material on unfair treatment of Negroes in this country reach foreign readers. Subscribers to The Nation in South America and elsewhere have sometimes found articles on Negroes cut out of the magazine. A recent item from this column on the beating of Roland Hayes, Negro concert singer, in Rome, Georgia, was scissored from copies going to Mexico.

ON THE MORNING that the Chicago Tribune printed the famous story revealing that the navy knew the size of the Japanese force it was to engage off Midway Island, Colonel McCormick realized that his editors had blundered. For perhaps the first time in his life he apologized to his publishing rival, Secretary of the Navy Knox. He immediately dispatched a telegram saying that he was sorry the story had been printed.

THE SOUND TRACK accompanying Universal Newsreel's pictures of Maxim Litvinov greeting one of the young Russian heroes now in this country carries the czarist national anthem.

ELECTRICAL WORLD, a trade journal, reports in one article that the Consolidated Edison of New York is helping the war effort with a series of broadcasts telling how to conform with dim-out regulations and still keep rooms well lighted. On another page it reports that the same company has suffered a loss of 14.5 per cent in the demand for power since the dim-out was ordered.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

Mythology: Western Imagination in the Making

BY IRWIN EDMAN

SCHOLARSHIP and imagination have never been too closely allied in this country. Creative spirits or those who wished to pass as such or whose imagination consisted in their imagining themselves to be such have been notoriously impatient of the pedantries of official academic scholarship. They have resented research in literature and the arts that inquired into everything about a work of art except the qualities that render it precious and unique. Scholars have, on the other hand, been irascible, not without cause, concerning refinements of criticism that are justified by everything but the facts. They have looked with suspicion on flights of generalization that have no evidence to support them, and disdained creative hypotheses made out of the whole cloth of week-end erudition. Scholars have identified imagination with irresponsibility. As for attempts to communicate general ideas to a wider public, they have regarded even the most serious of these as "popularization," to be greeted with something between a shudder and a leer.

These ruminations are suggested by "Mythology," Edith Hamilton's recent book,* which is or ought to be a most delightful lesson for both the poets and scholars of criticism. It is a model, too, of what popularization can be in the hands of a writer both learned and imaginative. The first thing one is tempted to say about "Mythology" is that it is a Bullfinch for our time. But that is hardly a description, even a suggestion, of what Miss Hamilton has done. In a prose at once edged and colorful, she has thrown the whole of even familiar Greek and Norse mythology into a fresh and luminous context. She has never overpressed suggestions and intimations. She has distilled into incidental observations the whole meaning of mythology itself to the modern scholar and man of letters. Though there is hardly a footnote, every page is a condensation of literary and anthropological learning.

She has woven skilfully into the very body of her text, always without heaviness, the sources of the various legends, and even indicated in brief, telling epithets their relative weight and importance. What emerges, especially in the case of Greek mythology—which occupies seven-eighths of the book—is a picture, both exact and exciting, of the world of Hellenic imagination. Miss Hamilton's study is more than a lively guidebook of gods and goddesses, heroes and heroines of the Greek and Norse world. It is a wise discourse on mythology itself, and shows what can happen when love and erudition animate a gifted writer to communicate the necessary elements of a complex and noble subject.

In a paragraph, for instance, Miss Hamilton succeeds in placing the world of Greek myths:

That is the miracle of Greek mythology, a humanized world, men free from the paralyzing fear of an omnipotent unknown. The terrifying incomprehensibilities which were worshiped elsewhere, and the fearsome spirits with which earth, air, and sea swarmed, were banned from Greece. It may seem odd to say that the men who made the myths disliked the irrational and had a love for facts, but it is true, no matter how wildly fantastic some of the myths are. Any one who reads them with attention discovers that even the most nonsensical take place in a world which is essentially rational and matter of fact. Hercules, whose life was one long combat against preposterous monsters, is always said to have had his home in the city of Thebes. The exact spot where Aphrodite was born of the foam could be visited by any ancient tourist; it was just offshore from the Island of Cythera. . . . The "Odyssey" speaks of "the divine for which all men long," and hundreds of years later Aristotle wrote "excellence much labored for by the race of mortals." The Greeks from the earliest mythologist had a perception of the divine and excellent. Their longing for them was great enough to make them never give up seeing them clearly, until at last the thunder and lightning were changed into the Universal Father.

One has only to read Miss Hamilton's account of Zeus, his history and his literary transformations, to see how much she has crowded of truth and of relevant poetry into that last sentence.

Our author is equally delightful and equally cool in letting us know or reminding us, where we have forgotten, what are the dominant sources of the literary tradition of the Greek stories. She is accurate and engaging, for example, on the subject of Ovid. "Occasionally stories familiar to us through literature and art have come down to us only in his pages. In this book I have avoided using him as far as possible. Undoubtedly he was a good poet and a good storyteller and able to appreciate the myths, to realize what excellent material they afforded him, but he was really farther away from them in his point of view than we are today."

Miss Hamilton does not, with Ovid, regard the myths as ancient poets' monstrous lies. She does not consider them as sheer nonsense. She constructs her account of them mostly out of the Greek writers themselves: out of Homer, who saw the gods with the vision of the directest of poets, in an atmosphere of radiance, courtliness, lustiness, and splendor, even in their cruelty and lies. She sees the myths as Hesiod saw them, stories of the creation of the universe and the generation of the gods, explanations in answer to the question how everything happened, stories to still wonder by satisfying it with logical history. She sees them in the moralized reasonableness of the tragedians, in the philosophical transformations of Plato. Her book places the myths properly where they belong, as both early literature and early science. She does all this in eighteen pages which are as good examples as one could wish of the difference between being brief and being superficial.

Reading this book gives anyone familiar with Greek literature the pleasure of recognition, of many recognitions sharply focused in the discrimination of a connoisseur scholar. It will give those wishing to find their way an index to what their reading of the Greek writers themselves will substantiate and amplify. One feels throughout that one is in the hands of a guide who, when she does simplify, is always careful to imply the delicate recesses and by-waters of her subject. Thus, in speaking in summary at the close of her discussion of Demeter: "The Olympians were the happy gods, the deathless gods, far removed from suffering mortals destined to die. But in their grief and at the hour of death, men could turn for compassion to the goddess who sorrowed and the goddess who died."

* Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

Hardly anyone could do better for a brief account than Miss Hamilton does with the House of Atreus or the House of Thebes. Our author is not too completely the summarist to make felicitous suggestions. For example, she does so when she notes Euripides giving the story of Iphigenia a happy ending: "A possible reason for this lapse on the part of one of the greatest poets the world has known is that the Athenians who were suffering greatly at the time from the war with Sparta, were eager for miracles and that Euripides chose to humor them." One could draw a contemporary moral if one wished to, but Miss Hamilton is too fastidious to do so.

Best of all for many readers will be the minor and neglected myths retold with succinct art; so that the narratives are little poems rather than summaries in a dictionary. Those who remember only Bottom's horseplay in Shakespeare will be surprised at the tenderness and beauty of the myth of Pyramus and Thisbe.

The section on Norse mythology is too brief. It is twenty pages long. In a way it hardly belongs in the same book at all, though it is remarkable as a clear compression of tortuous materials. Nor is Miss Hamilton at home in the subject in the same way as she is with the Greeks. She admits, for instance, that she judges the style of the ancient Norse legends from translation. But she does succeed in conveying a summary image of that strange somber world. Of it she says, "All the best Northern tales are tragic, about men and women who go steadfastly forward to meet death, often deliberately choose it, even plan it long beforehand. The only light in the darkness is heroism." Even the gods know that a day will come when they must be destroyed.

One wishes that Miss Hamilton had developed a little bit more her theme of the persistence, however transmuted, of the romantic fatalism of the Norse mythology—often disguised as the Christianity which never quite destroyed it—in both the English and German heritage. "For Norse mythology and Greek mythology together give a clear picture of what the people were like from whom comes a major part of our spiritual and intellectual inheritance." Her book is a study of the European imagination in the making. It has had a lot to do with what J. H. Randall, Jr., has called "the making of the modern mind." There is a saying in the Elder Edda: The mind knows only what has lain near the heart. What has lain near the Western heart and has been spoken in a thousand modulations of poetry, art, and music is here retold with grace, economy, and wit. The scholar and the writer meet in these pages to the edification of other writers and scholars and for the initiation of the common readers in their common unrealized heritage.

The Problem of Sovereignty

THE PRINCIPLES OF POWER. By Guglielmo Ferrero. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

FERRERO'S renown as a historian has long since been established. In recent years his historical inquiries have tended to become merely the occasion for more systematic reflections on the meaning of certain aspects of history. In seeking to satisfy the interest of both philosopher and historian he adopted the strategy of using a limited field of historical study as a basis for an inquiry into the meaning of larger trends of history. Thus his recently published "Reconstruction of Europe" was on the one hand a study of the Congress of Vienna and on the other hand a comparative analysis of revolutionary and constructive statecraft. Napoleon served as symbol of the former, and Talleyrand was made—not too plausibly—the embodiment of the latter.

His posthumous volume uses the French Revolution as the historical locus for an inquiry into the problem of government. Only two slight excursions, one into Roman and the other into recent Italian history, take him beyond this particular domain. But his real interest is not so much the French Revolution as the problem of "legitimate" government. He is seeking to determine how governments can be sufficiently stable and secure to obviate the necessity of maintaining themselves by force and fear. His analysis of this problem is rich in valuable insights which we could accept more gratefully if he made a wider sweep into history to substantiate his conclusions and if he were a little more modest in assessing the importance of his thesis. He seems to think that he is the first to have penetrated into the mysteries of government and found the secret of what makes it "click."

His thesis is that there are only two forms of "legitimate" government—the aristo-monarchic and the democratic; that the mark of legitimacy is uncoerced consent; that habit and tradition prompt consent in the former case and explicit forms of suffrage in the latter; that governments which lack these forms of legitimacy are driven by the fear of the people to maintain themselves by fraud and inordinate force; that modern history is dominated by a struggle between these two types of legitimacy.

The main foundation of this thesis is a rather neat device. The connotation of the word "legitimate" is extended on the one hand so that it becomes relevant not only to governments based on heredity but to democratic governments as well; on the other hand the moral connotation of the word "legitimate" is made to cover not merely democratic but hereditary governments. The important point is that the government be accepted by the people so that the fear of possible revolt will not preoccupy the ruler and tempt him to use terror as the means of survival. There is only one form of "illegitimate" government—one that uses force and fraud to survive. Lacking the implicit consent of the people, it is in fear of the people and consequently rules by prompting the people to fear its power. Ferrero's analysis of this vicious circle of fear in tyrannical government is psychologically very astute. There are also "pre-legitimate" governments, primarily revolutionary ones, which must use inordinate force until they have established themselves but which intend to rule upon the basis of principles that will finally win the consent of the people. There are also "quasi-legitimate" governments." They pretend to use one principle of sovereignty when in reality they are based upon another.

Perhaps the most valuable insight for modern men in the author's main thesis is the recognition that non-democratic governments must not be too simply identified with tyranny. Hereditary governments in which habit and tradition, the personalization of loyalty and the reverence for majesty, prompted by the panoply of the state, all combine to win the implicit consent of the subject may be creative forms of statecraft. Hereditary government actually implies a democratic principle in so far as it rests upon consent. On the other hand, even the most explicit forms of democracy are connected with a traditional principle, since only habit and tradition can make them absolutely secure by freeing them of the fear that the people might use their suffrage to annul the democratic principle.

The primary weakness of Ferrero's analysis lies in his inability to grasp, or to do justice to, all the complex economic and social factors which have contributed to the decay of hereditary and the rise of democratic governments. He seems to think that our modern instabilities are derived primarily from the conflict between the two principles of sovereignty. He admits that the two may be united and made to support each other, as has been the case in the constitutional monarchies of Europe, particularly Britain, Holland, and the Scandinavian countries. But he casts only a glance at this possibility. Occasionally he suggests that the complexities of modern civilization make democracy preferable to hereditary rule, because democracy arms all the various elements in society with political power and thereby insures a consideration of their interests in the harmony of the whole; while governments based purely upon heredity must also maintain a traditional social order which must progressively defy new dynamic elements in the social equilibrium.

On the whole, however, he is not interested in measuring the comparative merits of the two types of sovereignty. He is convinced that no government is sufficiently just to be able to preserve itself merely by commending itself to the conscience of its subjects. It must count upon some irrational force of habit or reverence to overpower the natural reluctance of people to endow their rulers with sufficient power to maintain order.

This not unjustified but rather extravagant note of skepticism about the problem of justice persuades Ferrero to regard the sudden collapse of the old regime of France, after the fall of the Bastille, as one of the great mysteries of history. It had authority only yesterday, and today its sovereignty is completely annulled, leaving, he says, a political vacuum. How can we explain such a mystery? The concept of justice might be of help here. Men may accept even an unjust government out of habit and tradition; but its injustices may pile up conscious and unconscious resentments which become fully conscious and dynamic the moment some open defiance acts as a match for the smoldering tinder.

There are indeed mysteries in the phenomena of the sovereignty and majesty of governments and in the implicit and explicit consent which people yield to their rulers, but the whole field of inquiry is not quite so occult as Ferrero seems to imagine,

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Report from the Near East

RETREAT TO VICTORY. By Allan A. Michie. Alliance Book Corporation. $3.

LIFELINES OF VICTORY. By Squadron Leader Murray Harris. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

RECENTLY a bad "correspondent's book" provoked me to say that at this date a war correspondent's manuscript must possess certain very special qualities to be worthy of print. I was, I think, too liberal in that I included a brilliant style among the printworthy qualities, and I begin to doubt whether Mr. Werth's "Moscow War Diary" is as good as I once thought. Knocking out style, then, as a quality of both good and bad books of this sort, grasp of historical process and an abundance of useful information are the two characteristics that alone should put a war correspondent's manuscript between stiff covers. On the first count Mr. Michie scores about fifty out of a hundred, and on the second about seventy-five or seventy-five plus. For the rest, "Retreat to Victory" is a streamlined, high-powered job of journalism in the Lucian school, superb in its sort, lean, swift, and graphic, though a little too much given to thumbnail portraits of everyone above the rank of major.

Very definitely Mr. Michie is not a boy on stilts shouting "Look at me," nor is he a Collier's Siegfried mooring for the love of schoolgirls. He is outspoken, and has the courage to say, for example, that for this country, and in general, civilian defense is a more or less useless luxury and bad for morale. He is critical and informative about fatuous incompetents in colonial offices. His contempt for "base rats"—Auchinleck is reported to have packed 600 of 700 staff officers off to the front when he took over Cairo from Wavell—equals the "base rats'" dislike of fighting men. He is frank about the incomprehensible blunders committed in local campaigns, but he shows his close-grained common sense in not drawing the false conclusion that British strategy has been basically wrong. Indeed, it is his belief in the soundness of Mr. Churchill's direction that gives his book its somewhat misleading title. Mr. Michie is aware that history is full of blitzkrieg victors who have lost their long wars. And "too little and too late," about which we had small choice, must not give way to "too little and too soon," about which we have some power of decision.

But if these were its only merits, "Retreat to Victory" would not be worth five or six hours of a sensible man's time. It happens, however, that Mr. Michie has seen a great deal of the war in the Near East, a region in which censorship has been absolutely ruthless. What Mr. Michie has to say about the political and military activities of the United Nations in this part of the world forces one to protest once more against the absurdities of imperialism. In the last war the Allies betrayed the Arabs, as Lawrence bitterly charged, or they kept their promises only when violent revolution compelled them to, as in Iraq. In this war, therefore, we must constantly dread a "stab in the back" from the peoples on whose territory we fight. The weakness of the conservative outlook is particularly evident in the behavior of the Free French during the Syrian campaign. De Gaulle and his staff were so naively confident that the Vichy troops would welcome deliverance that at the zero hour the Free French forces crossed the Syrian frontier headed by a band playing the Marseillaise. The instant reply was sounded by instruments that repeat their one note 460 times per minute. The Vichy French, who are real imperialists, fought savagely, while the Free French, whose philosophy is not yet clear, "had no stomach for rough stuff" and were far inferior to the colored troops of British India.

Thus, to pit our Frenchmen against their Frenchmen without contrasting our France with their France is an act of political naivete. It is almost like offering to varnish the pictures in Spanish art galleries as a device for keeping Franco neutral rather than doing something to increase the Spanish dictator's fear of his people, which, with our growing might, is what keeps him out of war. As it is, it is the Axis which too often, as in Egypt, utilizes the revolutionary appeal. The wretched fellahin, to whom Berlin and Rome promise land, are often pro-Axis, while the rich rabble of Cairo are pro-British. Again, Mr. Michie tells us that the British needed to raise their voices quite a lot to persuade the Free French to honor pre-campaign promises of limited independence for the peoples of Syria and Lebanon. Britain, that is to say, correctly insists that the Free French cede ground, but fails to apply that logic in India. One can estimate the influence which the inevitable Vichy comment must have upon those Frenchmen who, for lack of the social vision we do not ourselves display, cannot make up their minds to turn against Pétain and Laval. Mr. Michie, by the way, feels consternation at the State Department's policy toward Vichy, which, he positively asserts, has provided the Afrika Korps with war materials.

Mr. Michie's book is only incidentally a defense of Churchill strategy. Squadron Leader Harris's "Lifelines of Victory" was definitely written as a counter-blast to the second-front-now school. It is not much of a blast. The author's thesis is contained in the words of an undistinguished German general, "Strategy is the study of communications." We have ultimate superiority in productive resources and in man-power, the author agrees; therefore, so long as we maintain our lines of communication, the odds are with us. That one believes to be true, and it would be conclusive if victory necessarily went by odds. But there are so many other relevant questions to which the author does not give convincing answers that the book fails to impress this reviewer—who does not himself take any part in the second-front-now campaign. As a brief study of the worldwide communication lines in our control it is interesting, but even here the absence of any quantitative estimates robs it of force.

RALPH BATES

Childe Nicolas

CONFOUND THE WISE. By Nicolas Calas. Arrow Editions. $3.

THIS explosively vivifying book was needed. Criticism of the arts has become so much a specialists' affair—music for the musicologists, literature the semanticists' chanel house—that one almost forgets it could ever inspire a Weltanschauung. Who among the dwarf Aristotles and doubting St. Thomases will interpret the totality of art and life, present and past, in the light of positive immediate values? Where is a Ruskin for painting, a Nietzsche for drama, even a Pater or Spengler for culture in general? Mr. Calas may not be the answer, but he has at least attempted to be.

A Greek poet and pilgrim through the modern world, now based in New York, he began criticism some years ago in Paris with "Foyers d'Incendie," which might be rendered "The Incendiary at Home." The present work is the second in a series of four, the two to come being "Transfiguration" and "The Fate of Jocasta and the Destiny of Prometheus." His books are not treatises—that too is fortunate—but groups of free variations on one theme: the artist as rebel and prophet. The variations are classified under the roomiest of headings; the framework may be ignored, the parts have a life of their own. Of the present work the first section, entitled Time, is the best. A discussion of poetry as prophecy, revelation, stimulus to action, it greatly advances the often bungled synthesis of Marxism and psychoanalysis as instruments of evaluation. Ranging through Occidental poetry, Calas points out the parallel between poetic sublimations of the individual's desire for richer inner life and the social will to change. This avoids the two major traps of contemporary criticism: the Marxist tendency to judge in mere terms of social content (Dickens "greater" than Proust), and the anti-romantic, neo-Aristotelian view that literature is under some moral obligation to assuage rather than sharpen discontent.

Calas also rightly condemns—though here he is not quite fair to the exception of Jung—the tendency in psychoanalysis itself to treat the artist's cry of discontent as a clinical phenomenon, a "maladjustment," when the disease is in society rather than in the artist. He sums up: "One listens well only to that which leads to action." Defining "action" leads to difficulties of course, since in his view it seems to include any imaginative storm and stress induced by surrealist art, provided it is good art—for example, Tanguy not Dali. But the difficulties are rewarding, not simply vexatious, especially as they lead Calas to some excellent remarks on surrealism, his championship of which is unusually discriminating, and to a superb manifesto on poetry as heroism. In the remaining three sections he discourses on baroque art in Portugal, his own recent experience of that country, the aesthetics of portraiture, and New York as a culture symbol. Here disproportion sets in and the argument is frequently labyrinthine, especially when he needlessly introduces Portuguese baroque by a great slab of Portuguese history seemingly cribbed from a very dull textbook. But suggestive reflections, comparisons, analogies abound. Calas's richly associative mind is in refreshing contrast with our critical Alexandrians, close interpreters of single texts. His restatement of romantic doctrine in twentieth-century terms is one of the most fruitful contributions to criticism in America since Babbitt's "Rousseau and Romanticism," and makes a welcome counterblast to that masterpiece of misapplied intellect. Regrettably, it lacks an index, and it sometimes reads like French homework by a sixth-grader weak in English grammar. "Expose" for "expound," "moeures" for "mores," "lanced" for "launched," etc., with quantities of misspelled names and plural subjects with singular verbs, are blemishes that need not have occurred.

FRANK JONES

Four Recent Novels

TELEGRAM FROM HEAVEN. By Arnold Manoff. The Dial Press. $2.50.

NEARER THE EARTH. By Beatrice Borst. Random House. $2.50.

THE WHITE QUEEN. By Betty Baur. The Viking Press. $2.50.

A TIME TO BE BORN. By Dawn Powell. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

BESIDES the accident of being published in the same month, the four novels brought together in this review have in common their intellectual decency and their effort to deal intelligently with modern life. While none of the four is wholly successful, all four are readable and each has merit. In better literary times books like these might not warrant special enthusiasm, but in the current flood of Civil War novels and frontier novels, novels about a single river in Georgia or a single acre in Mississippi, they take on life-saving disproportions simply because they try, each in its own way, to cope with the world of their authors', and readers', experience. It may be significant that three of the four are first novels and their authors are young.

Arnold Manoff's "Telegram from Heaven" will remind you of Clifford Odets's "Awake and Sing." Although it has not the ingenuity of detail of Mr. Odets's first and best play, it surveys the same territory, the Jewish Bronx, from much the same point of view, well left of center. It has the same awareness that the lives of its poor Jews are part of a larger political picture and the same essential vagueness about what is to be done about it. But a lot of water has flowed under the bridge since Odets made his first appearance, and if the author of "Awake and Sing" hadn't the war to complicate his problem, the author of "Telegram from Heaven" uses the war both to complicate and solve his problem too easily. Before Pearl Harbor, for instance, what Sylvia Singer, Manoff's heroine, was waiting for was the right feller with the right prospects and the right bank account; after Pearl Harbor her telegram from heaven is her boy friend's draft call to fight for democracy. One is tempted to ask Mr. Manoff, "And after the armistice, what then?" Even with all the political breaks on her side, and obviously she deserves them, one suspects Sylvia Singer will still want to be Hedy Lamarr; it is a limitation that her author resolves her dilemma so crudely in terms of the present. But Mr. Manoff's writing gifts are worth notice. Like Odets, he has a feeling heart and a beautifully accurate ear for the harsh poetry of American-Jewish speech (attention, Mr. Kober, on both counts). There are half a dozen scenes—the moment in which Sylvia's friend Francey breaks down and confesses her sexual fears, and the interviews between Sylvia and her Riverside Drive employers—that have the sure touch of creativity. Mr. Manoff deals even more truthfully with his secondary characters and situations than he does with his hero and heroine, a sign of grace, certainly, in a beginning, or any, novelist.

Miss Borst won first prize in the Avery Hopwood competition with her novel called "Nearer the Earth." A far cry from the Bronx of "Telegram from Heaven," "Nearer the Earth" is the biography of a nice spoiled child brought up in a comfortable home in a comfortable medium-sized city; even the genteel poverty which confronts Karen Greenwald after her father's death is luxury compared to Sylvia Singer's one step from the relief rolls. Yet Karen's problem too is the problem of how to grow up and face reality; in her case maturity is made difficult by an oversheltered childhood. The "reality" her author concocts for her unfortunately has one too many deaths to be convincing, and for all her efforts at self-education, Karen Greenwald never develops into an interesting personality. Nevertheless, Miss Borst's story has many virtues. It is written with great good taste in a style that neither inflates nor whines, it is poignant without being tremulous, and for a first novel in which author and heroine are closely related, it is remarkably objective—so objective, actually, that one is never quite sure whether it is Miss Borst or Miss Greenwald who peters out in the end. What one feels most strongly is that Miss Borst needs to enlarge her range of seeing and thinking. It isn't so much that her world is so small as that she moves in it as if it were a cloister, by which I don't mean that, like so many women writers (see Gladys Schmitt's "Gates of Aulis" or Ann Chidester's "Young Pandora" for recent examples), Miss Borst thinks she is a priestess. In fact, her lack of self-exaltation is one of her outstanding distinctions.

The most interesting as well as the most uneven of these three first novels is Betty Baur's "The White Queen," which at moments is so skilful as to astonish you, at moments so skilful as to seem machine-made, and then again—as in the timing of the heroine's change of heart—not skilful at all. Much more ambitious than either Mr. Manoff or Miss Borst, Miss Baur divides her attention almost equally among several characters, interweaving their lives to the better understanding of each of them. The story is set in England in 1937, while Spain is fighting its war to determine all future wars, and the heroine is an American girl married to a well-placed Englishman. In the course of discovering the connection between her own destiny and the destiny of the world Deborah Abbott falls out of love with her husband and into love with an impecunious radical. Politics and social conflict, in other words, boil down to one woman's choice between two men—after all, a perfectly good way to write about world events in fiction; and amusingly enough, it is only when Miss Baur's social conscience gets the upper hand and she steps out of the realm of emotion to describe the practical workings of her Workers' Party or her Tenants' Association that she sounds naive. Miss Baur's real gift is her energy, her enormous zest for what things look like and how people are, individually and in disharmony with each other. And if, as one sometimes thinks, there was once a day when novels like "The White Queen," about pleasant articulate young men and women trying to make the right kind of lives for themselves and having vital relationships with one another, might have been expected to be the least common denominator of first novels, Miss Baur's book makes one wistful for it.

And then there is Dawn Powell, who is no first novelist, of course, and who should need no introduction to Nation readers. Miss Powell, one of the wittiest women around, suggests the answer to the old question, "Who really makes the jokes that Dorothy Parker gets the credit for?" The central figure of "A Time to Be Born"—you certainly can't call her the heroine—is the fabulous Amanda Keeler Evans, blond and beautiful, the author of a successful novel and the wife of a publishing power; she knows exactly what she wants, which is everything, and she is in a fair way to getting it. The world is her oyster, and the war, on which she is solemnly articulate, is the perfect break for her career. A ruthless debunking and the quintessence of cattiness, Miss Powell's book is at least one instance in which female venom becomes a social force-for-good. She cries out to be quoted, not one sentence at a time, either, like "A gypsy should be required to be wrong, or else she becomes an affront to science," or "She was thirty-two, but she looked like a woman of forty so well-preserved she could pass for thirty-two," but whole paragraphs and pages. Her description of the women's-magazine formula for how to cure a broken heart, her picture of women girding themselves for war, her analysis of contemporary literary trends are not only funny; they proclaim the educated, no-nonsense intelligence that lies behind them. It all adds up to a first-rate satiric talent, and one wonders what went wrong for "A Time to Be Born" to fall apart as it does in the middle. Perhaps it is because there is no proper satiric tradition nowadays for Miss Powell to work in; so that she loses heart and dubs in, as a backdrop to her satire, the kind of love story—nice little small-town girl wins away the great big tough newspaperman from the glamorous big-time beauty—that she would be the first to ridicule. At any rate, the wee note of cynicism she introduces into her love idyl doesn't save it.

DIANA TRILLING

Civilian Front

CIVILIAN DEFENSE OF THE UNITED STATES. By Colonel R. Ernest Dupuy and Lieutenant Hodding Carter. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

HANDBOOK OF CIVILIAN PROTECTION. Prepared by the Civilian Defense Council, College of the City of New York. Whittlesey House. $1.25.

ARMS AND THE PEOPLE. By Alden Stevens. Harper and Brothers. $2.75.

IN THE United States the problem of civilian defense is of less importance than in Europe only because our geographical position greatly decreases the danger of air attacks. Raids by limited numbers of planes from enemy carriers are possible, and some of our coastal points are quite likely to be bombed unless the enemy concludes that the chances of doing damage are not worth the risks. To less direct forms of attack we are distinctly vulnerable.

The government of the United States has already made unprecedented demands on civilians and will and must make many others. The reason for such demands is well explained in "Civilian Defense of the United States," which gives an excellent and complete account of the efforts now under way to weld Americans into a disciplined whole for the sake of victory. In the twenty-one chapters full consideration is given to all phases of aerial attack, gas protection, fire fighting, first aid, evacuation, health and welfare, sabotage, enemy propaganda, morale, and other pertinent topics. The explanation of our defense program is both full and lucid. A reader of this book can discover not only what is necessary to civilian defense but why it is necessary, and be enthusiastic in undertaking the program. A long list of practical suggestions of ways open to civilians to aid the defense effort and an impressive bibliography complete the book.

"Handbook of Civilian Protection," prepared under the sponsorship of New York's City College, is exactly what the name implies, a textbook of civilian defense. Much less complete in its scope than "Civilian Defense of the United States," it is mainly concerned with the problem of dealing with air raids, only secondarily with conservation and health, and not at all with such problems as enemy propaganda. However, it gives singularly thorough treatment to those problems which it does consider and is an adequate guide to ordinary situations. Air-raid wardens, auxiliary firemen and policemen, and the average citizen are told exactly what principles underlie the most effective use of their talents and how best to perform needed services. Certain rules of action are expected to be memorized by the student. This little booklet or its equivalent should be in the hands of defense volunteers in such of the larger American cities as are vulnerable to aerial attack.

Easily the most readable of these volumes is "Arms and the People." Instead of giving attention to minute details of defense it describes the broad and far-reaching changes which the war effort has already brought and is still bringing to the United States. Boom towns, priorities, mining, farming, modern housing, and improvement in the machinery of production are only a few of the subjects treated in what is a much more valuable volume than might appear at first glance. The author, a free-lance magazine writer, bases his book upon extensive travel and numerous contacts in all parts of the United States. His comments on army camps and their surroundings and on the problems created by placing millions of men in new environments are especially keen. He believes that the cleanliness, improved diet, and regular habits engendered by army life far outweigh increased prostitution and other evils. This optimism is typical of the author. Although Mr. Stevens does not overlook such serious future questions as demobilization and the post-war change-over of industry, he is far more impressed by the improvements in Southern agriculture growing out of the war, by the demonstration of the needlessness of industrial depressions, and by technological advances. "Arms and the People" is written in a popular style, but it is by no means superficial.

DONALD W. MITCHELL

In Early Issues of The Nation
Constance Rourke in the Reviewers' Den

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

"The Real Italians" by Carlo Sforza

REVIEWED BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

The Poetry of José García Villa

REVIEWED BY MARIANNE MOORE

Virginia Woolf as Critic

BY LOUIS KRONENBERGER

IN BRIEF

I LOVE YOU, I LOVE YOU, I LOVE YOU. By Ludwig Bemelmans. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Not Bemelmans at his best, but even Bemelmans at his second best is better than most and still the only writer who can produce two such consecutive sentences as: "She wore a little mink coat on deck—the only junior mink I have ever seen. The way the young widow managed her entrances into the dining-room reminded me of Easter at the Music Hall." Among these stories you'll especially enjoy Souvenir, the recollections of two trips on the Normandie, and Bride of Berchtesgaden, the account of Bemelmans's encounter with the Gestapo. The author's illustrations are, as always, all you would—or could—expect.

THE DAYS OF OFELIA. By Gertrude Diamant. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.75.

Neither a novel nor a guidebook, Miss Diamant's story of Ofelia, the little girl whose family were Miss Diamant's neighbors in Mexico City, is a pleasant, informative record of one person's living and traveling in Mexico. Ofelia was only ten, but she insisted upon becoming the American lady's maid. While Miss Diamant tried to teach her Mexican neighbor the virtues of booklearning and vitamins, Ofelia gave her mistress an inside view of native life—a happy way for a visitor to become acquainted with a foreign land, and a happy device for writing about it. A Book-of-the-Month Club selection.

THE STONES BEGIN TO DANCE. By Aben Kandel. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.

Mr. Kandel's novel is a whimsey in simple bad taste about life under the Williamsburg Bridge. Its central character is Mr. Marco, a Rumanian pushcart peddler who has read too many novels by Robert Nathan, and the story demonstrates that poor people are always sweet, simple, and good, and rich people always greedy and pompous—except those who got their start in life in the pushcart market. As dénouement, there is a gathering of all these once humble, now wealthy, good souls at the legal closing of the market to commend Mr. Marco for his loyalty to the old way of life and to be present at his affecting death. Unquestionably a book on the side of democracy. Also a good example of the Hollywood political theory that a few words from an eccentric character can solve most social problems.

DACEY HAMILTON. By Dorothy Van Doren. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Dorothy Van Doren's new novel is largely concerned with the newspaper profession in 1918. Her heroine, Dacey Hamilton (at twenty-seven, she is a widow and the mother of five children), works for a liberal weekly, and the hero (he has the astonishing name of Urian Oakes) is a Vermont boy making his way on Park Row. Inevitably there is a good deal of talk about what is going on in a world at war. It is good talk and should help us to understand what is going on in a world at war today.

SEE HERE, PRIVATE HARGROVE. By Marion Hargrove. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

Corporal Hargrove (he was promoted) has written a delightful book about the trials and tribulations of a rookie. We recommend it as an antidote for those who worry about their boys in our army camps. The book also contains much sage advice which every draftee would do well to heed. We hope that Corporal Hargrove will continue to keep us informed about army life. He can do more to popularize it than any number of official army reports. His book is well adapted for reading aloud.

GOETHE AND THE GREEKS. By Humphry Trevelyan. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

Recent advances in archaeological and historical knowledge and a widening of our view of other great cultures have shed new light on the Greeks and placed them in a new perspective. We cannot see the Greeks as Goethe did; but since his Hellenism was fundamentally "an effort to establish the basis of values upon which European civilization has been built," it "is not to be judged by its historical truth but by its vital force." This scholarly volume is therefore a highly important means both of keeping our perspective on Goethe right and of revitalizing our own view of the Greek ideal. By following a biographical method Mr. Trevelyan presents Goethe's view of the Greeks as many-sided, dynamic, and developing to the very end of his life, and shows how it can go on developing as our horizon changes.

OIL, BLOOD, AND SAND: STAKES AND STRATEGY IN THE MIDDLE EAST. By Robert L. Baker. Appleton-Century Company. $2.50.

Probably the most important phrase in this book is the following: "30,000,000 barrels of good crude would be sufficient to relieve Germany of all strain over all fuel and lubricants." It may be a coincidence, but this estimate is exactly the production of the Maikop and Grozny oil fields in the North Caucasus. The Nazis have captured the first and are well on their way toward the second. The author holds out no hope that the destruction of the wells by the retreating Red Army will seriously hamper the Nazis. He claims that the Germans have assembled vast amounts of drilling equipment in eastern Poland and Rumania for use in the Caucasus. He points out that the North Caucasus oil fields are rather shallow and that Texas drillers have brought in shallow wells in as little as seven days. So it seems that the Germans really have no need to drive on to Iran and Iraq and will probably attempt to establish a defensive winter line in the North Caucasus. The major part of this book, however, is devoted to the countries of the Middle East, their peoples and the problems of their defense. Mr. Baker knows how to separate the facts from the headlines in a mass of clippings and tell an integrated story. But the book suffers by comparison with "Retreat to Victory" by Allan Michie, who had the advantage of recent personal observation.

ANTHOLOGY OF CANADIAN POETRY (ENGLISH). Compiled by Ralph Gustafson. Pelican Books. 25 cents.

This anthology, 56 poets, 129 poems, begins with writers born around 1850, and ends with a young man of 22. The best known names are those of Constance Lindsay Skinner, Bliss Carman, Sir Charles G. D. Roberts, John McCrae (who is represented by only one poem), and the vastly overrated Wilson MacDonald; the best poets are Raymond Knister, A. M. Klein, and, decidedly, A. J. M. Smith. The anthologist, Ralph Gustafson, has attempted to make his principle of selection not "Canadianism" but artistic merit. The poems should give pleasure, he says; he seems rather easily pleased. The earlier Canadian poets in commemorating nature or expressing patriotic sentiments were influenced by Browning and Tennyson, surprisingly little by Kipling and Service, once in a while by Rossetti and Swinburne, a good deal by contemporary magazine verse. There is quite a lot of the I-lift-mine-eyes-to-gaze sort of thing. Those born later, around the turn of the century—almost none seem to have been engendered in the '90's—also pay attention to contemporary magazines, notably Poetry, and to the Imagists; they have hardly noticed Hardy, Hopkins, Housman, Yeats, Eliot, or Auden. Mr. Gustafson has included biographical and bibliographical notes on the poets, and on himself likewise, with a portrait by way of frontispiece. He has also included five poems of his own, as generous a number as he has given anyone else with the exception of Messrs. Knister and Smith—though he has given Klein and E. J. Pratt more pages. The example of Untermeyer to the contrary, anthologists should not do this. On the whole, while the anthology does not lack interest, and the price commends it, one rather hopes there is more to Canadian poetry than this, and that somebody better informed and with nicer taste than Mr. Gustafson will find and prove it.

RIVER ROGUE. By Brainard Cheney. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

The rogue of Mr. Cheney's title is "Snake" Sutton, who discovers when he is only a kid that his mother isn't all she should be, and runs away to live among the Negroes. Sensitive but tough, he becomes a river rat, a raftsmen on the Georgia rivers—the kind of glamorous villain who bites off his opponent's thumb in a fight; later, he conquers land life as well. A colorful exploration of hitherto uncharted literary territory—if that is what you look for in a novel.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

Wartime Price Control. By George P. Adams, Jr. American Council on Public Affairs. $3.

The American Ballot. By Spencer D. Albright. American Council on Public Affairs. $2.50.

This Land We Defend. By Hugh H. Bennett and William C. Pryor. Longmans, Green. $1.50.

Liberty and Learning. By Davis Edison Bunting. American Council on Public Affairs. $3.

Politics and Political Organizations in America. By Theodore W. Cousins. Macmillan. $4.

Civilian Health in Wartime. By Dr. Francis R. Dicouaide. Harvard. $2.50.

The Future of Industrial Man. By Peter F. Drucker. John Day. $2.50.

The Best American Short Stories, 1942. Edited by Martha Foley. Houghton Mifflin. $2.75.

Lost Chords: The Diverting Story of American Popular Songs. By Douglas Gilbert. Doubleday, Doran. $3.50.

Strategic Materials in Hemisphere Defense. By M. S. Hessel, Walter Murphy, and F. A. Hessel. Hastings House. $2.50.

The Merchant Service Today. By Leslie Howe. Oxford. $1.75.

Education for Democratic Survival. By Walter E. Myer and Clay Coss. Civic Education Service. $1.50.

Industrial Concentration and Price Inflexibility. By Alfred C. Neal. American Council on Public Affairs. $3.25.

Juvenile Delinquency and Urban Areas. By Clifford R. Shaw and Henry D. McKay. Chicago University. $4.50.

The Chorale Preludes of J. S. Bach. By Stanton DeB. Taylor. Oxford. $2.25.

Nazi Guide to Nazism. Edited by Rolf Tell. American Council on Public Affairs. $2.

The Native Labor Problem of South Africa. By J. M. Tinley. North Carolina. $3.

The Bible Is Human. By Louis Wallis. Columbia University. $2.50.

They Were Expendable. By W. L. White. Harcourt, Brace. $2.

How Wars Are Fought. By Captain J. E. A. Whitman. Oxford. $1.75.

RECORDS

ANOTHER of Beethoven's "Rasumovsky" Quartets Op. 59 is at hand on records, this time as the outstanding piece of music on Victor's September list. It is the second of the group—with its powerful, violent, dramatic first movement, its richly elaborated and poignant slow movement; it is performed by the Coolidge Quartet with impeccable technical finish, with excellent musical understanding and taste, with vigor and spirit; and the performance is well recorded (Set 919, $4.73). But good as this version is, it hasn't the warmth and luminous beauty of blended sound, the richness and subtlety of inflection, the incandescence of integrated progression of the Budapest Quartet version in Victor Set 340. And with Victor withdrawing Budapest Quartet performances of Beethoven's Op. 18 No. 3 and Mozart's K. 400 one must hope it will not withdraw that magnificent performance of Beethoven's Op. 59 No. 2, among others.

Strauss's "Don Juan," in which his brilliant powers are to be heard and enjoyed in their youthful vigor, is at hand in a Victor set (914, $2.63), of a performance by Kindler with the National Symphony. As against the older recorded performance by Fritz Busch with the London Philharmonic, this one has the advantage of richer and more spacious recorded sound. But the power which the Busch performance achieves through its restraint, its directness and structural compactness, the Kindler performance loses through its expansiveness, its rhythmic unsteadiness and structural slackness, its details of over-emphasis and fussiness in sonority and pace. The Busch performance, I might add, is recorded with adequate fidelity, clarity, and volume.

On a single disc (11-8239, $1.05) Kindler and his orchestra give us the Polka from Shostakovich's "Age of Gold"—a piece of Shostakovich humor-with-a-sledgehammer. On the reverse side is an orchestral arrangement of the Marina-Dmitri duet from Musorgsky's "Boris Godunov," which is hardly one of the great moments of the work and is not ennobled in this performance. The conclusion, as recorded, is heard with terrific surface-chatter.

The English composer Vaughan Williams is one of the people with the mere facility in sounds that is not enough to produce valuable music. In Williams the facility has given us the enjoyable Fantasia on a theme of Tallis, and on the other hand the more pretentious large-scale use of pictorial and atmospheric material and street-songs in the "London Symphony," with results that are mostly inconsequential and uninteresting. A good performance of the symphony by Goossens with the Cincinnati Symphony is well recorded (Set 916, $5.78).

Best Records issues Volume 1 (1620-1830) of "The Songs of Early America" (Set ES 1: three 12-inch records in album; $4.75), compiled by Elie Siegmeister and sung by a vocal quartet under his direction. I haven't the passion for folk songs that others have; and so I will comment only on the performances. The voices are good; but I find the enunciation and singing too cultivated, in some instances too arch, and in one instance mistakenly derisive where the song should convey its humor from within.

Better done are the songs of Argentina, Chile, Peru, Ecuador, and Cuba assembled by Irma Labastille in Volume 1 of "Latin-American Typical and Folk Songs" (Set ES 3: four 12-inch records; $6.25). B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Canada Ready for Offensive

Dear Sirs: In the article The Facts About a Second Front, in your issue of September 5, Donald W. Mitchell says in part:

Of the greatest importance, then, is the army now stationed in the British Isles—probably two million Britishers, plus Free French, Polish, Canadian, and American contingents. . . . Its quality is not easy to gauge. The courage of the men and their eagerness to fight can be taken for granted. But their training—until recent months that of protecting against invasion—their military experience, and their leadership are also vital factors. . . . The American army has increased enormously in both size and striking power in the past year, and it is the only one belonging to the United Nations which has been formed mainly for offensive action.

Canada just now is licking her wounds of Dieppe, essentially a Canadian show. Of one battalion only three officers survived, other ranks in proportion.

Was it just a tryout, seed sown in blood-soaked ground to bloom in the distant flower of victory? Or was it the entering wedge, not there and then to be driven home, of a general offensive, a second front?

Success or failure? History alone can make answer. But no one can deny the élan of the leadership, the gallantry of the troops, representative of Canada from coast to coast, who engaged in that assault. They proved worthy of their blood brothers, the men of Bataan.

From the day in 1939 that the First Canadian Division landed in Britain the troops were trained to the offensive. It grew from a division to a corps, from a corps to an army, the most completely armored force in the world today. Its commander, General MacNaughton, who has been mentioned for the supreme command of a second front, is on record as saying the Canadian army is equipped, trained, and designed to be the spearhead of such an enterprise.

The offensive is the historical role of Canadian soldiers. In the dark hours of Ludendorff's drive of March and April, 1918, when every rifle was needed, the Canadian corps was withdrawn by Foch to G. H. Q. Reserve, only a token force being left in the line before Arras. "I do not despair as long as I have my Canadians," he is reported to have said. There, for the next four months, in safe billets far behind the lines, under the leadership of Sir Arthur Currie, its training was entirely devoted to the spirit and tactics of the offensive. Fruition came on August 8, 1918, termed by Ludendorff "the black day of the German army," when in the Battle of Amiens the Canadian corps broke fourteen miles through enemy lines and so entered upon the series of victories that was to end with the capture of Mons on the eve of the Armistice.

These things being so, it is a trifle disconcerting for a Canadian to read Mr. Mitchell's lines quoted above.

J. F. B. LIVESAY

Clarkson, Ont., September 8

Post-War Worriers

Dear Sirs: I hear much about post-war conditions. But I believe with Paul Mallon that we should concentrate on the war, the business at hand, and take care of post-war affairs after the war is won.

These post-war worriers remind me of a mediocre golfer who is always concentrating on the next shot ahead rather than on his immediate shot. He always winds up second best. Now the one who winds up second best in this war is not going to have much to say about post-war conditions; therefore the post-war worriers, if they are seriously listened to, will not only lose the war for us but find they did all their worrying for nothing, since they will not be consulted on how to run the post-war world.

We hear on every side, "What's going to happen to us after the war?" What are we afraid of? We can make happen just about what we want to happen after we win the war. Let's concentrate on winning and not fill people's minds with forebodings.

The possibility of any change in conditions causes nightmares among some people in high places in the industrial and political worlds. Evidently they have not enough confidence in themselves to feel sure of their position in a changing world—many of them will tumble, no doubt. These are the people who are worrying about the post-war period. They are not worrying so much about the war as about what will happen to them individually after the war.

Most of the men who make up the army are from working families which do not enjoy particular benefits from the richest country on earth; they love their country, but they dream of better days. Can that be a worry for some of our present leaders who want to shape the post-war world to their particular liking? The boys from the army and the navy will have a lot to say about that. These boys may wonder how some men can have 1,000-acre estates, an army of servants, and a fleet of automobiles while they spend a lifetime acquiring a 50-foot lot with a 5-room house on it. Perhaps the chief worry of some persons is whether the soldiers will continue to support such a lopsided system. They may even insist on a democracy in fact as well as in name.

Let us dissipate the myth that a depression is bound to follow the war. If we can have prosperity in a period of destruction, we can have prosperity in a period of construction, and destruction must be followed by construction. If we agree that every citizen is important and that his welfare has a bearing on the rest of us, then we as a nation can go forward to a way of life heretofore undreamed of.

FLAHAVHAN MARTIN

Amarillo, Tex., September 9

The Treasury and the Banks

Dear Sirs: Harold Mager's article on continued government borrowing from banks was excellent. How absurd it is to expect Leon Henderson to stop inflation while the Treasury and the Federal Reserve cooperate with the commercial banks in expanding the nation's money supply! The whole procedure is nothing short of fantastic.

In 1929 a money supply—currency and demand deposits—of about $27 billion was sufficient to finance the production of about $82 billion worth of goods and services. On the same basis $40 billion would finance an annual production worth $120 billion. But our present money supply is already about $54 billion, and at the present rate of increase it will exceed $80 billion a year hence.

There is no need whatever for further borrowing from banks. But it is already clear that the Treasury cannot rely on voluntary investment in government bonds. What is required is a tax on available investment funds—with an exemption, say, of $5,000. Such a tax, at the rate, say, of ½ per cent per month, would force savings into investment and supply the Treasury with all the funds it needs at a very low rate of interest.

I don't think that such a tax would increase spending appreciably during the war. People don't usually spend savings except as a last resort.

GEORGE R. WALKER

Boston, Mass., September 9

An Indian Answers Russell

Dear Sirs: I take strong exception to much in Bertrand Russell's letter on India in The Nation of September 5. The letter needs to be particularly examined because coming from a distinguished thinker and a friend of India it is bound to carry much weight.

Mr. Russell complains that the American liberals do not know that "one of the points on which the Cripps mission broke down was the unwillingness of the Hindus to admit that Moslems have the same right of independence from Hindus as the Hindus from Britain." That issue had absolutely nothing to do with Cripps's failure. Cripps failed because Britain refused to curtail the dictatorial powers of the Viceroy, and because it refused to trust Indians with the defense of their land. Cripps admitted in the House of Commons that he never once discussed the minority question with the Congress, though he discussed it with the minorities. Of course Congress objected to Cripps's plan, for it implied Pakistan, and Jinnah rejected it for its failure to guarantee Pakistan, but the negotiations finally broke down over the nature of the interim government, not over what was to come at the end of the war.

There is nothing in common between the desire of a fraction of Moslems for independence from the Hindus and the desire of the overwhelming mass of the Indians to end an alien rule. Hindus and Moslems have religious differences that have recently been accentuated by Jinnah's intransigent attitude. Moslems, prior to the British, lived in India for centuries as rulers of the Hindus and since the British have lived as equals. They belong to the same racial stock and speak the same language as the Hindus. This Moslem talk of independence from the Hindus started only in 1939; since Cripps, it has been made the pre-condition of any negotiations between the two groups.

Mr. Russell further complains that American liberals "do not face the difficulty of a complete change of government when a Japanese invasion is imminent." Indians never asked for a drastic change that would involve either an election in India or passage of a bill in Parliament. They did ask for a coalition Indian government with real powers given it by convention or gentlemen's agreement. Russell cites Ireland's case to warn that even the grant of freedom may not fully arouse India for the war. He may be right. But without the grant of this freedom the apathy and bitterness in India will certainly play into the enemy's hands. That is the issue.

Russell takes Louis Fischer to task for suggesting that the disparity between the death rate in Bombay and London burns deep resentment and hatred into the soul of India, and for implying that the death rate is entirely the result of British rule. Fischer merely stated a fact in reporting the existence of this feeling among the Indians, without seeking to justify fully those feelings. The grinding poverty in India is largely responsible for the high death rate, and certainly there is connection between poverty and the government of the day in India. It is quite possible, as Russell suggests, that the death rate in Bombay, with a hot climate, will always be higher than in London, but it need not remain so appallingly high.

Again, Russell may be right in saying that there is no reason to suppose that fewer children would die in Bombay under a government headed by a man like Gandhi, who said that earthquake shocks in India were punishment for sin. Yet this attitude of Gandhi's has never prevented him from actively striving to improve the lot of the Indian masses. Gandhi looks upon British rule, too, as punishment for Indian sins, but he doesn't sit idly by. He also believes that India is paying for its sins against the Untouchables, but he does not leave the matter there; he is exhorting the upper classes to abolish this iniquitous system. In fact, in his opposition to British rule Gandhi is moved largely by the conviction that India's social and economic regeneration is no longer possible under the British.

Finally, I take exception to the composition of the commission Russell proposes for the settlement of the Indian question. He suggests an American, British, Chinese, and Russian member. If a British, why not an Indian? Why should one party in the dispute and not the other be allowed to sit in judgment on its own deeds? Let both parties, Britain and India, give a prior commitment to abide by the decision of an international tribunal. Indian nationalism is neither jingoistic nor exclusive; it is international in its outlook. When Indians talk of independence, they mean the absolute end of British domination, and not freedom from legitimate international obligations and responsibilities as Russell seems to imply.

While Russell is perturbed over the lack of clear thinking about India among American liberals, I am perturbed over the present attitude of the English liberals toward India. I wonder if Russell, too, is going the way of Cripps, Norman Angell, and others!

ANUP SINGH

New York, September 10

CONTRIBUTORS

DONALD W. MITCHELL has for many years been a close student of naval and military history. He is The Nation's regular military analyst.

LOUIS FISCHER, one of The Nation's contributing editors, has just returned from a trip to India and the Middle East.

WILLIAM H. JORDY is a young freelance writer and artist living in New York City.

IRWIN EDMAN, professor of philosophy at Columbia University, is the author with Herbert W. Schneider of an anthology of democratic literature entitled "Fountainheads of Freedom."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary and a contributing editor of The Nation, is the author of "The Nature and Destiny of Man."

RALPH BATES is the author of "The Olive Field," "The Fields of Paradise," and more recently "The Undiscoverables and Other Stories."

FRANK JONES, now teaching classics at Yale, has contributed articles, poems, and reviews to the Partisan Review and the New Republic.

DIANA TRILLING reviews fiction regularly for The Nation.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 26, 1942

NUMBER 13

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 249

EDITORIALS

- Dangerous Indifference 252
A Cure for Complacency 253
Stalingrad and Dieppe by Freda Kirchwey 254

ARTICLES

- Why Cripps Failed—II. by Louis Fischer 255
European Travelogue—1942 by Arthur Mandelbaum 259
Russian Lives and Oil Patents by I. F. Stone 261
How to Help France by Antonio Huerta 263
More Power to Himmler 265
Benes's Achievement 266
American "Censorship" 266
Fighting for White Folks? by Horace R. Cayton 267
In the Wind 270

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- The Italians at Their Best by Gaetano Salvemini 271
Out of Bataan by Marcus Duffield 272
The New Siberia by John Scott 272
The Case for Appeasement by Frederick L. Schuman 273
Refinements on a Journal by Paul Rosenfeld 276
A Poet by Frank Jones 277
In Brief 278
Drama: Business—but Not as Usual
by Joseph Wood Krutch 278
Records by B. H. Haggin 279

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 280

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor	Washington Editor	Literary Editor
ROBERT BENDINER	I. F. STONE	MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON      MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor	Music Critic	Drama Critic
RICHARD H. ROVERE	B. H. HAGGIN	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

THE WIDELY PUBLICIZED CHANGES AT THE War Production Board leave everything where it was before—in the hands of big business men and bankers who have already proved their constitutional inability to give us a total effort. Two new vice-chairmen have been appointed by Donald M. Nelson. They are Charles E. Wilson of General Electric and Ferdinand Eberstadt, a New York stockbroker. Wilson is superior in ability and understanding to Philip Reed of General Electric. Reed was rewarded by Nelson with an important post in London for the incapacity he had shown, first in handling copper, lead, and zinc, then in the conversion of civilian industry to war. In this field his apparent goal was the continuance of business as usual as long as possible. Eberstadt has made a good impression as chairman of the Army-Navy Munitions Board; he is an open-minded man, much above the dollar-a-year average. But neither Eberstadt's record at the Munitions Board nor Wilson's in private industry promises the kind of ruthless subordination of private interest to war production which is needed. Eberstadt succeeds the smug and complacent James S. Knowlson, who shares with Reed the responsibility for delaying the conversion of the radio, refrigerator, and other industries to war. But Knowlson will now be Nelson's deputy on the Combined Production and Resources Board.

★

EVEN LESS PROMISING THAN EITHER OF these two vice-chairmen is Nelson's choice for Rubber Administrator. This is a post for a vigorous, youthful man of independent mind, with the energy to combat the oil and chemical interests. Nelson's choice, William M. Jeffers, is sixty-six. He knows nothing about the rubber industry and seems unlikely to learn. He rose from office boy to president of the Union Pacific, a railroad controlled by W. Averill Harriman, and may owe his appointment to this connection. The Union Pacific is a well-run road, but it is hard to tell how much Jeffers has had to do with that. In recent years he has functioned principally as a glad-hander and speaker for Rotary clubs. An Omaha newspaperman tells one of our editors an illuminating story. When the Burlington, the Union Pacific's rival, put on its first streamlined train, this newspaperman interviewed Jeffers. Jeffers pooh-poohed the newfangled idea. This does not sound promising. The President's order, unlike the Baruch report, gives the Rubber Administrator power over Jesse Jones—on paper, anyway. It remains to be seen whether Jeffers will have the personal force to boss Jones, a stubborn customer.

✱

WHILE NELSON CLINGS TO THE IDEA OF salvation by dollar-a-year men, independent men in the production setup continue to lose their jobs through his influence. The latest victim of a "get tough" policy which gets tough only with those who try to get tough with big business is Guy Holcomb. Holcomb was chief of the small-business section of the Department of Justice until an angry letter from Nelson reached Attorney General Biddle last week. Holcomb told the Fluorescent Lighting Association in New York that the flare-up was caused by his insistence that WPB officials give some consideration to this type of lighting. It saves current and materials and has been fought by General Electric and other lamp manufacturers. Holcomb challenged Nelson to make the letter public and charged that it was written by John Lord O'Brian, counsel of the WPB, whose firm represented General Electric in the tungsten-carbide case. One may note in this connection that while prosecution of the tungsten-carbide case was postponed on the excuse that General Electric officials were too busy with war work, the same officials found time to bring a patent suit against a manufacturer of fluorescent lighting. Holcomb, like Libbey and Guthrie before him, was guilty of fighting the big-business crowd. That seems to be the only thing that ever arouses Nelson's ire.

✱

RECENT STORIES FROM MOSCOW AND London renew the bitter debate—which feeds the Nazi propaganda machine with juicy chunks of raw material—over the question whether or not the Allies really promised a second front this year. The latest contribution comes from Raymond Daniell in England, who insists that Churchill and Roosevelt disagreed about the wording of the second-front statement issued after Molotov's visit to Washington. Churchill, according to Mr. Daniell, did not like the language of the statement; he thought it might be misinterpreted. The President thought otherwise; and it remained as he wanted it. Its words should be recalled: "Full understanding was reached with regard to the urgent task of creating a second front in Europe in 1942." Mr. Daniell reports that persons agitating for a second front "read into" this sentence "the promise of an invasion of the Continent this summer, while those less easily swayed by emotions analyzed it as possibly meaning that the Russians had been convinced that, urgent as the need was, the task was too great." The wording of the statement is queer and somewhat tricky, but anyone who can read into it the meaning italicized above rates a medal for imagination. It meant, if it meant anything, that a second front was urgent and was in the making for 1942. In any case that is the way the Russians understood it; and so did ordinary people in Britain and occupied Europe and America. Now, when the chance of a second front in 1942 appears less and less probable, a chill of disillusionment has crept through all these countries, particularly Russia. If Churchill and Roosevelt knew in June that a second front was impossible, or even unlikely, then the statement they gave out was indeed unfortunate, and the Prime Minister should have insisted on changes. The people of Stalingrad fighting in the ruins of their homes have firmly believed the Allies would attack this year in the west. If no attack is made they are not going to be much interested in subtle qualifications hidden in a phrase which was taken as a solemn pledge of action.

✱

THE MORE LAVAL GROVELS BEFORE HITLER the more fiercely the French people resist the policy of collaboration and the more brutally the Nazis attempt to club them into obedient acceptance of the "New Order." The German-dictated decree conscripting French labor has been quickly answered by a new underground offensive against the army of occupation. Last week a bomb was exploded in a theater reserved for German troops, killing one man and injuring thirty. General Otto von Stülpnagel, German commander in Paris, immediately ordered the execution of 155 French hostages as a "reprisal" and proclaimed a drastic daylight curfew in the city. Simultaneously it was reported that large numbers of non-Jewish French citizens, drawn from the German "hostage pool," were being shipped eastward to slave in Polish and Silesian mines. After such demonstrations of the fact that life under German rule is not worth living, it is hardly surprising that more and more Frenchmen are daily risking their necks to kill Germans and sabotage production and transport. Nor is it surprising to find a renewal of French unity in the face of the common foe—a unity illustrated by the joint escape to London of Charles Vallin, vice-president of the Croix de Feu, and Pierre Brossette, former foreign editor of the Socialist newspaper Le Populaire. Vallin, like many Croix de Feu leaders, had at first supported the Vichy regime, but Brossette from the time of surrender had played a leading part in the underground movement. In a radio speech to France Vallin said he broke with the Vichy government when he realized that it had morally and physically aligned itself with the enemy. "Is it possible," he asked, "for Frenchmen today to have any opponents other than the enemy of their country?"

CONSCIOUS OF THE MOUNTING ANGER OF his fellow-countrymen, Laval has sought to strengthen his hold on the government machine by a decree giving him personal authority to dismiss any civil servant. In interviews with the press he is exhibiting an increasing truculence, which is perhaps designed to cover up his inward fears. He has answered the outspoken Catholic protests against the deportation of foreign Jews by interning priests and sneering at the hierarchy. "The Catholic cardinals and bishops," he said in an interview with German and other correspondents, "have intervened, but everyone is master of his own trade. They handle religion; I handle government affairs." This is much rougher treatment of the church than anything it suffered in recent years at the hands of the "anti-clerical" Third Republic. After the armistice the Catholic authorities as a whole supported Pétain, in the belief that he would restore France to Christianity. Now they are discovering that a totalitarian regime, which brooks no rival authority, is a more dangerous opponent than a lay democracy. Reports from Vatican circles received via Switzerland indicate that the French clergy are being encouraged to maintain their present stand by the Pope himself. Moreover, it is said, the return to Rome of Myron C. Taylor, Mr. Roosevelt's personal envoy to Pius XII, occurred on the initiative of the Vatican. The subjects under discussion are believed to include not only the position of the Jews in France but the possibility of some action in favor of oppressed religious minorities in occupied countries. *

SIR SAMUEL HOARE IS LOOSE AGAIN. THE appeaser and former colleague of Laval in the proposed vivisection of Abyssinia is back from his ambassadorial palace in Madrid for a visit to London, and is telling his much-bombed Chelsea constituents that "variety, not monotony, is what we desire in the new Europe, and freedom for each country to choose its own form of government." Not the "monotony" of democracy, in other words, but variety, a pleasant mixture—some democracy here, some fascism there—is what Sir Samuel advocates for post-war Europe. This is especially calculated to please the ears of his Spanish reactionary friends, and perhaps the words are also designed to reach across the border to Vichy, where his old friend Laval operates. The doctrine that each country may choose its own form of government sounds very democratic and is written into Article Three of the Roosevelt-Churchill Atlantic Charter. But suppose countries choose to be fascist? Suppose a defeated Germany chooses to be fascist? The political character of a country's regime is not merely a domestic matter; it is a matter of world concern. Fascism at home inevitably means aggression abroad. That is what the appeasers were so late in recognizing. Hoare and his like do not realize it yet. But those who are fighting this war to defeat fascism will see to it that victory does not mean the continued existence of fascist governments in Europe or anywhere else. Otherwise, victory would be hollow indeed—and temporary.

• ★

OUR NEWS FROM INDIA IS INADEQUATE because of the British censorship there. We had suspected it, but now we have definite confirmation from London. In his article in The Nation of September 5, Louis Fischer said that 50,000 Indian workingmen went on strike on August 21 at the Tata munitions works and demanded the release of Gandhi. "This," Mr. Fischer wrote, "has not been reported by the press anywhere." Graham Stanford, the London Daily Mail's New Delhi correspondent, has now reported it to his paper, where it appeared on September 18. "The Sheffield of India closed down suddenly in the war effort when workers of the great Tata steel company were seduced into striking," Stanford telegraphed. Apparently the American correspondents in India are pretty sore at not being allowed to wire their papers about such important developments. For Mr. Stanford adds (see the New York Herald Tribune of September 19) that "American newspapermen [in India] have complained bitterly regarding the government's policy of not allowing them to cable the facts as they occurred. It would have helped the Japanese; hence I think the American newspapermen were wrong." The real question is: Who helps the Japanese more—the American correspondents by wishing to report the truth on India, or the British by arresting India's national leaders, or Mr. Churchill by his crudely imperialistic speech of last week, when he said that the Gandhi civil-disobedience movement had resulted in "only 500 dead"?

★

VICE-PRESIDENT WALLACE, ADDRESSING A Mexican-American audience in Los Angeles, has just delivered a speech the general effect of which will be to strengthen good-neighborly feeling between this country and Mexico. Certain of Mr. Wallace's remarks, however, may easily be misunderstood in the sister republic. "The Mexican people," he said, "have a profound belief in the Four Freedoms. . . . But if I understand their history and feelings correctly they would add three more freedoms: first, the freedom to buy land at a reasonable price; second, the freedom to borrow money at a reasonable rate of interest; and third, the freedom to establish schools which teach the realities of life." We do not know just what Mr. Wallace means by the second of these points, but there is a danger that the first and third may be regarded as good-natured but unwanted advice on how to sterilize the Mexican revolution. Religious education is prohibited by Mexican law. Nevertheless, it would have been better had the Vice-President praised the very great achievements of recent Mexican governments in the building of schools. Similarly, close students of Mexican politics would be hard pressed to discover any fervent desire among the peasantry to purchase land. But the least attentive know that the Mexican agrarian reform has granted millions of acres of land in usufruct to peasants who could not have bought even a garden plot. At present when both the form and substance of that reform are under quiet but systematic attack from the Mexican right and center, the Mexican left—the most sincerely anti-fascist section of Mexican opinion—may mistakenly believe that Washington sides with their opponents. It would be a pity if this opinion were allowed to grow, for Mexicans are very likely to remember that we have made no democratic suggestions to the semi-fascist dictatorships of Brazil and Peru.

★

IT NOW APPEARS LIKELY THAT CONGRESS will grant the President's request for power to curb inflation by the October 1 deadline. Major differences between the House and Senate versions of the bill have been ironed out. Although the farm bloc has not yet abandoned its efforts to protect farm interests, the House Committee on Banking and Currency deleted, on the President's insistence, the clause providing for a recalculation of parity prices. Both the House and Senate bills direct the President to stabilize farm prices and wage rates at approximately their present levels, but are sufficiently flexible in language to enable the President and the Price Administrator to meet most contingencies. The House bill permits a 15 per cent upward adjustments in wages to meet the advance in the cost of living since January 1, 1941, but the Senate committee has rejected the "Little Steel formula" as too rigid. Undoubtedly the President will obtain the necessary power over farm prices, but the prospects on the other vital sector of the anti-inflation struggle—the tax bill—remain extremely gloomy. According to Treasury estimates, the Senate tax bill falls short by at least $6,000,000,000 of the amount needed to eliminate the excessive purchasing power created by the war. Secretary Morgenthau has urged that the Senate Finance Committee reconsider either the proposed tax on spending or a plan for compulsory savings, but the committee seems more interested in shaving down taxes imposed by the House than in doing its share to avert inflation.

★

ACTION ON THE CRUCIAL MAN-POWER front was further delayed last week when the Special House Committee on Defense Migration, after a week's hearings, concluded that no legislation is needed at present for the compulsory placement of labor. The responsible authorities in Washington are becoming more and more concerned over the almost complete anarchy in our man-power policy. Paul McNutt, chairman of the War Manpower Commission, has declared that strict government control over the distribution of labor is inevitable; and Wesley Lund, division chief under McNutt, has asserted that the country is in danger until the government works out a realistic policy for the division of available man-power between the armed services and the essential war industries. At least part of the responsibility for the existing chaos rests with Congress. Selective Service under General Hershey is set up on a local and state basis by law and is virtually autonomous in its operations. Although in theory "essential men" in war industries may be exempted from military service, actually thousands of key men are being drafted each week regardless of the effect on war production. The War Manpower Commission has assumed complete control over the 2,300,000 federal employees and has "frozen" the jobs of 200,000 loggers and miners in twelve Western states, but it lacks power comparable to that of Selective Service for placing men and women in the jobs where they can best serve the war effort. Congressional leaders may be justified in hoping that this can be achieved largely through voluntary measures. It is inexcusable negligence, however, to fail to provide the War Manpower Commission with the powers needed to meet any emergency requirements of our war industries.

Dangerous Indifference

IN THE 35 states in which primaries have been held, more than 42,000,000 voters were entitled to cast ballots. Less than 15,000,000 were both able and sufficiently interested to do so. One result of this close to record-breaking apathy is that the local party organizations, powerful enough in any case, had things almost entirely their own way. A corollary result is that a Congress of supreme historical importance will be chosen from a field of nominees selected largely by default. Genuine issues bobbed up here and there, but only rarely were they decisive at the polls. An incumbent's voting record on foreign policy before Pearl Harbor should logically have decided his fate in the primaries, and in some cases it did, but taken as a whole, the primaries tested nothing but the candidates' patronage record and the power of local machines.

In the circumstances the net results are a great deal better than they might have been. Among the seventeen Democratic incumbents relieved of their seats by way of defeat in the primaries are such arch-foes of the President as Moser of Pennsylvania, his colleague Martin Sweeney, the pro-Coughlinite Representative from Ohio, and Senator Bulow of North Dakota, a consistent isolationist. Among the Republicans the outstanding victims of their own isolationist records are Paddock of Illinois, Jarrett of Pennsylvania, Oliver of Maine, Robertson of North Dakota, Youngdahl of Minnesota, and Jenks of New Hampshire.

The severest losses on the Administration side are Tom Eliot of Massachusetts, whose district was gerrymandered from under him and presented to former Governor James Curley, and Luther Patrick, one of the best of the Southern liberals. The retirement of Representatives Faddis of Pennsylvania and Coffee of Nebraska, who tried unsuccessfully for a Senatorial nomination, may be rated as clear gains for the Administration. So is the failure of Leland Ford to grab nomination by both parties in California, a trick he has successfully turned in the past.

Among the hopeful new entries for the November run-off are Will Rogers, Jr., who without campaigning deprived Ford of the Democratic nomination in the Los Angeles district and is an odds-on favorite to win; Dorothy Roosevelt, widow of Eleanor Roosevelt's brother and the choice of Michigan Democrats to oppose the violently anti-Administration George Dondero; Michael Feighan, who took Sweeney's measure in Cleveland; and Daniel Ellison, Baltimore's technically Republican and thoroughly liberal candidate for Congress. The volatile Clare Booth Luce will oppose a tried friend of the Administration in Leroy Downs, who has the backing of labor in Connecticut's industrial Fourth Congressional District.

All told, only twenty-three incumbents were eliminated in the primaries. This means that the all-too-great number of Coxes, Woodruffs, and Hoffmans who have discredited Congress will have another fling in November. Probably the most ominous of these renomination victories are those of Lee O'Daniel, the Texas menace, and Hamilton Fish, whose personal machine outweighed the intra-party opposition of both Willkie and Dewey. The Republican Senatorial primary in Michigan likewise rates high for sheer ugliness. Victory went to Judge Homer Ferguson, but it is a chilling thought that more than 100,000 Michigan Republicans cast ballots for Gerald L. K. Smith.

Balancing these dismal developments are the defeats of Talmadge of Georgia and Blease of South Carolina; Blease tried to oust Burnet R. Maybank from his seat in the Senate by a campaign of racial incitement almost as blatant as the Georgia demagogue's. As much to the credit of Georgia voters as the retirement of "Our Gene," incidentally, is the renomination of Representative Ramspeck.

The absence of men in the armed services, migration of workers in war industries, and gasoline rationing, all played a part in keeping down the primary vote, but combined they could never have reduced it to a third of its potential strength. It took an alarming indifference to politics to do that. If this indifference persists through the campaign we face the possibility of a Seventy-eighth Congress that might paralyze the President at the height of the war or break him at the peace.

A Cure for Complacency

A CAREFUL reading of the President's sixth lend-lease report should cure any complacency about the aid we are furnishing our allies. Total authorizations are astronomical, but actual exports are puny. Almost $63 billion in aid has been authorized by Congress, but the total of lend-lease aid in the eighteen months ending August 31 is less than $6.5 billion. Of this sum, the value of goods transferred and services rendered amounts to little more than $5 billion. This is the equivalent of one month's expenditure at the present rate of our war production.

It is a humbling experience to examine that $5 billion more closely. More than $1 billion is for "services rendered." This includes repairs to shipping, the expense of training British airmen here, and the cost of plant expansions to meet lend-lease orders. The last, probably the most considerable item, adds to our arms-making facilities and is as much help to ourselves as to our allies. The rest of the $5 billion is "goods transferred," but goods transferred means goods transferred to warehouses in this country as well as abroad. Actual lend-lease exports in eighteen months amounted to $3,525,000,000, an average of less than $200,000,000 a month. This is chicken feed in a war of these proportions, a war in which Germany is reputed to be getting production at the rate of $3 billion a month out of the Reich and occupied Europe.

Consider, too, that this $3,525,000,000 had to be divided among thirty-five countries and the British Commonwealth of Nations. All the Latin American countries, including the Argentine, are among the beneficiaries of lend-lease. "Currently," the report says, about 35 per cent is going to the Soviet Union, another 35 per cent to the United Kingdom, and 30 per cent to the Middle East, Australia, and other areas. This gives the British Empire several helpings but does not leave much for the Chinese. We do not know what "currently" means, but the talk in Washington, whether true or not, is that very little is going to the Soviet Union because of shipping difficulties and that much material has been shifted to Britain for the opening of that second front, when and if.

It is important for the American people to realize that so far their lend-lease program is pretty small potatoes and that it behooves each and every one of us in any way connected with war work to do our part to speed the flow of aid. Our Washington letter this week touches on one aspect of the undercover forces that delay aid not only to the Soviet Union but to other allies as well. Every popular organization can do its part by protesting to Congress and other agencies about the conditions disclosed in I. F. Stone's dispatch.

Stalingrad and Dieppe

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

CHILDREN in later days will read about Stalingrad as they do now about Thermopylae or Hastings or Waterloo. But only persons alive today can sense, even faintly, the reality of that fierce epic. Many of the houses of Stalingrad are new and had neat front yards; four hundred gray-green Nazi bodies were seen the other day sprawled in the front yards along a single block. Every house is a stronghold concealing Russian fighters; every person fights who can shoot or throw a hand grenade. Homes are stormed like forts; taken, lost, retaken, blown to pieces. Business blocks provide ambush for defending forces; guerrillas can operate almost as well as in forests and mountains. The city becomes a labyrinth of fortifications—flimsy, compared to the real thing, but possible to defend to the last brick, to the last heartbeat.

Stalingrad still holds out as this issue goes to press. And the agony of the Russian resistance begins to touch the nerves of men and women as nothing has done since the siege of Madrid. Some stories of courage and death can be read with detachment, only half believed, pushed out of the mind. Stalingrad cannot be forgotten by any but the most obtuse. The unrelenting ferocity of the attack; the resistance of the Russians that persists beyond all imagining; the knowledge that if Stalingrad falls, much more than a battle is lost—all this has helped break down the emotional defenses of the watching world. Stalingrad has ceased to be the name of a steel town in the Volga valley; it is Manchester, Chicago, Kansas City. Its body-strewn yards are our own; its desperate, valiant people—are they as we? Could we fight so strongly, die so well? We may have a chance to find out. Especially if Stalingrad falls.

A full appreciation of the towering importance of Russia's struggle to the Allied cause has grown slowly. If it had existed a year ago, a second front in Europe would probably have been opened last spring, when the Nazi drive to the east began. Today a second front seems likely to be put off till next spring. Where will the Nazi armies be then? If Stalingrad falls, the Germans will try to find a stopping place for the winter; they will try to stabilize the line and begin to mop up the conquered land. Last year the Russians held them in a bloody embrace and gave them no rest. Will the Red Army have the strength to do the same thing this year?

Russia will not surrender; nor will it make peace. But who can guarantee that it can go on fighting with the ferocity of these past weeks? If Stalingrad falls and no second front seems imminent, the Red Army may be as glad as the German army to accept a de facto temporary armistice; to dig in until its supplies are replenished, its troops refreshed and reinforced, and—most important of all—until its Allies begin to fight Hitler in Europe. That such a respite would aid the enemy no one can doubt. It would give Hitler time, too, to reorganize his depleted forces. It would permit him to move masses of men to the west. But at the worst it would be better than the total defeat of Russia, and if Stalingrad falls, a period of relative inaction may be the only alternative to defeat.

The full and frank report of the Canadian government on the Battle of Dieppe throws new light on the problems involved in launching a full-fledged invasion of Europe. The report does not balance gains and losses, but it leaves the impression that the net result was a debit. Among the Canadians, who made up five-sixths of the land forces engaged, there were 3,350 casualties. More than two-thirds were listed as missing; of these a majority are probably prisoners.

The expedition suffered bad luck in a chance encounter with a German convoy which delayed the force scheduled to land east of Dieppe until after daybreak. The troops going ashore at Pourville, two miles west of the town, were able to drive some miles inland before they withdrew. If the expedition had been the spearhead of an invasion, instead of a reconnaissance, a beachhead might have been established at that point and reinforcements landed in numbers, making possible a flanking attack on Dieppe, which proved to be strongly defended against frontal assault.

The raid on Dieppe, however, should not lead to the conclusion that an invasion force would necessarily suffer proportionately heavy losses. Major General Russell P. Hartle, commander of the American troops in Ulster, was quoted in the New York Sun on September 18 as saying: "Right now, say in October, we might storm the Continent and lose a couple of corps in doing so, but we would be there and we would push ahead." A couple of corps would mean nearly 100,000 men—a heavy price for a landing. But a second front is not to be had without cost, and the loss of life in the west would be balanced by lives saved in the east, where for more than a year Russian blood has been poured out in unstinting measure.

The question to be asked is not how many men would be killed if an invasion were launched this fall, but rather, would the cost not be still greater and the chance of success still smaller next spring when Hitler may have stabilized the Russian front and shifted a large part of his army to the west?

Why Cripps Failed

BY LOUIS FISCHER

[In the first half of this article Louis Fischer discussed the withdrawal of Cripps's original promise of a responsible Cabinet government for India and the reluctance of the Indians to consider plans for the future before arriving at a satisfactory settlement for the present.

—EDITORS THE NATION.]

II

IT WAS to these questions of the present that Congress and Cripps addressed themselves very soon after Cripps arrived in India. Cripps had promised the Congress leaders a real national government. But since the power of such a government would depend on the extent to which it participated in defense activities, this subject was the first to be discussed in detail. Difficulties appeared immediately. In talking of the post-war future Cripps was free from the inhibition of practical considerations. But in implementing Article E* during the war he had to consult with the Viceroy and General Wavell. On March 30 Cripps wrote a letter to President Azad which began: "I had the opportunity of a short talk with H. E. the Viceroy last night; during which he discussed with me his views as to the implementation of Clause E of the draft declaration."

This had an ominous ring. The rest of the letter bears that out. "The Viceroy," Cripps went on, "would be prepared to consult with Indian leaders on this basis to see whether it were possible to designate an Indian to some office connected with the Government of India's defense responsibilities without in any way impinging upon the functions and duties of the Commander-in-Chief. . . ." This was offensively vague. Apparently matters were being taken out of Cripps's hands. On April 1 Cripps wrote another letter to Azad suggesting that he and Nehru meet with General Wavell. Meanwhile Cripps had decided to go back to England on April 6, but on April 2 he told his press conference that he had postponed his departure for a few days. On the same occasion he denied that he had been faced with the resignation of three British generals if he agreed to the demand for an Indian as defense member of the government. He likewise categorically denied the report that the Viceroy was raising difficulties. The Hindustan Times of April 3 declared editorially that "Sir Stafford Cripps's decision to postpone his departure by a few days will be heartily welcomed in this country." The Hindustan Times is edited by Devadas Gandhi, Mahatma Gandhi's son, and financed by G. Birla, a rich Indian capitalist at whose home in New Delhi the Congress Working Committee sat permanently during the Cripps negotiations. "No one who has the interests of the country at heart," the Hindustan Times continued, "wants to wreck Sir Stafford Cripps's mission."

General Wavell, General Sir Alan Hartley, and Major General Molesworth, deputy chief of staff of the British army in India, met Azad and Nehru in Wavell's house on April 4 for half an hour. Four of the participants in that interview have described it to me; it was a complete fiasco.

Cripps wired London. The fruit of these and other consultations was the plan submitted by Cripps to Congress in a letter dated April 7. It proposed that "an Indian representative member would be added to the Viceroy's executives"; this Indian "would take over those sections of the Department of Defense which can organizationally be separated immediately from the Commander-in-Chief's War Department." These sections were specified in an "annexure." What were the sections which would be taken away from Wavell and handed to a representative Indian? They were "public relations," "demobilization and post-war reconstruction," the distribution of petrol, "amenities" for the troops, "all canteen organizations," "certain non-technical educational institutions," "stationery, printing, and forms for the army," the reception of foreign missions, evacuation of civilians from threatened areas, economic warfare, and signals coordination.

The Indians laughed. "They were ready to trust us with canteens and the printing of stationery," a well-known Indian leader scoffed. The Congress Working Committee denounced this defense formula as "totally insufficient."

Again the threat of a breakdown. At this stage Colonel Louis Johnson, who had just arrived in India as President Roosevelt's personal representative, entered upon the scene on the invitation of Sir Stafford Cripps. Louis Johnson conferred with Lord Linlithgow, the Viceroy, and with Wavell, Cripps, and Nehru. He finally evolved a second formula, by which "the Defense Department shall be placed in charge of a representative Indian member with the exception of functions to be exercised by the Commander-in-Chief as War Member of the Executive Council. A War Department will be constituted which will take over such functions of the Defense Department as are not retained by the defense member. A list of all the retained functions has been agreed. . . ." This formula made it possible for the negotiations to go on.

* The clause providing for the defense of India in the present war.

When the Congress Working Committee received Johnson's formula, it amended it slightly to read as follows:

The Defense Department shall be placed in the charge of a representative Indian member, but certain functions relating to the conduct of the war will be exercised, for the duration of war, by the Commander-in-Chief, who will be in control of the war activities of the armed forces in India, and who will be an extraordinary member of the National Cabinet for that purpose.

A War Department will be constituted under the Commander-in-Chief. This department will take over such functions as are to be exercised by the Commander-in-Chief. A list of such functions has been prepared and is attached.

The Defense Member shall be in charge of all other matters relating to defense, including those now dealt with by the Defense Coordination Department.

With this formula the Congress Working Committee sent along a letter stating that "in view of the war and the obvious necessity of allowing full scope for war operations to the Commander-in-Chief, functions relating to the conduct of the war are delegated to him and are to be exercised by him for the duration of the war. He will, in effect, have full control of these operations and of the war activities of the armed forces in India."

On April 8 Cripps introduced a few changes in this formula and delivered it to the Working Committee. Cripps's formula read:

The Defense Department shall be placed in the charge of a representative Indian member, but certain functions relating to the conduct of the war will be exercised, until the new constitution comes into operation, by the Commander-in-Chief, who will be in control of the armed forces in India, and who will be a member of the Executive Council for that purpose.

A War Department will be constituted under the Commander-in-Chief. This department will take over such functions as are to be exercised by the Commander-in-Chief. A list of such functions has been prepared and is attached.

The Defense Member shall be in charge of all other matters relating to defense in the Defense Department and those now dealt with by the Defense Coordination Department in addition to other important matters closely related to defense.

In the event of any new functions failing to be discharged in relation to defense or any dispute arising as to the allocation of any old functions, it shall be decided by His Majesty's Government.

It will be seen that the two formulas were very close. Whereas the Congress formula provided that the Commander-in-Chief would exercise his functions "for the duration of the war," Cripps made it "until the new constitution comes into operation." The Congress formula called the Commander-in-Chief "an extraordinary member of the National Cabinet," whereas Cripps called him "a member of the [Viceroy's] Executive Council." As a matter of fact, however, Cripps attached no list of functions. And everything depended on the list. Despite this lapse, the general atmosphere at New Delhi improved, and it appeared that a settlement was near. In fact, press reports went out to America and other countries that a settlement had been reached. Indians and foreigners in New Delhi were optimistic.

At lunch time on April 9 Colonel Louis Johnson helped to arrange an appointment for Azad and Nehru with Cripps at five-thirty that afternoon. It was expected that Cripps would be able to announce to them an agreement on the defense formula. Instead he informed them in a brief interview that India could not have a national government and that he was going home. This was the break.

What had happened?

While in India, Cripps told members of his staff and non-Englishmen too that before he left England he had asked Winston Churchill to remove the Viceroy from office. He had apparently anticipated trouble from the Viceroy. Churchill, according to Cripps, replied that such a step would be inconvenient, and that the Viceroy would not interfere with the negotiations, although Wavell did have the final word on defense questions. Cripps maintained, however, that he had full authority to set up a real Cabinet government in India. On April 9 this authority was specifically withdrawn in new instructions to Cripps cabled from London. Cripps was told therein that he could not go beyond the text of the British government's draft declaration unless he obtained the consent of the Viceroy and Wavell. That explains the collapse of the Cripps mission. The same evening Cripps said that his enemies had defeated him.

Cripps packed his bags. One more important effort was made to retrieve the situation. Throughout the month of February, 1942, watching Japan advance in the Far East, President Roosevelt had taken a lively interest in the Indian question, and when the British Cabinet finally decided to send the Cripps mission to India, the White House dispatched to Churchill a proposal for the solution of the Indian problem. President Roosevelt followed every step of the Cripps negotiations, and when the break came on April 9, he tried to persuade Churchill to keep Cripps in India and resume the talks. But Cripps did not stay.

On April 10, before Cripps's departure, President Azad wrote Cripps a solemn letter. The Congress Party, he said, was "prepared to do without any assurances for this uncertain future" after the war, but Article E regarding the immediate war effort was vague. "When this vagueness was pointed out," Azad wrote, "you said that this was deliberate so as to give you freedom to determine these changes in consultation with others. In our talks you gave us to understand that you envisaged a national government which would deal with all matters except defense." "But," Azad argued, "the chief functions of a national government must necessarily be to organize defense both intensively and on the widest popular basis and to create a mass psychology of resistance to an invader. . . . Popular resistance must have a national background, and both the soldier and the civilian must feel that they are fighting for their country's freedom under national leadership." Congress had been conciliatory, Azad contended:

With a view to arriving at a settlement, we were prepared to accept certain limitations on the normal powers of the Defense Minister. We had no desire to upset in the middle of the war the present military organization or arrangements. We accepted also that the higher strategy of the war should be controlled by the War Cabinet in London, which would have an Indian member. The immediate object before us was to make the defense of India more effective, to strengthen it, to broad base it on the popular will, and to reduce all red tape, delay, and inefficiency from it. There was no question of our interfering with the technical and operational sides. One thing, of course, was of paramount importance to us—India's safety and defense. Subject to this primary consideration, there was no reason why there should be any difficulty in finding a way out of the present impasse in accordance with the unanimous desire of the Indian people, for in this matter there are no differences among us.

It is clear from the negotiations on the defense formula that the Indians wished to do more for the defense of their country than the British were ready to allow them to do. Gandhi's pacifism did not enter into it. Azad, Nehru, Rajagopalachari, and other Congress leaders are not pacifists, and Gandhi knows it. They wanted to fight the war. Instead, they were told they could run the canteens, print forms, and conduct economic warfare.

Cripps replied to Azad on April 11 stating that Indians would be in charge of internal order, police, war finance, railways, supplies for all the forces, armunitions, propaganda, A. R. P., and labor. But "nothing further could have been done by way of giving responsibility for defense services to representative Indian members. . . . This defense is, as you know, a paramount duty and responsibility of His Majesty's Government. . . ."

"The real substance of your refusal to take part in a national government," he said, "is that the form of government suggested is not such as would enable you to rally the Indian people as you desire." Cripps argued that "a Cabinet government" would require constitutional changes which are impossible in war time and that such a Cabinet, "nominated presumably by the major political organizations, would be responsible to no one but itself, could not be removed, and would, in fact, constitute an absolute dictatorship of the majority."

Cripps was thus introducing the Hindu-Moslem issue into the negotiations. This issue had never previously been discussed in the talks on the immediate war-time arrangements, and it did not have to be discussed. As Cripps himself said, the Cabinet government would consist of persons nominated by "the major political organizations," in other words, Congress and the Moslem League, and if this constituted an "absolute dictatorship of the majority," that is, the Hindu majority, how could you ever get any Indian government in India? For the Hindus are the majority in India, a majority of three Hindus to one Moslem. Cripps was in fact saying that India could never be free and united. He was in fact implying that India had to be divided. This is the logical conclusion of what he and many British imperialists have been saying in recent months.

Mahatma Gandhi

Cripps's other objection was that there could be no Indian national government without far-reaching constitutional changes which would have to be voted by the British Parliament in London. He suggested as a substitute an Indianized Viceroy's Executive Council. But in his first press interview in New Delhi on March 29 Cripps was quoted by the entire press of India as saying that "a good deal could be done by changing the conventions or adopting new ones—he particularly mentioned that the Executive Council could become a Cabinet."

Professor Reginald Coupland, who went out to India in the autumn of 1941 to study its constitutional problems and then joined the Cripps mission, writes in his book on the mission that "the Viceroy alone could determine the composition of a Council with which he would have to work. But it was generally believed that the Viceroy was willing to consider an all-Indian Council," with himself and the British Commander-in-Chief as members. Even this, Coupland states, would require an act of Parliament. But the Viceroy, he continues, "is specifically entitled by the Act [of India, 1935] to dissent from the majority opinion of his Council."

To meet the constitutional difficulty, some British and Indian moderates suggested, and Congress leaders agreed, that the Viceroy might, if he could be prevailed upon to do so, enter into a gentleman's agreement not to exercise his veto. Professor Coupland, however, declares that such "an undertaking not to use the overriding power would be a breach of the law." When Cripps encountered difficulties in the setting up of a national government he tried to convince Congress that "ultimately there was always the possibility of the members of the Executive Council resigning or threatening to resign if they disagreed with the Viceroy." Congress felt that this was an unhealthy and impossible arrangement by which to conduct serious war-time business. If the party representatives resigned owing to disagreement with the Viceroy, that would be the end of the scheme that Cripps brought to India, and then the Viceroy could appoint a new Executive Council consisting of his own Indian puppets.

It has been argued that such a Cabinet would be irremovable. That is correct. But by whom is the Viceroy's Executive Council removable? Not by the Indian people or any Indian party. Is Churchill removable? In principle, yes; in fact, it would be very difficult. Every majority is irksome to the minority.

The realistic answer to all the constitutional quibbling is this: As Gandhi and everybody else in India agrees, the British armed forces and the American armed forces must stay in India to fight this war. If the British allowed an Indian government to be set up in these circumstances, that government would not exercise complete power. The British would retain a great deal of power, and certainly enough to prevent chaos or a separate peace. The best time for the British to begin the transfer of political power to the Indians is in war time when so much of the physical control of the country remains in British hands. But the British do not see it that way: it is not a matter of legalisms; the will is simply not there.

The Cripps mission, accordingly, boils down to this: Sir Stafford offered the Indians a post-war settlement which they all rejected. For the war, he offered them participation in a Viceroy's Council similar in power to the Council which already existed and in which the Viceroy's voice was stronger than that of its Indian membership. He offered them very limited tasks, such as canteens, etc., in the defense of their country. Congress would have none of it because it was convinced that on this basis the enthusiasm and cooperation of the Indian masses for the war could not be enlisted.

If this is all that Sir Stafford Cripps carried to India, why did he go at all?

I think that Sir Stafford had two hopes. First, that his old friendship with Jawaharlal Nehru and his record as an exponent of Indian freedom would prevail over all practical difficulties. Second, that the gravity of Britain's military position in the Far East would pry the reactionary imperialists loose from their traditional intransigent attitude toward Indian freedom and enable him to go beyond the text of his offer. So he told the Congress leaders that they could have a real national government not subject to the Viceroy's veto. He told the princes that after the war England would surely get out of India and that they would have to trim their royal sails to the new wind of freedom. He told a deputation of British business men in India which included R. R. Haddow, president of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, Sir J. H. Richardson, leader of the European group in the Central Legislative Assembly, and C. P. Lawson, chairman of the European Association, that their long day in India was done and that in the future free India they would not enjoy special privileges. These British business men protested to British officials in New Delhi and, by cable, to Winston Churchill. The princes likewise stormed. British officials in India and elsewhere refused to countenance a real Indian national government. All these forces pulled wires and brought their influence to bear against Sir Stafford's success.

Cripps knows this better than I do.

Then how explain Cripps's behavior after the collapse of his mission to India?

Cripps's article in the New York Times of August 23, 1942, contains innumerable statements which are demonstrably misleading. Like other recent utterances by Cripps, it repeats many of the ancient imperialist arguments which Cripps castigated in his non-official past. Cripps, for instance, now stresses the difficulties created by the Moslem League's position. But when he returned from his non-official visit to India in 1940 he wrote as follows (See "Stafford Cripps, Prophetic Rebel" by Eric Estorick):

The controllers of the Moslem League are drawn almost entirely from the professional, landlord, or industrial class of well-to-do Moslems, whose interests are quite different from those of the Moslem masses. . . . They would like to see the return of the Moslem domination in India, . . . but as this is impossible they have regarded the continuation of British rule as on the whole the lesser of two evil alternatives. The other is the government of India by peasants and workers through adult suffrage and a democratic Indian constitution. They fear this latter alternative even more than they dislike British rule. It is for this reason that they have refused to support the demands of Congress. . . . We must ask ourselves whether the 250 million Hindus are to be denied self-government because 80 million Moslems either are afraid of it or put forward an impractical suggestion for the division of India. . . . In truth, if the 80 million Moslems were left to make their own political decision without any injection of communal animosity, the great majority of them would support the Congress Party's program. In fact, many of them do today. . . . The attitude that is being adopted today by the British government is that they can and will do nothing further until the Hindus and the Moslems settle their differences. This gives the reactionary leaders of the Moslem League the power to prevent the people of India getting self-government almost indefinitely. It is this attitude that the British government is in fact encouraging whether consciously or unconsciously.

Where is the fine, humane Stafford who wrote those words in 1940? He is in the British government and doing the same wrong to India which he then charged against the British government. For me, this is the saddest phase of the entire Cripps mission. If Cripps had failed and remained the old Cripps, the tragedy would have been much smaller than it is.

I do not know what happened inside the heart and mind of Cripps. I can easily imagine the torment through which he passed. What alternatives were open to him after his failure in India? He might have resigned and attacked the Churchill government. That is a difficult decision to take in war time. Churchill would undoubtedly have won the battle. Cripps would have been branded a dangerous non-conformist who would not submit to discipline in the Labor Party and who now breaks discipline as a member of the British War Cabinet. He would have been called a bad soldier and a bad loser. It would have been said that he went beyond his written instructions. His immediate usefulness might have been destroyed. His official career might have been cut short—at least for a time. He apparently preferred to stay inside to toe the line. I believe deeply that by doing so he harmed himself and his country. He was the possible alternative to Churchill and the hope of England. He may still be—perhaps this is the star that guided his action. India diminished his chances. But one might understand what he did—without justifying it—if he had at least kept quiet and refrained from adopting all the threadbare, obsolete phrases about India which his dihard colleagues have been using for decades. What a victory they must be celebrating!

European Travelogue—1942

BY ARTHUR MANDELBAUM

AND what's that?" The man with the rough haircut looks maliciously at me, and the swastika in his buttonhole glitters. He pulls one of my wife's gowns out of the trunk, raises it to his nose, sniffs, rips a seam, and says, "You can't take it with you; it's a new one."

My wife tries to explain to him that the gown is not new, but used and altered. He doesn't pay any attention.

The scene is not in Germany, but at the little frontier railway station of Eaux-Vives on the outskirts of Geneva, in "free" Switzerland. Since the main railway lines from Geneva go through occupied France, which can be entered only with the special permission of the German military authorities, that little station is the only door leading from Central Europe out into the world.

Passengers leaving Switzerland have to go through a rigorous German customs clearance. Only used clothing, food for twenty-four hours, a small piece of soap, and twenty cigarettes may be taken across the frontier—no new things or articles that could be used in war.

The Swiss customs official who is ransacking my trunk takes my little amateur camera and gives it to the German officer. The Nazi examines the lens contemptuously and puts the camera back into my trunk. The Swiss soldier on duty at the station, who is helping my wife to repack the trunks, says in a loud voice, "Take it easy, Madame! This will not continue much longer."

A young girl accompanied by a nurse has a box of ten small tubes of medicine. "Not allowed," says the German officer. "But it is absolutely necessary for her," the nurse tries to persuade him. "She needs it once a day; she cannot live without it." The Nazi does not listen.

Somebody has the idea of calling up the German embassy at Berne. After a short hesitation the voice at the other end of the line gives the necessary permission. "But," it says, "one more question: Is she a Jewess?" Having received an affirmative answer, the voice says, "In that case, I can't help. She must leave the medicine here." At that moment the Swiss customs official seizes the box from the hand of the German and without saying a word puts it resolutely into the girl's bag.

What now? everybody asks himself anxiously. But the Nazi acts as though nothing had happened and seems to be very busy with another passenger's trunk.

Our train is the express to the Spanish frontier. Because of the shortage of coal it goes only twice a week instead of three times a day as before the war and for the 500 miles takes eighteen hours instead of seven. Tickets have to be reserved two weeks in advance.

The man at the window in the corridor took part in the Battle of Belgium as a lieutenant in the infantry. "Do you see these men?" He points to a group of young soldiers standing on the platform of a little station. Their uniforms are ragged, their shoes torn. (I saw similar groups at nearly every railway station.) "They are going to Provence. A new army is going to be assembled there. France has not spoken her last word in this war, yet."

"And the Germans?"

"The Boches? They know they have lost the game since they began the Russian adventure. I was told so by many of them. They don't believe in their cause anymore. And how can you carry on with soldiers who have lost faith? France can testify to that. We are only waiting for the right time. And for arms, too."

"What do you think about your government?"

"I'll tell you a story about what happened recently in our town. A young woman who had lost her job was allowed to earn her living by singing patriotic songs in the streets. She stood at a corner of the main street and sang a new song:

Comme la France est belle Quand Pétain y règne!

But she did it so apathetically and sadly that she was arrested a few days later."

"Do all Frenchmen feel as you do?"

"The people, yes. But there are beneficiaries of the present regime in every town."

We approach the Spanish frontier, through Argeles, Rivesaltes, and other places well known since the tragic retreat of the Spanish Republican army, hardly three years ago. The concentration camps are still there, filled with Spanish Republicans, anti-fascists, and Jewish refugees.

At Cerbère, the frontier station, the inspection is over quickly. My wife gives the woman inspector some of our sandwiches. She takes them and apologizes, "Only for my children. And please excuse me. When you come back, the war will be over. Then I shall not be here, neither I nor the inspection. Good luck to you in the meantime!"

Children and dogs! They never leave you all through Spain. They creep out of the ruins of houses and look dumbly up at the windows of the train. A little girl lifts her dirty shirt and says proudly, "Can you count my ribs?" The dog at her side seems to ask the same question.

Hunger over Spain! Three ounces of bread a day, yellow corn bread, tasteless, like sand between the teeth. Close-cropped, black-dressed women sit at the street corners, with arms outstretched apathetically, the signs of typhus on their gaunt cheeks, the fever still flaring in their eyes. Hunger next to plenty; in the windows of the luxury delicatessen stores is the finest food—meat, cheese, cookies, candy, chocolate, and wonderful white bread. This is no black market; it is legal to buy as much as you want, at exorbitant prices. A pound of bread, for instance, costs ten pesetas (one dollar). All these marvelous things are under the protection of armed soldiers, inside and outside the stores. Guards are in every large shop, hotel, and bank. In the foyer of the travel office I saw eight men with fixed bayonets.

In Barcelona we learn that we have to wait some days for our train to Madrid. There is only one train a day, and all seats are taken for several days. In Barcelona in the evening the crowds walk up and down the Ramblas as in happier times. But something has changed. What has become of the gaiety which always resounded in the streets? One meets many crippled young men, victims of the recent war. Franco's men got newsstands and lottery booths. The Republicans may go begging, if they are not confined in one of the numerous concentration camps.

We are ten in the dirty compartment of the train—workmen, peasants, merchants. They amuse themselves by guessing our nationality. And when they discover that we aren't Germans but have been expelled by the Nazis from our country, they compete in showing us their sympathy. In Switzerland we were told to keep our cigarettes for Spain, for the whole of Spain could be bought for a couple of them. But these poor workmen give us their last bit of tobacco so we can roll a cigarette. At the stations they run out to bring us fresh water, lemonade, and fruit. "We are as unhappy as you," they tell us again and again.

One of them asks me when I think the war will be over—this year or next?

"I don't know; in two or three years perhaps."

He bursts out laughing. "Two or three years? No, already it is over. They have lost it."

"Who, the Germans?"

"Sure, no doubt about it."

Suddenly a word runs through the train, from mouth to mouth—Guadalajara! Everybody rushes to the windows. A young man explains: "Here we were, and there was the enemy." The trenches are quite easy to recognize on both sides of the railroad. The man tells simply but impressively about the progress of the battle. "It was here where I was wounded. By an Italian bullet."

Later my wife asks him, "And now? Have you forgotten for what you fought?" And he says, with a delicate smile, but proudly, "Madame, that cannot be forgotten. That is not finished yet." And again, "That cannot be forgotten." The old peasant who has not said a word till now turns to my wife and says, shaking his head, "No, young lady, that will not be forgotten, ever."

It grows silent in our compartment after these words. Everybody is absorbed in his thoughts.

Finally, after eighteen hours, we arrive at Madrid. There seems to be a riot in front of the station. In the confusion the man with my luggage disappears. The policeman whom I ask to help me shrugs his shoulders. "There are plenty of thieves. All these people would gladly carry your trunks and disappear like your man. Wait here; I'll see what I can do."

Somebody pulls me by the sleeve: my man! He gives me the luggage ticket. "No, Señor, I am not a thief. They are all out of work. And everyone is looking for an occasional job." He asks me whether we have rooms. No, we haven't. "Then come with me. My brother-in-law has a small boarding-house; we can reach it in a few minutes. The hotels are overcrowded. Tomorrow the Caliph of Morocco will be here, and the day after there will be the parade of the Blue Legion, just returned from Russia."

On the way he talks about his family. He is married and has four children.

"Why are you out of work?"

"I was a militia man, and since the war I cannot get a job."

"Are there still reprisals?"

"There are no more mass executions, but if a personal enemy denounces you for having done this or that, they do what they did to my brother a few months ago. They took him out of his bed, and in the morning a police car picked up his body in one of the public parks."

"Do you regret what you have done?"

"Regret it? Never! If it should begin again tomorrow, I would do exactly the same thing as in 1936."

The parade of the Blue Legion was the great event of the summer season in Madrid. In the evening when the soldiers lingered about the town, I had the opportunity to speak to one of them, a young man of twenty-five.

"It was terrible, Señor. The 1,400 boys you saw in the parade are the remnant of 5,000 who marched out of here last fall."

"You are volunteers, aren't you?"

"Volunteers?" He laughs bitterly. "They picked us from different regiments, a company here, a company there. Nobody asked us whether we agreed or not." Suddenly, without saying a word, he turns away and disappears among the crowd. I look around; two men of the military police are watching me suspiciously.

On the way to Lisbon we have a second-class compartment together with an older couple and their daughter. He is an aristocrat and landed proprietor.

"Yes, Germany will lose this war. Not so soon, but there is no other possible outcome. You see, they are enemies of the church. And the church has always been victorious over her enemies, exactly as in our civil war. I told them, 'You may change everything you want but don't touch the church.'"

"But Russia is an irreligious country, and nevertheless it is fighting against Germany?"

"The Russian government may be irreligious, but the Russian people were always religious and still are. Germany is the Antichrist."

"But your government is helping the Antichrist?"

"We have to pay our debts, Señor. We pay them with blood and food."

And after a while: "Yes, Señor, it is a real shame."

The next day we are in Portugal, a land of abundance. For the first time in years, we can eat our fill.

Russian Lives and Oil Patents

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, September 20

I AM ashamed to report that while the Russians have been fighting heroically in defense of our country as well as their own, we have been giving them a run-around. They have been trying for more than a year to obtain the use of certain American processes and facilities in order to build new plants in the Soviet Union for the production of aviation gas and other oil products. These are especially important now after the losses suffered in the Caucasus. While the Russians give lives, we haggle over oil patents. Months ago they picked some broken-down refineries in Texas and arranged to buy them. They wanted to dismantle them and, with some new equipment, set them up again in the Soviet Union. But many patents are involved in the refining operations of these plants, and many other complications seemed to spring up in the negotiations. The deal has been hanging fire for months. It is "about to be concluded any day now."

The basic obstacle, in my opinion, is that the big oil companies, while ready enough to sell Russia oil, are unwilling to allow it to use their patents and processes. They fear—so narrow are their horizons in the greatest war of history—that these processes may enable the Soviet Union to sell more oil on the world market after the war is over. Most of our difficulties here arise from just this kind of post-war planning, a subject which seems to interest many sections of big business much more than the war itself. One of the principal instruments of the big oil companies in postponing and delaying this important form of aid to our Soviet ally has been the State Department.

Soviet negotiations for these oil processes began back in January, 1941. At that time the State Department and the Board of Economic Warfare objected on the ground that the Soviet Union was Hitler's "ally." After June 22, 1941, at least three directives were issued by the President in as many months instructing subordinate officials to give the Russians all possible aid in this field. The State Department, nevertheless, continued to interpose objections. The officials who figure in this anti-Soviet episode are Max W. Thornburg, the department's adviser on international oil matters; A. A. Berle; and Loy W. Henderson. They doubted the Soviet Union's competence in oil production, a field in which it has won the respect of the American oil industry. They questioned whether we could spare the materials the Russians wanted. They suggested that an "expert" be sent to the Soviet Union to investigate. Thornburg is a State Department dollar-a-year man from Bahrein Petroleum, the Persian Gulf subsidiary of the Texas Company and Standard Oil of California.

In the meantime, I. G. Farben's past collaborators in this country and in England seem to have taken over strategic posts in the negotiations. The companies to which I refer are Standard of New Jersey, Shell, Texas, Standard of Indiana, Universal Oil Products, and the M. W. Kellogg Company. They have been slow to help the Soviet Union but quick to take advantage of its necessities. These companies figure in the patent pools dissolved by the consent decree in the I. G. Farben cartel case. On the excuse that joint action is required to do business with the Russians, these companies have pooled the same patent processes involved in that case in a new company called the International Catalytic Oil Processes Corporation. On the same excuse they got clearance from the Department of Justice last fall. In March of this year, just a few days before the I. G. Farben consent decree was filed, they obtained the blessing of Deputy Petroleum Coordinator Ralph K. Davies, a Standard of California man. The Petroleum Coordinator's Office issues "recommendations." "Recommendation No. 42" provides for "cooperative development" of processes by this pool "so that the developments and improvements" may be made available to the Soviet Union! Clever folk, these oil men.

The cast of characters is interesting. Early last fall an adviser was appointed to help the Petroleum Coordinator's Office on Russian affairs. He turned out to be Frank A. Howard, vice-president of Standard Oil of New Jersey. Howard was one of the three defendants in the cartel case. One of the counts to which he pleaded nolo contendere, the equivalent in New York and most jurisdictions of guilty, is relevant here. Standard, Shell, and I. G. Farben agreed that "no license for production of petroleum products from coal should be given to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics." It would be too bad, from Hitler's point of view, if the Russians, now that the Caucasus is endangered, had a few plants beyond the Urals for making synthetic petroleum from coal.

One of Howard's employees has obtained leave of absence to act as associate director of the foreign division of the Petroleum Coordinator's Office. He is William D. Crampton, formerly Standard's representative in France. His name appeared in the documents in the I. G. Farben case dealing with the attempt of the Germans to obtain synthetic-oil rights for occupied France from a patent company jointly owned by Standard, Shell, and I. G. The head of that foreign division is James T. Duce of the California Arabian Oil Company, also a joint enterprise of Standard of California and the Texas Company. All exports of refining facilities and processes, whether by Lend-Lease or the Board of Economic Warfare, must clear through this division. I have no evidence that this power has been abused, and Crampton has on at least one occasion helped speed an oil shipment to the Soviet Union. The one point which can fairly be made is that power over exports has been placed in the hands of men from one particular oil group.

These men, in passing on proposed exports, decide whether the materials can be spared from this country and whether they are technically sound and useful. A Standard Oil or Texas Company man might honestly think some independent process of little value. In this connection it must be noted that independent oil companies with valuable processes have complained to the anti-trust division of the Department of Justice that they could not get clearance on exports to our allies. One process mentioned was a well-known device for reclaiming aviation lubricants. The oil-trust crowd has done its best to discourage its use in this country and does not care to have it shipped abroad. It cuts down the sale of lubricating oil.

When the Senate Patents Committee went into the files of the Petroleum Coordinator's Office, it found a gap between Howard's appointment as Russian adviser and an angry letter received from Harry Hopkins in March asking why there was so much delay on the Russian request for oil facilities. Since then there has been long haggling over royalties and patent rights. The President, Hopkins, Morgenthau, Ickes, Stettinius, and Hull are the top officials involved. All but Hull have shown themselves sincerely anxious to speed aid to the Russians, but that does not seem enough. Some ten years ago H. G. Wells interviewed Stalin. In the course of the discussion, as I remember the story, Stalin said, "In my country the state controls the economy; in yours the economy controls the state." I hope the Soviets will forgive us. The same forces which impede aid to them also impede aid to ourselves. This, if they remember their Marxist primers, is how monopoly capitalism operates in war.

IN STARTING this section our purpose is very simple. We intend to underline the revolutionary character of the war and help develop a political strategy through which the democratic elements in all countries may overcome the forces of reaction and capitulation, and free the peoples of the world from the tragic conflict of fighting under colors not their own.

The section will be a weapon in this political war. It will be turned against the confusions and hesitations of democratic policy as well as against the horrors of Axis rule; against the Quislings who do Hitler's bidding in Oslo and Brussels and Vichy, but also against the potential Quislings concealed in Washington and London and Buenos Aires; against all theories of national dominance, whether of Nazi or Anglo-Saxon origin, which betray the hope of a democratic victory and a people's peace.

Behind this department will be no single personality. It will serve its political purpose only if it succeeds in rallying all people who really understand the character of the present war. We count on them for suggestions and information.—J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO.

How to Help France

BY ANTONIO HUERTA

IT IS impossible for anyone living in a normal political atmosphere to understand the kind of political struggle going on in Europe today—a Europe occupied or threatened by Nazi armies. For more than a year and a half—since the fall of Paris—I have lived the tragedy of France. I might have escaped sooner; I remained partly out of loyalty to other Spanish refugees but even more because of my intense desire to see France slowly awakening to revolt.

To begin with, certain distinctions must be made. Since I came to the New World, I have read much about the divisions within France. From my own observation and the reports of men still working there, I believe that present-day France can be divided into four groups.

There is, first, the group of collaborationists, centered in Paris with a few offshoots in Vichy, Marseilles, Toulon, in that order of importance. In numbers they constitute an insignificant group, perhaps not more than 2 per cent of the entire population of France, but they have at their disposal all the resources of power in the occupied zone and almost all in the unoccupied zone. To this group belong those who have been bought by the Germans, "racists" of every shade, the advocates of the 1940 capitulation, and all those who hate England because it stands for traditional liberalism and parliamentary democracy in Europe. It is a group of captains without soldiers, a collection ranging from Laval to Maurras, and taking in along the way Darlan, De Brinon, Laure, Doriot, Deloncle, Déat, Vallat, and their acolytes Dumoulin, Marion, Delbeque, Luchaire, and company.

Second, there are those whose only policy is to stall for time, who, though they would prefer not to fall completely under German hegemony, are only really interested in remaining in power, and so waver between a half no and a final inevitable yes. This is the group that centers around Pétain; it is not much stronger than the first in spite of the prominent position held by its chief.

Third, there are those who want a victory for the democracies because it seems to them the only chance for a national rebirth of France. This is a large group in which are found army officers, monarchists, and former members of the Croix de Feu. It includes roughly 25 per cent of the population in the occupied zone and some 10 per cent in the unoccupied. Its representative figure is General de la Laurencie, now under arrest. From this section were drawn originally, just after the fall of France, the main elements of resistance.

Fourth, the group that wants an Allied victory in order to reestablish an independent France, but also because victory means, for some, a restoration of freedom, for others, defeat of the hated Boche. This group embraces three-fourths of the French population in both zones. In the beginning it did not furnish many recruits for the underground movement; now it supplies them in greater number than the third group.

In the fight against Hitler, what counts are groups three and four. It is to them that Allied propaganda and political action must be directed. And that being the case, it is easy to see why so much of what they have had so far seems absurd and exasperating. No Frenchman from those two groups, which are in active opposition to Hitler, needs to hear anyone from the United States or England or Canada sing the praises of democracy; for some of them democracy has no meaning, others are fully aware of it. And they do not need to be told in general terms how terrible and cruel the Gestapo is; they know that at first hand. What Berlin delivers in action London does not need to explain in words. The Frenchman who can be mobilized against Hitlerism knows perfectly well where his interests and his duty lie. If he does not seem to act accordingly, it is because he lacks three things—confidence in himself, confidence in the democracies, and arms.

Two years after the signing of the armistice the average Frenchman is still overwhelmed by the collapse of France. It is not so easy to recover from the bewilderment of seeing one's country converted in the space of a few weeks from a great power to a dependency of a most hated neighbor.

Servile Vichy has been quick to take advantage of that despair. Every day it hammers into the heads of Frenchmen these three affirmations: (1) France has been decisively vanquished; (2) France and its allies were responsible for the war; (3) France and its allies must pay for it. On this score little can be done from abroad. The best cure is the ability to pass from depression to action. Once a Frenchman fully joins the illegal movement, he automatically abandons introspection. The best way to help is to make the French understand that their country's heroic effort to become itself again is known and appreciated abroad, to record in broadcasts to France every act of sabotage, to approve and encourage declarations of men like Herriot and Jeanneney.

One must know how to talk to France. Many of the addresses that move the speakers in New York and London move nobody in France. That fact should be taken into consideration, especially by the French refugees. They should remember that since they left their country in the summer of 1940 France has traveled a long road. The best thing they can do is to show that they too have learned, that they too recognize their mistakes, and that they are working to build the France of tomorrow.

In general, the propaganda by radio and by leaflet should be abundant in information and chary of commentary. Instead, for instance, of philosophizing on the wickedness of Hitler, it should provide all possible facts of German rapacity and cruelty in France or at the expense of Frenchmen. Give as many facts as possible about Nazi atrocities and about resistance to the Nazis in other occupied countries. Keep in mind that no news reaches France from Norway, from Czecho-Slovakia, from Poland, from the other victims of Hitler. Particularly stress the seizures of food in France for shipment to Germany, because this arouses the indignation of the citizen and, what is more important, the distrust of the peasant. Tell France that this is the principal reason why food was not sent them from America when there was greater possibility of shipping, and that even now it remains the real reason. Deal fully with the matter of the French prisoners, insisting that neither Vichy or Berlin has any real interest in sending the prisoners back to France, because experience has proved that the first thing most of the released prisoners do—even before going home—is to join the illegal movement.

TOTAL VICTORY

The propaganda must be courageous. It must breathe absolute confidence in victory. And it must denounce unworthy Frenchmen, whatever their rank or position. There must be no vague references to politicians or writers who are working for Vichy; they must be named.

Frenchmen risking their lives for freedom want to know that they have the democracies of the world with them, not in spirit only but in action. The most significant action the United States could take would be to break finally with Vichy and recognize the Fighting French. I deny the validity of the statement that continuing relations with Vichy helps the French people. Vichy alone profits by these relations. Vichy can boast that the most powerful democracy on earth, in spite of being at war with Germany, still considers the government of Pétain the government of the French nation.

Confidence in the democracies will be restored in the measure that they can convince the French people of the straightforwardness of their policy and their willingness to strike in its defense. What France is waiting for is to see the Allies launch an invasion of Europe.

Do Americans know what really impressed the French people about the famous meeting of Roosevelt and Churchill on the Atlantic? I talked with leaders of the illegal movement, people on the street, army officers, and politicians. The Atlantic Charter itself they found a generous document, a little too old-fashioned perhaps, not corresponding to the revolutionary trend of the war, but not bad, after all. But what really impressed them was to see the two great chiefs of the two most powerful democracies meeting in the open sea, surrounded by battleships and cruisers. There was strength and hope.

The reactions to the speeches of the war leaders show the same kind of thinking. The leader who exercises the greatest influence in France is Roosevelt. When they speak of "the President," they refer not to Pétain or Laval but to Roosevelt. It is as if they saw in him the President of the world. Well, of all his speeches, the one which most moved the people of France while I was there was the speech of September 11, 1941, announcing that he had ordered the fleet to shoot without warning any submarine or raider discovered within the zone of American security. There again, strength and hope.

The final thing the French need, and lack, is arms. In Paris they shoot anyone found carrying a knife with a blade longer than seven centimeters. But no active Frenchman cares about risks when he has a weapon of his own. He likes to feel in his pocket the gun or the bomb with which he can destroy the boche or traitor who tries to search him for arms. Some guns and explosives were dropped from the air by the British and distributed while I was there. But they were so few! Arms must be provided, plenty of them, and soon.

Warning!

The Nazi propaganda machine is already preparing for a new blitz following the fall of Stalingrad. Always extremely precise in its objectives, its efforts in the coming weeks will be concentrated on praising the heroism of the Russians and scoring the inability of the democracies to come to their aid. The purpose will be to split the United Nations front on the Russian issue. Already from Buenos Aires comes news that Nazi agents operating in left circles are spreading this line: "Russia is finished. The British and the Americans have allowed it to be murdered. So to hell with the war—let Wall Street and the City do the fighting for Roosevelt and Churchill!"

More Power to Himmler

THE introduction of a compulsory labor system in France is intended—so says an article in the Europa Press, a German news agency—"to procure workers for Germany." Actually, the decree is not motivated exclusively by the need for solving the Reich's critical labor shortage. Compulsory labor is a chief instrument of the political war being waged by the Nazis against the labor movement of Europe, which Hitler recognizes as potentially the greatest obstacle in his road to world domination.

Heinrich Himmler, head of the Gestapo, anticipated this plan by more than a year on the occasion of his official visit to Madrid. At that time some of the Francoist officers complained that since the end of the Spanish war sabotage by Spanish workers had reached a point where it was threatening the success of the regime's "recovery" plans. The Gestapo chief replied, "Send them to us. We will teach them to work."

Himmler's aim is twofold: to increase war production in the Reich, and ruthlessly to stamp out sabotage and slow-ups in the factories of the occupied countries now producing for the German war machine. The recent Vichy decree may be considered a prelude to the mass deportation of foreign labor to Germany which will take place in the next few months. Already there have been rumors that the Spanish refugees in France who have not been sent to North Africa to work on the Trans-Sahara railroad are soon to be shipped to Germany. And it is interesting to note that one of the clauses of the Vichy decree applies specifically to foreign workers in France. Moreover, Himmler has been authorized to create a number of special Gestapo brigades whose job it will be to control the foreign workers sent into Germany. The new brigades will be added to the fifty divisions now under the command of the Gestapo leader inside Germany and in the occupied countries.

As always Himmler has taken advantage of difficulties arising in the Reich to increase his own prestige and personal powers. Just a few months ago, when the demoralizing effects of the British raids on Cologne and Essen began to make themselves felt, Himmler brought forth a "plan for the protection of the civilian population" that overnight put him in command of the Luftschutz (air-raid wardens). The Luftschutz is a powerful organization started in 1933 partly on the initiative of two German industrialists who were engaged in the manufacture of gas masks and saw in such an organization a way of reaping a tidy profit. By seizing the Luftschutz Himmler obtained control of the substantial treasury built up by the organization over a period of eight years, and at the same time found a new way of invading the homes of the citizens of the Third Reich. Today Himmler can send his innocent-looking civilian Luftschutz members into any home in Germany without awakening the suspicion that the Gestapo uniform inspires. Under the pretense of instructing the household about air-raid precautions they have an opportunity to do whatever detective work Himmler may require.

Utilizing these devious means, Himmler has made himself the real power in every important department by placing his agents in strategic posts. In the Ministry of the Interior it is Himmler's man, Stuckart, third secretary of state, who makes decisions. In the Ministry of Finance the old Junker Count Schwerin von Krosigk has been replaced for all practical purposes by Secretary of State Reinhardt, who answers directly to Himmler. He is charged with the task of seeing that the Gestapo's treasury is well supplied. To counterbalance Goebbels's influence in the Ministry of Propaganda Himmler has managed to install Dietrich as chief of the press division. Dietrich is one of Hitler's most constant companions and serves as liaison officer between the Führer and Himmler. Similarly Himmler has found places for two of his lieutenants in the Ministry of Education: Amann holds the post of Reich Youth Leader, and Scheel that of Reich Student Leader. And so it goes for all the other branches of the government.

Now through the formation of brigades to oversee the foreign labor being sent to Germany Himmler reaches into a new department, that of Robert Ley, Minister of Labor, whose recent defeatist speeches may well have displeased the head of the Gestapo. Twice lately Ley has departed from his usual pronouncements about "victory" to talk of "the determination of the German people not to capitulate."

Thus Himmler has become the real Minister of Political Warfare in Germany itself as well as in the occupied countries.

Benes's Achievement

ON THE heels of the British repudiation of the Munich agreement comes word that the Czecho-Slovak German Social Democratic Party, through its members in Great Britain, has taken similar action. In a resolution voiding the stipulations of Munich the party hails Anthony Eden's action of August 5 as a measure affording fresh hope and encouragement to the struggle for Czech liberation.

The resolution points to the fact that Czecho-Slovak German Social Democrats have consistently pronounced the restoration of Czecho-Slovakia's pre-Munich frontiers to be one of their primary political aims. Now, by virtue of the exchange of notes on August 5 between Masaryk and Eden, the problem of the German Czechs has become one with that of all Czecho-Slovakia.

Another group of German Czechs, the German Democratic Liberal Party, in a letter to President Benes, states that the joint declaration of Eden and Masaryk gives "great satisfaction" to all progressive, anti-fascist Czechs, regardless of their mother tongue. The same position has been taken by the Czecho-Slovak German Communists. The fact that these three groups have joined in a common stand is a tribute to the success of Dr. Benes in achieving complete cooperation among the Czech anti-fascist forces.

Such assurances that the German Czechs will not demand frontiers in conflict with the program of the Czech government should level one high hurdle on the cluttered road of post-war planning.

American "Censorship"

SPANISH Republicans are almost automatically refused visas by the American State Department. Franco Spaniards find little difficulty in entering the United States. A recent arrival from Madrid is the correspondent of the official Franco news agency, E. F. E. He was held briefly at Ellis Island but released after pressure was put on the State Department by Ambassador Cárdenas.

His activities here and his cabled opinions of the United States can best be followed by listening to German broadcasts to Latin America. Recently the Berlin radio announced that the new E. F. E. correspondent in New York had reported his disgust "at what is called freedom of the press" in America. There is no such thing, he said; all you get are official hand-outs and they are full of lies. In Germany, on the contrary, the Franquist reporter continued, he had complete freedom to collect information and to write and send anything he pleased.

Why—in spite of the brutal censorship of which he complains—America's fascist guest is permitted to cable home lying attacks to be broadcast as Nazi propaganda is a question for our own agencies of propaganda to answer. Must continued diplomatic relations with Franco expose the United States to the unchecked activities of his agents working in behalf of Hitler? That such a question needs to be asked at all is a revealing comment on American concepts of political warfare.

Fighting for White Folks?

BY HORACE R. CAYTON

ANY discussion of the problem of Negro morale must start with the paradoxical role which the Negro plays in American life. The position of the Negro in the social structure of the country varies from region to region. In the deep South he is a member of a caste whose status is scarcely in harmony with democratic theory; in the urban North he is set apart to the extent that he usually does not participate in white social activities and a ceiling is placed upon his opportunities to compete in economic and political life. In the North the Negro does enjoy, however, some of the rights, privileges, and protection of the law in common with white citizens. The major difference between the North and the South is that in the deep South the present social order depends upon the subordination of the Negro, while in the North he is an incidental minority problem.

The subordination of persons in a society because of race, religion, or culture is of course nothing new. Many societies, that of India, for example, have existed for centuries under a system in which a person's position is determined at birth. These societies have usually assigned people to a higher or lower position on the basis of certain absolute values. Thus in India when the caste system operated effectively, it did so because the religion which regulated society was accepted by both the higher and the lower groups. The paradox of the Negro in America is that he has a relatively fixed, caste-like status in a society based upon the political principle of democracy.

The slave Negro was not included in the democratic tradition. He was not permitted to be a part of the social and cultural democracy of the new nation born in 1776. This forced cultural isolation prevented the Negro then from identifying himself with the whole society and continued to prevent him, even after his emancipation, from entering that society on an equal footing with the whites. With his increased education and the increased social consciousness of white persons, he has, of course, come to share more and more in the fruits of citizenship.

On the other hand, the Negro's conception of himself and his expectations from the total society have always been in advance of what the social structure would permit. The more educated Negroes have been keenly aware of the contradiction between democracy and racialism. Each increment in education, each rise in status, has brought home to Negroes the discrepancy between these two forces in American life and as a result has heightened the racial consciousness of the group as a whole and produced frustration, cynicism, and bitterness in many individuals.

This situation has fundamental implications for the problem of morale among Negroes. One of the prime factors in morale is the identification of the individual with the collective enterprise. Having been denied many of the rights and privileges of American citizenship, Negroes are not now psychologically prepared to accept responsibility for the acts of the collective society from which they have always felt isolated. Their attitude is illustrated by the story of the old share-cropper who came to the "Big House" to get his ration of corn meal and fat-back. After receiving his supplies, and just before leaving, he looked at the plantation owner and said, "By the way, Captain, I hear the Japs done declared war on you white folks!" Then there is the story of a small Negro community in the backwoods of Mississippi, none of whose inhabitants could read or write. Not knowing much about the war and being timid about asking white people to explain it, they sent one of their men to a nearby town to see if he could discover, without asking direct questions, what it was all about. After standing around all day and hearing many references to the attempted rape of Hawaii, he returned to his community and reported that Uncle Sam and the Japs were fighting about an "old whore" called Pearl Harbor. This feeling of being alien, of being isolated from the interests of the total society, can be noted among all classes of Negroes. Even those who are more aware of the international issues of the World War share, nevertheless, a deep-seated resentment against their cultural isolation.

Not many Negroes have any strong conviction that the present struggle will improve their status, and without such a conviction morale is necessarily low. As Professor Louis Wirth, the University of Chicago sociologist, has pointed out, "to make great sacrifices willingly a group must have an unambiguous cause for which to struggle. They must be imbued with the feeling that their cause is right, that something desirable will result or something undesirable will be abolished through their collective action." Even the war effort has been marked by many specific instances of discrimination—segregation in the armed forces, segregation of Negro blood in the Red Cross blood banks, the shooting and killing of Negro soldiers in uniform by military and civilian police, and especially the discrimination against Negroes in defense industries. All these things contribute to the disaffection of the Negro toward the war effort. He compares them constantly with the avowed objectives of the war and recalls his own disillusionment with the results of the First World War. As a matter of fact, in many regions the more frequently the slogans of democracy are raised for the general population the lower falls Negro morale. The general bitterness was summed up by a young Negro who, on being inducted into the army, said, "Just carve on my tombstone, 'Here lies a black man killed fighting a yellow man for the protection of a white man.'" Another Negro boy expressed the same feeling when he said he was going to get his eyes slanted so that the next time a white man shoved him around he could fight back.

Such statements reveal the resentment which has been generated by the Negro's isolation and indicate his lack of identification with the purposes and privileges of the majority group, his growing tendency toward psychological identification with other non-white people, and his hope for a change. The growing identification of the American Negro with non-white people all over the world is no figment of Nazi propaganda. A recent issue of a Negro weekly contained five articles and an editorial on colored people outside of America. One article was on the African trade unions in South Africa; two were on the Indian situation; one was on Churchill's statement that the Atlantic Charter was not to be applied to colonies held by the United Nations; and one was on Negroes in South America. It may seem odd to hear India discussed in poolrooms on South State Street in Chicago, but India and the possibility of the Indians obtaining their freedom from England by any means have captured the imagination of the American Negro. The feeling throughout the colored world is that there is going to be a change in the status of non-white people, and there is little fear that the change could be for the worse. Whereas for years Negroes have felt that their position was isolated and unalterable, some of them are now beginning to feel that dark people throughout the world will soon be on the march.

The real danger does not lie in the agitation of some Negro leaders or in the very vocal Negro press. In the main Negroes in the United States are a disorganized, leaderless group. The N. A. A. C. P. is made up of a handful of Negro intellectuals and professionals and has no mass following. The church has lost its control over the majority of the urban Negro population. But inspired by the feeling that a change in status for the Negro is imminent, black America is ready for a nationalistic movement such as Garvey's when the right

WOMEN IN WAR INDUSTRIES

30,000,000

9,400,000

5,500,000

1,750,000

U. S. A.

GREAT BRITAIN

GERMANY

U. S. S. R.

GRAPHIC BY PICK-S

demagogic leadership presents itself.* In such a contingency the present leaders, even though they were convinced that all demands should be held in abeyance for the duration and were willing to preach this to the Negro masses, would be incapable of exercising any real control over the masses.

Last year, in an article in Opportunity, the writer made the following prophecy concerning the problem of building Negro morale:

The problem of maintaining Negro morale will increase in importance as we move closer to the actual war situation. It will doubtless be met by the development of propaganda rather than by any fundamental attempt to change the Negro's social and economic position. . . . The attempt to propagandize the Negro will be fumbling. It will be fumbling because, to my notion, it has not been necessary before for Americans to spend much time and energy meeting the discontent of a large racial minority.

This prediction has been pretty well carried out. Some concrete gains for the Negro are on record—the appointment of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practices, the establishment of an aviation unit at Tuskegee and of a naval unit at the Great Lakes Training Station (though they are Jim Crow). These achievements, however, have not done much to improve Negro morale, for traditional American race feeling, plus the fact that the national Administration is supported in its foreign policy by a Congress controlled by Southern politicians, has not only maintained the Southern pattern of rigid segregation but extended it to many fields of social life in the North. Rules of segregation have frequently been enforced as a war emergency where they did not obtain in civilian life before the war.

In the armed forces and to a large extent in industry the Administration has taken the position that a relaxation of the color line would destroy the morale of the majority group. What might be considered the realistic white point of view was expressed in a letter from William A. Krauss, published in Common Sense last June. Replying to an article by A. Clayton Powell, Mr. Krauss wrote:

I think that very few white Americans are made happy by the knowledge that they—the majority—are discriminating against a Negro minority. They will agree up to the hilt with Mr. Powell that the condition is lamentable, but they will not agree to what he seems to be driving at: that is, free, full, and cheerful social equality for the American Negro.

Full social acceptance of the Negro is an idea that simply doesn't occur to the white majority. And social acceptance means far more, of course, than having the Negro in for dinner or inviting him to join the club. . . . Whether in a model world or model army this should or should not be so is, obviously, unprofitable for me or for Mr. Powell to argue—the fact is that in the United States today it is so. It cannot be otherwise, it will not be otherwise, while the majority see the Negro as different.

The very acts which will insure morale for one group may, it is thought, destroy it for another. A large group of white persons in America do not wish to change the position of the Negro. Just as there is a feeling in the non-white world that things are changing, that this is the time to press for gains, so there is a feeling among whites that their position of dominance is being challenged and that they must resist any encroachment on their prerogatives. The problem of building Negro morale, therefore, is one of maintaining the color line—which is considered necessary for the morale of white soldiers, workers, and civilians—while appeasing the rising Negro public opinion with verbal and token gains whenever the tension becomes too great. This difficult task is complicated by the conflict between those who wish to stimulate Negroes from coast to coast to demand complete equality now and those who suggest the organization of a League to Maintain White Supremacy.

Propaganda to raise Negro morale has had little success during the past year. Most of the federal propaganda agencies have been too much in fear of a reactionary, Southern-dominated Congress to devise any adequate approach to the problem. The old Office of Facts and Figures, in order to stimulate Negro morale, produced an all-Negro movie short showing a Negro labor battalion singing while they marched and worked. The film simply antagonized Negroes, since it showed them as laborers rather than fighters, conformed to the stereotype of singing Negroes, and emphasized their Jim Crow position in the army. It would have been much better for Negro morale if the film had not been made. Another federal agency worked on a de luxe and expensive edition of a book about the American Negro, illustrated with color photography, designed to counteract the Japanese propaganda that democracy necessarily means white supremacy. The book, however, could not be circulated in the United States because it might offend Southern Congressmen.

The need for more skilful propaganda and more effective action becomes imperative as the position of the American Negro in American democracy gains global importance. There is a close relationship between the interracial tensions within the United Nations and the course of international events. The present crisis in India is raising the expectations of American Negroes. On the other hand, every bid for status by the non-white people of the United Nations—and every military victory of the Japanese—evokes among the majority group the response of fear and the determination to keep down the dark races.

* There has been a revival of the Universal Negro Improvement Association, the old Garvey movement, which focused the attention of several million Negroes on a program glorifying the colored races. Its recent national convention, the first for several years, held in Cleveland in August, was attended by more than 400 delegates. This was the largest convention since the peak of the movement. Considerable attention was given to the application of the Atlantic Charter to Africa.

The problem of the American Negro might be met by force if the Negroes' insistence on equal participation exceeded the willingness of the total society to grant these demands, but in using force the United States, and in fact the United Nations, would lose one of their most powerful weapons—the loyalty of the peoples seeking freedom, regardless of color. Under these circumstances it is difficult to conceive how this country can deal with growing Negro claims without planning a program of concessions. It is true that in the daily press and on the air the Negro is getting more attention than he has enjoyed since the old Abolitionist days. And there is a growing awareness on the part of labor that the Negro problem requires action. In normal conditions all these things would be considered gains for the Negro. But they are sporadic and unintegrated and are insufficient to counteract the apparent inability of the government to set up a comprehensive plan.

Any real change in the morale of Negroes will come only with a real change in the position of the Negro in the social structure of the country. Such a change will involve, especially in the South, a complete revamping of the social relations between the races. That is something which this country will not voluntarily undertake. Unless we are to maintain a society which Edwin Embree has described as "half Nazi, half democrat," the government must intervene with a rational plan. The shape of things to come—the new pattern of race relations—will be worked out on a global basis and will necessitate tremendous internal changes in many countries.

In the Wind

NOT LONG AGO the Chicago Tribune, in answer to critics who accused it of attributing ideas of its own invention to "Washington sources," asserted that the practice of falsifying date lines and authorities has long been accepted in the newspaper business. Leo A. Lerner, a Chicago newspaperman, took the Tribune's statement as a challenge and polled editors throughout the country on their attitude toward the practice. Of 410 leading editors who received the questionnaire, 132 responded. Four agreed with the Tribune and admitted that their papers often falsified the origins of stories. Two disagreed in principle, but confessed that they occasionally used false date lines. Three returned ambiguously worded answers, and 123 replied that they disagreed with the Tribune and never followed the practice.

WASHINGTON OBSERVERS (real ones) believe that the State Department is withholding from the press its knowledge of an agreement between Laval and Hitler to have thousands of Negroes from French colonies in Africa conscripted for labor in the Ruhr valley. It is said that a large number of French Senegalese have already been sent to Germany.

CAMPAIGN NOTES: James E. Curley, former governor of Massachusetts, who last week defeated Representative Thomas Eliot in the Democratic primaries, brought a Negro into a Boston bar shortly before the voting and announced, "Gentlemen, here is my opponent." . . . Citizens eager to unseat Representative J. Parnell Thomas, an enthusiastic member of the Dies committee, were faced with an unhappy dilemma in last week's Republican primaries in New Jersey. Thomas's opponent campaigned on a simple platform. He wanted to start impeachment proceedings against the President and then retire to the join the armed forces.

LAST MONTH'S Harper's Bazaar, in its "Where Shall We Go?" column, recommends a French restaurant in New York by saying, "Not even in Paris could you get finer food."

THE LIVING AGE, which until last June was run on money supplied by the Japanese government, was revealed after the last war to have been a beneficiary of German funds.

A NOTE of revealing frankness appeared in the July 30 issue of Kritisk Ugerevue, a Nazi-subsidized Danish weekly. "In order to defeat Russia," it says, "it is not sufficient to conquer territories. The farther the German army penetrates into Russia the greater the demands made on the transport of materials, a fact already noticed in regard to Germany's transport of goods to adjoining European countries. For every 100 kilometers the army penetrates, more locomotives and trucks are demanded."

A NEW EFFORT to combine serious political journalism with tabloid sensationalism will appear on October 7. Amster Spiro, former city editor of the New York Journal, is the editor of the new publishing venture, a picture weekly to be called Graphic.

WESTBROOK PEGLER continues to refer at least once a week to the American Newspaper Guild as a Communist-controlled organization, completely ignoring the fact that it is now more than a year since "Communist control" was the issue in a Guild national election. Those who were accused by their fellow-guildsmen of being influenced by the Communist Party were voted out of office and a national administration of known anti-Communists was installed.

RUSSEL BIRDWELL, a Hollywood publicity man formerly in the employ of Howard Hughes, is now press agent for Henry J. Kaiser, presumably part of the deal that made Hughes and Kaiser partners. Birdwell is largely responsible for the hundreds of "personality stories" about Kaiser that have recently appeared in the press.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Italians at Their Best

THE REAL ITALIANS: A STUDY IN EUROPEAN PSYCHOLOGY. By Carlo Sforza. Columbia University Press. $2.

THE Italians have experienced many strokes of good fortune and many disasters, many glories and many shames during the twenty-five centuries of their written history. Their record embraces Caesar and Punchinello, St. Francis of Assisi and Casanova, Dante and Cagliostro. The most disgraceful of their misfortunes, the most humiliating of their shames, has come with Mussolini: to be subjected at home and represented abroad by a senseless, cruel, and pompous demagogue who, with swelled chest, arms akimbo, jutting jaw, and eyes rolling out of their sockets, has occupied the front pages of the world's newspapers for the past twenty years. And since not a few Italians have been strutting about aping their Duce, the opinion has spread that all Italians are like Mussolini and that Mussolini, as a German scholar would put it, embodies the Italian Volksgeist.

In writing his charming book Sforza has been haunted by Mussolini's shadow. When describing the "real Italians," Sforza describes those who are the very opposite of what servile foreign correspondents from Rome and empty-headed, stuffed-shirt visitors have made the Italians out to be.

His book ought to be read not only by the casual reader but by those who wish to devote themselves to Italian studies. There is no page that does not sparkle with flashes of insight and cogent remarks that give the lie to much of the misinformation current on the nature of the Italian people. Whoever has lived in Italy long enough to come in touch with peasants, fishermen, and the common folk of the towns will visualize the men and women that Sforza loves, respects, and describes. It is especially among the Italian women of all classes that Sforza's "real Italians" are to be found.

And yet, not "all" Italians are like Sforza's "real Italians." The "other" Italians also—the Italians of Mussolini's type—whom Sforza tries but does not succeed in ignoring, are "real." They form a large section of the population, especially of those "intellectual" classes that are called intellectual because they have been educated beyond their intelligence and have been made stupid by education. There are among the Italians, as among all other peoples, different streams: angels and devils, men and beasts, heroes and cowards, Toscaninis and Mussolinis. Those whom Sforza calls the "real Italians" are "the Italians at their best." Had they been the only "real" Italians, Sforza would be living in Rome and not in New York.

A chapter on the Italians in America has been added to the American edition of this book, which was first published in France in 1936 and in a second French edition last year in Canada. Sforza would like the generations of Italian descent in America to be absolutely loyal to their new country but to maintain "cultural and spiritual bonds with the old." "You cannot make a good citizen out of a man who is intellectually and spiritually impoverished by being cut off from the only past he has had. If you do this, he becomes a savage, a bastard, a robot." Sforza will abandon this theory as soon as he realizes that all Americans have had a European past from which they have been or will be cut off.

The "cultural and spiritual bonds" of immigrants can but grow looser and looser from the first to the second, and from the second to the third and fourth generations. They remain firm only among the cultivated classes. What kind of "cultural and spiritual bonds" could ever be maintained in 1942 by an American high-school boy whose grandfather was an illiterate Italian peasant who emigrated to America in 1880?

Cultural and spiritual bonds result in political loyalties only in minds incapable of unraveling the tangled skein of thought and feeling. People who have not been trained for subtle analysis are apt to undergo serious and dangerous moral crises when cultural and spiritual bonds clash with political loyalties. What is happening in this country among the Italian-born citizens and residents, and even among large sections of the younger generation, teaches us that if certain tragedies cannot be avoided today, we ought not to multiply and perpetuate them by keeping alive forever and ever, not only among the cultivated but also among the non-cultivated classes, bonds that might endanger the deepest moral structure of a man.

If all those who have come from Europe to America, that is to say, all Americans, had maintained their "cultural and spiritual bonds" with the country from which they had come, America could never have developed a civilization of its own. It would be a mosaic of disconnected and conflicting "racial minorities," linked not only by "cultural and spiritual" but also by "political" bonds to their European fatherlands rather than to the country where they have settled permanently.

The older generation that came from Italy and is unable to break away from ancestral traditions may be disturbed by the new spiritual features which develop in their children under the impact of the new environment. But they are wrong and the youngsters are right. And men like Sforza ought to tell them so.

I trust that Sforza's book will have many readers. But I also hope that, in his good sense and generosity, he will in further editions elaborate his statements on this point in such a way as to make them worthy of a "real Italian." Let him tell the American citizens of Italian origin that they have no reason to be ashamed of their Italian origin, their muscatel wine, or their spaghetti. Let him tell them that they should inherit and keep alive what is more important than food: the stoical endurance of their fathers under toil, sorrow, and pain, and the humble, sweet, yet heroic virtues of their mothers. This would be their most precious contribution to the American way of life. However, since they have made this country their permanent home, they ought to become American in culture and in spirit, and the sooner the better. GAETANO SALVEMINI

Out of Bataan

THEY WERE EXPENDABLE. By W. L. White. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

THEY," in the title of this admirable little book, refers to the seventy men of Motor Torpedo Boat Squadron Three which fought in the Philippines last winter until nothing was left of it. Five men came back and the rest were "expendable." You realize you're expendable, as one of the men explains, when the captain takes you to a machine-gun post and tells you to hold this position, and you ask for how long, and he says, never mind, just hold it.

William L. White, who did some excellent work covering the war in Europe, got the story from the lips of four of the young officers of M. T. B. Squadron 3 who returned, and he tells it in the form of a conversation: their commander, Lieutenant John Bulkeley, talks for a while about their adventures in the waters off Bataan, then his second in command, Lieutenant Robert B. Kelly, cuts in, and so on. It makes about as exciting an evening's reading as one could ask for. With Bulkeley you look up into the Manila sky at the neat, unhurried Japanese bombers and wonder where in hell our fighter planes are, and later you find out where—smashed on the ground by the enemy, just as were those of Poland and France; we had not learned. You go along that midnight when two of the little torpedo boats raid the Japanese fleet in Subic Bay; at first it is utterly black, then there is plenty of light from enemy searchlights and tracer bullets and the flashes of their shore guns—all aimed at you—and by this light you find your way to an enemy cruiser and send a torpedo into her.

The six raiders probably sank a hundred times their own combined tonnage in enemy warships before their gasoline and their torpedoes and their crews and the boats themselves were expended. The men were spending themselves recklessly, heroically, to delay the Japanese even by minutes until our reinforcements should arrive, which they never did. "You don't mind it until you come back here where people waste hours and days and sometimes weeks . . ." one of the young officers started to say, but Bulkeley interrupted him: "People don't like to hear about that." There is not another word in the book about the need of America's waking up, but the tale itself, simply and skilfully put together by Mr. White, is a powerful arouser. People who cheat on gasoline rations or who vote themselves fat bonuses out of war profits should be compelled to read it.

The last three boats of the M. T. B. squadron carried General MacArthur and some other non-expendables to Mindanao, whence they were flown out of the Philippines to Australia. You go along on that ghastly, furtive ride from Bataan down the islands. General MacArthur doesn't look very impressive on the trip, but what seasick general would?

MARCUS DUFFIELD

The New Siberia

SOVIET ASIA: DEMOCRACY'S FIRST LINE OF DEFENSE. By Raymond Arthur Davies and Andrew J. Steiger. The Dial Press. $3.

A BOOK describing modern Soviet Asia is a welcome event in an America where many people still think of Siberia as a place of exile for the political prisoners of the czars.

The authors have given a fairly accurate picture of this rapidly developing area, though the descriptions of natural resources, railroads, new towns, and industrial plants all reflect a political orientation 100 per cent in line with official Soviet policy; most Soviet newspapers point out more shortcomings in the operation of Soviet industry and agriculture and are more frank about difficulties and privations than are Messrs. Steiger and Davies. Their tendency to give the Soviet Union the benefit of any doubt leads in some cases to major inaccuracies. For example, the economic map—a beautiful job of draftsmanship—shows the roads connecting Yakutsk with Okhotsk, Magadan with Verkhne-Kolymsk, and many others as "highroads," whereas the most up-to-date Soviet maps and such literature as is available in the Soviet Union all describe these roads as gruntovye dorogi—dirt roads. A certain naivete combines with this enthusiasm to produce such statements as that on page 273: "Were the Soviet Far East to have a population of 20,000,000 instead of the present 6,000,000, Japan would think three times instead of twice before attacking the Soviet Union."

However, after the reader has discounted the enthusiasm and made allowance for the naivete he will find much to enjoy in this survey of a fascinating portion of the earth's surface—a territory as large as the United States, Mexico, and Canada, thirty-five times as large as Germany, almost entirely undeveloped and much of it completely wild. Almost every stage of economic development is to be found somewhere in this vast terrain, which stretches from the Arctic to the sub-tropics. In the Trans-Baikal area crayfish dug out of the permanently frozen subsoil, where they have lain for millenniums, have been restored to life in the laboratory. In Wirkhizia the women used to hatch silkworm cocoons in small bags suspended between their breasts. In Tadzikistan falconry is still the accepted method of hunting small game. The book abounds in such exotic grace notes to its twin themes of industrialization and sovietization.

Mr. Steiger has had unusual opportunities to observe the development of Soviet Asia. He has traveled over large parts of it himself. When he came to Magnitogorsk in 1934, I met him at a May Day banquet for foreign workers. After numerous speeches and vodkas he expressed a desire to see the blast furnaces, whereupon he and I and a burners' brigadier who worked in my gang set out for the plant some time after midnight. We climbed one of the blast furnaces, had a good look at the lights of the construction job, and were descending when we were picked up by an armed guard. Taken to the local GPU station and closely questioned for an hour or so, we were relieved of all our documents and sent home with instructions to appear the next morning at the city GPU office. We presented ourselves somewhat sheepishly at the appointed time. A taciturn official returned our documents, after satisfying himself that we were neither saboteurs nor spies, and sent us home with an admonition not to visit the plant after any more banquets. I don't know whether Mr. Steiger got into trouble in any of the other centers of Soviet Asia which he visited, but I feel certain that he made the most of his opportunities; and I imagine that his report is more complete than that of any other Westerner who has tried to do a general book on this subject.

JOHN SCOTT

The Case for Appeasement

HOW WAR CAME: AN AMERICAN WHITE PAPER; FROM THE FALL OF FRANCE TO PEARL HARBOR. By Forrest Davis and Ernest K. Lindley. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

THIS book," says the publisher's blurb, "tells the inside story of American foreign policy and covers one of the most critical periods in American history, when our State Department used every weapon in the armory of diplomacy to fight a delaying action on a global scale against the conquering Axis powers." With all respect to the publishers and the authors, this reviewer begs to dissent.

Messrs. Davis and Lindley are distinguished journalists and biographers. They have written a corking good tale which deserves wide reading. It is a true story. But it is not the whole story. This they grant. Its lacunae, however, are larger than they admit. They set out, no doubt, to write an "inside" narrative which would be, in the language of their Foreword, "an independent venture, critical, unofficial, and bearing no imprimatur." But those who write current history from official sources as yet unpublished have only two alternatives: to apply critical judgment to the record revealed to them by a cooperating officialdom and thereby run risks of offending their friends and shutting themselves off from further access to secrets; or to write an uncritical apologia which will demonstrate the rectitude of all decisions made and be highly flattering to those who made them. The authors of "How War Came" chose the second alternative.

This choice does not vitiate the value of their work. But it is not openly acknowledged. The reader must therefore beware. To help convince the American public of the essential rightness of its government's course is a wholly commendable enterprise. Such a task has been frankly undertaken and carried forward to brilliant success in the recent little "White Book of the United States Foreign Policy, 1932-1942," issued by the Committee for National Morale. But to undertake such a task under the guise of a critical, unofficial, and objective evaluation is not quite cricket. Neither can it be regarded as altogether helpful by those who attach more importance for winning the war to the exposure and correction of past mistakes than to the vindication of past decisions which have been right.

"How War Came" is nevertheless an extraordinarily valuable document—especially if read in conjunction, say, with Robert Bendiner's "The Riddle of the State Department"—for it comes very close to representing the most elaborate and adequate justification thus far put forward by the State Department in defense of its record. The "scoops" and

"There's only one Jennie Lee in the world!" says WILLIAM SHIRER
"She is one of the remarkable young women of our time."

She tells her story in THIS Great Journey By JENNIE LEE

DAUGHTER of a Scotch miner, she became a member of Parliament at 24, then aide to Beaverbrook and close friend to Sir Stafford Cripps. This book by a girl of the people shows that Britain's real strength and will to victory lies in the brawn and heart of her workers in mine, field, and factory.

• "You feel that the post-war world will be a better place to live in after reading this courageous book."

—Sterling North, N. Y. POST.

$2.50, FARRAR & RINEHART, NEW YORK

BRAZIL UNDER VARGAS

By KARL LOEWENSTEIN

Author of "Hitler's Germany: The Nazi Background to War"

"NOT ONLY an indispensable book on Brazil, it breaks new ground in its analysis of political realities in Latin America."

—Phila. Inquirer

"Keen, scholarly analysis of Brazil's governmental processes. Urgently needed to understand our chief South American ally."

—Library Journal

"The first thorough technical study of Brazil's present political, legal and administrative setup."

—The New Yorker

at all bookstores $2.75

THE MACMILLAN CO.

New York City

Outstanding Volumes on Consumer Cooperation

COOPERATIVE DEMOCRACY

(Fourth Edition)

By JAMES P. WARBASSE

This book, regarded everywhere as the "Bible" of the consumers' cooperative movement in America, has enjoyed a sale of thousands of copies and has been translated into at least five languages. It is brought up to date in this new edition to provide comprehensive, accurate and timely information about the movement's principles and methods for the growing numbers of people showing interest in the cooperative idea. $2.50

THE PEOPLE'S BUSINESS

The Progress of Consumer Cooperatives in America

By JOSHUA K. BOLLES

A dramatic, informative and eye-opening account of the meaning, strength and influence of this economic and social movement for every consumer who is curious to know what it is all about. The present status of cooperatives in America is vividly and comprehensively described by an ace newspaper man who toured 5000 miles to find out for himself why and how it works, why it attracted and what it is doing to and for the 2,500,000 families enrolled as members in the movement, how it did a business of close to a billion dollars last year, and why it is growing more rapidly today than ever before. Illustrated. $2.00

On Every List of "Best Books" on the Cooperative Movement

THE CONSUMER MOVEMENT

By Helen Sorenson Describes and appraises all agencies and activities that make up the American Consumer Movement. $2.50

INTRODUCTION to the COOPERATIVE MOVEMENT

Edited by Andrew J. Kress Over three hundred selected readings from the entire literature of the movement, both here and abroad. $3.00

MASTERS OF THEIR OWN DESTINY

By Father M. M. Coady The story of how cooperative organization rehabilitated the impoverished peoples of Nova Scotia. $2.50

COOPERATION AS A WAY OF PEACE

By James P. Warbasse Explains how the application of the principles of cooperation to international dealings can secure a lasting peace. $1.00

OUR INTERESTS AS CONSUMERS

By Dorothy H. Jacobson What consumer interests are, where they are going, what is being done by and for them, and how they can become a force in directing national policy. $1.45

Books available at your bookstore or direct from

HARPER & BROTHERS - 49 E. 33 St., N. Y.

"revelations" are secondary to the reasoned case in support of a given pattern of policy. It is interesting, but scarcely vital, to know various bits of gossip connected with crucial events—for example, that Stalin convinced Hopkins in early August, 1941, that Russia would hold; that Mrs. Roosevelt didn't know where the President was going when he sailed to meet Churchill; that Churchill, soapy in his tub, said "That should do it" when the President suggested the phrase "United Nations." More important are the revelations that Welles, as early as January, 1941, began warning Oumansky of Nazi invasion in June and that Berlin had long pressed Tokyo toward the policy which found expression at Pearl Harbor. The accounts of Anglo-American relations, of early Administration moves against the Axis, and of the protracted Japanese-American negotiations of 1941 are well done, but add less to what was already public knowledge than some other chapters of the book.

The real value of these pages lies in their able defense of the State Department. There is no full examination of alternative courses of action and few suggestions that the department ever was or could be wrong. Apart from occasional references to "blind spots" and such statements—intended as praise—as "Mr. Hull's world was that of the orderly nineteenth century," there is no unfavorable criticism at any point. Even the Atlantic Charter, with all its shortcomings, is misnamed a "written alliance," staunchly defended as a masterpiece of statesmanship, and compared with Wilson's Fourteen Points to the disadvantage of the latter—a comparison which will be convincing only to those who fail to reread the Fourteen Points and to recall their immediate psychological and military effects. The case for the department, however, as presented by Defense Attorneys Lindley and Davis is a strong one and merits serious consideration.

The case rests upon sundry and somewhat shifting arguments. America was militarily unprepared. The President could not commit the country to action—for example, to keep Indo-China out of Japanese hands or to join Britain in warning Tokyo—without Congressional approval, although this is very close to what he did in the naval base-destroyer deal. Critics of appeasement were "without responsibility." To appease Japan was to buy time. As late as November, 1941, Hull and Welles were ready to "unfreeze" assets and resume gasoline shipments, but Hu Shih and T. V. Soong

NOVA SCOTIA: Land of Co-operators, by Leo Ward, C.S.C.

Nova Scotia (Antigonish, St. John's and a dozen other towns) is the center of a new co-operative movement that is small today but big with the hope of a new birth of Democracy. For Co-operation means discovering the community, and taking in common the first steps on the road to economic freedom and security. . . . Dr. Ward visited all the little towns where co-operatives and credit unions had been established, talking with all the "little men" who are learning to understand and apply the great principles of Christianity that can only become effective in co-operative action. . . . For Co-operation in Nova Scotia does not mean merely stores and savings banks, though they have them in plenty and Dr. Ward describes them. Even more it means learning to work with and to live for one's neighbor. In Nova Scotia they say, "The man who is only good for himself is no good." Dr. Ward went to Nova Scotia to get the point of view of these "little men" who are doing the new things, and he tells you about them, what they told him about themselves and about each other as he talked with them in kitchens and fisher huts: watching the weaving and dyeing of rugs in that first co-operative unit, the family: learning how houses are built co-operatively, how miners and fishermen organize study clubs and learn to plant gardens. . . . Like G. K. Chesterton and Vincent McNabb, Dr. Ward is concerned with first principles, as those who have read his earlier books know ("Values and Reality", "God in an Irish Kitchen", "Holding Up the Hills"). In this new book he has done a unique piece of reporting on one of the most significant social developments of our time. Illustrated with maps, $2.50

SHEED & WARD • 63 5th Ave., N. Y. C.

Coming November 1

A New Edition of

COOPERATIVES
IN AMERICABy ELLIS COWLINGCompletely revised and brought up to date $2.00

Place Your Order Now!

COWARD-McCANN, Inc. • 2 W. 45 St., N. Y.The Island Press Stands forDEMOCRACY IN BOOKS

The authors who organized the Island Workshop Press two years ago are applying the Rochdale principles of consumer cooperation to this business of literature. Like the American farmers in the Middle West who by the thousands combine to supply themselves with the tools and seeds they need to raise a crop, providing their own capital and operating their own business, these authors now are using the benefits of that knowledge and experience which creative publishers and authors have for centuries developed, in the best interest of the book consumer.

*Catalog on requestISLAND WORKSHOP PRESS CO-OP, Inc.
470 WEST 24th STREET NEW YORK CITYBOOKS ON CONSUMERS COOPERATION*THE MORALE OF DEMOCRACYHon. Jerry Voorhis
Special Cooperative Edition $.50THE STORY OF TOMPKINSVILLEStory of Cooperative Housing.
Mary Ellicott Arnold
Paper $.65; Cloth $1.00COOPERATION AND NATIONALITYGeorge W. Russell (AE)
Special Cooperative Edition $.25*Pamphlets on Consumers Cooperation*
(These Five Pamphlets for 50 Cents)COOPERATION: THE DOMINANT ECONOMIC IDEA OF THE FUTURE

Vice President Henry A. Wallace $.10

SHORT INTRODUCTION TO CONSUMERS COOPERATION

Ellis Cowling $.15

A TOUR OF NOVA SCOTIA

The Story of Pioneering Cooperatives $.20

HERE IS TOMORROW (Cooperatives in America)
Illustrated. Wallace J. Campbell $.10THE STORY OF TOAD LANE

Stuart Chase $.03

THE COOPERATIVE LEAGUE OF THE U. S. A.
167 West 12th Street New York City, N. Y.CONSUMER COOPERATIVE LEADERSHIPBy Edward A. Filene
Good Will Fund

Answers the questions the American consumers are asking on how they can cooperate for the establishment of an economy of plenty for all.

Consumer Cooperative Leadership was compiled with the assistance of the leaders of the cooperative movement. It is packed with information, facts, illustrations, which will aid in the developing of sounder cooperatives. Its chapters on the responsibilities of the board of directors and of committees and their relation to the manager, personnel and membership are particularly useful. As the Manager's Manual is to the manager, Consumer Cooperative Leadership is to the membership.

$1.25 (plus postage)

MANAGER'S MANUAL FOR CONSUMER COOPERATIVE
FOOD STORESBy Consumer Distribution Corporation

Is one of the most valuable contributions to the co-operative movement. It contains a wealth of information for managers, clerks, directors, and members of Co-op Stores.

It tells in fundamental terms the policies and methods which will build a successful CO-OP. Every member who wants to know how his store can be run most efficiently should read The Manager's Manual.

$1.25

NEXT STEPS FORWARD
IN RETAILINGBy Edward A. FileneWith the Collaboration of Werner K. Gabler and Percy S. Brown

Mr. Filene's book gives the public a far-sighted view to the future of retail selling with chapters on large-scale cooperative merchandizing.

"Aside from its discussion of underlying trends, the book contains a wealth of information of value to smaller stores in helping them to do a better merchandizing job."—New York Times.

$1.00

*Order fromThe Cooperative League of the U. S. A.
167 West 12th St. New York City raised such a furor at this new betrayal of China that the proposal was dropped. On policy toward Fascist Spain the book is silent. Concerning Vichy France it dwells on the "personal honor" of the Vichymen, on the touching friendship between Pétain and Leahy, and on the success of Washington in keeping the fleet and the colonies out of Axis hands through "an inexpensive form of insurance." Only Churchill's veto, incidentally, seems to have prevented Hull from insisting on Free French evacuation of St. Pierre and Miquelon. A pro-De Gaulle policy would have been "doctrinaire," "heroic," but "less useful." All appeasement was brilliantly successful and therefore justified.

Leaving aside the moral imponderables, which may well be decisive in this kind of war, and considering only the criteria of an amoral Realpolitik, there is but one flaw in the case: time is the ally only of those who know how to use it. The time bought by appeasing Japan was not used by London and Washington to strengthen China or buttress effectively their own defenses in the Pacific but was used by Tokyo to grab Indo-China and prepare the way for the conquest of all eastern Asia. The time gained in appeasing Franco has been used by the Axis to spread its gospel throughout Spain and Latin America. The time won in appeasing Vichy has been used by its beneficiaries to strengthen the Reich and Japan, to attempt the delivery of Syria and Madagascar to the foe, to support Rommel, and to prepare for worse to come. The time now won in appeasing Mannerheim will be used to prepare the complete severance of the Murmansk supply line. So long as the enemy is constantly enabled by grants of time to enhance his power for future attack and to weaken our power for either attack or defense, the purchase of time by the payment of successive instalments of decency, honor, and self-respect, to the delight of all foes and the despair of all friends, remains today what it has been for a decade—a formula for defeat.

The case, in short, is not good enough. It was not enough for the President to explain before Pearl Harbor that the policy of appeasing Japan had "worked for two years." It will not be enough, when Vichy and Madrid join the Axis in open war against us, to explain that the policy of appeasing them "worked" for a time in allegedly delaying their entry into the struggle. It is not enough to say that the Administration had no alternative. Only the gullible will accept such explanations. All others will know that it has been precisely because of the pursuit of such policies by London and Washington year after year that the forces of fascism have been able to conquer most of Europe and Asia and are still today winning the war, with large reserves of "appeased" allies to call upon if the tide of battle begins to turn against them.

Messrs. Davis and Lindley, and the officials for whom they speak, understand Washington. They do not understand Hitler and Hirohito. Despite years of observation, they still do not comprehend the technique whereby the fascist Caesars, with their dupes and stooges in all the puppet states, win victory after victory with the unwitting aid of their enemies. They do not see that appeasement, far from being an answer to this technique, is the sina qua non of the technique itself. To this record of tragedy the words of Jeremiah still apply: "A shocking and horrid thing has been committed in the land; the prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests administer to them, and my people love to have it so. But what will you do in the end thereof?"

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

Refinements on a Journal

WINTER OF ARTIFICE. By Anaïs Nin. Copper Engravings by Ian Hugo. New York: Gotham Book Mart, Distributors. $3.

THE father of Anaïs Nin was an elegant, spoiled Spanish musician and composer whom some authorities set in an artistic category above Manuel da Falla's. In her twelfth year he brought her, his wife, and his small sons to New York and deserted them. The little girl was in love or fancied herself in love with her father, possibly because she had received little understanding from him. His brutality profoundly shocked her. To help make the desolation of life endurable she began keeping a journal. She has told us that it was a monologue or dialogue dedicated to him, inspired by the superabundance of thoughts and feelings caused by the pain of his leaving. In her own words, "little by little she shut herself up within the walls of her diary. She talked to it, addressed it by name as though it were a living person, her own self, perhaps. . . . Only in her diary could she reveal her true self, her true feelings. What she really desired was to be left alone with her diary and her dreams of her father. In solitude she was happy."

The diary grew, persisted in the process of her development. It is said actually to comprise fifty-odd sections or notebooks. Fragments which have been circulated suggest that despite monotonies it belongs to literature more thoroughly than does the famous journal of Marie Bashkirtseff. Romantic posturing, narcissistic self-portraiture seem fairly absent here. One feels the effort of truth in the face of curious reticences and obscurities. The vast congeries of prose is lyrically expressive of certain feminine, in instances almost imperceptible, feelings connected with an aesthetic world mainly that of decadent Paris; expressive even more of a feminine self-consciousness strangely enamored of the very state of feeling, yet singularly perceptive of the subliminal and marvelous. The element of the irrational, germane to all lyricism, is included in the style: it is prevalently surrealist. Audaciously it exploits the connotative power of language while presenting the unseen through wild, often far-flung analogies. Still many of these analogies are remarkably exact: that, for example, which reveals the semi-conscious rhythmic unity of feeling between two intimates—almost on the musical level—through an image of orchestral sonorities; or that shadowing forth neurotic conflicts with the symbol of the high strain and hubbub of a giant New York hotel. Taste, indeed, remains in evidence throughout: plainly in the style's refusal, for all its periodic exaltation, to violate the genius of prose, the tone of speech, and fully commit oratory or prose-poetry.

Frequently in these years, we feel, the author must have entertained an impulse to improve on her lyrical diary in the way of unification and impersonality by recasting some of its material in narrative shape, with herself as the center of an epical event. As frequently, we guess, she must have had moments which revealed not only the growing difference between the imago who was the recipient of her confidences and her actual father but the former's steady tendency to sublimation. Both hunches are corroborated by "Winter of Artifice," the present little volume—sensuously so attractive with its shapely typography, good ink, softly toned paper, and the delicate line engravings by Ian Hugo. With the disposition of some of the material of the journal at a certain distance from her own center of gravity, it exhibits—awkwardly at times but altogether fluently and touchingly—two of these moments of revelation. The first was incidental to her seductive parent's long-looked-for reappearance in her life. In the course of an effective portrait of him we see Joaquin Nin take her to stay in the south of France and her conception of a temporary feeling that he is the person closest to herself. Shortly the disharmony which always had existed between their ways of living grows plain. She becomes aware that she has outgrown her need of him.

The second experience reaches us in the course of an ingenious account of a psychoanalysis. We grasp the event of the partial transference to the physician and the patient's discovery of her own poles of warmth and coldness under different feminine names. We see her new enjoyment of her own body and final disinclination or inability to dissolve her early fixation and completely accept normality in the orthodox sense. The final charmingly imaginative pages tragically reidentify the fixated being who imperiously and jealously holds her allegiance in torment and bliss, in living and keeping her journal. She calls it "the dream": it wears the look of her own individuality, in which as if it were a shell she hears the murmur of life. The suspicion that from the first Anaïs Nin was both something of an artist and a solitary, that her "beata solitudo, sola beatitudo" in keeping a journal made her more of both, is inevitable. Journals famously are a resource in solitude, a means of breathing in the desert. Fatally they also are its co-creators.

PAUL ROSENFELD

A Poet

ELEVEN POEMS ON THE SAME THEME. By Robert Penn Warren. New Directions. $1.

THIS is by far the most distinguished collection of new poems yet issued in James Laughlin's "Poet of the Month" series, and one of the most heartening utterances in poetry altogether for a long time. Warren, as is his custom, reasserts the poet's ancient sovereign right to present himself primarily as a unique individual, implying rather than insisting that he is a creature of his time. Obsession with the peculiar terror that is this century's chief contribution to history has given rise to some great poetry; but it is possible to meet one's own fears too often, however strikingly they may be clad. Warren speaks from a rich memory of his craft and an imagination able to sever itself from the clutch of time and circumstance. This freedom is not laxity: the tone and rhythm are strict, austere, and penetrating as the spirit. Throughout we hear the refrain of apprehension, potential guilt, the social break-up into uneasy atoms—but distilled, often muted, perceptible through a harmonious personal music. It is conveyed especially well in the four love poems of this collection: less dramatic but subtler, more insinuating, than Auden's on the same theme. Auden makes frustrating circumstance the protagonist; Warren, preserving the context of love, suggests the frustration by a glowing meditative tenderness.

The other seven poems are less moving, though they are equally impressive verbally. Those on general issues verge nearer rhetoric, and a reminiscence of boyhood, otherwise poignant, becomes diffuse toward the end. But all shine with the power that springs from intense emotion controlled by first-rate creative knowledge. This should assure Warren a continuing decent obscurity as long as the making of poets' reputations rests with the established arbiters of bad taste.

FRANK JONES

CONTRIBUTORS

ARTHUR MANDELBAUM, after leaving Germany, lived and worked in Geneva before coming to this country. He has written for English and American publications.

ANTONIO HUERTA, a member of the executive committee of the Spanish Socialist Party, arrived in Mexico from France on the last ship bringing Spanish refugees.

HORACE R. CAYTON, well-known Negro writer, is the labor editor of the Pittsburgh Courier.

GAETANO SALVEMINI is Lauro de Bosis lecturer on the history of Italian civilization at Harvard University and the author of "Historian and Scientist: An Essay on the Nature of History and the Social Sciences."

MARCUS DUFFIELD is a New York newspaperman.

JOHN SCOTT worked as a welder in Magnitogorsk for several years and then became Moscow correspondent of the London News-Chronicle. He is the author of "Behind the Urals: An American Worker in Russia's City of Steel."

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN, Woodrow Wilson professor of government at Williams College, is the author of "Night Over Europe: The Diplomacy of Nemesis."

FRANK JONES is teaching classics at Yale. He has contributed articles, poems, and reviews to the Partisan Review and the New Republic.

PAUL ROSENFELD, well-known critic of art and literature, was one of the editors of "The American Caravan."

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Readers' Service Division

The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

IN BRIEF

SUN IN CAPRICORN. By Hamilton Basso. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

The memory of Huey Long lingers on in an oddly dated little novel about violent politics in Louisiana. If it can happen again, and Mr. Basso must think it can or he wouldn't be writing a book about it, this isn't the novel to warn, terrify, or arm you for the future—perhaps because the bitter pill of political tyranny is too sugarcoated with Southern gentility. But it is pleasant to meet a decent liberal as the hero of a Southern novel, even though his resolution to kill Gilgo Slade, Mr. Basso's fictional Kingfish, isn't entirely convincing.

DOLLAR COTTON. By John Faulkner. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

In a novel about a self-made cotton king, Otis Town, John Faulkner runs his brother William a close second for unpleasantness. Town came to the Delta when land was 90 cents an acre; he stayed to amass, and lose, a fortune and become quite a figure in the community as well as in his author's affections. A monomaniac about cotton, he allowed himself only minor pleasures—cheating his field hands, murdering a Negro who objected to being cheated, taking the murdered man's wife. A jolly little monster, and the madness, suicide, and lynching that shortly precede his death put the last bright touches on this portrait of an American pioneer, Faulkner variety.

DRAMA

Business—but Not as Usual

DURING the past six months or so the standard cocktail-party, dinner-table question addressed to drama critics has naturally been concerned with the effect of the war on the theater. Making the very dangerous assumption that such polite queries are not merely polite, I generally reply that insufficient evidence has so far been gathered, but that out of the depths of my special knowledge and accumulated wisdom I can draw a prediction: the war will be good for business and bad for art—at least so far as the actual war years themselves are concerned. And if I really haven't yet a great deal to go on, I have at least as much as the military experts who balance probabilities about Russian resistance or the second front, and I cannot very well go much further wrong.

Take, for example, the case of the first two plays of the new season which are good enough to make a hopeful bid for success. No doubt the years of peace and plenty saw a certain number of serious plays as tepidly laudable as "Morning Star" at the Morosco Theater and a certain number of farces not more subtle or original than the moderately amusing "Janie" at the Henry Miller. But if the fact that they are the most hopeful productions so far be taken together with last year's record, there is some justification for an attempt to find a trend. Both concern themselves directly with war-time conditions; both are rather broad and obvious; both appear to find audiences rather more willing to be pleased than similar plays would have found them a few years ago. Of all this a little more a little later.

"Morning Star" is by the Anglo-Welsh actor Emlyn Williams, who was first introduced to New York as the author of the excellent theatrical thriller called "Night Must Fall" and who later revealed his more earnest side in "The Corn Is Green." It is the writer of the second, not the writer of the first, who is recognizable in the new play, but "Morning Star" is, nevertheless, not nearly so good as "The Corn Is Green." Probably the explanation is simple enough. In "The Corn Is Green" Mr. Williams was concerning himself with a group and a milieu which he knew more intimately than most people know them, and he had, accordingly, something of his own to say. In "Morning Star" he is concerned in a very general way with England's reaction to the war, about which he can neither say anything particularly original nor feel anything more poignant than most of us have already felt. It is all very well to say that a great writer ought to deal with great themes important to many men. But the greater the theme and the more generally people have felt a concern with it the more necessary it is that one who handles it should really be a great writer, and the more obvious it becomes that the mere determination to deal with great themes does not make him one. The big scene of the present play is an air raid which we have now had presented four separate times as the big scene of a war play. The main story, which, by the way, is not any too well integrated with the rest of the action, has to do with the rather obscure emotional reactions of a brilliant research physician who first resents the war's interference with his work, then tries to find a use for that work in the war, and finally becomes reconciled to the necessity of submerging himself in the general effort. Characters who are interesting chiefly because they are supposed to have just written a great book or made a stupendous scientific discovery are for some reason or other seldom very easy to believe in on the stage, and Mr. Williams's researcher is no exception. More important is the author's purely negative failure to rise either intellectually or emotionally to the occasion. He is certainly not insincere. Neither is his play, as war plays of twenty years ago sometimes were, cheap or facile. It is merely unoriginal and inadequate. The fact that most spectators will probably remember longest and with most pleasure Wendy Barrie as the congenital tart who does her dubious bit by providing solace to bureaucrats in their off hours is in part a tribute to Miss Barrie's good looks and talent. It is also, since the role is a pretty familiar one, a commentary on the failure of the play as a whole.

"Janie" has to do with the misadventures of a Junior Miss in war time. Though (of course) pure in heart, her sophisticated vocabulary and penchant for petting parties raise certain doubts in the minds of her parents. And despite the fact that her father has just written in the small-town paper of which he is proprietor a thoughtful editorial on the necessity of keeping soldiers away from high-school girls, she stages in his absence a party which gets very decidedly out of hand. Once the action is well started, the piece is rather frenetically lively and is often laughable enough if one is in no very critical mood, but though it is obviously inspired by last year's "Junior Miss" it bears, so far as atmosphere and characterization are concerned, about the same relation to that play that a comic strip does to one of Miss Benson's sketches.

The indications are that the present war, like the last one, will greatly increase the public appetite for the easier forms of amusement and provide certain sections of it with a greater than normal ability to pay for them. This, probably means not only a certain prosperity for the so-called illegitimate forms of theatrical entertainment but also, I suspect, some additions to the usually very restricted group of chronic playgoers. Perhaps, then, it is not merely imagination which leads me to suspect in "Janie," as well as in other recent plays, a deliberate broadening of methods calculated to appeal to a group probably no less intelligent than the usual Broadway audience but with considerably less theatrical sophistication. One also notes that 1942 is much more interested than 1917 was in professedly serious plays about the war. So far, however, such plays have not, for the most part, been conspicuously good ones.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

COLUMBIA issued one of the great sets of the year (509, $3.68) in July: Mozart's Symphony K. 504 ("Prague") performed by Beecham with the London Philharmonic. The work offers Mozart's powers at their height—in the long, dramatic introduction, the exuberantly brilliant first movement with its opening theme and later details that are uniquely Mozartian in their exquisitely wrought poignancy, the similarly brilliant finale, and between these two movements the wonderful Andante in which the Mozartian poignancy is exquisitely wrought at length. The performance offers Beecham's sharply, powerfully inflected Mozart style at its most effective. And the recorded sound is excellent, but with balance tipped heavily toward the bass.

One hears sharp, powerful inflection also in Schnabel's playing of Mozart; and it gives the phrases of the piano in the Concerto K. 595 the contours, character, life, significance which they lack as they are rattled off smoothly by Casadesu in the performance of this superb work in Columbia's June set (490, $4.75). Moreover, even the recorded sound of the piano is lifeless, as well as gritty and rattly not only with the wide-range Brush pick-up but with the limited-range Astatic; the recorded sound of the orchestra is muffled with the Brush, brighter with the Astatic; some of the surfaces of the copy I heard were very bad with the Brush, cleaner with the Astatic; and the pitch wavered on side 4.

Also on Columbia's June list was Mussorgsky's "Within Four Walls" (71367-D, $1.05) from the "Sunless" cycle, an affecting example of Mussorgsky's subtle recitative-like style in this genre. It is sung by Robeson with vocal magnificence and impressive feeling, though without the richness of inflection of Rudinov's singing in the Gamut set of the entire cycle. Robeson sings it first in English, then in Russian; and the effect is better with the Russian words.

Another June release by Columbia offered the Overture, Nocturne, Scherzo, Wedding March, and less frequently heard Intermezzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, well performed by Rodzinski with the Cleveland Orchestra, and apparently—from the way it sounded on a limited-range machine—well recorded (Set 504, $4.73).

On Columbia's May list was the fine Prelude in C minor for organ—previously recorded with its Fugue by Schweitzer in Columbia's Set 320—well played now by Commette on a single disc (71366-D, $1.05). On the limited-range machines on which I heard it the recorded sound of the performance was brighter than that of Schweitzer's, but massive passages were unclear. And two excerpts from Gluck's "Orfeo"—the best known "Che faro senza Euridice" and the lovely "Che puro ciel"—are well sung by Risé Stevens (71365-D, $1.05).

As for September, Columbia offers Sibelius's Symphony No. 5 (Set 514, $4.73)—a work that is not without the Sibelius mannerisms and formulas and empty pretensions at profundity, but that is for the most part enjoyable. Rodzinski's performance with the Cleveland Orchestra is the best I recall hearing; and its recorded sound is very good except for a weakness in the lower range that makes kettledrums and string basses often inaudible.

Then there is Chopin's Piano Concerto Op. 11, one of his most beautiful works, which has been available in the magnificent performance by Rubinstein on Victor records, and which Columbia offers now recorded by Kilenyi with the Minneapolis Symphony under Mitropoulos (Set 515, $4.73). Kilenyi's playing is wholly without distinction and grace; and its clumsiness is made worse by faulty recording, which in addition badly distorts the sound of the orchestra.

The Theme and Variations from Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3 has some good pages, but is a lesser work of Tchaikovsky. It is brashly performed by Barbiroli with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, and brashly recorded (X-226, $2.63). The recorded sound of Reiner's performance of the concert version of "Forest Murmurs" from Wagner's "Siegfried" with the Pittsburgh Symphony (11831-D, $1.05) is better; but Reiner makes two cuts, and his treatment of the music is mannered and unsatisfying.

Mendelssohn's "On Wings of Song" and "Morning Greeting" are well sung by Lehmann (17344-D, $.79).

"Mozart's K. 400," in the first paragraph of last week's column, should have been "Mozart's K. 499."

B. H. HAGGIN

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

Americans vs. Germans: The First A. E. F. in Action. Written by American Soldiers. Penguin. 25 cents.

The American Way of Life. By Harry Elmer Barnes and Oreen Ruedi. Prentice-Hall. $.5.

Rebels and Gentlemen: Philadelphia in the Age of Franklin. By Carl and Jessica Bridenbaugh. Reynal and Hitchcock. $.35.

A Layman's Guide to Naval Strategy. By Bernard Brodie. Princeton. $.25.

We're in This with Russia. By Wallace Carroll. Houghton Mifflin. $.2.

The Army Means Business. By Herbert Corey. Bobbs-Merrill. $.275.

Fiscal Planning for Total War. By William Leonard Crum, John F. Fennelly, and Lawrence Howard Seltzer. National Bureau of Economic Research. $.3.

Virginia Woolf. By E. M. Forster. Harcourt, Brace. $.1.

So Your Husband's Gone to War. By Ethel Gorham. Doubleday, Doran. $.2.

Frontier by Air. By Alice Rogers Hager. Macmillan. $.35.

4,000 Years of Television: The Story of Seeing at a Distance. By Richard W. Hubbell. Putnam's. $.225.

Santa Fe, New Mexico. By Ernest Knee. Hastings House. $.2.

Poems of This War by Younger Poets. Edited by Patricia Ledward and Colin Strang. Cambridge University-Macmillan. $.175.

Desert Challenge: An Interpretation of Nevada. By Richard G. Lillard. Knopf. $.4

Frank Norris: A Study. By Ernest Marchand. Stanford University. $.3.

Chemical Elements. By I. Nechaev. Coward-McCann. $.25.

The Jews in Spain: Their Social, Political, and Cultural Life During the Middle Ages. By Abraham A. Neuman. Jewish Publication Society. 2 vols. $.5 set.

Sabotage! The Secret War Against America. By Michael Sayers and Albert E. Kahn. Harper. $.25.

A Treasury of Great Poems English and American. Selected and Integrated by Louis Untermeyer. Simon and Schuster. $.375.

The Right Book for the Right Child. Edited by Carleton Washburne, Miriam Snow, and Mabel Morphett. John Day. $.3.

The Death of the Moth and Other Essays. By Virginia Woolf. Harcourt, Brace. $.3.

Letters to the Editors

We Must Tighten Our Belts

Dear Sirs: It seems to me that one important segment of the population has been overlooked in the discussion of new taxes, namely, the white-collar workers and certain professional people, such as social workers, teachers, and clergymen in smaller congregations. The increase in taxes, as I understand it, is for the purpose, in part, of curbing purchasing power. Among certain groups wages have sky-rocketed. Among the first-mentioned they have been almost static.

I am a social worker, and this year my income is about 11 per cent higher than last year. Living expenses are more than 30 per cent higher; anticipated income tax almost 100 per cent more than last year. I'm going to find it terribly difficult to pay, even as a single man, and still live halfway decently. I have already reluctantly cut my contributions to charity, bought no clothes this year, curtailed my war-bond buying, and I still have to reduce my food and rent budget, which was never more than enough for comfort.

Isn't this a point worth considering? What will the white-collar and professional worker do if taxes grow heavier and heavier?

B. H. N.

Dayton, Ohio, September 16

Unity Before Freedom

Dear Sirs: I hope that you will allow me some space in your paper in connection with Louis Fischer's articles on India.

The present crisis in India has for some time been poisoning American opinion against the British. The common belief is that there is a nation of people called the Indians who are clamoring for their independence but who are forcibly kept in bondage by the British. And in the popular imagination Mr. Gandhi is a saint, a hero, and a martyr, manfully struggling against the British "oppressors." This belief is almost entirely false and absurd, and it is a falsehood which tends to have disastrous effects upon Anglo-American relations. Mr. Fischer has, I expect, no intention of confirming and bolstering such ideas, but that, I predict, will be the actual effect of his articles.

I worked for twenty years as a British civil servant in Ceylon before I became a professor in America. Let me state a few facts. There is no such thing as the "Indian nation." There are an immense number of races in India and over 200 different languages. A Tamil from South India has less in common with a Punjabi than an Englishman has with a Hungarian. Next, there has never been in all history a united, self-governing, free India. Unification has come only once or twice, and only by force of conquest—the British unification and the unification under such Moslem conquerors as the Emperor Akbar. It follows that to create now a free, independent, united India—which is Mr. Gandhi's demand—is a problem of the same order as that of creating a United States of Europe under one free government.

A common delusion in this country is to suppose that Mr. Gandhi's demands are the "demands of India." Mr. Gandhi no more represents the views of the whole Indian continent than some powerful party leader in the United States represents the views of the whole Western Hemisphere. Mr. Gandhi's party represents only the Hindus of British India.

In the light of these facts, what do the Congress Party's demands actually mean? The British are to go. Very well. But they cannot leave the country without any government at all. They must hand over power to someone. To whom? There is no governmental organization in existence to hand over to. The problem of India is the problem of creating one. And the Congress demands that it be a single government of a united India.

Someone will say: Why not leave the creation of the new government to the Indians themselves? To Mr. Gandhi and the Congress? But to let the Congress set up its government would be equivalent to forcing the 94 million Moslems, the 45 million Untouchables, the 6 million Sikhs, and the population of the 562 native states under a government which they detest and which—in the case of the Moslems at least—would probably be resisted with violence, bloodshed, and civil war.

Thus the British cannot solve the problem by capitulating to the Congress. There is only one way that a solution can be reached. This is by the various Indian parties—Hindus, Moslems, and the rest—getting together and hammering out a form of government on which they will all agree. The collapse of all negotiations so far comes not from an unwillingness of the British to hand over power but from the stiff-necked obstinacy of the Indian parties themselves, particularly the Congress, either to accept any program which the British suggest or to get together and agree on a program among themselves.

In these circumstances there is nothing that the British government can do except preserve order and wait for a more propitious time. It has been suggested that America, or President Roosevelt, should "mediate." I see no objection, though I should have little hope of anything coming of it. But if such mediation is tried, let one thing be clear. It is not mediation between the British and the Indians which is wanted—for the British have already agreed to grant any form of independence the Indians ask for, provided they agree among themselves. The mediation would have to be between the Congress on the one hand and the Moslems and other minorities on the other.

In all this, it is true, I have ignored the issue whether independence should come now or after the war. This is played up by the newspapers and by the Congress leaders themselves, but it is, in my view, a minor question. The real difficulty is to get an agreement among the Indian parties about the form of government. If this were solved, the question of the date would fade into insignificance, would probably resolve itself.

W. T. STACE

Princeton, N. J., September 15

"Only One Haggin"

Dear Sirs: B. H. Haggin's magnificent discussion of the Shostakovich "Lenin-grad Symphony" compels me to write what I have been meaning to write these many years—a fan letter. Subscribers often ask me why I do not include a music column in Common Sense, and the answer I give them is always the same: "We can't be satisfied with second best; there is only one Haggin."

SELDEN RODMAN

New York, September 10

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · OCTOBER 3, 1942

NUMBER 14, PART 1

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

281

EDITORIALS

- Prices and Politics 283
14 Months and 18 Minutes 284
The Dies "Front" 285
The Man-Power Crisis 286

ARTICLES

- Washington Thoughts on a Second Front
by I. F. Stone 287
The Return of Heinrich Fromm by Felizia Seyd 289
Mr. Petrillo's Hopeless War by Charles Williams 291
Toward Peace on the Danube by Rustem Vambery 293
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 295
In the Wind 296

POLITICAL WAR. Edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- Primer of Political War 297
European Youth Congress 298
A Free Italian Legion by Randolph Pacciardi 299
Hatched in Japan 300

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- "Sentimental Education" Today by Louise Bogan 301
India and the United Nations by George E. Taylor 302
Vanished Glories by Joseph Wood Krutch 304
The Way to Begin by Frank Kingdon 304
How China Fights by Maxwell S. Stewart 305
Drama Note by Joseph Wood Krutch 307
Records by B. H. Haggin 307

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

BERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON    MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor

HARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER
REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

WHEN WE SAW THE STATEMENT BY WENDELL Willkie demanding a second front in Europe "at the earliest moment our military leaders will approve" and adding that "perhaps some of them will need some public prodding," we were tempted into one wild moment of unreasoning optimism. "How could Willkie," we asked ourselves, "a personal envoy of the President, traveling with two representatives of the Office of War Information—how could he make so strong a statement if it didn't fit in with American policy?" We put little things together: Churchill's desire that the second-front statement issued after Molotov's visit be modified and Roosevelt's refusal; the obvious eagerness of certain American military men for early action in the west. And it was easy to argue that the President might welcome just the sort of "public prodding" Willkie's remarks, and the worldwide reaction to them, provided. They would strengthen his hand with the British and show the Russians that important Americans are ready to speak out without regard to official hesitations. And the Russians played up magnificently, putting on a show for the American visitor that has never been offered to any other emissary. Would Stalin have sent Willkie to the front and given him information withheld from everyone else if he had not believed Willkie's word carried official weight?

✱

AND NOW THESE HOPEFUL ARGUMENTS have found astonishing support in the London Times, which for the first time comes out clearly for a second front, agreeing with Willkie that continued delay will mean time lost, not gained. This is an impressive change from its previous cautious reserve. It insists upon a second front while the Russian first front still holds. It praises Russia's magnificent tenacity but brushes aside the complacent theory that the Red Army can hold without help from the west. Here again is an "unofficial" opinion which may carry official weight. And it is reinforced by the recent urgent warning issued by the British Broadcasting Company to the French people to evacuate the coastal areas because an "offensive of the United Nations is being prepared." We can imagine with what desperate attention the Russians are studying these omens and perhaps, like ourselves, allowing themselves the luxury of hope. But all this has happened before. We must remind ourselves that signs, particularly in the political sky, are notoriously unreliable. If Stalin-grad falls and no second front appears to be in preparation, all the encouragement drawn from the words of leaders and the press will be distilled into bitterness. The Russian people will feel that they have been betrayed, and relations between Russia and the West will have been dangerously impaired.

★

IN THE ATMOSPHERE OF VICHY INTRIGUE and treachery breed like flies on a dunghill. It is not surprising therefore that Laval, who has made a career of disloyalty to his country and his colleagues, should find his subordinates plotting to supplant him. The story has come to light through the dismissal of Jacques Benoist-Mechin, one of the secretaries of state attached to the office of the Chief of Government, who appears to have been sounding out the Germans with a view to forming with Jacques Doriot and Admiral Platon a triumvirate which would take over the Vichy government. The Admiral, also a secretary of state, apparently was not personally involved in the plot, or perhaps acted as informer, since he is being retained in office. In an interview Laval has declared that his government is "very solid" and will continue its task to the end. But he must recall his own maneuvers to displace Pétain and the way in which he was protected and kept in cold storage by the Nazis until they were ready to insist on his reinstatement. And he must wonder how long it will be before history repeats itself. In order to stave off this evil day he is working hard to satisfy the inordinate German appetite for man-power. Particulars have just been released about an agreement between Vichy and the Nazi authorities for the recruiting of 150,000 French specialists in exchange for the release of 50,000 prisoners of war. Only 20,000 of these specialists have so far been rounded up, and in an effort to induce more volunteers to come forward they are being promised half their French salaries in addition to "generous remuneration" in Germany. Those who fail to respond to government appeals are threatened with mobilization under the new compulsory-service law and warned that this will mean far less favorable conditions.

★

THE BLUNT AND UNQUALIFIED ASSERTION of Ralph A. Bard, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, that "we are still losing the war . . . and we should damn well understand it" has struck home as few statements have done since the outbreak of the war. Most Americans know in their hearts that Mr. Bard is dead right. We have been at war nearly ten months. During that time we have undertaken just one offensive action, the recapture of the southern Solomons. The United Nations have lost the Philippines, Wake, Guam, Singapore, the East Indies, Burma, Kiska, Tobruk, the Crimea, and nearly the whole of the North Caucasus, and are in imminent danger of losing the Volga Valley. Perhaps, as Wavell recently declared, the military situation is nearly stabilized today, but stabilization of present conditions means defeat. The situation on the home front, as Mr. Bard points out, is fully as alarming as on the battlefield. The ten months since Pearl Harbor have not even produced adequate tax legislation: the bill now before the Senate will bring in only about one-third of the revenue needed to prevent inflation. Congress has consistently dodged its responsibility on anti-inflation legislation, the drafting of eighteen- and nineteen-year-old boys, general man-power policy, and many other matters of urgent importance in the war effort. About all that we have to cheer about are the heroic exploits of the Russians and the Chinese, and we have done very little to help either of these courageous peoples.

★

THE SILVER BLOC HAS FOR SO LONG HAD its snout comfortably inside the Treasury fence that it is genuinely shocked to find a conflicting interest trying to haul it out by the tail. This situation has arisen because the whole supply of foreign silver, now priced at 45 cents per ounce against the legal floor on domestic silver of 71.11 cents, is being diverted to essential war industries. Jewelers and silverware manufacturers have thus been left in the cold just at the moment when rising incomes have led to a new demand for their products. Senator Green of Rhode Island, a silver-manufacturing center, has therefore introduced a bill to permit the sale of Treasury "free silver"—that is, metal which has not been monetized—at current market prices or the price at which it was purchased, whichever is the higher. The sternest opposition to this proposal is promised by the Western silver interests, whose chief spokesman, Senator McCarran of Nevada, has been brazen enough to suggest counter-legislation raising the legal silver purchase price to $1.29, its full theoretical monetary value. The obvious effect of such a step would be to increase the profits of the mines and divert still more man-power and materials from the war effort. At the same time we see no particular reason to encourage the manufacture of jewelry and other luxury goods, which must also be regarded as non-essential under present circumstances. We believe, therefore, that Representative Celler of New York, who has introduced a bill for outright repeal of the Silver Purchase Act, is nearer a solution of the problem than Senator Green. If this could be achieved, the Treasury would be freed from its obligation to buy domestic silver and would be enabled to release its hoards, which are probably large enough to fill all the needs of the war industries.

THE INFANT MORTALITY RATE AMONG serious journals is enormous, and for a new magazine to survive a year is not only an accomplishment in itself but a promise of longevity. Free World, which published its first issue just a year ago, has already established itself as an outstanding American exponent of the democratic cause. The journal, together with the Free World Association, has won the adherence of a notable group of American and foreign experts and leaders, many of whom contribute greetings to Free World's first anniversary issue. The Nation, which had the privilege of supporting the idea of the new journal even before it appeared, is happy to add its congratulations to the rest. Free World embodies the hopes and ideals for which The Nation has always fought; when we wish it long life and success, we are really expressing our desire for a democratic victory and a people's peace. The anniversary number carries among other outstanding articles a discussion of the technical aspects of the second front by Tom Wintringham.

✕

OBSERVERS WHO NOTED THE FURROWED brow of Henry L. Stimson last Thursday night have concluded that the Secretary of War was jittery over the precarious position of Stalingrad. But the Secretary had a tougher nut to crack. He had promised to decide in forty-eight hours whether or not to permit Sergeant Joe Louis and Corporal Billy Conn to fight a title bout at the Yankee Stadium. The decision called for more than snap judgment. Permission had already been granted once, with the understanding that all receipts were to go to the Army Emergency Relief Fund. But Louis, it turned out, had, after the fashion of fighters and authors, drawn heavily on promoter Mike Jacobs against future profits. So had Conn. Louis also owed his manager, John Roxborough, some $40,000 and back income taxes amounting to $117,000. Having already turned over the proceeds of two of his title bouts to army and navy relief, Louis not unreasonably wanted some of the forthcoming receipts to apply against his indebtedness. Whether or not he specifically made the request, officials at Fort Riley promised him just that arrangement. Moreover, War Boxing, Inc., a group of sports writers picked to run the fight, voted after a row to award the fighters at least the amount of their indebtedness to Jacobs and Roxborough, who, incidentally, hadn't asked for anything. Thereupon hell broke loose. Representative O'Toole of New York threatened a Congressional investigation, and Stimson, seeing the handiwork of his subordinates, announced he was shocked. The moral appears to be that a matter of such weight should never have been intrusted to generals and colonels. The Secretary should have seen it through from the weighing in to the final count. Or perhaps the President himself should have taken over.

Prices and Politics

THE danger of price inflation as an ever-growing segment of our economy was converted to war production was thoroughly recognized more than a year ago. In the fall of 1941 a bill was introduced in Congress giving the Administration power to control prices, but its passage was delayed while the farm bloc battled to secure specially favorable treatment. As a result, when the bill was finally presented to the President, it included a complicated formula which in effect prohibited the setting of ceilings on farm prices at below the level of 110 per cent of parity.

Mr. Roosevelt signed the bill, although not without many misgivings, and shortly afterward the general maximum-price order was put into effect. This action proved very effective in the case of commodities which it was able to bring under control, but owing to the wide margin that still remained for the upward readjustment of most farm prices, it failed to prevent a slow but steady increase in the cost of living. Throughout the summer the President was urged from all quarters to take new measures. Then on Labor Day he sent a message to Congress asking for a revision of the Price Control Act providing him with authority to stabilize farm prices at not less than 100 per cent of parity and warning that, in default of legislative action by October 1, he would have to tackle the problem under his general war powers.

There is no reason why Congress should have rubber-stamped the President's proposals; if it could have concocted a better formula for checking the drift to inflation its proposals would have been warmly welcomed by the public. But what it had no right to do was to yield to the pressure of special interests and put forward a bill which, purporting to stabilize prices, positively encouraged inflation. This is exactly the effect—indeed, it is hard not to say the intention—of the amendment approved in the House by a vote of 205 to 172. For while ostensibly adhering to the President's 100-per-cent-of-parity formula, the amendment orders a recalculation of parity so as to include not merely the wages paid to hired farm labor but the theoretical wages paid to the farmer's family and his computed managerial compensation. The result would be an effective increase in the present parity level to 112 per cent and an increase in the national food bill, according to OPA estimates, of from $3 billion to $3½ billion annually. Nor would this be the end, for such an increase in the cost of living would require widespread wage increases and thus automatically bring about a further rise in parity prices.

In the Senate the farm bloc was all ready to push through the same amendment, but the majority leadership beat a tactical retreat and secured a postponement of the vote. At the time of writing it appears likely, thanks largely to a very courageous speech by Senator Prentice M. Brown of Michigan warning against the dangers of a head-on collision between the President and Congress, that a compromise will be adopted giving the Price Administrator authority to adjust ceilings to allow for increased farm wages. If the voice of that forgotten man, the ordinary consumer, can be raised loudly enough to reach Capitol Hill, the House may also be induced to reverse itself.

But although the situation looks less dangerous than it seemed a few days ago, it is still worth while to consider the forces which have been egging on Congress to flout the national will. The ingenious formula for the recalculation of parity is generally recognized as the work of the "Big Four" farm organizations, which mobilized their Washington lobby a few days after Mr. Roosevelt sent his message to Congress. Foremost of these organizations is the American Farm Bureau Federation headed by Edward A. O'Neal. Allied with it are the National Grange, the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives, and the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation. By and large they represent and are controlled by the bigger farmers and Southern plantation owners. Once they were willing to play ball with the Administration, but they have bitterly resented the Department of Agriculture's efforts to help the small farmer through the Farm Security Administration.

In their present fight these organizations have received help from an unexpected quarter—the United States Chamber of Commerce, whose president, Eric A. Johnston, told PM that it had passed a resolution approving the inclusion of labor costs in reckoning parity. Mr. Johnston is said, also, to have taken part in the policy meetings of the farm lobby. The Chamber of Commerce is a business men's organization, and hitherto no business spokesman has, publicly at least, attacked the general principle of price control. Why, then, should the Chamber back a measure which must hamstring price control and promote inflation? Is it pushing the farmers forward because it dare not openly attack the OPA? Or is its motive to harass the Administration by inflaming relations between the farmers and the New Deal and between the farmers and labor?

This curious tie-up, together with the fact that the supporters of the House amendment included a number of non-farm Representatives distinguished chiefly for their bitter enmity toward the President, suggests that the Congressional "revolt" has been inspired at least as much by politics as by a desire to grab for agriculture a larger share of the diminishing national cake. And the fact that it has achieved some measure of success indicates a criminal lack of responsibility on the part of many members of Congress which we trust will be duly punished on November 3.

14 Months and 18 Minutes

IN EIGHTEEN minutes Secretaries Morgenthau and Ickes have finally cleared a letter of intent on an aviation-gas plant for the Soviet Union. Russian efforts to obtain facilities of this kind, as I. F. Stone revealed in last week's Nation, had been stalled for fourteen months. Publication of the facts seems to have had an effect. It is shocking to learn that after all these months orders have only now been given for the engineering and architectural blueprints required and that something—perhaps continued haggling over patent royalties—is still holding up Russian efforts to buy two second-hand Texas refineries for shipment to the Soviet Union. The deal for these plants, long shut down, has been hanging fire for many months and is still in the vague "any-day-now" stage. This run-around given the Russians has become a major Washington scandal, and we hope the subterranean anti-Soviet and monopolistic influences responsible will be cleaned out of the government as a result. Drew Pearson, William L. Shirer, and Walter Winchell have given the story publicity over the air, and the charges have been taken up by PM. In a follow-up article for that newspaper, Mr. Stone has added new and sensational details.

The most shocking of these disclose the part played by officials in the WPB, the Petroleum Coordinator's Office, the Navy Department, and the State Department in ignoring the orders issued by the President. On July 25, 1941, and again on August 18, 1941, Mr. Roosevelt issued detailed instructions to his subordinates specifying exactly what facilities the Russians wanted and ordering immediate action on these requests. By November subordinate officials had succeeded in shelving the whole program and substituting one calling for second-hand rather than new refining equipment. Even the contracts for these have yet to be completed as we go to press, though fourteen months have passed since the President's original directives were issued.

To the list of obstructionists given in last week's Nation, Mr. Stone has added the names of Dean Acheson and Charles Bunn in the State Department; of Ernest W. Reid, the Mellon Institute dollar-a-year man who is chief of the chemicals branch in WPB; of Alex I. Henderson, a lawyer formerly with Cravath, de Gersdorff, Swaine, and Wood who is head of the materials division in WPB; and of Ralph K. Davies and Wright W. Gary in the Petroleum Coordinator's Office. Davies, formerly with Standard Oil of California, is Deputy Coordinator; Gary, formerly of the M. W. Kellogg Company, was until a few weeks ago director of refining in that office. Mr. Stone also charged that E. J. Sadler of Standard Oil of New Jersey succeeded in convincing Admirals Stark, Reeves, and Stuart that it was unwise to grant the Russian requests. Those who favored the Russians, at least until the barrage of technical objections grew too heavy, were Harry L. Hopkins, Lease-Lend Administrator Edward N. Stettinius, Jr. (who seems to have crumpled most easily), Donald M. Nelson, and William L. Batt. Earl Petty, the oil expert who accompanied the Harriman mission to Russia, and John N. Hazard, in charge of Russian aid at Lend-Lease, deserve commendation for their efforts to help our Soviet ally.

Some of the men who opposed action to grant the Russian requests did so, no doubt, from the best of motives. There were honest differences of opinion as to whether we could spare certain oil facilities, though these objections take on a sardonic grimness in view of all the Russians have managed to spare in lives and wealth in the war against our common enemy. "The shocking thing," as Mr. Stone said in PM, "is that these subordinate officials took it upon themselves to substitute their judgment for the President's."

Behind these questions of supply and the technical points raised were considerations of a frankly commercial character. They were expressed by Reid and Henderson at the WPB, by Thornburg at the State Department, and by the Standard Oil official who won the backing of the three admirals. These considerations almost certainly played a major part in the curious reluctance and lack of interest shown by the oil men who dominate the Petroleum Coordinator's Office. Thornburg, a former executive of a company jointly owned by Standard of California and the Texas Company, expressed the suspicion that the Russians were only using the war as an excuse to obtain the precious secrets of the oil companies. (Most of them were long ago made available, through the Standard-I. G. Farben cartel, to Germany, Italy, and Japan.) Reid said frankly that the chemical branch of the WPB opposed the giving of such processes to either the British or the Russians because they would use them to compete with us after the war.

We think this whole affair calls for a complete and thorough investigation by a Senate committee and for the discharge of some at least of the officials concerned. We think Loy Henderson should be recalled from Moscow. We believe that Thornburg should be replaced by an independent man as international oil adviser to the State Department. Reid and Alex Henderson have demonstrated their incapacity at the WPB in many domestic matters, as well as in this affair. Berle has sufficiently shown his anti-Soviet animus to be kept out of negotiations affecting the U. S. S. R. A house-cleaning by Secretary Ickes has been long overdue in the Petroleum Coordinator's Office. A shake-up would show the Russians that forces genuinely friendly to them are dominant in the Administration.

Aside from this punitive action, we think it time a

United Nations joint committee was formed with full power to commandeer and exchange all technical and scientific information. The first job of such a committee should be to give the Russians any and all processes they need as the Axis cuts one supply line after another.

The Dies "Front"

MARTIN DIES must have seen advance notices of The Nation's supplement on Martin Dies, inclosed in this week's issue, for he has just announced, again, that he is about to expose the Nazi "front" groups in this country. It should be easy, in one way, for him to deliver the long-delayed goods, since he himself has been associated with some of the outstanding organizations and individuals which belong in the category of Nazi or at least pro-Nazi fronts. It would be hard, in another way, because his most ardent admirers and supporters have included George Sylvester Viereck, Fritz Kuhn, William Dudley Pelley (since summarily removed by FBI indictments), Gerald L. K. Smith, George Deatherage, and Father Coughlin. There is, however, one new element in Dies's most recent repetition of his old promise to expose fascism. He offers in advance an extenuation for membership in Nazi "front" organizations that he has never allowed in his exposures of Communist "fronts"—and to him the whole New Deal is such a front. Mr. Dies says that "many members of these organizations are neither Nazis nor Nazi sympathizers but have been duped into joining because some of the ostensible principles of the organizations appealed to them." Many of the groups, he goes on, protesting too much, were formed for "ostensibly laudable purposes and to accomplish so-called patriotic objectives."

Frankly we don't believe Dies can or will tell us anything new about fascist fronts, and The Nation supplement explains why. There is nothing in his record as a seeker of publicity to show that he would hesitate to denounce his friends or former friends and platform mates if that seemed the only way of continuing his career. What the record of his point of view, his associates, and his activities does show is that Dies is so close to being a fascist himself that he is incapable of recognizing a William Dudley Pelley as a menace until the FBI labels him one by putting him in jail. To Dies, the believer in white supremacy, the hater of labor and aliens, the enemy of the New Deal, Pelley's purposes probably seemed laudable and his aims patriotic.

It is all too characteristic that Dies's vague new promise to expose the Nazi fronts came two days after another of his specific attacks, complete with names, on nineteen government employees who, he says, are subversive. As usual his evidence consists of his assertion that they are members of groups under the control of the Communist Party. One at least of those named is no longer a government employee. Many of the others are known to be strongly anti-Communist. Some of them, to judge by Dies's previous performances, are probably guilty of no more than being on a mailing list; it is just possible that a few were "duped into joining because some of the ostensible principles of the organizations appealed to them." To Dies all are guilty—and stand publicly branded—until they are proved innocent, though he carefully explains that members of Nazi "fronts" must be considered innocent until they are proved guilty.

How much longer is the Congress of the United States going to finance the political maneuvers of a man who is pro-fascist in the deepest and most dangerous sense of the word?

The Man-Power Crisis

THE long-anticipated crisis in man-power is at hand. Secretary Wickard has warned the House Agriculture Committee that the United States faces a serious food shortage unless prompt action is taken to solve the critical farm-labor problem. Paul V. McNutt, chairman of the War Manpower Commission, has declared that a general labor shortage already exists in thirty-five of the country's war-production centers. The Selective Service quotas during the past few months have been much higher than was anticipated six months ago, and may continue to rise. Employment during July, after making allowances for the armed services, totaled 57,200,000. This was 3,600,000 higher than the figure for July, 1941, and nearly 10,000,000 higher than July, 1940. And in many war industries production is just beginning to get under way. In the automotive industry, for example, the July employment of 824,000 was only 59 per cent of the expected total of 1,400,000. Shipbuilding and airplane production—as evidenced by the recent labor demands of the H. J. Kaiser organization—are still expanding rapidly. It is probable that the demand for man-power for war purposes will expand by another four million before the early months of 1943.

If this demand is to be filled so that our war-production program can continue without interruption, at least four things must be done. First, steps must be taken to use our existing supply of man-power more efficiently. Much of the demand for labor today is concentrated in a few centers, while the supply is scattered over the whole country. Some employers are "hoarding" skilled workers that are badly needed elsewhere. Despite restrictions, "pirating" of skilled labor continues. Where there is no pirating, labor turnover is often high because of the lack of housing. Faulty schedules of production and the irregular flow of materials often cause layoffs and undermine morale. Finally, the man-power shortage is aggravated by illegal discrimination against Negroes and other minority groups. The War Manpower Commission has attempted to remedy many of these maladjustments—its most drastic action being the "freezing" of workers in the lumber and metal industries of the West. But, despite its efforts, most of the difficulties remain.

Second, a clear policy is needed on the draft deferment of essential men in war production. Although measures have been taken to prevent the voluntary enlistment of men in classes 2-a, 2-b, and 3-b, we have as yet nothing approaching a national policy for protecting vital industries and agriculture against unwarranted losses. Nor have we an over-all policy balancing the total man-power demands of the army and navy against the crucial requirements of the war industries, which must supply not only our own demands for munitions but those of the other United Nations.

In the third place, a good deal more preparation must be made for the employment of women. Margaret Hickey, chairman of the newly formed Women's Policy Commission, recently asserted that five million women not now employed must be recruited and placed in war industries before the end of 1943. So far most of the newly employed women have been either single or without young children. But if five million additional women are to be drawn into employment in the next year, many young married women with children will have to be included. This will require the establishment of thousands of day nurseries, arrangements for part-time work, and special provisions for the care of school-age children during working hours. Little has been done in this direction.

All these steps are necessary whether we use compulsion or continue to give workers full freedom in selecting jobs. At the same time it is clear that to solve the man-power problem a fourth step must be taken—conscription. The pressure of war needs makes it increasingly difficult for the individual to decide for himself where he can make the maximum contribution, but unfortunately no machinery exists at present for deciding this for him. Local Selective Service boards do not have the information which would enable them to place registrants in civilian jobs. The United States Employment Service has the technical background for the task but has not the power or the necessary staff. Congress has delayed setting up the machinery for a labor draft on the plea that immediate needs could be met without compulsion. This has doubtless been true so far. But the remaining months of 1942 are bound to see a serious aggravation of the problem, and this period will be all too short for the organization of an adequate system of labor selection. Further delay will imperil the entire war effort.

Capital Thoughts on a Second Front

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, September 26

THERE are only three persons in Washington who can speak with authority on the question of the second front—the President, General Marshall, and Harry Hopkins. None of the three is in a chatty mood. At the other end of the scale there is a wide variety of "confidential information" of the kind that enlivens the capital's better dinner parties. Even the actual date—several of them—when the second front is to be opened is available. Six weeks ago persons "in the know" had a date in September; gossip has now postponed the second front until the spring.

In between the three who really know and those who merely talk is an area in which a more reliable brand of information is obtainable. There are persons whose jobs enable them to catch the rumblings of the mighty at first or second hand. There are members of Congress whose committee assignments keep them in touch with the main direction of military and diplomatic thinking. There are reporters who specialize in covering a single government department, and who are sometimes willing to pass on what they themselves, for one reason or another, cannot write. In this area, too, talkativeness is in inverse ratio to authoritativeness.

By interviewing a good many people of this kind one can obtain a few scraps of information that have some value. One can also obtain a cross-section of opinion on the second front within official circles. This is useful because it enables one to understand more clearly the men who must make the actual decisions about the second front and the subconscious motivations which flicker dimly behind their elaborate arguments.

The most interesting bit of fact I have picked up, and I think my source reliable, is that the Canadians have spoken up vigorously for an early second front at official military discussions of the problem here. This may help to explain why Dieppe was so predominantly a Canadian affair. It looks as though the British said, "Well, if you're so anxious for a second front, go and try one." On Dieppe itself opinion is divided. Some point to the terrific ratio of losses as an argument for delaying a second front. Others feel that the casualties suffered by the first wave of an invasion must necessarily be high, and that the losses prove only that a large-scale foray is much too costly to be staged at all unless it is fully intended to establish a beachhead and follow it up immediately.

The weirdest notion I picked up came from an important elected official whose work necessitates constant contact with the military. He himself is a man of superior insight, with a courageous and progressive record. He would talk only in general terms, and much of what he said is incorporated in other sections of this letter. One statement he made left me a little breathless. It was an argument against the second front, and I gather that it reflected what he had been told by military men and that he himself did not know whether to be impressed by the argument or to laugh at it. "We've got to keep ourselves in readiness to strike with full force," he said, "wherever the Axis weakens. Suppose, for example, the Dutch were suddenly to rise against their oppressors, and we did not have sufficient military force to support them." If we intend to wait for the Dutch or some other conquered people to take the initiative, we may have to wait a long time.

This chance remark may be unimportant as a clue to official policy, but it is revelatory of mental attitudes. Though both Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill are men of great vitality who have shown capacity for daring and imagination, they seem to be surrounded by too many men who suffer from spiritual arterio-sclerosis. Behind Anglo-American policy in recent years there has been a constant tendency to play a waiting game, and this out of inertia rather than restraint. Military and diplomatic leaders in too many cases have been men who feared risk, hoped for miracles, were content to wait for something to turn up.

This is not Mr. Roosevelt's temperament nor is it Mr. Churchill's, but the latter is haunted still by Gallipoli and the former dare not interfere too much with his military advisers. Some persons close to the President feel that he has already gone farther than any predecessor in overruling the generals and the admirals. These persons say this in approval, but they also feel that there is a limit beyond which he cannot go unless he is to shake up whole strata of personnel and not merely override specific decisions.

The President's military and naval advisers may be right in saying that no second front can be opened now. No civilian official of any importance has the temerity publicly to contradict them. The opinion of these military and naval advisers is none the less being evaluated in the light of more general considerations, and in that light their judgment does not inspire too much confidence. The first of these considerations is that this same military-naval leadership in both Britain and America has yet to show any capacity for bold thinking or acting; had it done so, more reliance could be placed on its verdict that the second front is not yet possible. The second is a growing distrust of the established official experts in every field, industrial as well as governmental. The war has deflated one great reputation after another, exploded one solemn and authoritative judgment after another. Some civilian officials resent the tendency to place military matters in a separate and sacred category. They regard these matters as technical questions in the same way that the supply of aluminum, the best way to make synthetic rubber, or the problem of conversion is a technical question. They feel that the "experts" may be as wrong on the second front as their civilian counterparts were on industrial questions. In other fields these civilians see that the best results are being achieved, as in shipping, by fresh men and fresh ideas. They are in no mood to accept the verdict of the generals and the admirals without question.

The second front is, of course, a military problem, but it is also, in many ways, a political problem. Here is one way, as explained by one of the most intelligent observers here, a man who occupies an important position in the government. He is in favor of a second front, and no doubt that colors his reasoning, but here it is: No general or admiral wants to advise an attack that may not be successful and may be fatal to that general's or that admiral's reputation and career. There are circumstances nevertheless in which it may be necessary, for political reasons, deliberately to take a risk that is unwise from a military point of view. This official feels that both the good-will of the Russian people and the morale of the Anglo-American peoples call for a second front. It may be a gamble but sometimes the greatest gamble in a war is not to gamble at all. He feels that the risk may be great but that not to take it is to resign ourselves to years of armed stalemate. Political decisions are involved here, difficult to make against the advice of the military, especially since it would be dangerous to attempt a second-front expedition under the command of persons who felt from the start that it was doomed to failure. The imponderables of will, drive and faith are an army's best regiments, but there is a half-hearted streak evident in sections of British and American leadership. This also is in part political.

It would be doing an injustice to a great many conservatives in the army and navy higher ranks and in the war-production bureaucracy to oversimplify this aspect of the second front. Yet there is some measure of accuracy in the rough observation that the strongest desire for the second front is found among the New Dealers, the least among the big-business crowd. This takes a lot of qualifying. There are a few New Dealers so tangled up in their own emotional and political differences with the Communists that they can't see straight on the war.

There are big business men like William L. Batt, W. Averell Harriman, Edward N. Stettinius, Jr., Donald M. Nelson, who sincerely want to do everything in their power to help the Russians, though I don't know how many of them are actually for a second front soon. This is also true among the Wall Streeters so conspicuous in the top civilian layers of the War and Navy departments. In a sense, almost everyone here is for the Russians, even Jesse Jones, though at the Joseph E. Davies reception last week all that Jones could think of to praise them for was that they paid their bills and loans on time.

Vague sympathy is one thing; decisive action another. There is an undercurrent of doubt and hostility which makes itself felt whenever any government agency gets down to brass tacks on a problem of aid to the Soviets. How much risk a man will take, how much sacrifice he will make, depends on how deeply he feels. The survival of the world's one socialist country is a cause most business men and conservatives are supporting, but not until our own country is hit on our own continental soil and our need for all and any allies is apparent to save our own homes will they really become accustomed to this—for them—rather odd alliance. By that time, unless we act more vigorously now, that ally may not be there or may be so reduced in strength as to be ineffective.

I came across an extreme form of reluctance to make sacrifices for the Soviet Union while working on my Russian oil story for last week's letter. Some of the oil men involved put forward the argument, "Why give the Russians our oil trade secrets, when they'll probably make a separate peace soon anyway?" This is wishful thinking of a mad variety: the same people last fall were saying, "Why give the Russians these processes, they'll soon be licked anyway?" They feel that if the Russians were out of the war, these sacrifices would be unnecessary. As the war grows less and less profitable and calls for more and more sacrifice, there will be more defeatism of this kind in some circles of big business, though in others there will be more genuine patriotism.

Another factor must be touched upon. There is a very small minority of conscious fascists here. There is a somewhat larger group which feels hampered domestically by the Russian alliance. A whole-hearted attack on the American left is impossible so long as even the Communists must be treated tactfully. The Dies gang would like to see Russia out of the war. There are others who, without going that far, are fearful of social changes arising from the war. In an emergency, when quick action and complete decision are necessary, one need only waver a little to be lost. These more or less subconscious waverings play their part here in the question of the second front, as in every other fundamental issue of the war. Only popular pressure can put an end to them. Fight for a second front.

The Return of Heinrich Fromm

BY FELIZIA SEYD

[Heinrich stumbled across my path last week. He had a message for a friend from her family in Berlin. What he told her about conditions there is rendered faithfully in what follows. Not a fact has been altered, nor the spirit in which the story was told. Names of persons and certain places in the United States are of course fictitious.—F. S.]

HE WAS born some fifty years ago in a small town near Madison, Wisconsin, where his father ran a cheese factory. The family was well-to-do, and its male members were smart, hard-driving business men with the exception of Heinrich, who was not very bright. Heinrich hung on to his family for many years until the sheer pressure of his father's and brothers' contempt drove him away. He held odd jobs all over the country, sometimes as a mechanic, for he was skilful with his hands, but most of the time as an elevator man or a night watchman or something that allowed him to think on his job. Not that he had anything particular to think about. He just liked the leisure to think.

After the depression he came to New York and lived in Yorkville, where he acquired a circle of friends, people like him who talked a lot and thought in vague terms and never acted much. His best friends were Willi, the baker, and Mr. Biedermann, who had been a reserve officer in the Kaiser's Germany and tried to organize a Stahlhelm, or veterans' group, in Yorkville. But the Stahlhelm did not take in Yorkville, and as Mr. Biedermann found the Bund slightly alien to his taste, he had given up organizing. He vented his enthusiasm in talks about the old country. He and his friends bragged about the super-race the Germans were. Hadn't they created a new industrial and military machine second to none? Everybody had jobs and everybody was getting rich under Hitler. And they bathed in the glow of this success and felt an inflated sense of their own importance, even Heinrich, who was so shy, modest, and inhibited. Yes, Heinrich began to square his shoulders and think of himself as a cross between Siegfried and Lohengrin, and all of a sudden he decided to go to Germany and get a job.

His cronies admired him for this decision, which they would like to have taken themselves. But they had jobs and families and interests here, and it couldn't be done. Heinrich, on the other hand, was footloose and had the courage to go. They were so thrilled that they collected the money for him to sail to Bremen on the Europa. That was in 1939. "Won't the family be surprised to hear of my roaming the world like this," thought Heinrich, and felt like a Viking.

Now it must be said he was fifty-five by now and no Viking at all. His gray hair was thin, his face small and lined; his shoulders were so bent that he seemed to scan the sidewalk like a stumblebum. But Heinrich felt proud and strong inside.

He arrived in Germany, was shoved through the different party agencies, and found himself with a job at Siemens, the huge industrial plant northwest of Berlin. They did not give him heavy work to do—just made him develop blueprints, and paid him eighty-five pfennigs an hour. The workers teased him for having given up the land of Armour beef and Swift bacon for so meager a compensation. But Heinrich could go without the bacon because he was a vegetarian. And didn't he get culture and equality instead? He went to the opera, the theater, and the educational films on cheap strength-through-joy tickets. He also attended the plant's social evenings, where you might happen to sit next to one of the foremen, who would talk to you like a brother. He liked the opera best, though one evening when he attended a performance at the Charlottenburg theater he was nearly killed by a beer bottle that fell from the balcony. It was that kind of crowd. He thrilled over some of the war films and thought it was fine that there were people in the world who could do such tremendous things.

For himself he was content to develop prints. He was not up to any great physical effort because rations were getting smaller from month to month. He lost weight. True, you could get a pork chop once a week, but Heinrich ate no meat on account of his delicate stomach, and he gave his meat rations to people who would give him their bread. The bread gave him indigestion. Of course there were vegetables enough, at least in summer, but they tasted of the artificial manure with which they were forced—yes, and that might be the cause of his eczema. Actually he hadn't money enough to feed himself adequately; his pay was about 115 marks a month after insurance, taxes, and so on were deducted, and there were the winter-relief contributions twice a month and other labor-front matters which cost money. Even with the little he ate he needed about twenty-five marks a week for food, which left him about fifteen marks to pay his rent with. You can't get a room for fifteen marks, so you had to cut down on your food.

However, it wasn't right to complain. All this was only temporary. At least people said so. The few burgher families that invited him to their houses, because he was ein gebildeter Mann and had traveled, were all staunch supporters of the Führer. They were making out pretty well in their businesses and occupations. They said that the war would last another three years, during which the Germans and Japs would lick the world. Then the Germans would be able to live on the fat of the land. They said that after Pearl Harbor.

But the men at the plant spoke differently. In the three years that Heinrich had worked there the crowd around him had shifted considerably. A lot of women had come in, young and old, who jabbered about food, ration points, kids, or men, while the men complained about the wage rates, the hours, and the discrimination in ration cards. If you weren't a party member you had less to eat and wear. Some 50 per cent of the workers were foreigners now, and at least 40 per cent were women. But of course the German worker had to fight in Russia and win the war. Sometimes Heinrich wondered whether they wouldn't all be dead when the war was over.

That winter after Pearl Harbor was bitter because it was so cold. Heinrich's old threadbare overcoat from America wasn't much of a protection. So he went to the relief center and applied for another one. The official there said, "Let me see your old overcoat." He looked at it, shoved it back across the counter, and said, "You keep this. It's far better than anything you can get in exchange." That was a disappointment. Another was that he could not get a new glass bowl when he broke the one he developed his prints in. You could not even buy a cup in the stores.

It was a lonely and meager life though fairly safe. Siemens was bombed once, but only one man lost his leg. The walls of the factory were a yard thick. You needed a 2,000-pound bomber to do damage here.

But there were other worries. His eczema became worse, he had dizzy spells, and his weight was down to ninety-five pounds. He had given up going to the opera because it was so dark at night. One night a man accidentally shoved him into the gutter, and he sprained his ankle.

He might have consoled himself with an affair of the heart. Many maturer men were getting married. But Heinrich had been afraid of women all his life and could not visualize himself having an affair with any of the fresh young things around him. At times he rested an admiring eye on Erika, who was a beautiful blonde of twenty-five, reputed to have a good dowry. But Erika probably aspired to an army man or storm trooper; at least she never looked at him. As for his marrying an old woman—that would make him feel twice as old.

Had he really planned to settle in Germany for good? Not that he remembered. No, he was here just for adventure. It was a grand adventure, but his father had a cheese factory in Wisconsin—though probably they would not want him there—and there were Willi and Mr. Biedermann and the Cafe Hindenburg on Eighty-sixth Street in Yorkville. Also there were butter and plenty of oranges in the stores on First Avenue. The German people mocked him when he told them about it. America was no better off than Germany. Persons over fourteen could not get any fruit whatever. They had it from the radio. He laughed and shrugged, and the more he discussed and argued the clearer he visualized his native land and its generous, informal, natural ways. After all, America had a war too, and maybe they would need him there as a carpenter or a welder, provided he could get his strength back.

He went to the Swiss legation, which handles American affairs in Germany, and was told that the American government would pay his passage back on the Drottningholm. When he told this to his fellow-workers they sat back on their haunches and gaped. The foreign workers treated him with new deference; the Germans slapped him on the back and called him lucky dog. But the women did the most extraordinary thing. They all wanted to marry him, and among them was the lovely blond Erika. She went down on her knees to beg him to take her with him to the United States. "I am so sick of this rotten life," she sobbed. He was glad he could not do anything about it. He was still afraid of women, particularly of Erika.

He had a jolly time on board the boat watching his fellow-passengers. He was too shy to form any but the most modest acquaintances. But he admired those who strutted about—young, arrogant, rich-looking. Like this fellow Bahr, for instance, who paced the ship scanning the sea with his binoculars.

When the ship landed in New York, Heinrich stayed aboard for quite awhile. Then he had six or seven weeks at Ellis Island. I think it must have been utterly exhausting to the authorities to question Heinrich, who never with the best of will could give a concise picture of anything, though he loved to talk. His friends in Yorkville had the same trouble in talking with him. They were a bit shocked by his appearance, too. He had never looked so poor, so thin, so humble and helpless.

Didn't he like Germany? Why did he come back?

Well, after all, America was his home country.

Didn't he get enough to eat?

He could have had pork chops once a week.

What about fish?

Once he went to Aschinger's, a cheap chain restaurant, and they had something that was called fish soup, but only once.

What about chicken, for instance?

Chicken? Heinrich looked vague, as if he could not remember the word.

Willi, Biedermann, and Heinrich drank beer together in the evening.

"What about the good wine and beer in Germany?" asked Biedermann, smacking his lips.

Heinrich's eyes lighted up. "Oh, yes, we had all the beer and wine we wanted—on New Year's Eve."

They gave up. They talked of other things. It was painful to talk of Germany when you had Heinrich before your eyes.

Biedermann, who owned an apartment house, gave him a job as an elevator man and lent him money so that he could buy some clothes. Heinrich had brought back one suit and had washed it himself at Ellis Island. It didn't look like much after that. Heinrich is happy with his elevator job. When he feels better he hopes to be a welder and work in some defense industry.

When there is little to do he sits on his chair in the basement and chuckles to himself. He must tell his family what a traveled man he is. He might even tell them about Erika. He could have married her, you know.

Mr. Petrillo's Hopeless War

BY CHARLES WILLIAMS

PETRILLO Obstructs War Effort," "Petrillo Perils Free Business," "Petrillo Hits at Heart of Radio"—these and other similar headlines, heavily laden with menace but also having an unwitting note of burlesque, have been appearing regularly on newspaper front pages. They reveal that James Caesar Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, has succeeded John L. Lewis, at least temporarily, as labor's chief inciter of editorial frenzy.

Petrillo, a cocky Chicago labor politician with a great disdain for public opinion, provoked these outbursts, and also a Congressional investigation, by forbidding his musicians to make recordings for radio stations and juke boxes. He forbade them on the ground that his "boys," the 138,000 members of the musicians' union, were suffering seriously from unemployment. By making recordings, he said, musicians simply were pushing themselves out of jobs. When Elmer Davis, as director of the Office of War Information, protested that lack of recorded music would cripple many small radio stations essential to our national communications system, Petrillo told him that he was "absolutely misinformed" and refused to rescind the ban. Aside from the results already mentioned, his recalcitrance has brought forth a Department of Justice charge of "wrongful and unlawful combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade and commerce in phonograph records, electrical transcriptions, and radio broadcasting."

Actually the ban on recordings, which has been in effect since August 1, was not altogether the act of a "dictator." It was sanctioned by the union's executive board and represents a desperate but probably futile effort to stave off the effects of technological advance. The country's 500,000 juke boxes and the use of "canned" music by hundreds of radio stations have destroyed employment opportunities for thousands of musicians. Many taverns and hotels which formerly employed small bands now use the juke box; it costs less and provides music by Benny Goodman instead of Joe Doakes. Of some 800 radio stations in the United States, fewer than 300 employ musicians; the rest use recordings only. "A good recording," Petrillo has estimated, "costs musicians about a million dollars in wages before it runs its course." Putting aside for the moment the question of whether a good recording is preferable on aesthetic grounds to the nondescript playing of "live" musicians, it is obvious that the A. F. of M. has a case. It becomes even more obvious when one learns that as a rule between 50 and 60 per cent of the A. F. of M.'s members are unemployed. "Justice demands," observed an advertisement inserted by the union in New York City newspapers last month, "that the musician should not be compelled to make 'canned' music for commercial industries which grow rich—while he walks the streets without a job."

Unfortunately for the musicians, the reputation of their president is such that it precludes the possibility of any sympathetic public hearing. Petrillo is a perfect justification of Pegler's conception of a labor boss. He receives $46,000 a year in addition to a generous expense account, maintains a suite at the Waldorf, rides around in a huge bullet-proof car, employs six or seven bodyguards, four of whom are relatives, and talks as if he were following a Pegler script. He is high up in the Ed Kelly machine, and fits nicely into the Chicago scene. There is a persistent rumor that he wants to be the city's next mayor. In the American Federation of Musicians his rule is thoroughly despotic. The constitution empowers him to call strikes, levy fines of as much as $5,000 on individual members, and "annul and set aside" the constitution, by-laws, and resolutions and substitute provisions of his own making. The Department of Justice once characterized his powers as "absolute and subject to no control." He uses them bluntly, though occasionally he attempts to dissemble, as when he wrote to Elmer Davis this summer that he was merely a "messenger for 138,000 musicians."

The dictatorial strain in its tough Chicago form is unmistakable in Petrillo. He attracted national attention first in December, 1939, when as head of the Chicago Federation of Musicians he unreasonably ordered "The Man Who Came to Dinner" and George White's "Scandals" to delete all reference to John L. Lewis. The National Council on Freedom from Censorship, seeing in this move an ominous new threat to our liberties, immediately wired, "Your action creates a precedent by which control of an entire production may be vested in a labor union, reflecting its self-interests and prejudices." The outcry was so great that Petrillo retreated with the surly comment that he was "going to fight John L. Lewis any way I know how." More recently, in a patriotic outburst, he ordered all union orchestras to play the national anthem at the beginning and end of each performance. "Anybody who gets tired of listening to it," he declared, "is not a good citizen." He has ordered at least one Chicago theater manager to stay out of his theater when musicians are present, and often has used his rather awesome powers as a union leader to pay off personal grudges.

For all that, Petrillo has served A. F. of M. members with a sturdy devotion. The union may not be his religion, as his friends extravagantly claim, but his feeling for it is the generous one a man has for an enterprise that has lifted him from obscurity to power and fame. He regards the A. F. of M. as his personal property, which is not far from the truth, and he works hard in its interests. During the eighteen years in which he headed the Chicago union, before taking over the larger responsibilities of national leadership, he made Chicago the best city in the world for musicians. He increased the local's membership from 4,000 to 11,000, and raised wage scales to a new high. Unlike the Luddites of the last century, who smashed machines to create employment, Petrillo, to find additional jobs for his members, simply compelled owners of machines to place them in storage. He drove sound trucks off Chicago streets and forced theater owners to employ musicians for whom they had no use. In the latter case the increased overhead costs caused a number of Chicago theaters to close, but this did not trouble Petrillo, who thinks that actors are "dopes." Using his position as a Chicago park commissioner to good advantage, he got the city to appropriate, first, $63,000, then larger sums, for summer park concerts which provided employment for several hundred of his members. In appreciation of his services the local gave him in one year, 1937, some $110,000. Petrillo, who is boastfully proud of "delivering the goods" for his boys, observed, "Hell, I don't have to steal. When I need anything, I just let my boys know and they give it to me."

As national president of the A. F. of M., a position he inherited in 1940 from Joe Weber, who had held it since 1900, Petrillo has won a dozen major battles for professional musicians. Caring little or nothing for public opinion, partly because his Chicago training induced the belief that "suckers" don't count, he threatened a strike against a national radio network to force a station in Louisville to employ six musicians, and he called one to get a slightly better contract for eleven musicians in Pittsburgh. Although newspapers throughout the country raged, he refused to permit radio broadcasts by army bands until the studios had agreed to give "stand-by" jobs to regular musicians. "They all said that they would keep on the pay rolls as many musicians as they had before," he announced at the end of the dispute; "so we said that army programs are okay." "Stand-by" employment is the battle line on which Petrillo has fought most effectively. He almost never departs from the principle that the professional musicians must be paid for all playing time, no matter who does the playing. He has refused to allow amateur musicians, any mention of whom stirs his wrath, to broadcast without a provision for stand-bys. He once demanded that the Chicago Daily News, which had arranged to have Chinese Boy Scout buglers welcome the arrival of a giant panda, employ an equal number of his members to "stand by." He has banned from the air the National Music Camp Orchestra and several other groups of talented young amateurs for the simple but highly assailable reason that "when amateur musicians occupy the air, it means less work for professionals." Petrillo steadfastly refuses to admit that his policy has a harmful effect on the development of musical talent, although it is likely that he does not especially care. His absorbing interest is not music but musicians, and he once inquired belligerently, "What's the difference between Heifetz and a tavern fiddler?"

Most A. F. of M. members share the Chicago local's affection for their boss and completely approve his vigorous insistence on stand-bys and his war against the twin evils of the amateur and the juke box. But stand-by pay is hardly a solution to the problem of technological unemployment, and it is not likely that Petrillo will succeed in abolishing either amateurs or recordings. The New York musicians' local, which is the most progressive in the country, has appealed to the public to support the musicians "right to eat." But probably the public will decide that for sound aesthetic reasons many musicians do not have that right, at least not as musicians. The chances are that it will continue to choose first-rate recordings in preference to second or third-rate "live" music. The musicians' stubborn answer is that no recordings will be available when the present supply is exhausted. But public opinion, which has been thoroughly aroused by Petrillo's bumptiousness, and, more directly, the federal anti-trust suit may force them to back down. Petrillo already has indicated that he would lift the recording prohibition if some system of royalties could be worked out for the musicians who did the recording. This, unfortunately, requires some friendly federal legislation, which at the moment seems improbable, and it would not materially change the average musician's status. It would mean a larger income for the name bands and possibly a larger union relief check for the unemployed, but it would not restore the musician to his pre-juke box position. Small-time musicians have become as obsolete as the Indian. James Caesar Petrillo, for all his confident toughness, will not be able to erase that fact.

Toward Peace on the Danube

BY RUSTEM VAMBERY

THE dire realities which contemporary statesmen have to face make an escape into wishful thinking very attractive. Wishful thinking has produced many blueprints for a post-war world federation, for a United States of Europe, and for various regional federations that might serve as stepping-stones to larger units. The misuse of sovereignty for aggressive wars on the one hand and the undisturbed internal peace of the United States during the last seventy-seven years on the other have lent the idea of federation a magic glow. The concept of a Central European, Southeast European, or Danubian federation, however, is more than a contemporary ignis fatuus. Even if we disregard the Little Entente and the Balkan Pact as regional security agreements and pass over the efforts of President Masaryk and Premier Hodza to organize a system of small nations, we must admit that a unified Danubian empire was visualized long before the First World War.

I do not refer to the Hapsburg empire. What the builders of the Austrian empire sought was not Danubian unity but compensation for the loss of the Holy Roman Empire. And in spite of the belated attempts of the late Archduke Franz Ferdinand to base the "Politik meines Hauses" on a German-Hungarian-South Slav triality, the Hapsburgs never dreamed of a federative union of sovereign nations. Voluntary federation would have been incompatible with their divine right to rule; yet it is precisely this title to power which today rallies all reactionaries in the countries that might federate in support of a Hapsburg head.

Not a Hapsburg ruler but Count Ladislav Teleki, a leader in the Hungarian struggle for independence, was the father of the conception, which was taken up by Louis Kossuth as early as 1850. This plan for a Danubian federation underwent some modifications, but as it was made public in 1862 it would have included Hungary, the Rumanian principalities, Serbia, and Croatia. A common council residing in each of the allied states in turn would have dealt with defense and foreign affairs, finance and trade, and it was understood that the minorities in each country would enjoy cultural autonomy. "In heaven's name, I beg my Slav and Rumanian brethren," Kossuth cried, "to throw a veil over the past and to rise, hand in hand, for our common freedom." In our time a plan for federation of the Danubian nations was put forward by Professor Jászi before the war. Because of the mixed population in all the possibly federated states, he advocated organization on a cantonal basis, like Switzerland's.

Since Southeastern Europe is traditionally a powder barrel, the desirability of a federation that would check the bellicosity of rival nationalities needs no argument. It is the question of possibility that has to be discussed. When Kossuth supported the plan of a Danubian federation, the historian Ladislav Szalay, exiled in Switzerland, wrote to his wife expressing his doubts whether the cultural level of the nations concerned, not excluding the Magyars, fitted them to enter such a union. Though nearly a century has passed, the question cannot be ignored today.

Obviously nations on a similar level of cultural development can federate more easily than nations of widely divergent standards. This is apparently the reason why the Swiss federation has proved successful. Perhaps two federations in Southeastern Europe might work better than one that included countries of such disparate development as Austria and Albania. Which nations should join a Danubian and which a South European federation will largely depend on the final outcome of the war, on the influence that one or the other of the United Nations attains. The core of a federation, or rather of two federations, can be found in the Polish-Czecho-Slovak declaration of November 11, 1940, and in the Yugoslav-Greek agreement of January 5, 1942. Recently the inclusion of all countries from Poland or even from the Baltic states down to Greece has been suggested. These suggestions have a fatal weakness. Their authors envisage a federation not for the benefit of its participants but against either Germany or Soviet Russia, desiring it as a kind of cordon sanitaire to keep Germany in check or to prevent the spread of communism toward the West. These purposes are equally misconceived. No counterpoise can eliminate the German menace; to try to establish one would only mean a return to the balance of power, which sooner or later results in war. And persons in Western countries who are still motivated by the Bolshevik scare underestimate both the fundamental change in Russian policy and the importance of the Russo-British-American alliance.

Whether there should be a Danubian and a Balkan federation or whether both should be components of a Southeast European Union—the term “Central European Federation” is too reminiscent of “Mitteleuropa”—is a question that cannot be answered in a political vacuum. Any federation that is real and sincere is likely to contribute to the peace of Europe; its composition will largely depend on how the European continent is reorganized when the principles of the Atlantic Charter are converted into practice.

There shall be “no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned.” Desirable as the entrance of Austria into a Danubian federation would be, it is possible that a popular vote, influenced by economic considerations, might favor Anschluss with Germany. A federation of all Danubian nations seems most reasonable, but reason alone is rarely decisive in political self-determination. The United Nations may have to use some douce violence and grant the federation economic advantages; they should not play off one small state against the other as was done after the First World War. No advantages that are granted, however, should be allowed to develop economic autarchy if the federation is to become an instrument of peace.

The first and foremost premise of either a Danubian or a Southeastern federation is the suppression of overheated nationalisms and imperialistic appetites. That kind of nationalism which, in the words of J. B. S. Haldane, is not so much love of country as love of more country deeply resents any enforced stop to aggression, but no federation is possible without unreserved renunciation of imperialist dreams based on sometimes doubtful historical rights. Instead of wishing to rule over minorities, each of the federated nations must strive to include no more outsiders than ethnic geography makes inevitable.

Recently both Dr. Hodza and Dr. Hanc have stressed the point that cooperation with the present regime in Hungary is impossible, and certainly the picture will become more hopeful when Hungarian democracy eventually gains control. There is in Hungary a nucleus of democracy formed by some peasant leaders and a group of intellectuals who, if they were given as much support as their adversaries received twenty-two years ago, could render useful work in changing the social structure and public spirit of the country.

THE OUTLOOK

Emotional and aggressive nationalism is not a monopoly of the Magyars. Rumanian Iron Guardists are no better than the Green Shirts of the Hungarian Arrow Cross, and the chauvinism of the Slovaks matches that of the Magyars. No honest agreement between the Danubian peoples can be reached unless each of them is ready to overcome the hindrances to federation in their own country. The Serbo-Croat and the Slovak-Czech antagonisms must in some way be allayed. Harmonious teamwork presupposes that none of the partners should be a nation divided against itself. National prejudices, often based on distorted history, must also be got rid of. There is no reason why Magyars and Rumanians, Serbians and Bulgars should dislike each other, but rational arguments seldom master unreasonable emotions.

Though it would be premature to make a definite suggestion about the members of a Danubian federation before we know how the great European problem, Germany, is going to be handled, it is obvious that countries which were formerly in the orbit of Austria-Hungary would more easily fit together, being familiar with each other's faults and virtues. Inasmuch as the European continent was more or less balkanized after the First World War, there is less reason to stress the ethnic, social, and cultural characteristics which would make the inclusion of one nation or the other desirable or otherwise. Not even economic considerations are decisive, for a condition of any peaceful post-war world is that it must not be composed of self-sufficient units eager to destroy each other.

A unified system of customs, currency, and communication is of course the basic requisite of a Danubian federation. A democratic form of government in all of the federated states, with allowances made for differences in political temperaments, is equally indispensable as a guaranty of personal, religious, and political freedom. No federation is conceivable without central authority. There will be need of an economic council and of an executive body directing the federation's foreign policy. Members of the council would be elected by the respective parliaments; the executive body would be composed of appointees of the governments of the federated countries. This executive body would of course be in charge of the armed forces. There are many other questions to be solved in the constitution of the Danubian federation, but all of them, including the problem of the cultural and religious autonomy of minorities, will lose much of their significance if bona fides prevails.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Co-ops on the March

CONSUMERS' Cooperation in the United States has emerged in the past few years from a somewhat sickly childhood into lusty adolescence. Today the Cooperative League, which this week is holding its thirteenth Biennial Congress at Minneapolis, is able to boast that the movement is growing faster in America than in any other country at any time.

This progress has been achieved without the benefit of much publicity. Big-town newspapers have at times played up the cooperative movement in Sweden or Finland but have seldom found its local development sufficiently newsworthy to merit a position anywhere near department-store advertising. Now, however, American co-ops have reached a stage where they can tell their story directly to the people. Beginning October 11 they are going on the air with a series of thirteen Sunday afternoon programs, which by means of a coast to coast hook-up will be heard in all parts of the country.

The scripts, I understand, are to be in dramatic form, and I have no doubt that the recent history of the movement will provide plenty of exciting material. There is, for instance, the Episode of the Kidnapped Fertilizer. Dissatisfied with the price and quality of the product supplied by local representatives of the fertilizer trust, Farm Bureau members in the Middle West agreed to go into the business for themselves. A number of them put up cash in advance to buy several carloads from a Southern manufacturer. The shipment was duly dispatched, but en route it vanished, apparently without trace. The impatient farmers then sent out an amateur sleuth, who, after much legwork, scented his quarry immobilized on an out-of-the-way siding. Some clever person—could it have been an agent of the fertilizer trust?—had chalked on the sides of the freight cars "scab fertilizer," and good trade unionists among the railroad men had managed to forget them. Once explanations were made, they eagerly sped the fertilizer on its way, and a neat scheme not merely to injure the cooperatives but to disrupt their relations with organized labor had been squelched.

There is a sequel to this story. From this beginning the Farm Bureau cooperatives in Ohio and Indiana built up a large wholesale and retail business in fertilizers compounded according to their own specifications. Then, having an assured market, they decided to establish their own source of supply. In 1940 they built five factories in which they invested nearly a million dollars. When the first was ready to open, the trust went into action, cutting the price from $30 to $26 a ton. The co-ops met the cut, and with the loyal support of their members were able to increase their volume sufficiently to cover costs by a small margin. This made possible savings of millions of dollars for all the farmers in the territory.

The fertilizer trust is no picayune adversary, but tackling Standard Oil means giant-killing on a really heroic scale. In 1929 the Consumers' Cooperative Association was organized in North Kansas City, Missouri, as a wholesaler for oil and gas co-ops. Its original capital was only $3,000, but its business grew steadily in spite of the depression, and it was able to acquire a compounding plant for lubricating oil and then grease and paint factories. Finally it decided to build its own refinery, which was opened with great éclat in May, 1940. Ten days later the new plant was compelled to close down. By switching contracts and taking advantage of the rationing provisions of the Kansas state oil code, Standard Oil of Indiana was able to cut supplies of crude to the co-op to a trickle. However, the co-op was far from licked. It started work on a pipe-line extension to connect the refinery with more wells. Simultaneously Governor Payne Ratner, who was up for reelection that year, was bombarded with letters demanding a change in the law. The whole story has not yet been made public, but the upshot was that the refinery was soon back in operation, working to capacity, and in its first year was able to report savings for its members of $250,000.

While the cooperative movement in America has been, and still is, predominantly rural, it is beginning to spread into the industrial centers, particularly in the East. Co-operative buying clubs are growing into small stores, small stores into super-markets. Too many of the urban societies, however, depend too exclusively on the support of middle-class enthusiasts, and the movement has yet to penetrate the consciousness of the workers as a whole. It is a field which might well attract the attention of the trade unions. Inhibited by the war from fighting for higher wages for their members, they might encourage them to explore the cooperative way of making a shrinking dollar stretch.

One of the primary cooperative principles is to charge current market prices except in cases where these have been distorted by monopoly, but the profits go back to the membership in the form of rebates proportionate to purchases. It has been discovered, however, that once people are thoroughly converted to the cooperative idea they lay less stress on this benefit and more on the fact that "cooperatives can be depended upon to tell the whole truth about merchandise." A cooperative can no more cheat than it can profiteer, for to do so would mean that its members were skinning themselves. Today we are facing not only inflation of prices but deflation of quality. Against this danger the cooperatives offer many safeguards, and the pioneer work which the movement has carried out in the field of grading and informative labeling should now reap its reward.

In the Wind

SENATOR ROBERT A. TAFT of Ohio, speaking on People's Platform, a radio forum sponsored by the Columbia Broadcasting Company, referred sourly to the President's ultimatum to Congress on the inflation issue and then said: "Of course, I admit that in order to fight dictators like Mr. Hitler and Mr. Stalin the President must have increased power."

DANIELLE DARRIEUX, the French actress who has become notorious as a "collaborator," was recently married to Porfirio Rubirosa, the Dominican chargé d'affaires at Vichy. One of Mlle Darrieux's attendants at the wedding was the wife of the second secretary of the American embassy.

DESPITE THE PUBLICITY which pro-Japanese gatherings in Harlem have received, an observer of several meetings reports that attendance is never more than 200 and that the same faces turn up at almost every one.

GIUSEPPE ROSSI, who before Pearl Harbor was editor of the avowedly Fascist Grido della Stirpe, has been added to the staff of the Corriere d'America, the largest Italian daily in this country. The Corriere d'America is published by Generoso Pope, a warm and open supporter of Mussolini for several years before America's entrance into the war.

WHEN KING CHRISTIAN of Denmark learned that the Germans were planning to enforce the Nürnberg laws in his country, he made a point of appearing in full-dress uniform at a special service in a Copenhagen synagogue.

CONTRIBUTORS

FELIZIA SEYD is the author of "Romantic Rebel: The Life and Times of George Sand." She is a Swiss citizen.

CHARLES WILLIAMS is the pseudonym of a New York journalist.

RUSTEM VAMBERY, formerly professor of criminology at the University of Budapest, is chairman of the American Federation of Democratic Hungarians.

RANDOLFO PACCIARDI was commander of the Garibaldi battalion in the Spanish civil war.

LOUISE BOGAN, poetry critic of the New Yorker, is the author of "Poems and New Poems."

GEORGE E. TAYLOR, head of the Far Eastern Department of the University of Washington, is the author of "America in the New Pacific."

FRANK KINGDON is president of the Union for Democratic Action.

WILLSON WHITMAN, a native of Texas, is the author of "God's Valley: People and Power Along the Tennessee River."

KENNETH G. CRAWFORD is on the Washington staff of PM.

WILL CHASAN edited the special supplement on the Dies committee which appears with this issue. He is associated with the publicity department of a national labor organization.

CHARLES VAN DEVANDER is on the Washington staff of the New York Post.

JAMES WECHSLER is with the Washington bureau of PM. He made a close study of the Dies committee when he was associated with The Nation.

Primer of Political War

IN ORDER to wage political war we need to know that it is not enough to build ten planes for every Nazi plane and four tanks for every Nazi tank. Even the combined industrial strength of the United Nations is not enough. We need first of all to be convinced that there is a political problem involved in winning this war which cannot be dealt with by generals or admirals, but only by political fighters.

Second, there must be a clear political line. Once and for all the question must be settled who in the United Nations is to have the final say: whether it is to be those who believe with Vice-President Wallace that we are in the midst of a people's revolution or those who, in this country, think in terms of the "American century" and, in Britain, of the inviolability of the empire.

Finally, somebody must be designated, and empowered, to deal with the problems of political war.

These three things go together; and it is because "our side" has attached too little importance to the strategy of political warfare that we have evolved no machinery with which to wage it effectively.

Since the outbreak of hostilities in Europe, for instance, the United States has set up a number of agencies to deal with the non-military aspects of the war. The Office of War Information, the agencies under Colonel Donovan, the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs—all these share responsibility with existing offices in the State, War, and Navy departments for various aspects of political defense and attack. Some of them are doing good work. In the case of the Office of War Information, our high estimate of Elmer Davis's ability has been justified. His clear thinking and fighting spirit have already made themselves felt in news releases, broadcasts, and movie shorts. But it would be an illusion to believe that Elmer Davis's office is in full command of the activities concerned with political war. Its sphere of action is distinctly limited, as is its power to get rid of obstacles placed in its way by other departments.

Nor is the Office of Strategic Services—which has recently annexed some highly capable people—in a position to tackle all the crucial problems which grow out of the political character of this war. As for the Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, there the very mention of the word "political" or "war" sends a shudder through "neighboring" officials. "Culture" is the sign under which they operate, and the idea of encouraging a democratic opposition in Latin America is one they prefer to skirt.

We are not talking in hypothetical terms: we can cite an all-too-concrete case. Several months ago, before the Rio conference, there arrived in the United States as official guests two important leaders of the democratic section of the Argentine Parliament. These men had reason to believe that the Argentine President, Castillo, counting on an Axis victory, intended to give more and more active aid to Hitler, and they brought with them a plan for preventing their pro-Axis government from sabotaging the entire South American war effort. It was a feasible and practical plan. They took it from office to office and were received everywhere with the greatest courtesy. But nothing happened. Their plan was not simply one of propaganda or diplomatic action; it did not fall within the sphere of the services primarily concerned with "intelligence"; and it was not a matter which the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs could handle by sending out a flock of lecturers. Since it was none of these things, but a program typical of serious political warfare, no agency had the power to act—so there was nothing for the two Argentinians to do but go back, discouraged, to Buenos Aires.

We could mention other situations that would be hard for the average American to understand. Suppose, for instance, that one of the agencies mentioned above considered it necessary to send a person or group of persons to Europe to carry out an urgent task connected with the political struggle. The first battle it would have to fight would not be with the Axis but with our own bureaucracy. It might find it more difficult to obtain a passport for its representative than to smuggle him through France or Yugoslavia. And if, finally, the State Department decided to issue the passport, it might well have become too late to carry out the assignment.

But if it is unwise to leave matters of procedure to officials who think in bureaucratic terms, it is altogether absurd to permit a department which has no understanding of political warfare to exercise veto power over actions originating in other agencies charged with specific political functions. In the field of political war no Foreign Office should have the last word. The whole tradition and mentality of the conventional diplomat stands in the way of effective action. But some agency must control the complicated machinery of political struggle. The strategy of democratic resistance and counter-attack requires central direction just as does Hitler's strategy of terror. Until now this direction has been entirely lacking. Nowhere is authority centralized. No close collaboration exists among the agencies within a single country. And no continuing collaboration among agencies of similar purpose in the United Nations is provided for.

There is only one way out of the present situation: each country should make a single office responsible for the conduct of political war and give it full powers; and the United Nations should create an Inter-Allied Council for Political War—a council similar in structure to a war cabinet, made up of five or at most seven men whose political experience, democratic record, and aggressive conception of the war are beyond question.

This Inter-Allied Council would be charged with laying out the over-all plans of political war. It would decide, for instance, whether it is still desirable in October, 1942, to maintain diplomatic relations with Vichy. It would provide an instrument of negotiation in cases like that of India. It would elaborate the strategy of support for the illegal movement in Europe. It would decide upon the advisability of tolerating the pretended neutrality of certain states.

Every national agency would in turn carry out the general directions of the Inter-Allied Council. Its acts would not be impeded by the apathy of those bureaucratic officials who do not realize that the democracies have only one year in which to counteract ten years of Nazi political war.

Some will argue that a supreme political war council would impair the sovereignty of the individual states. Of course it would. But if each of the "United" Nations insists on waging the war in its own way, the democracies are lost.

European Youth Congress

NOT more than five hours after President Roosevelt finished speaking to the Assembly of the International Students' Services in Washington, Baldur von Schirach, the Nazi Youth leader, addressed a European Youth Congress summoned to Vienna. We have before us his speech and will quote a few excerpts from it. But far more interesting than the speech itself is the fact that the congress was staged as a counter-offensive to the assembly in Washington, although, according to diplomatic sources, it had originally been planned as a celebration of the conquest of Stalingrad. This in itself shows the flexibility of Nazi technique and again demonstrates the Nazi genius for converting a military setback into a political success.

We shall omit all the ugly personal remarks made

United Nations!

"All right, you're not a member of the Communist Party of your country now. But were you ever? That's what I'm asking you."

"But suppose I was? In Germany there were thousands who joined the Communists just to fight Hitler—as you are fighting now. Would that keep me from becoming a citizen? I don't understand."

"Well, you'd better. And get this: in America, we consider Russia more of an enemy than Germany."

[Taken verbatim from a dialogue which took place a few weeks ago in a Philadelphia naturalization office.]

about the President and Mrs. Roosevelt, and even their children, and go on to the paragraphs which show the leaders of Nazi youth engaged in real political warfare.

First, von Schirach called into service that most effective of all Nazi political weapons, the project of European unity: Hitler will bring the people a United Europe; what the people of all countries so long for, the Führer will accomplish; only Great Britain and the United States, with their subservience to old imperialist and capitalist conceptions, oppose such unification. We quote:

Europe is more than a continent—Europe is a symbol of the human race. . . . Where is your Praxiteles, your Michelangelo, your Rembrandt, and your Albrecht Dürer? What audacity dares, in the name of a sterile continent, to take up the fight against mankind's eternal works of culture, born of divine inspiration and the highest perfection of mankind? . . . The war of America and its British associates is nothing less than an attempt to take possession of the incomparable wealth of Europe. We, comrades, inherit the soil of Europe; we will hold Europe. In defiance of the old British-American game of multiplying the so-called sovereign states of Europe in order to play with them more easily and to impose on them the terms of General Motors, General Electric, and the big cartels, we will have a United Europe, real, sovereign, and master of its destiny.

Next, an offensive in the social revolutionary sector: the democracies still do not dare to advance any revolutionary political and social program as their objective, but Germany has already created a new society which it offers to the youth of the world. Said von Schirach:

When the sick old man in the White House had the unfortunate idea of assembling 300 students of his country in order to send a message to the youth of the world, he could offer that youth nothing better than the old slogans of the French Revolution. Thus in his political and spiritual ideas he goes back to Europe. It does not dawn on that "world governess" that he is cabling to Europe . . . doctrines 150 years old, which are printed in our own history books. . . .

Here are assembled leaders of youth and delegates of those powers which, unlike Mr. Roosevelt and his followers, have not talked about reform but have achieved the greatest revolution in the history of the world, and are defending their achievement with their lives. . . .

The soldiers of the Axis do not need promises from their Führer. They have left their jobs to take up arms, and they know that when they return after the war their jobs will be waiting for them. Every German soldier knows that his fatherland is a social state and that the conception of a people's community which was given to our nation by the National Socialist movement is a reality, in which the millions of our youth participate.

What does Mr. Roosevelt say to the fact that in the German Reich all capable young people, regardless of inheritance, are trained and educated in the Adolf Hitler schools with public funds, and that every young person in the youth organization of the Führer has an equal chance, regardless of the wealth and position of his parents, to advance according to his abilities?

As a result of the Vienna Congress, to which delegates from every occupied or "associated" country were "invited," a European Youth Organization was created. The Nazis are making full use of the general desire for unification. Under their leadership the new organization may become a dangerous force. To fight it, the United Nations youth movement must rally its strength and purge itself of its factional politics and past mistakes.

A Free Italian Legion

BY RANDOLFO PACCIARDI

WE HAVE had much speculation on the chances of a revolt in Italy and on what can be done to stimulate it. We have heard many stories of rising discontent and acts of resistance. These should be examined coldly, so that we may plan for the future on the basis of facts rather than hopes.

The facts suggest caution. Actual information coming from Italy is scanty and contradictory. Anti-Fascist incidents have certainly occurred. There are indisputable signs that the ascendancy of the regime over the army is being challenged. The purges of the Fascist cadres have lately reached into the officers' corps, and men of the highest rank have been demoted or dismissed.

But such signs of unrest should not be given an over-optimistic interpretation. There is practically no chance of an early revolt in Italy. People should not forget that Italy is under the heel of two dictatorships, that to liberate itself it must fight not only Mussolini but Hitler too—with Hitler the tougher adversary.

Revolt in Italy will continue to smolder under the surface unless it is released by an Allied invasion of Europe. The opening of a second front would have a tremendous popular effect and would undoubtedly cause disaffection in a large section of the army. But not until Italy faces actual military defeat can a full-fledged uprising be expected. The forces of suppression are too strong. For this reason above all others anti-Fascist Italians are concentrating on the organization of a Free Italy in Exile to cooperate with the political and military forces of the United Nations.

"Youth, a free United Europe is yours!"

Drawing by Victor De Pauw

The recent conference of Free Italians at Montevideo was characteristic of Italian popular movements. The initiative and planning came entirely from below—from the masses of Italians living in South America. It was in response to their invitation that Count Sforza went to Uruguay to take part in the deliberations, to which I also was invited. The mandate of the conference was clear: to create a United Italian National Committee and organize a Free Italy Legion.

Both purposes call for some explanation. First, it is worth recalling that there are two Italys—enslaved Italy and the Italy which has emigrated. I have no exact figures on the number of Italians abroad, but when one remembers that Italy has always been a country of emigration, the official government figure of ten million cannot be very wide of the mark. The greater part of these are naturalized English, Americans, Argentinians, Brazilians; about three million are Italian citizens, one million of whom are in the United States.

Italians—even those born in the “new” country—have always been bound by strong spiritual ties to their motherland. The Fascist government has taken advantage of this fact. Active propaganda has been carried on in the United States and Latin America ever since the March on Rome—in many places with undoubted success. It is a fact that just as not all Italians in Italy are good Fascists, so not all who live in democracies are good democrats. The democracies have not been alive to the danger, and have done little in three years of war to catch up with twenty years of Fascist propaganda.

To help overcome this dangerous lead, free Italians are preparing to organize their political and military strength. If we have decided upon an Italian National Committee in place of a Government of Italy in Exile it is because we wish to avoid any appearance of artificiality. Our position is not identical with that of those national groups which had constitutionally established governments until they become a prey to the Nazi conqueror. Our National Committee will do everything in its power to help the Italian people win their liberation. But its functions cease at the frontier; Italy, when free, will choose its own government.

Count Sforza was unanimously and by acclamation chosen to head the committee. To me fell the privilege of organizing and leading an Italian Legion. More than anything else, the idea of a Free Legion can be used to inspire and arouse the Italian people, who still hold in their hearts the Garibaldi spirit and tradition.

In organizing the legion we shall make a clear distinction, particularly in the United States, between Italian nationals and Italian Americans. We shall not accept members from the second group because we recognize clearly the obligation of all citizens of Italian origin to the country of their adoption and its armed forces. But we make no similar distinction in a country like Argentina, or in any country whose government has adopted an equivocal position in regard to the war.

Numerically we have enough people to draw upon to build a large legion. But even one division would be of immense value in the political war within Italy. In Spain I commanded at the beginning a single battalion. Its mere existence was of greater value to the anti-Fascist movement in Italy than all our political work of the previous ten years. When I reached France en route to the United States I was deluged with proofs of the enthusiasm with which the Italian people had followed our fight shoulder to shoulder with the brave Spanish Loyalists.

To create an Italian Legion all that is necessary is to obtain permission of the governments of the countries in which recruiting would take place and to designate a training center. After that a legion could be organized and put on a war footing very quickly.

The necessary financial support should not be hard to find. First, in the Americas, in England, and throughout the British Empire the frozen assets of Italian individuals and firms could be put at our disposal. Second, among citizens of Italian extraction there are many wealthy men who would be proud to back the movement. Finally, the Italian Committee could quite properly ask for a loan for equipping the legion.

For many reasons we should prefer to organize the legion in the United States, but we would be willing to go to any country of the United Nations. We are ready, and have been ready for a long time. All we need is authorization to give Italian volunteers the signal they are waiting for.

Hatched in Japan

THE presence in Bangkok of Subhas Bose, Indian nationalist leader with Berlin affiliations, and the announcement by the Berlin radio that he was receiving a salute of honor from twenty thousand Indian, Burmese, and Siamese soldiers are indications (according to the London Tribune) that unless a settlement is arrived at between the British government and the Indian Congress, other forces will intervene in the gradually deteriorating situation in India. One of the plans of the Indian Independence League of Bangkok seems to be to land in India some part of the so-called Free Indian Army to support the native revolutionaries. Japanese troops will hold the British army on the frontier while the Free Indian Army acts as guerrilla units in the interior. It will be maintained that this is a war of liberation in which Japan is fighting only the British army. This move is intended by the Axis strategists to meet the objections of anti-fascists like Nehru, who do not want the Japanese army in India.

BOOKS and the ARTS

"Sentimental Education" Today

BY LOUISE BOGAN

THE most important novel to be published in English in 1941 was the first intelligent translation into English of Flaubert's "L'Education sentimentale."* This novel, first published in 1869, was written after "Salammbo" and just before the final version of "La tentation de Saint Antoine." It is now generally acknowledged to be Flaubert's masterpiece. A profound and sardonic comment on Flaubert's own generation and the France of his youth, it is in every way pertinent to the human and social dilemmas of our own day.

The novel was viciously attacked by the critics and neglected by the general public, at its appearance. Only a few friends—Banville, the Goncourts, George Sand—understood Flaubert's intentions or appreciated his success in putting them through. Sand realized that Flaubert's readers were still too close to the events described, and too involved in the Second Empire point of view, to wish to appreciate the book's ruthless analysis of social change and human motives. They recognized themselves too easily. And Sand complained that Flaubert gave no overt clue to where his sympathies lay. She wanted "an expression of blame . . . to condemn the evil. People do not understand that you wanted precisely to depict a deplorable state of society which encourages bad instincts." Flaubert had run into this sort of obtuseness in the French public and government before this. It had brought about the suit against the morals of "Madame Bovary." He was incapable of agreeing with Sand's rather sentimental moralistic demands. His idea of the relation between the individual and society was far more complicated than hers. Society warped the individual, but was it not individuals who had created, and blown up to enormous proportions, the governments which symbolized this hampering agency? Perhaps the basic evil lay deeper, in the constitution of the human heart.

Flaubert was depressed by the book's failure. He wrote in 1874 to Turgenev that he was still astonished that this work had never been understood. He finally decided that the book lacked "the falseness of perspective." "Every work of art," he said, "ought to have a point, a summit, make a pyramid . . . or better, the light should strike some point of the sphere. Now, there is nothing of that sort in life. But Art is not nature!" Here Flaubert partially understands that in this novel he has created a new genre. Critics, including Henry James, have misunderstood the book's conclusions because they were in no way dealing, here, with another "Madame Bovary": not with "realism" or "romance," but with satire of a high but hidden order.

There is no doubt that "Sentimental Education" is a difficult book to get the hang of, at a first reading. The reader must have a fair working knowledge of reaction and revolution in nineteenth-century France. To use a figure of Lowes Dickinson's, France was, throughout the century, politically in a state as though tracked by the Furies. It was a century of nervous unrest and of new and untried theory. And all theories, once applied, backfired in the most appalling way. The revolt against the Orleans line brought in the July monarchy (1830) and Louis Philippe's dead-weight bourgeois rule. Universal suffrage, granted after 1848 and thought to be the instrument to establish the kingdom of God on earth, resulted only in Louis Bonaparte, and after three years of the Second Republic, the Second Empire. Paris fought for freedom; the provinces, fighting for the still un-laid ghosts of the old regime and Napoleon, finally voted away the newly granted franchise itself. Added to the political melee was the social one. The Industrial Revolution struck France in the '30's, in the factories of Lyons. All political parties were thrown into the rise of money, and the new concept of the right to work. The resulting confusion was severe. It is precisely this confusion, and its results, mirrored in the characters of the men and women who were at once its creators and its victims, that Flaubert here describes.

The book, written under the Second Empire, covers the period from 1840 to Louis Napoleon's coup d'état of December, 1851—save for the last two chapters, which form a coda to the whole. The action, excepting a few short passages, is seen through the eyes of Frédéric Moreau, of the provincial landed middle class, newly come to Paris, as the book begins, to pass his law examinations. A new spirit is in the air. The tradition of romanticism, and of the bohemian painter, writer, and poet, is almost completely threadbare. The period of the career based on money deals of one sort or another ("Enrichissez-vous" was said to be the counsel of Louis Philippe to his subjects) had begun. Art and industry, art and journalism, stood opposed, in spite of naive efforts to reconcile their purposes. (Industrial Art is the name of the magazine run by Arnoux, the husband of the woman Frédéric comes to adore; the paper of the unprincipled Hussonet begins under the name Art and ends up entitled The Man About Town.) Stock-jobbing, loans, investments, and mortgages were the preoccupation of deputies and ministers. Borrowing a little money and making more, getting in with "influential" people, occupied the minds of law students, writers, painters, and hangers-on. The movement of opportunism elaborates and expands into a mounting frenzy. Notes fall due; debts pile up; the fate of men and women depends on the worth or worthlessness of shares. Bankruptcies, auctions, bailiffs finish the hopes of guilty and innocent alike. Underneath runs the theme of personal treachery. Friends betray one another; old men revenge themselves in their wills; women take it out on rivals by holding over them old debts and promissory notes.

The revolts of Republicans and the new Socialists against bourgeois rule form the book's secondary theme. The theorists make plans and hold to rigid formulas. Spontaneous outbreaks of the people link up with the planned action of the revolutionaries. Barricades go up; arms are requisitioned from the citizens. The crowd swarms into the Tuileries; grand pianos and clocks are flung out of windows. One of the book's great set-pieces describes the Paris street fighting in 1848. And the book closes with Paris again under arms: the dragoons, aided by the police, galloping against the citizens under the gaslight with sabers drawn—and the Second Empire has begun.

*"Sentimental Education." By Gustave Flaubert. Translated, with Introduction and Notes, by Anthony Goldsmith. Everyman's Library. B. P. Dutton and Company. 95 cents.

Sénécal, the democratic dogmatist who develops by degrees into a tyrant and member of the police, is the character which has astonished modern readers by its deadly accuracy and contemporary pertinence. "Where are the labor poets?" Sénécal asks, when shown a library. He wants, in literature, content and not form. He thinks tableaux vivants corrupting for the daughters of the proletariat. As a factory overseer, he extracts fines ruthlessly. "Democracy," he remarks, "does not mean license for the individual. It means a common level under the law, the division of labor—order!" "You've left out humanity," Frédéric answers. It is Senecal who kills Dussardier, "the good fellow," the honest believer in Socialist virtue "who attributed all the evil on earth to authority."

And Flaubert traces down "an insane desire for authority, of whatever kind if only it be authority," in all these people who have lost so many natural links to life. "France, feeling herself without a master [after '48] began to cry out in terror, like a blind man without a stick, or a child that has lost its nurse." And the reader continues to recognize these characters. There is something startlingly familiar in Houssonet, the journalist who prints gossip and slander as news, who "extols the fifth-rate and disparages the first-class minds." Arnoux, the intermediate type between bohemian and business man, infected with the failings of both—"his mind was not elevated enough to attain to art nor ordinary enough to think solely of profit, so that he was ruining himself without satisfying anyone"—is closely akin to Frédéric, who feels the resemblance. Arnoux is a gourmet and gives little dinners "with ten kinds of mustard." Deslauriers, Frédéric's friend, in the words of the Goncourts, is "with his fond envy, his intermittences of perfidy and friendship, his solicitor's temperament, a perfectly drawn type of the most widespread kind of scurvy humanity." Mlle Vatnaz, the emancipated woman, venomous, the dupe of her passions, a literary hack and go-between with a business head, is still not a complete grotesque.

Then there is the gallery of "conservative humbugs," male and female, whom Flaubert does not spare. "Bigotry of the rich rivaled the frenzy of the starving. . . . Property began to be confused with God, and attacks on it . . . almost resembled cannibalism." But Flaubert was out to show up "the bourgeois in blouses as well as the bourgeois in coats." He examines with the same detachment social theorists, the hysterics, terrorists, and fakes on the fringes of the Socialist movement, and the conservative money and power jugglers and their "distinguished" circle, ready to grease the palm of any government that came into power. The stupidity of the workers' meeting and the complicated spite of the dinner party are both analyzed. Flaubert wished to clear the reader's mind of all "accepted ideas" concerning the supposed nobility of either group. Suddenly, at the end of the book, we look back and see how each category has received its touch of clear-sightedness: these liberals who are at bottom neurotic reactionaries; these members of a new middle class who not only "have no interest in the things of the mind," who do not act according to motives of patience, pity, duty, love, or generosity, but actually do not know that such qualities exist. And has Flaubert spared from his satiric justice of treatment the supposed prototype of a lifelong love of his, Mme Arnoux? She has been thought to stand in the book as an unclouded exponent of womanly sweetness and virtue. Is she not, rather, a sort of Madame Bovary in reverse—a woman who rejects passion because she pietistically fears God's punishment, whose virtue brings her to the pass of offering herself, in age, to a man who suddenly sees the true incestuous nature of his devotion to her?

The profound psychological truth of the book's two final chapters is unequaled in modern literature. For in these two scenes Flaubert's uncanny knowledge of the pathology of modern life becomes startlingly evident. The nostalgic reminiscence of Frédéric and Deslauriers, casting back to their youthful frightened visit to the prostitute's house, reveals the continuing infantilism of these two grown-up children who have never been able to lift themselves over the threshold of maturity, who cannot learn, who can only, in spite of some native decency and generosity, repeat, and flee life's consequences. The modern split between emotion and reason stands revealed. Flaubert elsewhere remarks: "You do not possess Christianity any more. What do you possess? Railroads, factories, chemists, mathematicians. Yes, the body fares better, the flesh does not suffer so much, but the heart continues to bleed. Material questions are resolved. Are the others? . . . And as you have not filled that eternal yawning gulf which every man carries in himself, I mock at your efforts, and laugh at your miserable sciences which are not worth a straw." "Sentimental Education" is a handbook to the present because the gulf of which Flaubert speaks, after seventy years, has not been filled but only widened and deepened. The thirst for some saving authority has grown stronger, the childish bigotries more complete. Let us examine our theorists, Flaubert says, and throw out their false premises. Let us enlarge the provable human data. Have these nervous insurrections accomplished anything; are we following the "advanced notions" of a parcel of "buffoons"? Should "the government of a country be a section of the Institute, and the last section of all"?

Some partial answers lie in this novel, panoramic and profound, written in the "ivory tower" of Croisset and published one year before the inauspicious events of 1870 which ushered in the Third Republic.

India and the United Nations

INDIA WITHOUT FABLE: A 1942 SURVEY. By Kate Mitchell. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THE feeling is growing in America that the problem of India is not one for Britain and India alone but one which concerns all the United Nations. "India Without Fable" is written from this point of view in an attempt to instruct the American public about "some of the more elemental forces at work in India today." Miss Mitchell has not lived in India, does not know any Indian languages, and relies on second-hand sources. Nor is she any longer connected with the Institute of Pacific Relations, as the publisher's blurb seems to imply; she has long been interested in the Far East and during the last few years has been connected with the magazine Amerasia.

Much is to be said for a survey of India at this time which reads so easily as this one. In comparatively short space the author covers in the contemporary historical manner India's political and social institutions and problems. Except for the description of Gandhi as a reactionary figure, there is little in this survey with which the Congress Party would disagree. The distinction made between Gandhi and other leaders of Congress, the contrast between his pacifist views and what is described as the firm determination of Nehru and others to lead India in the fight against fascist aggression, is an exaggeration of the facts which arises from wishful thinking. The author, very naturally, wishes to have India in the war and free at the same time; so she gets around the difficulty of Gandhi by dissociating him from the movement he has led so long and by advising the British to deal with the real anti-fascist leaders of Congress.

In spite of a realistic insistence on the importance of the historical factor, which explains the deep bitterness of the Indians toward the British, Miss Mitchell assumes throughout her survey that a free India would fight whole-heartedly with the United Nations against the Axis. But if she is right, as I think she is, in the general line of her indictment of the British, can one so easily dismiss the parallel of Ireland and Egypt, which have in common with India the same historical factor? The record of Burma, which had more self-government than almost any other British colony, is not encouraging.

The main weakness of the book is that the problem is not put in a sufficiently broad setting. This is not a quarrel between petty politicians in London and India but a vast experiment in the liquidation of the nineteenth-century imperialism which American leaders have already buried, at least in their speeches. To free 350,000,000 people at a time when Japan and Germany have enslaved large parts of Europe and Asia is a necessary condition for winning the war, as the author points out. But no solution is to be found in an appeal to American intervention. Miss Mitchell sees the economic background of the problem in terms of the fable that "the cause of Indian poverty is not the rate of population growth but the fact that India is a case of arrested economic development"; if she had considered it in terms of the future relationship between industrialized and agrarian areas, of which imperialism is a historical phase, she would have seen that if India is to be a joint responsibility of the United Nations, so must other problems. There is nothing wrong with the war directives stated in the speeches of American leaders, in which she has such strong faith, but how can they be implemented? Only, it may be suggested, by making the solution of India's problems a test case of the intentions of all the United Nations in economic as well as political matters.

Miss Mitchell's book would have been more valuable if its author had recognized the more "elemental" facts of India's place in what was once a world economy, if she had seen the reactions of British and Indian leaders against that

pour la VICTOIRE
JOURNAL FRANÇAIS AMÉRIQUE

*The Leading French Newspaper of the American Hemisphere—The Largest
French Newspaper Published Outside of France*

Directors:

MADAME GENEVIEVE TABOUIS
PROFESSOR FRED G. HOFFHERR

Editor-in-Chief:

MICHEL POBERS

In

pour la VICTOIRE
JOURNAL FRANÇAIS AMÉRIQUE

YOU WILL READ

Weekly editorials by Geneviève Tabouis
Philippe Barrès, Henri de Kerillis, Michel Pobers

AND

Weekly articles by France's most prominent scholars, writers, statesmen and artists.

In recent issues, this newspaper featured articles and statements by:

WRITERS

Eve Curie
Julien Green
Antoine de St. Exupéry
Emile Buré
Henri Bernstein

ARTISTS

Charles Boyer
Darius Milhaud
Edgar Varèse
Jean Carlu
Jean Benoît-Lévy

DIPLOMATS

Lord Halifax
Baron Theunis
Constantin Fotitch
Alexis Léger
Alexander Loudon
Maxim Litvinoff

pour la VICTOIRE
JOURNAL FRANÇAIS AMÉRIQUE

Publishes the latest news and most complete documentation from France—News from the Fighting French battlefronts—Exclusive and original documents from Underground France

On Sale At All Newsstands—10 cents

Yearly Subscription: $4.50

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER
13 WEEKS FOR ONE DOLLAR

POUR LA VICTOIRE

535 Fifth Ave., New York City MURRAY HILL 3-6208-9

Please send POUR LA VICTOIRE to:

Name.....

Address.....

I am enclosing ONE DOLLAR

background, if she had recognized that Indian agrarian life, like that of China, presents tremendous obstacles to industrialization which did not exist in most European countries. Miss Mitchell, apparently believing that national independence plus industrialization is all that India needs for prosperity, might well have asked herself whether the half-free section of the world, when it triumphs, will organize the world in accordance with nineteenth-century concepts of sovereign states, free to indulge in economic extravagance. In this larger context the political freedom which India must have is a minor issue and far from the major obstacle.

GEORGE E. TAYLOR

Vanished Glories

ANNALS OF THE NEW YORK STAGE. By George C. D. Odell. Volume XIII. Columbia University Press. $8.75.

STUDENTS of theatrical history used sometimes to express a certain amount of admiring wonder concerning the scholarly industry exhibited by the Reverend John Genest in his ten volumes entitled "Some Account of the English Stage: 1660-1832." The more recondite would respond by citing as even more detailed the manuscript volumes for which one Latreille evidently never got a publisher and which finally found refuge in the British Museum. But by comparison with Professor Odell's "Annals," these are mere opuscles, and perhaps the most significant comment to be made on a work too vast to be reviewed is simply to state categorically that there is not any other record of any theatrical epoch anywhere in the world which is even remotely comparable in completeness or, for that matter, comparable in minute accuracy—of which Professor Odell makes such a fetish that he is quite capable of spending days considering the problem presented by the initials of an obscure vaudeville actor of the eighties who does not appear to have been able to keep his own name straight. As the stately volumes appear one after another—handsomely bound, handsomely printed, and each adorned with hundreds of photographic illustrations—the wonder grows; and anyone with a feeling for the dignity of record can hardly fail to get a queer sense of security from the mere contemplation of the shelf which the thirteen volumes so far issued so majestically fill.

The latest, which includes some six hundred large pages of text and more than a hundred double-column pages of index, is devoted to the seasons 1885-88. As usual the author concerns himself not only with the legitimate stage but also with burlesque, variety, concerts, and so on, and includes within his survey not only Manhattan but also Brooklyn, Williamsburg, Queens, and Staten Island. Here, in other words, are not only Ada Rehan, Modjeska, Lily Langtry, and John Drew, but also Lotta, Frank Daniels, and Primrose and West. The period covered includes the declining days of Wallack's Theater and the rise of Daly's.

If any readers wonder what has sustained Professor Odell through his stupendous labors, the answer becomes more and more obvious as he reaches the period to which his own memories go back. In the first place—and though nothing could be less argumentative than his genial, conversational manner—he is obviously anxious to keep alive some memory of the theatrical glories of an epoch which is seldom even mentioned by those whose knowledge and interest is so completely confined to the post-Ibsen epoch that they dismiss as unworthy of consideration a theater which had other aims—though it also had acting of a kind which there is good reason for believing more remarkable than anything the twentieth century has seen. In the second place, it is also obvious that Professor Odell has embarked upon a sort of recherche du temps perdu and that the titles of plays, still more the names of actors and of theaters, fill his mind with a memory of past beauties and past delights. The scale and method of the work forbid any lengthy disquisitions, but it is plain that he moves among the performers of the eighties not as a historian but as a contemporary, and even the brief personal touches which he permits himself often serve to evoke in the reader a pleasure which, real as it is, must be only a very small part of what the author is enjoying for himself. In reviewing one of the previous volumes I expressed the wish that Professor Odell might find time for a volume of frankly personal recollections, and I can only repeat the wish here.

Those who are familiar with only the recent stage will be pleased and perhaps surprised to discover how many performers described and pictured in this volume survived on our stage until at least the very recent past.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Way to Begin

A DEMOCRATIC MANIFESTO. By Emery Reves. Random House. $1.50.

MR. REVES has here written so much that one must enthusiastically agree with, and written it so well, that it may appear ungracious to emphasize the equally important things he has omitted. Yet I must confess I put his book down with some disappointment, feeling that while he has clarified excellently the necessary role of coercion in organized society and the demand for a new beginning in international thinking and organization, he still has not come to grips with the revolutionary nature of the events through which we are living or with the necessity for releasing the dynamic energy of the democratic idea itself.

He opens his book by saying, "Twenty years after the complete and utter defeat of autocratic and militaristic principles and states, the world is now undergoing the greatest onslaught in history by those same autocratic, militaristic forces." This premise is not only superficial; it is misleading. It reduces both the waging of the war and the consideration of the peace to dimensions that, if accepted as fact, may make us lose the one and bungle the other.

Our goal is a far greater one than the defeat of autocratic and militaristic states, although their defeat is an essential phase of the total struggle. We are living in a time when unprecedented changes in communication have created new patterns of human relationship, more comprehensive in scope and more complex in interdependence than ever before. Our institutions, using the word institutions to mean the formal organizations of our relationships, have not kept pace with these changes. They have survived from a simpler, more provincial day. Consequently we are experiencing an intolerable tension between our actual experience as world citizens and our inherited organized provincialism. Because our actual experience can no longer be contained within existing institutions, we are plunged into a revolutionary period when new philosophies, new laws, and new units and plans must replace old social habits—the most revolutionary era since the Renaissance.

Of course we are caught in conflict. Enormous numbers of people stand to profit by the continuance of established institutions and will rally to fight for them. Old gods will not die in their beds. In our upheaval the lines of the new and the old are not always clearly discerned, and in the confusion strange partnerships appear. For instance, Hitler's most potent allies within the democratic countries have been both the frightened guardians of the old order who have been deceived by his counter-revolutionary utterances and eager leftists who have turned to him out of disillusion with their old associates. He himself is a confused mixture of reaction and change, made up of contradictions he has never been able to resolve in his own thinking because he is far more the creature of his period than its creator.

How can anybody ride these tempestuous times to the creation of a good society? Only by releasing the energies of positive democracy which have hitherto been bottled up by the specious politics of compromise. The way to have a democratic world is to build a democratic world. Let us dare to create a genuine political and economic democracy in the United States. Let us give India its freedom. Let us unleash the powers that liberty generates in men, and democracy will raise up its own leaders and inspire their followers with the will to fight and win. The next epoch can be that of free men if we set men free to make it so.

We have been calculating in the granting of liberty. We have measured its exercise with a code of pennies. Now we must make our faith and our practice as daring as our times are decisive. If we do not, democracy will die a semantic death, and its ashes will mingle with those of past governments that withered in the blast of great events.

FRANK KINGDON

How China Fights

CHINA AFTER FIVE YEARS OF WAR. Prepared under the Auspices of the Ministry of Information of the Republic of China. New York: Chinese News Service. $1.

THE average American, even though he is familiar with China, finds it almost impossible to understand the miracle of Chinese resistance. The China which the outside world knew before 1937—Shanghai, Peking, Tientsin, Hankow, Canton—including all the country's industry and a large part of its richest agricultural land, has been in Japanese hands for years. Yet China has not only held off the powerful Japanese army from its interior provinces but has displayed increasing offensive prowess. How has this come about? What changes have been wrought in the political and economic organization of this one-time "backward" country to enable it to stand up to one of the great military powers of the twentieth century. In contrast to the paucity of official information on war-time developments in most of the belligerent countries, the Chinese government has provided us with a detailed description of the way in which China has organized to meet the Japanese threat. It provides an answer to most of the questions that Americans might want to ask about fighting China.

The preparation of this book reflects the difficulties under which China labors in carrying on the struggle. Because all direct means of communication have been cut, the text of the book, which was prepared in Chungking by members of the staff of the Ministry of Information, was transmitted in full by short wave to this country. It was then edited and printed in New York by the Chinese News Service. The handicaps of preparation have seemingly had no effect on the quality of the job. The book reads as if it had been prepared by an exceptionally able journalist in the most favorable conditions. It is extremely informative and, for a government publication, remarkably candid. And, what is perhaps even more remarkable for a government publication, it conveys something of the spirit behind China's indomitable resistance.

There is little that is relevant that is not covered by the book. It tells how the government was put on a war footing with power centralized in the hands of Chiang Kai-shek, how China's army was modernized and expanded to meet Japan's threat, and how the country's industries were moved and reorganized in the western provinces. The strategy used in several of the more important battles of the war is analyzed. But the most interesting sections of the book are those which tell how the people of China—workers, farmers, and students—have adapted their lives to the harsh requirements of war.

The story of how China's universities have met the test is one of the great epics of our times. Nearly all the country's colleges and universities had to move thousands of miles from coastal areas to China's Far West. In some instances the journey had to be made entirely or in large part on foot. Often these trips were made under Japanese aerial attacks. A surprisingly large part of the equipment was successfully moved, but there was an appalling lack of buildings to house the schools in the remote interior. Today they are largely housed in old temples, barracks, city gates, and rented houses. Many of the students are seriously underfed; they must do their studying in the daytime because they cannot afford to buy oil for lamplight. Yet despite all these handicaps the universities are playing a vital part in China's resistance. And their ability to carry on without even the barest necessities is characteristic of the spirit which has made China unconquerable.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

The Nation's Essays

Contributors so far to The Nation's bi-weekly page of informal literary comment have included Joseph Wood Krutch, Louis Kronenberger, Lionel Trilling, Jacques Barzun, and Louise Bogan. Essays to come include "Poe as a Literary Critic" by Edmund Wilson, "Proust, Gide, and Huxley" by Justin O'Brien, and others.

VOTE for VICTORY

---

New Republic Supplement

---

With the current issue, The New Republic includes one of its celebrated VOTERS' HANDBOOKS. Entitled this year VOTE FOR VICTORY, the handbook lists the candidates in every state and Congressional contest and designates those with a good record and those with a bad record.

The supplement defines the issues and calls the roll of the various sections of the country where vital choices are to be made.

It is enlivened by a Bunyanesque dialogue between Rep. Bottleneck, a typical old-school vote-getter, and Rep. Victory, the kind of man we must elect, if Congress is to resume its rightful place in our democracy.

VOTE FOR VICTORY is a political pamphlet of a new kind. You can help elect a better Congress by reading and distributing it.

Extra copies have been placed on the newsstands but to be sure of getting your copies, please use the order blank below.

A Congress to Win the War

---

New Republic Supplement

---

The great debate about Congress was started in early summer by The New Republic's supplement A CONGRESS TO WIN THE WAR.

Many special editions have been ordered and sales so far exceed 285,000.

The supplement introduced the term "obstructionist" and pinned it as a label on many Congressmen seeking reelection. And it names the men with vision and courage, who are serving the people well.

You can help in the coming campaign by reading and distributing A CONGRESS TO WIN THE WAR.

It tells how every Congressman voted on the twenty domestic and foreign issues most vital to the war effort. At a glance you can tell whether your Congressman voted right or voted wrong for the country's safety.

Those obstructionists who, because of local conditions, cannot be defeated, must be deprived of national influence by exposure of their records. That is a job this 32-page supplement does superlatively well. Read it, distribute it. There is an order blank below. The cost is small.

---

A 13-week Introductory Subscription $1.00

---

THE NEW REPUBLIC
40 East 49th Street, New York City

For the enclosed $..... please send me postpaid
..... copies of VOTERS' HANDBOOK.

Prices: 1 copy 10c      90 copies $5.00
16 copies $1.00      200 copies $10.00

Name.....

Address.....

N 10-3-42

THE NEW REPUBLIC
40 East 49th Street, New York City

For the enclosed $..... please send me postpaid
..... copies of A CONGRESS TO WIN THE WAR.

Prices: 1 copy 10c      90 copies $5.00
16 copies $1.00      200 copies $10.00

Name.....

Address.....

N 10-3-42

Drama Note

LAST week I ventured the prediction that, so far as the theater goes, the war will be good for business and bad for art. The only new production since then is something called "Vickie" (Plymouth Theater) which abundantly supports my contention. Audiences seem to think it very funny indeed. On the other hand, most of my critical colleagues appear to feel, as I certainly do, that the timely topicality achieved by making the protagonists an inventor and his WAC-y wife is insufficient to turn an obvious rough-and-tumble farce into something else. "Vickie" is the sort of play in which you know that the amorous couple is going to be interrupted in the middle of a kiss by the doorbell and in which, sooner or later, somebody is going to ask, "Who is this guy anyway?" José Ferrer, Uta Hagen, Taylor Holmes, and other well-known people do their best, but it is not enough.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

COLUMBIA'S October list offers still another of Beethoven's great quartets—this time Op. 95, extraordinary in its somberness throughout, its compression and concentration, all of which combine to produce the poignancy and vehemence even of the scherzo, the compactness and violence of the darkly passionate first movement, the compactness and intense, agitated poignancy of the finale. The Budapest Quartet's performance (Set 519, $3.68) is a superb statement of the work in living sound; but Columbia's reproduction of the sound makes it unrecognizably cold, hard, dull (side 4 is much brighter than the rest).

Excellent reproduced on the other hand—with tonal beauty and brilliance, with clarity of definition, with perfect balance—is Rodzinski's performance of Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony with the Cleveland Orchestra (Set 520, $5.78). The performance, moreover, has a hard clarity and brilliance which cause me to prefer it to Stokowski's. As for the work itself, there was the possibility that hearing it again after some time I might find more in it than before; but actually the rehearsing brought home to me with new force the impotence of the pretentiousness that expresses itself in those fluently gigantic terms.

Other orchestral releases include

Strauss's charming "Kaiserwalzer," capotivately performed by Walter with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony—with the recorded sound of the performance quite normal and agreeable for once (11854-D, $1.05). And Tchaikovsky's "Capriccio italien," one of the poorest of his works, on which Beecham wastes his superb musicianship in a performance with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set X-229, $2.63). On the limited-range Magnavox machine on which I heard the set the recorded sound of the performance was good.

Then, finally, there is the set (518, $2.89) of arias from Mozart's operas sung by Pons with an orchestra conducted by Walter. They are the Queen of the Night's "Der hölle Rache" from "Die Zauberflöte," "Voi che sapete" from "Figaro," "Ach, ich liebe" and "Welche Wonne" from "The Seraglio," and the Alleluia from the motet "Exultate"; and Pons brings to them the crystalline quality of her small voice, but not the force required by the Queen of the Night's aria, nor the style required by the others. Moreover, she sings the Queen's aria in French, one of the arias from "The Seraglio" in Italian, "Voi che sapete" in French.

Some time ago I argued against the criticism that Toscanini's performances of Schubert's and Beethoven's symphonies were not in the Viennese tradition, questioning whether there was such a tradition and whether it would be binding in any case. My article brought me a letter from a reader who contended that they might be criticized for not being in the Viennese spirit. This, he said, was the relaxed attitude that restrained the performer from driving the music excessively, from giving way to over-excitement, from compressing the music too tightly. When excessive itself the attitude produced the looseness and sprawling expansiveness of certain performances of Bruno Walter; on the other hand "it is [Toscanini's] nature to drive excessively, to step up pace, and to create over-excitement. Nowhere is this more apparent than in his performance of the first movement of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Or, since the Viennese spirit is confined not alone to Beethoven's music . . . the first movement of Mozart's G minor Symphony." And other examples cited by my reader were the second and fourth movements of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. "In contrast to the fevered performances of Tosca-

8 YEARS AGO THESE AND 64 OTHER LEADING AMERICAN ARTISTS PLANNED an AMAZING PROJECT to BRING FINE ART WITHIN THE REACH OF ALL!

TODAY—YOU CAN OWN THEIR
Signed
ORIGINAL ETCHINGS AND LITHOGRAPHS

AT THE INCREDIBLE PRICE OF ONLY $5 EACH

Incredible, but true, signed originals by THOMAS BENTON, JOHN STEUART CURRY, LUIGI LUCIONI, GEORGES S. SCHREIBER and 73 others can be yours at the astonishingly low price of only $5 each. This great Associated American Artists offer includes originals by America's most famed artists. You will obtain your art masterpiece from the same collection from which many leading art museums have recently obtained works for their permanent collections. 143 subjects to please every taste and every home are available to you. Whether you like landscapes, marines, character studies or sporting subjects, they are all represented in this collection. Every original is guaranteed and you may return it within 30 days if it does not completely satisfy your every expectation.

Send for your free catalogue. This new catalogue illustrates works now available and contains biographical data on each artist. It explains the reason behind the amazingly low $5 price. Send for the free catalogue today!

SEND FOR FREE CATALOGUE TODAY!

ASSOCIATED AMERICAN ARTISTS

Studio N, 711 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Without any obligation on my part—mail me your FREE, fully illustrated 64-page catalogue picturing all of the signed original etchings and lithographs now offered by America's leading artists, including the artists' biographies . . . prizes . . . comments. I enclose 10¢ in stamps to cover handling and mailing. It is understood that in case I wish to acquire any of these originals, I may do so at a cost of only $5 each, with the privilege of returning any of them unless I am completely satisfied.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

nini I place, as characteristic of the Viennese spirit, the recorded performances of Weingartner."

Some of Toscanini's performances have the compression, tension, nervous excitement that my reader speaks of; but some of them are relaxed: the second movement of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony that my reader mentions may move a little faster than in Weingartner's performance, but it is not tense or excited. Moreover, in some instances where Toscanini's performances have this tension, intensity, excitement, it is open to objection, but in other instances it is not: the turbulence of his recorded performance of the first movement of Mozart's G minor is wrong, but the intensity of his performance of the first movement of Beethoven's Fifth is not. And the reason in each case has nothing to do with Vienna; it has to do with the character of the music. Not all the music written in Vienna is alike; not all of it is relaxed; not all the music that is relaxed is Viennese. True, there is a peculiarly Viennese relaxation; but while we think of its being in Schubert we don't think of its being in Mozart's G minor and Beethoven's Fifth. And as a matter of fact we don't think of its being in all of Schubert—in the C major Symphony, for example.

A few years ago I thought myself that the flaw in Toscanini's wonderful performance of this symphony was its lack of Viennese relaxation; recently I have found the performance wonderful without any qualification; and the other day I encountered the justification of the performance in Ralph Bates's penetrating discussion of the work in his little book on Schubert. "The symphony," he says, "largely achieves its effects by sheer intoxication of persistent rhythms. . . . The whole of the Allegro [first movement] is one vast exercise in rhythmic exploitation. The first subject . . . serves perfectly as a liberator of a steely, racy rhythm. . . . The sudden and unheralded entry of the beautiful second subject, with its own special rhythmic contribution, discloses the aesthetic basis. In this Allegro there must be no slackening of pace in pulseless transitions. The Scherzo even more unambiguously proclaims its object. . . . Again the second subject is introduced breathlessly, and at once its externals are stripped off, so that already in bar 41 the naked, scintillating ardor of string timbre is swinging up and down with enormous power. Even this rhythmic form is later simplified so that the music rises and falls with immense suggestion of a shining piston crosshead and rod, driving an exultant music through time and space. The same is true of the Allegro vivace [finale]. In a certain sense this is not Art, for there is no music which gives such a revelation of astronomic grandeur in its external, pulsing sameness of beauty. . . . It is the termination of this music which is so awe-inspiring. . . . The huge fff climax sinks rapidly to a ppp . . . there is no slackening of pace as the triplet figure begins to create one of the most astonishing splendors in music. It is as if we were borne up on that pulsating atom of rhythm, above the world and out from its limits over the cold purity of universal space, as if we beheld the circling of worlds and the laws they manifest." Toscanini's performance is that of a man who has this understanding of the work.

B. H. HAGGIN

LANGUAGES

Speak . . . read .

JAPANESE

CHINESE, SPANISH, RUSSIAN

Quickly, Easily, Correctly

The Linguaphone Method enables you to speak any of 29 languages—by LISTENING to voices of native teachers in your own home. Amazingly simple, thorough, sound; no smattering. SEND FOR FREE BOOK.

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE

3 R. C. A. Building, N. Y. C. • Circle 7-0830

MEETINGS

BERTRAND RUSSELL

will deliver a series of ten lectures on

"PHILOSOPHIES IN PRACTICE"

WEDNESDAYS, 8 P.M., beginning Oct. 7

ask for folder RN 7 EAST 15th ST.

RAND SCHOOL ALgonquin 4-3094

WANTED TO BUY

LINGUAPHONE. Any language. Indicate condition, language, number of records and books. Room 804, 18 E. 41st St., N. Y. C.

FOR RENT

EXCEPTIONAL 2 ROOMS, bath, completely furnished, with service. Midtown near Park Ave., in physician's private house. $55 monthly until May 1 to responsible bachelor only. References exchanged. Box 1398, c/o The Nation.

BUCKS COUNTY, PA.—Charmingly furnished old stone house, 6 rooms, all modern conveniences, coal furnace, telephone. 85 acres. Hunting. Will rent or exchange for furnished N. Y. apartment. Telephone Quakertown 703-R-4. Massing. R. F. D. 3, Quakertown, Pa.

114 St., 508 W.—Arizona, $5 and up. Opposite Columbia, luxurious studios, house-keeping; 24-hour elevator, switch-board service; special monthly rates.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

- Juarez: Hero of Mexico.* By Nina Brown Baker. Vanguard. $2.50.
- Modern Camouflage: The New Science of Protective Concealment.* By Major Robert P. Breckenridge. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.50.
- My Father in China.* By James Burke. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.
- Lord of Alaska: Baranov and the Russian Adventures.* By Hector Chevigny. Viking. $3.
- Europe, Russia, and the Future.* By G. D. H. Cole. Macmillan. $2.
- Keith: Old Master of California.* By Brother Cornelius, F. S. C. Putnam's. $5.
- The Judgment of the Nations.* By Christopher Dawson. Sheed and Ward. $2.50.
- The Time of My Life: A Frontier Doctor in Alaska.* By Harry Carlos DeVighne. Lippincott. $3.
- My Sentimental Zoo.* By Claire Goll. Peter Pauper Press. $2.
- Mexico: The Making of a Nation.* By Hubert Herring. Foreign Policy Association. 25 cents.
- The Role of the Races in Our Future Civilization.* Edited by Harry W. Laidler. League for Industrial Democracy. 50 cents.
- The Consolidation of the University of North Carolina.* By Davis Lockmiller. North Carolina. $3.
- The Mediterranean: Saga of a Sea.* By Emil Ludwig. Whittlesey House. $3.75.
- The Turning Point.* By Klaus Mann. Fischer. $3.
- Timoshenko, Marshal of the Red Army: A Study.* By Walter Mehring. Unger. $1.75.
- Abraham Lincoln and the Fifth Column.* By George Fort Milton. Vanguard. $3.50.
- Man's Most Dangerous Myth: The Fallacy of Race.* By M. F. Ashley Montagu. Columbia. $2.25.
- G. B. S.: A Full-Length Portrait.* By Hesketh Pearson. Harper. $3.50.
- Our Side Is Right.* By Ralph Barton Perry. Harvard. $1.75.
- Britain at War.* By J. B. Priestley. Harper. 35 cents.
- Patents for Hitler.* By Guenter Reimann. Vanguard. $2.50.
- The Road to Vichy: 1918-1938.* By Yves R. Simon. Sheed and Ward. $2.25.
- The Illustrious Dunderheads.* Edited by Rex Stout. With an Introduction by Frank Sullivan. Knopf. $1.75.
- American Harvest: Twenty Years of Creative Writing in the United States.* Edited by Allen Tate and John Peale Bishop. Fischer. $3.50.
- Religion in Soviet Russia: 1917-1942.* By N. S. Timasheff. Sheed and Ward. $2.
- Castor Oil and Quinine: Once a Doctor, Always a Doctor.* By George Wonson Vandegrift. Dutton. $3.
- Edward Sylvester Morse.* By Dorothy G. Wayman. Harvard. $4.50.
- The Great Offensive: The Strategy of Coalition Warfare.* By Max Werner. Viking. $3.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · OCTOBER 3, 1942

NUMBER 14, PART 2

What Dies Is Up to

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

THE story of Martin Dies and his committee is told at length in this issue. It is a sensational and scandalous story. In some of its details it is amusing. It will, I suspect, make many people mad. For most Americans, however little they may worry about political theory, have a strong distaste for unfair behavior. They don't admire blows landed below the belt; they don't think men and women should be attacked and given no chance to defend themselves; they don't like to see old, respected democratic procedures made a joke of by men sworn to defend them. And so the easiest and most obvious way to attack Dies is to expose his unscrupulous methods and trust the natural instinct of the public for legality and fair play to bring about a change.

But this method of attack has its dangers. Too much emphasis on the bad behavior of Dies and his committee tends to distract attention from the purposes that dictate such behavior. It is what Dies is up to that counts—Dies and the group that backs him. For that reason the material gathered in this issue is not merely the story of a reactionary politician who happens to be conducting a normal Congressional investigation in a rather high-handed manner. It is the record of American fascism in action.

The Dies committee is an agency of political civil war. It is not going to use legitimate methods of inquiry because inquiry is not its purpose. (One might as well ask a People's Court in Germany to observe democratic judicial forms.) The purpose of the Dies committee is not to discover and expose subversive groups and individuals. Its purpose—its specific political purpose—is to discredit and if possible destroy the New Deal and the progressive elements in the national Administration, including especially the President of the United States. And that, in turn, is only the immediate practical expression of a much larger purpose, which is the destruction of progressive tendencies in American life as a whole.

That is why the committee has gone out of its way to attack on the flimsiest grounds the new administrative agencies that are chiefly responsible for the conduct of the war. Congress is as it is—at least until after the coming elections. While the departments vary, their personnel remains relatively constant, though the progressive spirit has permeated the best of them. But the agencies—especially the war agencies—have in many cases attracted men of energy and a liberal point of view. They are the seed-bearers of the democratic future, if there is to be one. It is no accident that Dies, or his Man Friday, Matthews, should have selected the Board of Economic Warfare for perhaps his most unscrupulous attacks. Headed by one of the true democrats of our time, Vice-President Wallace, directed by a dynamic progressive, Milo Perkins, this board has powers which may help to shape the economy of the peace as well as of the war. When Dies tried to discredit this board by mistakenly attributing Communist-front connections to one of its ex-banker members and by shamelessly digging up a harmless book on nudism to ruin the reputation of another of its staff, he was acting on a sound fascist instinct.

That one of his shots miscarried isn't very important. What is important is the fact that his unscrupulous smearing has succeeded in terrorizing practically every agency in the government. A man or woman who was ever on one of the letterheads from which Dies lifts the names of his victims or who is listed in the famous network of the lately exposed Mrs. Elizabeth Dilling is by that token considered ineligible for most appointments. It takes a stout-hearted, tough-hided administrator to pick his staff without regard to their standing in the Social Register of Martin Dies.

Some of the results of the Dies terror have crept into the newspapers. The resignation of Maurice Parmelee from the Board of Economic Warfare and of Malcolm Cowley from the Office of Facts and Figures were among the published triumphs of Dies over decency. But few people know of the hundreds of able men and women whose names have been proposed for jobs and then dropped, or have not even been proposed, because the shadow of the Dies inquisition lies across the administrator's desk in every agency.

Matters should improve now that the Department of Justice has exposed the hollowness of the charges leveled by the committee against government employees. But will they? Agencies want to dodge trouble and get ahead with their work, and only the other day an official in one of them who called me to inquire about an applicant for a job told me they couldn't be bothered with him if he had had any connection with organizations on the Dies black list.

Whether all its members know it or not, the Dies committee is as authentic and ugly a manifestation of American fascism as Huey Long, or Gerald Winrod, whose appearance before the committee was mysteriously canceled at the last minute, or Father Coughlin, whom Dies never could be induced to investigate at all.

Don't remind me that he poked into the affairs of the Bund or questioned one or two native fascists. Of course he did—just enough of them to hold his franchise. After all, fascism is not yet triumphant in America; even a Dies has to go through the motions of pretending to be a democrat. Dies could afford to investigate a Fritz Kuhn or a Deatherage. Or rather, he couldn't afford not to. His bias is patent to you and me; though apparently it is not patent to the average Congressman. But even a less-than-average Congressman might knit his brow if he noticed that, in a time when the United States was becoming embroiled in a life-and-death struggle with international fascism, the one Congressional committee purporting to inquire into "subversive activities" left fascists and Nazis alone and devoted itself strictly to the job of smearing New Dealers and branding as Communists any progressive who ever signed a statement attacking William Randolph Hearst or gave $5 to Loyalist Spain.

Dies investigated—if so honorable a word can continue to be used for the sloppy, gossip-column technique of his committee—the irreducible minimum of his fellow-fascists. But the people he set out to save his country from were the liberals, the progressives, the pro-labor, pro-New Deal democrats. He called them Communists, and he got his appropriations from Congress and nice approving-with-qualifications editorials in the press, and he persuaded an astonishingly wide public—just as Hitler did before him—that he was saving it from the ravages of revolution. He not only succeeded in doing this; he succeeded in making people afraid of him. He created the remarkable myth, and sold it to his fellow-Congressmen, that to oppose Dies was to support Stalin. And many a legislator who privately attacked Dies, or at least deplored his "methods," lost his nerve when the moment came to vote no.

But this happened in Germany, too, while Hitler was on the road to power. Remember? The great press, even the liberal press, feared to attack the rising Hitler openly, though his plug-uglies were beating up honest people in the streets and his anti-Semitism was a stink in the nostrils of the world. The decent German papers deplored this and that—his "methods," his attacks on Jews; they may even have questioned the accuracy of his assertion that Germany was about to be captured by communism. But they let the central menace grow. And so Germany was captured by Hitlerism instead. And Hitler's gentle opponents—the deplores, the questioners, the civil libertarians—were either taken over or chucked into concentration camps, where their passion for tolerance wouldn't interfere with the rising New Order.

Don't mistake me. Dies is no Hitler. He is an ambitious, reactionary Southern politician. He has not even much of a following in his own state or he would have come in better than fourth in a four-man race for the Senate. Dies is not important as a man or a politician. He is important as a symbol of forces that have been mobilized to defeat our hope of a democratic America, a victorious war, and a people's peace. Dies speaks for a reaction that is today engaged in civil war. And he speaks effectively. We must not fool ourselves with talk about methods and rights and proper Congressional procedures. Dies is not performing a democratic function badly; he is performing an anti-democratic maneuver well. His every move is an act of war. His committee is a camouflaged pillbox in the fascist fight for control of our democracy. It needs to be stormed and overthrown—not reformed.

Forum for Fascists

"I submit that the Dies committee, on the face of the record, has shown itself not to be entitled to continuation. I submit that the committee has demonstrated itself to be the foe of groups the government is trying to unite in the war effort . . . the creator of internal confusion, hubbub, and disunity; the implacable antagonist of the New Deal; the avoider of fair judicial and committee procedure; the exemplar of marked solicitude in its treatment of American fascists; the grantor of the committee forum as a platform from which Jew-baiters, crackpots, and totalitarians identified with fascist organizations spouted their nauseating nostrums. These and many other attributes, omissions, and commissions of the committee make it in my judgment deserving of a quiet and not too well-heralded funeral."—Representative John Coffee, Washington.

Background of a Demagogue

BY WILLSON WHITMAN

BY THE time the North could measure the menace of Huey Long, Louisiana's leader was dead and buried. To informed Southerners, Yankees have seemed equally slow on the uptake about Long's neighbor, Martin Dies.

Dies, lacking Long's intermittent but genuine concern for the common man, skipped the build-up of a state machine and started his career with the anti-New Deal Southern ring in Washington. Working with such Republicans as Clare Hoffman, Hamilton Fish, and J. Parnell Thomas, this ring—led by the ghost of John Nance Garner—has Cox of the Rules Committee for strategist and Byrd and Smith for business managers. Dies is its loud speaker, and well-meaning Yankees who ask the Rules Committee to abolish the Dies committee need to give more study to slick Southern teamwork.

Martin Dies comes from a country with a grievance. To repeat that the South has been a hard-up colony of the North since the Civil War may be tiresome, but as long as we have a freight differential it is true. A fascist-minded South is the product of freight differentials, wage differentials, and a financial discrimination which breeds more discrimination all along the line. You cannot convince a Southern business man that there is enough for everybody and that he need not grab from poor folks or jockey for privileges in Washington. In his experience there has never been enough since Sherman burned the factories and wrapped iron rails around pine trees.

You cannot even make a present-day Southerner fight big business on the ground that it is Yankee business; he knows when he's licked. Reversing the pattern of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," the absentee landlord is now a Yankee corporation, with Simon Legree succeeded by a Southerner grateful for the job of overseer.

Texas, second richest state, should be least subject to the South's inferiority complex, but in Texas corporation influence is especially strong. In the Dies district, a region of cut-over timber, washed-out cotton fields, and pumped-out oil wells along the Louisiana line, the money is in the hands of big oil refiners, now enjoying a war boom.

Martin Dies grew up a politician. Southerners with gumption enough to see that the country's business is run by Northern corporations either move North or go into politics. In Dies's case the decision was made in an earlier generation; his father was a Congressman, and while young Martin was going to the university in Georgetown he was also learning the oily ropes of Texas politics as his father's secretary. He was a Congressional baby when he succeeded to his father's seat.

Starting early and staying in office, the young Southern politician can give cards and spades to his Yankee colleagues. Southerners play for keeps, and if, like the Irish, they don't always play fair, it is because government has meant for them, too, the rule of a foreign conqueror. They learned corruption from the carpetbaggers and the occupying army of Ben Butler.

Southerners make much of grandfathers, but nobody in Texas knows about the Dies family two generations back. Martin Dies senior spoke with the self-consciousness and the ornery, acrid cynicism of a Southerner only a few jumps ahead of the white-trash class. An enlarged photograph of his father, prominent in the Dies office, testifies to the present Congressman's yearning for ancestral background.

Conscious that he is not quite "quality folk" by Southern standards, Martin Dies has to ally himself with the right side—the side of business, not of working people; of native-born white churchgoers, not of foreigners, Jews, or Negroes. Respectability means opposing not merely labor unions but "communistic" consumer cooperatives and social-betterment agencies.

Martin Dies is economically shrewd. Anybody is smart who can rise from a $1,500-a-year small-town law practice to a $10,000-a-year job, and hold the job. But really smart people learn how to get along without spending their own money, and Representative Dies has learned this. In addition to his Congressional salary, most of his expenses are chargeable to the taxpayers; so are his mistakes, even to libel costs. His ghost writer, J. B. Matthews, is paid by the people, although fees for magazine articles and lectures go to Mr. Dies. Bills for printing and mailing his propaganda are also paid from public funds.

Representative Dies is, presumably, too smart to take checks or stock or any other form of emolument from the corporations whose interests his policies serve, and which have supported him ever since he started his political career. But it is hard to rule out friendly family relations, and Dies's Uncle Jack is vice-president of the Humble Oil and Refining Company, a subsidiary of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey. The Dies committee has won approval from people willing to pay half a million dollars for its continuation; the chairman told the House as much when there was some opposition to a trifling $100,000 appropriation.

Martin Dies

Martin Dies is a nationalist. That can represent progress in the backwoods, where a man from the next county is a foreigner. The people of Dies's district are 99 per cent native, and the white folks are mostly of "pure Anglo-Saxon descent." In Dies's boyhood the district included a penitentiary, afterward an insane asylum, which housed a few aliens from other parts of the state; but this would only suggest that a foreigner must be either criminal or crazy. Martin Dies didn't get abroad in the last war, and once proposed more stringent passport restrictions to keep Americans safe at home. He did little traveling in this country until his committee could foot the bill.

Dies's predecessor, Representative John C. Box, was credited with originating the politically tactful quota system of immigration; but Dies's own efforts have been to bar the gates completely against "foreign hordes" and to keep "America for the Americans." His father bitterly opposed Wilson's League of Nations. In 1934, when the nationalist tide was rising again, young Martin signed a magazine article entitled Nationalism Spells Safety, in which he confessed that he was "disgusted with all this unintelligible jargon about internationalism." In speeches made in recent years he has consistently seen less danger to the country from invasion by foreign armies than from "foreign influences" and "the invasion of foreign ideas."

Martin Dies is anti-labor. His father fulminated against the Colorado mine strike and thought that Champ Clark and Oscar Underwood, as well as Bryan and Wilson, had sold out to socialism. Martin junior began his Congressional career as Garner's fair-haired boy in the fight on the NRA and the wage-hour bills. Having proposed an investigation of sitdown strikes as "un-American," he naturally regarded his Committee on un-American Activities as an assignment to "scotch rattlesnakes" among C. I. O. organizers, blacklist members of aggressive unions, and smear the NLRB.

Martin Dies gives aid and comfort to anti-Semitic groups. He has made flowery speeches to Jewish organizations, but look at the anti-Semitic organizations, from the Klan to the Crusaders, which support him; read, in his book, how the Trojan horse was "led in by a refugee"; consider his committee's proposal to stop immigration from Europe at a time when the immigrants were mainly refugees from the Reich; and note that his statement, "This is a Christian nation," was approved by William Dudley Pelley as "Silvershirtism at its best."

Martin Dies is anti-Negro. When George Deatherage said to the Dies committee, "I am bigoted enough to believe in white supremacy," the chairman blushed at the word "bigoted." In his district the poll tax disfranchises some 70,000 Negroes. His committee has sought to identify poll-tax repeal with the Communist program.

Martin Dies is a master of ballyhoo. His father won praise from Yankee newspapers by calling Wilson a power-crazed czar, leading the country to ruin. By smearing labor and the New Deal, Martin junior made news acceptable to 85 per cent of the papers in the country. Like Dexter Fellowes, Dies had a show the editors enjoyed, with the G. O. P. elephant to do tricks for him. And his publicity is notable for perfect timing and smart use of space.

The timing has been right not only for elections but for appropriations; each time he wants more money he takes so many inches of type, and because he asked for millions, his biggest appropriation was headlined a "reduction." Good timing also distinguishes his warfare against labor and the New Deal. Attacks on union organizers are synchronized with contract negotiations, and red influence in the Administration is charged at the crises of debate on such important measures as neutrality repeal or price control.

Geographically, Dies press releases distribute their fire, promising juicy local revelations but confining discussion to distant dangers. In Washington Dies talks of German airports along the Rio Grande; in Texas, of threats to Philadelphia shipyards.

Quick to take advantage of or to invent news tie-ups, he is also good at balancing blunders with fresh promises and meeting a rebuke with impertinence. When the President criticized Dies's early use of his committee to defeat Murphy in Michigan, Dies managed in one sentence to insult the Chief Executive and a future Justice of the Supreme Court: "It would have been wrong to shield Governor Murphy simply because he was a Democrat and a strong friend of the President."

The most serious damage done by Dies publicity was of course to warn the Bund of impending investigations in time to permit removal of records. This pattern of the telegraphed punch—announcement of raids to come, followed by failure to find the missing papers—occurred in city after city, despite Justice Department protests and Presidential warnings. Bund leader Fritz Kuhn was not summoned by the committee until a year after a Bund investigation was promised. By that time he had been arrested by New York state authorities, on FBI evidence, but Dies claimed and still claims credit.

Martin Dies uses publicity to poison public opinion against Russia. His book says much about the Trojan-horse technique; from the start his investigation minimized Axis activities by emphasizing the menace of Moscow. In vain the President asserted, and Gallup figures showed, that the country wanted an investigation of Nazis; and Maury Maverick warned that political investigations "always complimented the Germans because there were so many Germans but gave the Russians hell." Dies himself said for publication that Nazi influence, rumored to be backed by "large industrialists" (never again mentioned), would be considered first, with Communist influence second, and "Spanish and Chinese propaganda third." Nevertheless, the investigation proceeded, until Germany declared war on the United States, in the proportions of the Dies book. Twenty-one out of twenty-eight chapters of "The Trojan Horse in America" are on communism, two on the Bund, one on the Pelley brand of fascism, and one on the Italian brand. Japan doesn't even get a chapter, while Falange and White Ukrainian activities go unmentioned.

After false emphasis comes confusion as a device to mislead. The multiplicity of Dies's charges was bound to obscure real issues; the investigation was spread over consumer groups, charities, relief associations, a Negro university. Dies even offered to investigate various government agencies and did send investigators into TVA territory, while he himself went to Hollywood to hunt for Moscow agents. Where no affiliation could be found, it was always possible to leave a dirty thumb-print: "From the evidence before us we are not in a position definitely to state whether or not the American Civil Liberties Union can properly be classed as a Communist organization." But "linking" and "branding" come easy to a man capable of asserting that "Joseph Stalin . . . directs an international spy ring with one hand and a local legislative lobby for cheaper milk with the other."

Finally, a favorite Dies device is simple substitution of Communist for Nazi, or vice versa, in keeping with the Dies doctrine that the "red and brown Führers" are Siamese twins. In an early debate on the Bund he said, "I'm no alarmist. I'm not inclined to look under every bed for a Communist." Throughout the hearings he often interrupted or led witnesses to say that facts brought out about the Axis must have a Communist counterpart—"and of course the same tactics are pursued by Russia." During the Mexican elections of 1940 he warned of red plots to intervene by force of arms, when he must have known that the threats of violence were coming from the fascist supporters of General Almazán, who was in turn supported by the oil companies hiring Dies's Uncle Jack.

Martin Dies makes a dangerous appeal to the ignorant. His flag-waving oratory was made to order for Hearst headlines; his accents appeal to joiners, and joiners appeal to him. At one time he planned a "League for Peace and Americanism," similar to Senator Reynolds's Vindicators, which was to agitate for "jobs for Americans" and the deportation of aliens and against immigration and the sending of American troops to fight on foreign soil.

Having been feted by Westchester society, hailed at a hotel dinner in New York as "the Sir Galahad of American politics," and mentioned for the Presidency by Father Coughlin, Dies must be excused for cherishing the highest hopes for his own future. Nobody except him really thinks he could be President; he couldn't even attain his early ambition to be party leader in the House. But his fan mail has Congress scared.

To sentimental patriots, the favorite Dies appeal is that of the martyr. His life is threatened, his children may be kidnapped, his files must be guarded because he has fearlessly exposed the enemies of our country. Any defeat is due to the enemy. When the House declined his proposal to investigate strikes, "this showed the power wielded by the Communists and their fellow-travelers during that period." When ninety-eight clergymen and religious leaders asked Congress to cut off the Dies funds, they "had permitted themselves to be used by Browder." When Treasury agents discovered that Dies owed back taxes, he told admirers, "We are facing a serious situation. . . ."

Martin Dies's committee is a dangerous approach to an American Gestapo. On Dies's own testimony it does not conflict with the FBI because it investigates the strictly legal activities of persons who cannot be indicted as criminals, persons described in the records as "well-meaning innocents," honest liberals," and "ordinary middle-class citizens." But Dies expense vouchers show payments to informers and spies, trucking charges for the seizure of records, and rentals for listening-posts and dictaphones. At committee headquarters it is admitted that lists of names will be furnished to responsible authorities who make proper written application to the chairman—that is, will be furnished to employers compiling black lists.

The committee urges its own black list upon government agencies. One war-agency executive says that Dies intimidation now forces administrators to hire mediocre, "safe" help in preference to more efficient progressives, because you can't have inquisitors disrupting the staff.

Martin Dies is hostile to progress in government. He has argued repeatedly for "class tolerance," meaning, apparently, acceptance by Americans of fixed financial and social stratification. He has devoted much committee time to investigating persons who worked against child labor and for social-security laws and other elementary reforms. His present hope is to use the war to defeat reform; "Many people think we can preserve our social gains and defeat Hitler. It cannot be done," he told the House.

Naturally he feels that minorities have no rights worth mentioning. "For years they [the Communists] have been building up this utterly senseless idea of civil rights," he complains. He has long urged outlawing the Communist Party and all organizations "linked" to it by his committee. "In France they're executing the Communists," he noted with approval, shortly before France fell. Nor are majority rights, as expressed at the polls, too sacred to the Dies mind. Americans, Dies is fond of saying, derive their fundamental rights "from God and not from governments, dictators, kings, and majorities." Here the danger is the assumed partnership between Dies and Deity; bouncing up after a Roosevelt reproof, he declared, "I shall not swerve from the path of duty as God gives me the light to see it."

Martin Dies is opposed to the present war. But lacking the courage of his father, who lost his Congressional seat after voting against World War I, he won't admit it. The present Congressman Dies is smart enough to support the war where it shows; he has supported Roosevelt the same way. He managed to snipe at England in speeches while voting for lend-lease and has admitted that he does not favor lend-lease aid to Russia. His bitterness against the Soviet Union brought from Congressman Sumners a reminder that one doesn't insult an ally. As for the Japanese, his press statement that committee revelations might have prevented Pearl Harbor was officially denied by the State Department and was unsupported by subsequent committee publications. In a speech delivered at New Orleans in October, 1941, he dismissed the Japanese as "just a bluff."

No conscientious objector to war, he can fairly be called an isolationist. Everything in his philosophy opposes a people's war and will oppose a peace based on collective security. In 1938 he was warning that Communist propaganda for collective security might get us into war; his committee was especially bitter against the Loyalists in Spain. As late as 1940 he was investigating, or promising to investigate, the efforts of the Chinese, French, and British to make America unneutral.

Texans are fighting folk who ask about a man's own war record, in or out of Congress. In the last war Martin Dies was too young to be drafted, although many young Texans of his age enlisted. He is not too old for the present war, but his health doesn't even permit him to attend closely to his Congressional job. Suspicious Southerners note that the Dies health is variable, sending him, in time of political crisis, to the hospital, to Florida, or to his Texas farm.

J. B. Matthews—the Informer

BY RICHARD H. ROVERE

J. B. MATTHEWS, a former Communist, is the strong right arm of Martin Dies. In private he is Dies's closest adviser; in public his most fawning admirer. Although he bears only the unimposing title of Research Director, he does more work than all the regular committee members put together. If Matthews had not come on the scene late in 1938, the committee might have been voted out of existence. It was fast becoming an embarrassment to Congress and a joke to the press. Matthews's testimony, a three-day orgy of self-reproach, put it back on the front pages, and his work as a staff member has kept it there ever since. In return he has been given a free hand to run the greatest smear campaign in American history.

A tall, rangy man, domineering and endlessly argumentative, Matthews is ideally suited to the job. As red-baiters, Dies and the rest of the committee know what they want, but they have no grasp of the movements they pretend to investigate. Matthews has known most of them from the inside and knows just when and how he can scuttle the truth. Left to themselves, Dies, Starnes, and Thomas would bungle things beyond repair; they could make no sense at all of the left-wing documents which are Matthews's tools. But Matthews is an industrious fanatic who will burrow forever in impossible magazines like the Party Organizer. In almost every way Dies and Matthews are as conveniently mated as Jack Spratt and his wife. Dies has political ability and power; Matthews has energy and knowledge. Dies is easygoing, but he has a way with the public; Matthews has the intensity and craftiness for behind-the-scenes intrigue. In their personal relations Dies looks up to Matthews as a man of sound religion and vast learning who, unlike most intellectuals, is willing to make reactionary politics a career. He was pleased as punch when Matthews, in writing "The Trojan Horse in America," stuffed the Troy metaphor with high-sounding allusions from Greek history. Matthews, although he privately considers Dies an oaf, is willing to play the sycophant in order to use Dies's political prestige, achieved largely with his help, for his own ends.

Most informers are moved either by spite against their former friends or by a simple desire to save their own hides. Matthews is inspired by a spite so great that it has become an almost disinterested zeal. If he were, as many suppose, nothing but an opportunist, he would probably be hoist by his own petard, but he happens to be a political psychopath who believes implicitly in the rightness of his mission. Because he was first compromised by the Communists and then cast off by them, his sentiments were, in the first flush of anger, not unlike those of a lady who has given her guarded virtue and the best years of her life to a faithless lover. Being a man who has always lived by religions and ideologies, however, he soon came to see his old associates not only as persons but as representatives of a set of ideas. And so his hatred now includes every piece of the Marxist dogma and anything remotely like it. When the Dies committee asks Matthews for something with which to smear a government official, the chances are that it is just out for the blood of another New Dealer. But for the Research Director the task is one of high importance. Every liberal he uncovers is another Turk brought low in his crusade to save the Republic from what he calls, with fitting vagueness, "the general idea of collectivism." If his files, which consist principally of old letterheads, rifled mailing lists, and back numbers of radical magazines, show that a man spoke up for Loyalist Spain in 1937, Matthews will not hesitate to write him down as a Communist in 1942. He may not hold with such logic himself, but that is not the point. He has said time and again that he considers it weak-minded to distinguish the radical heresies one from another. In his autobiography he wrote: "I believe that . . . a demagogue, by whatever political name, who deliberately seeks to prejudice the public mind against business . . . is as dangerous as any Communist to the welfare of America." And again: "I know that conservatives who would oppose successfully the left-wing illusions of our time must drop their divisive interpretations of what lies back of the Communist and Socialist movements." From which it follows that for Matthews it is enough that a man once supported Loyalist Spain or spoke harshly of the utilities. But, of course, it is not enough for the public, and that is why "Communist" or "fellow-traveler" is added.

Joseph Brown Matthews was born forty-eight years ago in Hopkinsville, Kentucky, to a former school teacher and a Singer sewing-machine salesman. Republican in politics, Methodist in religion, the family wanted young Matthews cut to their pattern. But at Asbury College, in Wilmore, Kentucky, where he studied ancient languages, he fell indirectly under the influence of the Christian liberals of his day, men like David Starr Jordan and John R. Mott. He spent the years of the First World War teaching their gospel, along with some arithmetic and penmanship, at a Chinese school in Java called Tiong Hoa Hwe Koan. On the side he did some missionary work with the Javanese and mastered enough of the Malay language to render the Methodist hymnal and a book by Henry Van Dyke into that difficult tongue.

His stay in Java outlasted the war by a few years. He returned here to devote his full time to the study and teaching of the antiquities. At Columbia he worked under A. V. Williams Jackson, the great orientalist, and he taught Hebrew, Latin, Greek, Sanskrit, Arabic, and Aramaic at several freshwater colleges in the South and Middle West. Academic colleagues recall that he had a quick, if conventional, linguistic mind. He still maintains a scholarly interest in languages, and occasionally, when there is not much going on around the Dies committee, he bolsters his $7,200-a-year income by doing some translations for the State Department. But in that period—the mid-

J. B. Matthews

—his social conscience was developing rapidly, and he found himself more and more concerned with the problems of war and race relations. He joined several pacifist organizations, and in 1924, while teaching at Scarritt College, he did a yeoman's job lining up Tennessee votes for the La Follette-Wheeler ticket.

If it had not been for the unfortunate sequence in which he received two telegrams on a June day in 1929, Matthews might be spending his middle age as a university scholar of modest abilities and liberal inclinations. One wire was from the Fellowship of Reconciliation, a New York pacifist group, and it offered him the post of executive secretary. The other, which came a few hours later, was from Drew University, a Methodist school in New Jersey, and it asked him to accept the chair of Hebrew. Matthews would have preferred to take the teaching job and help the cause in his spare time, but he had already committed himself to the non-resisters by the time the second telegram arrived. Today he traces his subsequent misfortunes back to that fateful day, and his victims may well do the same with theirs.

As a radical leader in Tennessee Matthews had shown a real flair for oratory and some facility as a writer, but he had no opportunity to try his hand at the kind of palace politics which lends spice and a sense of importance to so many unimportant movements. In New York he discovered that his talent for meddling verged almost on genius. When he testified before the Dies committee he named ninety-four left-wing groups with which he had been associated over a period of seven years. Five months after he went to work for the pacifists, he joined the Socialist Party. A year later he was almost expelled by the Socialists for consorting too much with the Communists. Like Heywood Broun, who was then his friend, he always made his exit by the door to the left. Indeed, he was often so unreasonably radical, so eager to flaunt his views and boast of his daring, that many people who knew him then believe now that he was a provocateur instructed by the government or some other agency to enter left-wing movements and commit their members to incriminating statements. On the basis of present evidence that seems a mistaken view of the matter. Extremes have always attracted him. Today he is more bitterly and proudly reactionary than Martin Dies himself.

In any event, Matthews flourished as a politician, and kept on moving closer to the Communists. "The winter of 1932," he has written, "found me prepared to become a full-fledged fellow-traveler." He had long since abandoned the meek philosophy of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, which still employed him, and in the Socialist Party he associated himself with a group that was dissatisfied with the moderate policies of Norman Thomas and wished to replace him with a leader who would be more willing to cooperate with the Communists. He went to Russia in the summer of 1932, the year of the great famine in the Ukraine. "I even saw with my own eyes such appalling sights of poverty as would move the coldest heart." When he came back he wrote an article, published in the Daily Worker, denying that there had been any famine. He now says that neither then nor later was he an actual member of the Communist Party. Probably not, but as he is always so quick to point out, the line that separates Communists who carry membership cards from those who do not is all but invisible. In 1933 Earl Browder had enough confidence in him to make him chairman of the United States Congress Against War, later the American League Against War and Fascism, and still later the American League for Peace and Democracy. By far the most ambitious Communist enterprise ever set up in this country, the American League became, in the years before the war, an important instrument of Russian foreign policy. It is unthinkable that anyone but a trustworthy Communist would have been allowed to lead it.

The material rewards of service to radical causes are seldom great. Matthews had a wife and children to support. He solved the problem in 1932 by accepting a part-time executive position with Consumers' Research at a salary that took care of his family's needs. Consumers' Research was radical only in the sense that it was a help to the little man and a nuisance to business. Its director, F. J. Schlinck, had no political connections and believed in government by the technological élite. Nevertheless, Matthews felt that he could work there without damage to his Marxist conscience. If anyone scoffed, he elaborated a theory, strictly his own, of "consumer communism." Apparently he was convincing, for several other Communists got jobs at Consumers' Research, and by 1935 they had decided either to gain control of it or wreck it and start a movement of their own. A strike of the employees was called in the autumn of that year, and Matthews, as an executive, was on the spot. The issues of the strike are still obscured by the policies of both sides, but a few facts are clear. The strikers had a legitimate grievance. Many technicians were paid only $13 a week and some had been fired for complaining. On the other hand, no one could doubt that the Communist leaders were moved less by pity for the worker than by envy of the organization's success. They will always endure meager rations for a cause they want to succeed. At any rate the strike was a partial success. The strikers did not win their demands, but they won enough public sympathy to start a rival organization, Consumers' Union. But Matthews, whose desire for security proved greater than his revolutionary fervor, had fought the strikers bitterly. His position with the Communists was intolerable; he quit them for good.

For two years before he turned up on the witness stand of the Dies committee Matthews meditated and sulked. After all the wrangling and conniving of the past ten years he looked fondly back at his old Kentucky home and saw great virtues in it. Nostalgia mounted to passion and then, exultantly, he wrote: "I had an inheritance of conservative traditions. Now, after almost twenty-five years of political nomadism, I am back at the beginning. But political and economic conservatism is no longer merely an inheritance. It is a personal faith." Still a joiner, he began looking for movements in which he could express his new convictions. He found plenty. Instead of denouncing fascists from Communist platforms, he began denouncing Communists from fascist platforms. He became a star speaker for American Patriots, Inc., an organization which was run by Allen Zoll. He worked at the League for Constitutional Government, distributor of such items as the "Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion" and Elizabeth Dilling's "Red Network." His own turgid autobiography, "Odyssey of a Fellow-Traveler," was published by John Cecil, who as head of the National Immigration Board spends his energies trying to keep out anti-Nazi refugees on the ground that they are all Jewish Communists. An article by Matthews was published in Anti-Komintern, organ of the German Foreign Office. Another was proudly displayed by Social Justice.

In Washington Matthews has become more than just the brains of the Dies committee. Even if the committee is run out of business, he is likely to turn up again as the guiding spirit of some other Dies campaign. His success in working for Dies has made him a tower of strength for the whole Tory bloc in the House, and he has had a hand in several of their campaigns, particularly those against labor. Matthews has come a long way. The former fighter for Negro rights is a henchman of poll-tax Congressmen; the former professor of Hebrew is a friend of anti-Semites; the former pacifist, Socialist, and Communist works with fascists.

History of a Hoax

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

FACT-FINDING through the process of investigation by Congressional committees is one of the necessities of our form of government. Framers of the Constitution wisely made provision for use of the subpoena power by the legislative branch as a way of getting information needed for intelligent law-making. This power has been used often and, for the most part, wisely. On occasion it has been used brilliantly.

Indeed, brilliant use of the inquisitorial power of Congress has established one of the American government's brightest traditions and obscured occasional misuse of the subpoena by Congressional committees. The tradition sparkles with such names as Pujo, Hughes, Walsh, Pecora, and Black. The Teapot Dome investigation exposed graft and put a stop to it. The Senate banking investigation exposed abuses in the financial system and brought reforms.

We have come to think of Congressional investigation as a wholly satisfactory way of periodic self-examination. If the body politic has accumulated toxic waste, investigation will indicate a purge. If there is a malignant growth, it will indicate surgery. We shall not go too far wrong, our government processes will not be allowed to become too obsolescent, if the people's representatives have access to this X-ray.

The Special House Committee on un-American Activities, otherwise known as the Dies committee, has committed many sins since its formation in 1938. It has shown contempt for the constitutionally guaranteed rights of the people. Its methods have been a disgrace to the Congress whose delegated power it misuses. Its conclusions have been so warped as to justify the charge of deliberate falsification. But its greatest sin has been its sin against the tradition of Congressional investigation.

As outlined by Representative Martin Dies in the spring session of 1938, when the resolution that later established the committee's power was introduced, the purposes of the investigation were perfectly proper. The sweeping nature of the resolution itself was criticized at the time by several members of the House. Nevertheless, the broad grant of power was indicated by the character of the subject to be investigated. Dies said he merely wanted to look into the activities of such subversive organizations as the German-American Bund.

Maury Maverick, then a brash young Congressman from Dies's Texas, warned that the House could expect "the greatest fishing expedition Congress has ever undertaken," but the resolution was adopted by voice vote. This resolution is still the committee's basic grant of power. It provides for "an investigation of (1) the extent, character, and objects of un-American propaganda activities in the United States; (2) the diffusion within the United States of subversive and un-American propaganda that is instigated from foreign countries or of a domestic origin and attacks the principle of the form of government as guaranteed by our Constitution; and (3) all other questions in relation thereto that would aid Congress in any remedial legislation."

Four years have elapsed since this fishing expedition started. The newspaper space covered by accounts of the committee's exploits probably would blanket the whole state of Texas. From the point of view of Chairman Dies, the inquiry has been successful beyond his wildest dreams. He is a national figure, not just an obscure gentleman from Texas with a talent for legislative log-rolling and cloakroom banter. His committee has heckled, harassed, and obstructed the New Deal, with which Dies has never been sympathetic. It has even had a hand in defeating New Deal candidates for important elective office. It has accumulated so much favorable publicity that members of the House, many if not most of whom would like to choke off an investigation that has become systematic persecution of liberals and liberal causes, including New Dealers and their projects, are afraid to come out against it.

About all this one finds little difference of opinion in Washington. Dies has a small group of articulate defenders and apologists in the House, led by the spitfire reactionary from Georgia, Eugene Cox, but he has lost caste with the rank and file of Congressmen. Yet most members of the House, it is safe to assume, credit him with one worth-while achievement. Most of them will tell you that Dies has done the nation, and even the cause of liberalism, a service by revealing and making generally known the operating methods of the Communists—how they steer front organizations composed principally of liberal innocents, how they burrow into the unions, and how they serve the foreign policy of the Kremlin.

If Dies could properly be credited with this, then many non-Marxist liberals probably would agree that he had performed a service. Actually, Dies accomplished no such thing. The American Communists have revealed themselves in these last four years. No liberal, however innocent, is innocent enough to misunderstand an organization that shifted from collective security to isolationism and back again while Russia was first combating the Nazis by peaceful propaganda, then entering into a non-aggression pact with Berlin, and finally fighting the Nazis magnificently from the White to the Black Sea.

A few members of the House, moreover, harbor the delusion that Dies helped smash the German-American Bund and the native fascist movement. Here again, the smashing was accomplished by events. Native nightshirt men like William Dudley Pelley went their way rejoicing, helped by the publicity Dies had given them, until the war made their causes and methods outlaw and until the FBI and the Justice Department moved in on them. Dies's accomplishments in the field of fascist-smashing can be accurately measured by the fact that he never disturbed Father Charles E. Coughlin, spiritual center of the native movement. It can be further measured by the fact that most of the twenty-eight pro-Axis leaders now awaiting trial for conspiracy to undermine the morale of United States armed forces were never troubled by him.

No one who has watched it in operation, close up, will make the popular mistake of crediting the Dies committee with achievement of its publicly announced objectives—exposure of Communist and fascist influences in the United States. It is true that the Dies committee questioned both Earl Browder, secretary of the Communist Party of the United States, and Fritz Kuhn, head of the German-American Bund, and that both were convicted of crimes and sent to jail after appearing before the committee. But the prosecuting agency in both cases was the Department of Justice, and the evidence presented was dug up by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Almost certainly both prosecutions would have been won had there never been a Dies committee.

The fact of the matter is—and it has been clear ever since the first month after the committee started functioning—that Dies has not been trying to destroy either communism or fascism so much as the New Deal and organized labor. He soon learned what he may or may not have known when he started—that there was only an incidental connection between what he said he was doing and what he was actually doing. To accomplish his twofold purpose it was necessary to discredit liberals of various shades, all allied with the Roosevelt New Deal reform movement, but unconnected with the native fascists or Axis-inspired nightshirt organizations on the right and uninfluenced by the Communist Party on the left.

Had Dies actually exposed the operations of the Communist Party, he would have destroyed his greatest asset. It served his purpose better to keep the line between communism and non-revolutionary liberalism as hazy as possible. To make the obvious distinction between liberals bent on gradualist reform by legal, democratic means and Marxian purists getting ready to inherit a revolution would have been to dilute the red paint Dies found so effective for smearing everyone outside his own reactionary circle.

In his report on the Union for Democratic Action, a non-Communist organization founded to promote the cause of intervention when the Communists were singing an isolationist tune, Dies came close to attacking liberals as such. He was saved from this extremity, however, by the trusty files of J. B. Matthews, the committee's resourceful chief investigator. These files contain the names of thousands of Americans who have belonged to, received mail from, or been officers of organizations like the American League for Peace and Democracy. These organizations, many of them like the American League now defunct, are classified as Communist fronts by the Dies committee. If it finds a list of names in the files of such an organization or on a yellowed letter-head, the Dies committee proceeds on the assumption that it is a list of Communists or of Communist stooges.

Dies

Hearst Griffin McCormick

In the membership of the Union for Democratic Action were, of course, many who had belonged to so-called front organizations, as almost all men of goodwill did back in the dim, dead united-front days. There were also a few who, like Matthews himself, were former Communists or confirmed fellow-travelers. However, it was patently silly, as even the New York Times pointed out, to call the pro-war U. D. A. a front for the Communists. Moreover, some of the organizers of the U. D. A. had no records of past affiliation with any liberal or Communist-front organizations. In at least one case, to the certain knowledge of this writer, Matthews solved this problem simply by allocating to a U. D. A. member some affiliations that never existed with some organizations the victim had never even heard of.

The Dies method of conviction by association was, as usual, carried one step farther in the case of the U. D. A. Since the U. D. A., in association with the New Republic, had published a supplement designed to expose the records of isolationist, anti-New Deal, anti-labor Congressmen and thus contribute to their defeat in the fall elections, the Dies committee report implied that the New Deal was to be the beneficiary of a Communist plot against Congress. This implication was then made explicit by the Chicago Tribune and some other newspapers, whose bias against Roosevelt is nearly rabid and whose attitude toward the war is not far from neutral. By a tenuous chain of association going back to the heyday of the American League for Peace and Democracy the New Deal of 1942 also became Communist.

This has been the method of the Dies committee almost from the start. Application of the method is revealing of its purpose. Organized labor, particularly the C. I. O. has been as obvious an intended victim as the New Deal. Communists in the labor movement and in the New Deal Administration—and there have been and still are some, more in the C. I. O. than in the government, but still a few in relatively unimportant bureaucratic posts in Washington—have been victimized only incidentally.

Dies's sympathies have always been with the extreme conservatives. He was an alien-baiter long before he became a labor-baiter. Although he tolerated the New Deal, even strung along with it during the Roosevelt honeymoon of 1933, he started voting the line of his fellow-Texan, John Garner, as soon as it became apparent that the President meant what he said about basic liberal reform. Dies has wielded the power of his committee as a guerrilla fighter uses a machete in every campaign since, and including, the Congressional and state campaigns of 1938.

There has been nothing subtle about Dies's political axing. He has gone in swinging and laid about him without regard for the niceties of political usage. His first victim was Frank Murphy, who in the fall of 1938 had come through the sitdown-strike crisis and was seeking reelection as governor of Michigan. Dies's method here was to permit Murphy's political enemies to fill the committee record with unsupported charges that Murphy was a dupe of the Communists, who had tried to turn the automobile plants over to radical strikers. Similar treatment was given Elmer Benson, Farm-Labor governor of Minnesota. Both were beaten. An attempt was made to defeat Culbert Olson for governor of California, but in this case a crude job of attempted character assassination failed to kill.

More recently Dies has worked on Leon Henderson, calling him an "ex-crackpot" and other names, all eagerly picked up by the Axis radio for short-wave propaganda; on Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins, accusing her of shielding Harry Bridges; on Attorney General Francis Biddle, charging him with obstructing the work of the committee; and on Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes, accusing him of virtually all crimes. Dies's attacks on government officials have been timed to do the most possible harm. Henderson, for example, was hauled over the coals while his price-control bill was pending before the House, and sweeping charges that

Coughlin Fish Smith Dilling

Pelley

Winrod

Kuhn

Communists held high government positions were released while the neutrality-repeal debate was in progress.

These latter charges—that the Communists have infiltrated the government with the help of the New Deal and are about to foment revolution from within—have become Dies's principal theme. In his lectures, for which he is reported to receive as much as $500 apiece plus expenses, and from which he is said to have accumulated a tidy little fortune, he sends shivers down the spines of his hearers by rolling the Trojan horse to the very door of the Capitol.

Congress and the Department of Justice finally called this bluff of Dies's in 1941. A provision was written into the Justice Department appropriation bill directing that at least $100,000 be spent on an investigation of government employees who were "members of subversive organizations or advocates of overthrow of the federal government." After spending much more than $100,000 and investigating some 4,000 cases, 1,121 of them based on complaints from the Dies committee, the Justice Department finally has made its report.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation under J. Edgar Hoover, who can scarcely be called a fellow-traveler or suspected of shielding the comrades, made thorough investigations, but only two employees were fired as a result of its reports. An interdepartmental committee appointed by Biddle to oversee the investigation said, in effect, that the Dies list was a phony, that the investigation had wasted good time and money, that it had interfered with the morale of government workers, and that the government had been found to be free of subversive influences.

Dies growled that Biddle was welcoming Bundsmen and members of Communist-front organizations into the government and prepared to carry on as usual. How much harm the exposure of his Trojan-horse hoax has done him remains questionable. The press from the very start of his investigation has been for the most part uncritical of Dies's methods and extremely generous with its space in reporting his findings.

However, Dies's press has not been as good this year as previously, and exposure of his horse as something made out of imaginative plush probably won't do him any good, particularly since it followed another dramatic demonstration of the great investigator's irresponsibility. This demonstration was made by David B. Vaughan, an economist employed by the Board of Economic Warfare. Vaughan was one of thirty-five persons in the BEW who were branded as members or former members of front organizations in a letter from Dies to Vice-President Henry A. Wallace, chairman of the board. Vaughan had worked for the Irving Trust Company, 1 Wall Street, and had been a member of nothing more subversive than the Baptist church before coming to Washington. Dies, it developed, was thinking of David Vaughn, once a director of the American League for Peace and Democracy and not a government employee.

So Vaughan sued Dies for $75,000 on the theory that, since the accusation made against him was originally set forth in a letter, not in an official House document, and was released to the newspapers, it was not privileged and therefore not proof against libel action. Dies huffed and puffed but finally agreed to settle out of court. He would, he said, pay Vaughan's legal expenses and make a public apology. He did both. But then he nicked the House Accounts Committee for the $500-plus involved in the settlement. He escaped personal liability narrowly, however. The vote to bail him out in the Accounts Committee was six to five.

It has been the practice of the committee, when it felt itself slipping, to get out another report. After the first two years it all but gave up holding hearings because their unfairness was too obvious. Since then there have been a White Paper, which purported to show up the Nazi propaganda machine in the United States but proved little beyond the known fact that Hans Thomsen, chargé d'affaires of the German embassy, was pro-German, a Yellow Paper on Japan, which was shown up by Congressman Tom Eliot of Massachusetts as a rehash of old stuff available in the Congressional Library dressed up with E. Phillips Oppenheim touches, and similar studies on various phases of what the committee treats as un-American phenomena.

The most revealing report the Dies committee ever

Wasted Money

"I am convinced beyond all doubt that the net results of the labors of the Committee to Investigate un-American Activities is harmful to the nation's war effort. It has excited suspicion unduly, created distrust and disunity, and embarrassed and hampered the orderly functioning of important departments of our government. I am extremely fearful that it may by some injudicious or intemperate outburst bring disaster to the cause of the United Nations.

"Its record is one in which the Congress can have no pride, and its procedure at times has been violative of what we Americans like to call fair play. No longer can I condone its misdeeds, and having no hope that it will reform, I hope its continuance will not be authorized. Money appropriated for expenditures by that committee is worse than wasted. I shall vote 'nay'."—Representative Herman P. Eberharter, Pennsylvania.

wrote was never published—or rather it was published in a form so expurgated that it bore only a pale resemblance to the original. It was a report subscribed to by Dies and his fellow-travelers, who have always been in the majority on the committee, attacking "Marxist atheists . . . who masquerade under the name of liberal" and charging that these atheists run the New Deal. It said they were cloaking their totalitarian ambitions in the seductive raiment of reform but actually were trying to regiment labor under the National Labor Relations Board, agriculture under the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, industry under the Securities and Exchange Commission, and so on. Centralization of power in Washington was called the first stage of Washington dictatorship and Roosevelt "the Kerensky who precedes the dictator."

The three New Dealers who had been placed on the committee in successive attempts to reform Dies—Representatives John Dempsey of New Mexico, Jerry Voorhis of California, and Joseph Casey of Massachusetts—threatened to bring out a minority report if this tract were published by the majority. As a result, the report was toned down and finally brought out as a unanimous recommendation that the committee be continued. However, excerpts from the original were published by The Nation.

These excerpts showed, more clearly than anything that has ever been written by or about the Dies committee, just what it had been up to. The report was, of course, written by Matthews in an attempt to put an ideological base under the feet of Dies and his anti-liberal associates on the committee and in the House. Matthews has written not only the Dies committee reports but many if not all of Dies's speeches and magazine articles, and one book. In fact, the Dies committee probably could be called with more accuracy the Matthews committee.

Dies almost certainly had no very clear idea of what he would do with his authority and his first $25,000 when he got them and took up the hunt for subversives where it had been dropped by a succession of House investigators—Hamilton Fish of New York, John McCormack of Massachusetts, and Samuel Dickstein of New York. It was to prevent Dickstein from continuing with the investigation that the Southern crowd, which found itself in control of the House after 1932, made Dies chairman of the committee. All the previous investigators had found the hunt an unrewarding enterprise.

Dies had no better success at first. His original appropriation was not large enough to finance very much of a show. To conserve his meager exchequer he had to depend principally on volunteer witnesses who would pay their own expenses, and most of the volunteers were wackies. John Metcalfe, a reporter for the Chicago Times, was Dies's first paid investigator and first full-dress witness. He had joined the German-American Bund to find out what it was all about and presented some pretty sensational testimony. But the newspapers didn't give it much of a play. It was not until John Frey, head of the Metal Trades Department of the A. F. of L., turned up with a statement about Communists in the rival C. I. O. that Dies hit the publicity jackpot.

Frey's testimony showed him what he needed and what the press wanted—the two things were identical. Ever since then he has borne down heavily on charges of communism in the C. I. O., often timing exposure of leaders in specific unions to hit the newspapers simultaneously with the start of contract negotiations. This happened, for example, in the important Harvester negotiations. But there wasn't enough specific material on communism in the C. I. O. and communism in the government to keep the hungry presses fed. There wasn't enough, that is, until Matthews appeared as if from heaven, to serve first as a witness and then as a paid employee of the committee. He knew the comrades and their methods, and he was willing to tell all.

Increasingly under fire in the last few months, Dies has taken to putting his foot in his mouth with painful regularity. He recently boasted from the seclusion of his Texas home that he was about to expose a gigantic spy ring, but nothing has come of it; he stated flatly that Axis diplomats had protested to the State Department about the committee's activities, but the department said it had received no such protests; he demanded that the Department of Justice place 17,000 German Americans under surveillance, only to be informed that this would require an army of 51,000 FBI agents doing nothing else. Things have not been going well, but another report, this one on German espionage, sabotage, and propaganda, is in the works, and Dies apparently is relying on it to assure the customary renewal and $100,000 appropriation next year.

The fact is that Dies could not bring out a comprehensive report on Nazi-inspired propaganda activities without mentioning his friends. One of his closest friends and collaborators is Hamilton Fish, whose connections with Viereck brought him close to the fountainhead of the pre-Pearl Harbor Nazi propaganda in this country. Inevitably, the line followed by Matthews and Dies has led them into tolerance for if not active collaboration with the native fascists. Some of Matthews's own stuff has turned up in their publications. And even though the extreme anti-democrats, Jew-baiters, and pro-Axis elements have been driven under cover by the circumstances of war, they have not been rooted out. Coughlin and his gang are still at large. So are the more respectable and therefore more dangerous of the hot-headed former isolationists, or, if you please, noninterventionists, for whom the Chicago Tribune, the New York Daily News, the Washington Times-Herald, Senator Burton K. Wheeler, and Charles A. Lindbergh are spokesmen or potential spokesmen.

The Dies committee has now spent a total of $385,000. It has tried to discredit scores of earnest, useful citizens. Any incidental contribution it has made will not compensate for the violence it has done the tradition of Congressional inquiry. Of all the Congressional committees that have operated as inquisitorial agencies in the last four years, including the Truman committee, the Dies committee probably will be longest remembered. It will be a smear on the record of New Deal Congresses so long as the record remains.

Whose Trojan Horse?

BY WILL CHASAN

NO SINGLE circumstance, not even the invigorating presence of German funds, has helped more than the Dies committee to facilitate the growth of an American fascism. The committee, whose capacity for evil is still largely unappreciated, has created for American fascists the immensely useful and provocative myth of a national government swarming with Communists, demented professors, and aliens. It has subscribed explicitly to the fiction that the United States is in danger of a red revolution, thus lending authority and a new potency to the traditional fascist appeal. It has, as Vice-President Wallace once charged, aroused the doubts and angers on which fascism thrives.

One's natural impulse is to believe that the committee has performed this ignoble service unwittingly. But both the committee's chairman and its research director are too keen politically, too cynically aware of their effects, to allow so amiable an interpretation. The record of the committee itself is overwhelmingly consistent; if it does not prove that those responsible for the committee's policies are fascist-minded, it leaves no doubt that they have intentionally sponsored the distortions and prejudices which are fascism's leit-motif.

American fascists, quick to sense the value of the Dies committee, have been its eager, staunch, and unscrupulous defenders. They have gathered thousands of petitions for its continuation, acclaimed its "statesmanlike" and "patriotic" qualities, and with charges of communism have badgered many of its Congressional opponents into silence. With a zeal which would have been incongruous had the Committee to Investigate un-American Activities been living up to its name, they regularly exhorted their followers to support "this great American protective movement." When Wallace condemned Dies, Father Coughlin urged Social Justice readers "to employ their leisure moments" to write Dies "letters of encouragement." He suggested that a million letters to Dies would be "an answer to those who are bent on destroying him." George Deatherage, who ostensibly was investigated by the committee, mailed out franked copies of a speech by Senator Reynolds praising its work. Gerald Smith's Committee of One Million collected 400,000 signatures on petitions urging Congress to renew the Dies appropriation. Smith boasted that this was "the biggest and most effective single effort put forth to support the [committee's] continuation." The Constitutional Educational League, named in the recent federal-grand-jury action against seditious groups, claims that on one occasion when the Dies committee was threatened, it "secured over 4,000,000 signatures to petitions and deluged Congress with an avalanche of letters and telegrams from aroused patriots." Other groups named in the federal-grand-jury sedition charges espoused the Dies cause with equal fervor.

The Dies committee's occasional thrusts at fascist leaders have almost never alienated them. They have knowingly interpreted the committee's infrequent anti-fascist moves as necessary political camouflage, put on in the interest of obtaining a new Congressional sanction. James True, for example, carefully explained to subscribers to his Industrial Control Reports that Dies "had to play politics until he procured a large appropriation," but that actually "several members of the committee deplore the un-American investigation of George E. Deatherage and General George Van Horn Moseley, and that their influence in the conduct of future hearings will be effective." William Dudley Pelley assured his Silver Shirts that Dies "for propaganda reasons must rant and roar against race prejudice and religious intolerance but behind the scenes . . . a different trend is apparent." At rare intervals a minor leader, like Robert Edmondson, has been provoked by some temporary discomfiture at the hands of the committee into denouncing it for "placing Jews before Americans." But generally the fascist attitude toward the Dies committee has been characterized by warm approval and a nice understanding of its political difficulties.

The committee chairman, to whose poll-tax mentality fascist ideas offer no real shock, has encouraged this understanding. A feeling of ideological kinship, bolstered by a simple, indiscriminating desire for applause, led him to appear at meetings whose distinctly fascist nature was only thinly disguised. He endeared himself to a Madison Square Garden meeting, at which Social Justice was hawked, by saying that "we in America are not now in danger of any invasion of foreign armies despite the lies of war-mongers and propagandists." The audience, for whom this sentiment had a specific connotation, cheered lustily. Dies addressed many similar audiences, and often was gratified to hear himself described as "the man of the hour." He spoke for the clearly pro-fascist American Defense Society and was the featured speaker at a luncheon of the New York State Economic Council, arranged by Merwin K. Hart and attended by James Wheeler-Hill and Fritz Kuhn. These fraternal expeditions created a close personal bond between the hunter and the quarry. Dies could not be expected to jeopardize firm friendships through some tactless committee action. Nor could the un-Americans see any reason to fear the activities of one who implicitly indorsed their program and openly accepted their hospitality.

Although vastly helpful, Dies's personal appearances at fascist assemblies have been only a subordinate phase of the committee's usefulness to those whom it was supposed to curb. The main value of the Dies committee to American fascists has been as a mighty central propaganda agency. It has provided the fascist press with enormous quantities of lush and, to the gullible and uninformed, damning material against our democratic institutions. It has given them "evidence," bearing a Congressional committee's stamp of approval, to show that

New Deal leaders are tainted with communism, that New Deal agencies are overrun with reds and aliens, and that the President himself somehow is implicated in all this villainy. Dies, according to the Federal Communications Commission, is the American quoted most frequently in Axis propaganda broadcasts. What perhaps is more to the point is that the Dies committee, from its inception, has been a principal source of material for American fascists.

Through its own facilities the committee has given the same material, a mixture of fantasy and half-truth, a far wider currency than fascist channels alone would permit. The respectable New York Times never would feature a charge by Pelley or Winrod that Leon Henderson is a Communist and a crackpot, but it has gladly done so when the charge was made through the Dies committee. In this respect the glaring unfairness and falsity of most Dies committee testimony enhance its worth to American fascists. For when a Congressional committee accepts and respectable newspapers print testimony that seems untrue, they extend the bounds of credibility, destroy the recognizable marks of truth and authority, and open the way for acceptance of the most grotesque fascist propaganda. Thus the Dies committee, with the aid of the anti-New Deal press, has in effect built up a receptive audience for fascist libels which previously evoked only scornful disbelief.

American fascists have shrewdly exploited the Dies committee's authority. Many of the spectacular "revelations" which they were able to publish as the committee's official findings actually originated in their own files. The device is plain to anyone who has followed

Fight Communism

Save America

Attend These Meetings

Join American Patriots.

AMERICAN PATRIOTS, INC.

CALENDAR OF EVENTS FOR DECEMBER

You and your friends are invited to attend these important, illuminating meetings.

ISSUED BY N.Y. CHAPTER, AMERICAN PATRIOTS, INC., 49 W 44th ST., NEW YORK; NATL. HDQRS., GREENWICH, CONN.

Sunday
Dec. 4
3 PM

PRO-AMERICAN FORUM
DR. J. B. MATTHEWS
Former member of the Communist "Inner Circle" will speak on "Communism in the Federal Government"

Dr. Matthews, whose recent testimony before the Dies Committee was sensational, will tell a startling story of the extent to which the Communist Party has bored its way into Washington.

Hotel Biltmore, Madison Ave. at 43d St. Admission 50 cents

Thursday
Dec. 8
12:30 PM

LUNCHEON MEETING
under the auspices of
THE NEW YORK STATE ECONOMIC COUNCIL
Speaker
CONGRESSMAN MARTIN DIES OF TEXAS
Chairman of the Congressional Committee Investigating Un-American Activities

Hotel Biltmore Price, including luncheon, $2.00

Thursday
Dec. 8
PM

ORGANIZATION MEETING of the new American Federation Against Communism
This meeting is for active members of the
New York Chapter

Sunday
Dec. 11
3 PM

PRO-AMERICAN FORUM
Two outstanding speakers
MAJOR GENERAL GEORGE VANHORN MOSELEY
A fearless, outspoken patriot, whose attack against Administration policies after his retirement from the Army this Fall produced a real storm.

ALSO
DON BATE
Formerly United Press correspondent in Shanghai
A brilliant speaker and an authority on international affairs
"Keep America Out of War"

Hotel Biltmore Admission 50 cents

Thursday
Dec. 15
8 PM

PROTEST RALLY
This great rally is being held to protest against the Un-American censorship of radio, as exercised against Father Coughlin, Boake Carter, and others.
Bainbridge Colby, Senator James A. Reed of Missouri and other men of national prominence will speak.

Meeting sponsored by Committee for Defense of Americans
Constitutional Rights Manhattan

the committee's proceedings. Innumerable stories which blossomed into newspaper headlines were planted by avowed fascists with the aid of the committee. Dies admitted to one reporter that Father Coughlin supplied him with "anti-Communist" material. Elizabeth Dilling, in condemning her indictment for sedition by the federal grand jury, offered as proof of her Americanism the fact that she "furnished data and assistance to the Dies committee." Joseph Kamp, the director of the Constitutional Educational League, is known to frequent the committee's office, and numerous other fascists have enjoyed helpful and sometimes profitable relations with it. Their presence explains at least in part why so much of the committee's record runs parallel to the fascist "line," and why its chairman's occasional ranting against intolerance or race prejudice has never disquieted them.

erance or race prejudice has never disquieted them.

The Dies committee, according to a blunt critic, could do the United States no greater disservice if its loyalty were owed directly to Hitler. This judgment, in the light of the record, seems only mildly intemperate. The committee, aided and incited by its fascist prompters, has attacked our democratic symbols with subtlety, cunning, and cynical ruthlessness. Although a "fact-finding" body, it has, in the fascist tradition if not with fascist motives, subordinated truth to ideology, "revealing" only enough obvious facts to acquire a sympathetic hearing for its less obvious distortions. It has permitted itself to become something close to a Trojan horse for American fascism, and the record often indicates it has done so with open eyes and genuine zest.

Four to Three

BY CHARLES VAN DEVANDER

THREE members of Martin Dies's Committee on un-American Activities provide him with a clear majority of co-conspirators and congenial stooges. J. Parnell Thomas of New Jersey, "who can find subversion in trees and isms in running brooks," and Joe Starnes of Alabama, who suspects anyone whose grandparents were not born in America, form a hard core of toryism and intolerance around the committee chairman. Noah Mason, an isolationist Republican from Illinois, completes the majority.

The committee minority, which is timid to the point of worthlessness, consists of two New Dealers—Jerry Voorhis of California and Joe Casey of Massachusetts—and Harry Beam, a Democratic machine politician from Chicago. Voorhis, a rich man's son who once called himself a Socialist, is genuinely liberal but invincibly naive. The Dies majority considers him an "easy mark." Casey, a more astute politician, would be a better match for the reactionaries on the committee, but he has found it expedient to take a minor part in the committee's proceedings. He has left the burden of opposition to Voorhis, whom he credits with "doing a splendid job." Beam, a nondescript product of the Kelly-Nash organization who "goes along" with the New Deal on domestic legislation and "went along" with the Administration's pre-Pearl Harbor foreign policy, has only a tenuous claim to membership in the minority. He has contributed little to the committee record and often has "gone along" with the majority.

Thomas and Starnes, together with Dies, understand exactly the function their committee is performing, and they have not allowed the minority's occasional and feeble protests to deflect them in any important way. With the help of the anti-New Deal bloc in Congress, they are using the committee consciously and effectively to obstruct liberal laws and agencies. Unlike Dies, who assumes the role of a detached patriot, his colleagues often admit their purpose, which they see as a perfectly legitimate one.

John Parnell Thomas, who exceeds Dies in bitterness toward the New Deal, began his career as a bond salesman in Wall Street at a salary of $12.50 a week. He eventually became the head of an insurance-brokerage firm. Thomas drifted into politics after the war, from which he emerged as a captain. His tory views were an

Starnes

Beam

Voorhis

Casey

Mason

Thomas

asset in New Jersey Republican circles. He was elected to the Allendale borough council in 1925, became mayor of Allendale the following year, and in 1928 was re-elected. In 1936, after two terms in the New Jersey Assembly, where the Republicans shared power and jobs with Frank Hague, Thomas was elected to Congress. The red menace, alien-led labor unions, and the New Deal have been Thomas's chief concerns as a Representative. His most conspicuous Congressional acts, aside from his participation in the Dies committee, have been a proposal to deny the benefits of the Wagner Act to unions with alien officers and the introduction of a resolution asking that Secretary of Labor Perkins be impeached for her failure to deport alien radicals. Thomas was only mildly chagrined when William Dudley Pelley, during his appearance before the Dies committee, called the impeachment plan a "masterpiece" and said that he had distributed it in pamphlet form to 100,000 people. Thomas apparently regards labor unions as a breeding ground of subversion. He has denounced the National Labor Relations Board as a shield for potential saboteurs. He also has offered the Dies committee files to employers so that they may check upon the "subversive" connections of troublesome employees. Thomas uses red menace, fifth column, and New Deal as roughly synonymous terms. "The fifth column in the United States has flourished under New Deal rule," he said in a radio address in 1940. "The surest way of removing the fifth column from our shores is to remove the New Deal from the seat of government."

Joe Starnes, the Alabama Democrat, has a great deal in common with Thomas, the New Jersey Republican. Both are Tories and pretend to fear that the Dies committee "may turn out to be the last remaining safeguard against the dictatorship of the proletariat in America." Starnes, in the tradition of Southern standpatters, believes in womanhood and the poll tax and "standing in" with the interests. The Alabaman, who taught school before going into the practice of law and politics, was elected to Congress in 1934. He is energetic, hard-working, and politically ambitious. His immediate goal is a seat in the Senate. It is significant that the Alabama Power Company and the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company, Alabama's biggest corporations, are backing him despite his support of the TVA, the pet hate of the power crowd. His corporation friends doubtless understand that no opponent of TVA can stay in politics in the Muscle Shoals district. Apart from that one excusable lapse there is nothing in Starnes's record to which any conservative could object. He has a perfect anti-New Deal score on other domestic matters and is particularly "sound" on labor questions.

Like many Southern politicians, Starnes has found the alien to be a convenient political whipping-boy. Nor does he stop with aliens. Lumping tens of millions of patriotic citizens in the same category, he told the 1937 convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars that the "huge alien, foreign-born, foreign-stock population" of America constituted a serious problem to the nation in a war-threatened world. Just how many generations back he draws the line on "foreign-stock" citizens, he did not make clear. But he was quite definite about what he thought should be done with them. It was pure folly, Starnes said, "to permit more than six and a quarter millions of aliens to remain in this country to become potential spies and enemies to bore from within."

Starnes's value as an investigator of un-American activities is measured by the fact that he has never considered the Bund dangerous. Another indication of his value was provided during the committee's investigation of the Federal Theater and Writers' Projects. A witness happened to mention Christopher Marlowe's "Faustus." Starnes snapped to attention: "Marlowe?" he said. "Isn't he a Communist?"

Noah Morgan Mason, fourth member of the Dies committee majority, is an amiable sixty-year-old conservative who spent all of his adult life up to 1930 as a pedagogue. In 1930 the local Republican organization snatched him from his books and sent him to the Illinois Senate, where he stayed until elected to Congress in 1936.

Lacking the viciousness and farsseeing purpose of the Dies-Thomas-Starnes clique but sharing all its reactionary views, Mason is extremely useful to the committee chairman. When the annual question of appropriation comes up, Dies shrewdly sits back and allows Mason to do most of the talking. Mason, with a show of reasonableness, usually concedes that the committee has made mistakes—who of us hasn't—but assures the House that the committee should be continued on the ground that the good it has done outweighs the bad. It is an effective dodge; the committee admits everything, but answers and explains nothing.

Mason was an isolationist before Pearl Harbor mainly because he deplored the spending of "huge sums" for defense against "imaginary enemies" abroad. A Republican of the Hoover vintage, he dislikes the New Deal's fiscal untidiness, and judges most measures by their possible effect on our tax rate.

Harry P. Beam probably is one of Congress's least distinguished members. He was an assistant corporation counsel in Chicago during the Capone-dominated twenties and was elevated to Congress in 1930. Beam has contributed little to the Dies committee or to the House of Representatives. In the tradition of the Chicago Democratic machine he "votes right," with only occasional derelictions. He has been no problem to the Dies-Starnes-Thomas triumvirate in their conduct of the committee, although he has balked at approving the worst of their "reports." Like Mason, he is useful window-dressing.

Joseph Casey, an able if at times excessively prudent young lawyer from Clinton, Massachusetts, has been in the House since 1936. His record on domestic legislation and foreign policy has earned him the approval of Massachusetts liberals, who now are supporting him for the Democratic Senatorial nomination, to oppose Henry Cabot Lodge this fall. Casey is an effective fighter but has preferred not to become a focal point for the widespread indignation against the methods and aims of Martin Dies. Instead he merely backs Voorhis in an opposition that has been singularly inept. Casey, however, is not all political prudence. He courageously upheld the New Deal's pre-Pearl Harbor foreign policies, although he knew his anti-isolationist votes would cost him the support of important political factions in Massachusetts.

H. Jerry Voorhis, a Mr.-Smith-Goes-to-Washington type, is one of the most earnest liberals in American politics, but as a member of the Dies committee he has sadly disappointed his friends and supporters. Up to February 9, 1939, Voorhis had been on the sidelines, criticizing the methods of the Dies committee as "reprehensible." Then a vacancy occurred on the committee, and Speaker Bankhead—with the express approval of President Roosevelt—appointed Voorhis to fill it. No one foresaw what was to follow. The assignment blinded the serious young Californian to what had been perfectly obvious to him before. Once on the committee he abandoned his worthy efforts to destroy it and began trying to reform it instead. He still is trying.

Voorhis, whose family fortune has never impinged on his social conscience, was a registered Socialist in the days before the New Deal, that being "the only way I could voice my protest against the reactionary leadership of both major parties." With the advent of President Roosevelt he became a Democrat "with a clear conscience." He was elected to Congress in 1936 during the upsurge of California radicalism and was reelected two years later and again in 1940.

Until his association with the Dies committee, Voorhis was often extolled as the leading liberal in Congress. Unencumbered by Marxist prejudices, he had a broad, instinctively American view and a courage which liberals successful in politics frequently lack. Voorhis is aware of his recent fall from grace and is deeply troubled, but shows no sign of altering his conduct. He seems determined to continue his efforts at reform, although so far they have failed notably. The committee majority makes decisions at meetings to which he is not invited, issues reports the existence of which he never suspects, and rudely rebuffs his polite attempts to modify their procedure.

Nevertheless, despite the almost unanimous disapproval of his liberal colleagues, Voorhis believes that he is following the wisest course and that he is restraining the committee from even worse excesses. The basis for his belief is not apparent in the record. What is apparent is that his is exactly the kind of naivete on which the reactionary Dies majority has flourished.

The Small Fry

BY JAMES WECHSLER

THROUGH the doors of the Dies committee hearings room have passed some noxious specimens of Americans. Many of those whom the committee amiably described as "investigators" or "experts" had previously earned less flattering descriptions as professional anti-Semites, pro-fascists, labor spies, and convicts. Their records did not deter Martin Dies from accepting their unsupported testimony as gospel truth.

Nobody pretends that the political bias or the prison record of an informant automatically invalidates his testimony. The significant fact is that the Dies committee made no real effort to test the reliability of the men who took the stand or to judge their "evidence" against the shady backgrounds from which they emerged. It is no exaggeration to suggest that some of the Dies investigators and experts themselves provide a colorful rogues' gallery for any future committee investigating un-American activities.

The Dies committee revealed its preference for questionable informants quite early in its career. Its first senior investigator was Edward F. Sullivan, whose qualifications included a six-month jail sentence for larceny and obvious ties with some of our most notorious fascists. Sullivan, a member of the steering committee at the anti-Semitic National Conference of Clergymen and Laymen held in 1936 at Asheville, North Carolina, worked closely with Gerald Winrod, now under indictment by a federal grand jury, and Michael Ahearn of the James True Associates. Later he joined True in circulating Industrial Control Reports, one of the many news letters circulated by the friends of American fascism.

Sullivan's record dramatized the link between pro-fascists and the labor-spy ring. The La Follette committee exposed his services as an espionage agent for the Railway Audit and Inspection Bureau, services which presumably were among his qualifications when Dies hired him. Exhibit 118 of the hearings of the La Follette committee is a letter from I. D. Rice, a leading official of the Railway Bureau, to his New England manager. Rice wrote: "Please note letter from Mr. E. F. Sullivan. He is a solicitor that we have put on in the Boston territory."

Letters for Dies

"As national chairman of the Committee of One Million, the writer is proud to report that when Mr. Dies asked for a continuation of his committee, together with an additional appropriation, the Committee of One Million carried a petition bearing more than 400,000 names to Washington calling for the continuation of the investigation. We placed this petition before the Rules Committee, and it was also presented on the floor of the United States Congress. Expert observers insist that this was the biggest and most effective single effort put forth to support the continuation of this statesmanlike committee."—Gerald L. K. Smith.

"In your appreciation of the work accomplished by Dies, employ some of your leisure moments to write him a letter of encouragement. In fact, a million of letters, brought to his desk, would be an answer to those who are bent on destroying him and the legislative body which he represents."—Social Justice.

During his tenure as Dies's principal sleuth, Sullivan brought a character named Alvin I. Halpern to the committee's witness stand. When Sullivan made contact with him, Halpern was under indictment for grand larceny. The day of his second appearance before the committee he was sentenced to a term of one to two years for the crime.

Out of his crowded criminal and espionage career Sullivan developed some interesting thoughts about the fifth-column menace. He once observed in a report to committee members that "Jewish organizations naturally are concerned about the activities of the German-American Bund and the so-called Silver Shirts, but this concern is not shared by any other agency with whom I contacted. For the most part the law enforcement groups and patriotic agencies seemed to think that this great agitation over the activities of the Bund is but a smoke screen to take the people's mind off the real menace, communism and those affiliated with it."

Sullivan's past activities finally made him too "hot" even for Dies to carry, and he was dropped from the committee's staff. When last heard from he was associated with a Ukrainian American fascist group.

Another loquacious expert whom Dies used was Walter Steele, editor of the National Republic. Steele "exposed" dozens of liberal organizations, including the American Civil Liberties Union, as part of the "Communist movement." His testimony occupies 402 pages of the Dies committee volumes. What the Dies committee never explored were Walter Steele's own subversive activities, which are continuing today.

Chief lobbyist for the American Coalition, Inc., a super-patriotic alliance which includes among its affiliates such fascist groups as the American Vigilant Intelligence Federation and the Paul Reveres of Chicago, Steele is one of America's leading pro-fascists. His publication, which has a circulation of almost 50,000, supported Franco during the Spanish war. It specializes in alien-baiting and depicts all labor leaders as Communists. As lobbyist for the American Coalition, Steele appears at every state and federal investigating committee to give "impartial" information on communism. One of Steele's latest undertakings was an attempt last March to introduce fascist literature into Puerto Rican schools. His efforts incurred the wrath of the head of Puerto Rico's school system, and the Army Intelligence Service balked the project by declaring that "the National Republic is a fascist publication which should not be allowed in the public schools of Puerto Rico."

The Dies committee waged war against the WPA, a key New Deal project. Its thesis was that the WPA was in the grip of the Communists. As its stellar witness it brought forth Edward Banta. Brother Banta, though the Dies committee did not reveal it, was closely associated with the American National Labor Party, an undisguised pro-Nazi outfit. He was a speaker for the Christian Front and a contributor to Bund publications. Banta is still an active fascist. His current associations include the League of American Women Against Communism. Banta, who believes that the Communist Party "is composed of outcast Jews," has also sought to form an alliance with Leon De Aryan, recently indicted for sedition.

The committee listened attentively to the findings of Harper Knowles as he gave the lowdown on subversive activities on the West Coast. The committee identified him as a representative of the American Legion—an association which Legion officials quickly disclaimed. One commentary on Knowles's reliability was provided by James S. Landis, who observed bluntly that Knowles "lied when he dared to."

While the Dies committee was making Knowles a public benefactor, another government inquiry was delving into the organization to which he devoted most of his energies—the Associated Farmers, of which Knowles was secretary. The La Follette committee found the Associated Farmers guilty of fomenting anti-labor violence throughout California. It described the Associated Farmers' movement as part of the pattern of native American fascism. The Dies committee never investigated the Associated Farmers but blandly accepted evidence from its secretary, who characterized California's Governor Olson as a "Communist sympathizer."

Hazel Hoffman, an agent of the Dies committee, testified in May, 1941, about the American Peace Mobilization. It is questionable whether the Dies committee needed a special agent to expose the A. P. M. as a Communist front. A significant item, generously overlooked by Martin Dies, was Hazel Hoffman's connection with the Constitutional Education League. The league, headed by Joseph Kamp, a labor-baiter and shrewd pro-fascist, was one of the Dies committee's most vocal supporters. The recent government sedition indictment listed it as one of the organizations through which conspiracy against the war effort was being carried on. Yet Hazel Hoffman was a heroine in the Dies committee play.

George E. Sullivan, former counsel for General George Van Horn Moseley and ex-Representative Jacob Thorkelson, was still another expert welcomed by the Dies committee. Sullivan, whose recent book, "The Road to Victory," charges that there is a Talmudist plot to overthrow our government, was known as an anti-Semite before his appearance at the hearings. His mode of thinking, which endeared him to Social Justice, the Defender, and other pro-fascist publications, is illustrated best by the title of one of his booklets: "Wolves in Sheep's Clothing—An Authentic Portrayal of the Perfidious Proposals of Communism and Socialism in Their Real Setting, as Masks and Devices Employed by Amazingly Organized and Financially Powerful Occult Forces, Bent upon World Conquest."

Many Dies experts had a direct stake in "smearing" specific New Deal agencies. A good example of a vested interest posing—unchallenged—as a detached reporter was Alice Lee Jemison, who came before the committee to accuse the Indian Bureau of the Department of the Interior of attempting to spread "communism and paganism" on the reservations. Miss Jemison's stake was simple. She was Washington representative of the American Indian Federation, organized to lobby for legislation giving thousands of Indians $3,000 each. The Indian Bureau was opposing the legislation. But Miss Jemison got her headlines as an expert on subversion.

Dies could also have discovered, if he had bothered to inquire, that Miss Jemison had contributed to at least one fascist newspaper and had been associated with Elizabeth Dilling.

One of the shadiest episodes in the history of the Dies committee is that involving David Mayne. Mayne, who had been Silver Shirt Pelley's Washington "agent," was employed by the committee apparently to embarrass Dies's liberal critics—especially Representative Frank Hook, a Michigan Democrat—who, the committee had learned, were preparing an indictment of Dies's mysterious associations with leading friends of the fascist front. Mayne made contact with Dies's foes and sold them copies of letters allegedly written by Pelley boasting of a secret agreement with the Dies committee. Since Mayne's credentials as a Pelley representative were beyond dispute, the letters were purchased in good faith. They were issued as part of a general exposé of Dies, who then triumphantly produced Mayne's proof that the letters were forgeries. Subsequently Mayne was brought to trial. He pleaded guilty to charges of forgery and taking money under false pretenses, but sentence was unaccountably suspended.

Other Dies informants included John W. Koos, the Ukrainian fascist leader, who in 1938 cabled congratulations to Hitler for his success in settling "the minority problem," and Professor Edward I. Fenlon, who assured readers of the Coughlinite Brooklyn Tablet that if Franco were a fascist, it would not necessarily make him or his cause vicious. There were also the anonymous labor spies who supplied Dies with the information on the basis of which he charged that the C. I. O. was overrun with felons.

Why did the Dies committee accept the "revelations" of these walking delegates from the fascist fringe? Probably because it shared all their preconceptions. Certainly the most lurid charges against the New Deal could not have seemed improbable to a man who like Dies believes that Supreme Court Justice Murphy and Vice-President Wallace are tainted with communism. Whatever the motive behind his performance, Martin Dies chose to give America's political underworld its day in court—with friendly attorneys and a packed bench, and, in some instances, with liberal fees for services rendered.

They Support Dies

"[I have] the highest respect for the Dies committee and sympathy with its program."—George Sylvester Viereck.

"I am in favor of it [the Dies committee] to be appointed again and I wish them to get more money."—Fritz Kuhn.

"I founded the Silver Legion in 1933 . . . to propagate the exact same principles that Mr. Dies and this committee are engaged in prosecuting now."—William Dudley Pelley.

"Behind the whole fight on the Ku Klux Klan has been that hand of an insidious alien influence. The vicious fight on the Klan sprang from the same source which has fought the Dies committee from the day of its inception."—Ku Klux Klan pamphlet.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 155

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · OCTOBER 10, 1942

NUMBER 15

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

329

EDITORIALS

- |  |     |
|--|-----|
| Toward Total Economic Mobilization                 | 332 |
| Murray of Montana                                  | 332 |
| The Chinese Cooperatives                           | 333 |
| Hitler Prepares to Dig In by Freda Kirchwey | 334 |

ARTICLES

- |  |     |
|--|-----|
| Prisoner of the Japanese. by J. B. Powell | 335 |
| Washington Letter by I. F. Stone          | 338 |
| After Stalingrad by Donald W. Mitchell    | 339 |
| Workers in Uniform by Harold Mager        | 341 |
| In the Wind                                      | 342 |
| Beat the Dunderheads by Robert Bendiner   | 347 |
| I Worked for McCormick by Greer Williams  | 348 |

POLITICAL WAR edited by J. Alvarez del Vayo

- |   |     |
|---|-----|
| Behind the Enemy Line                       | 343 |
| The Spider of Ankara                        | 344 |
| The Road to Lublin by Max Mandellaub | 345 |

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- |   |     |
|---|-----|
| Primitive Painting by Clement Greenberg          | 350 |
| The Appeal to Morals by Frank Kingdon            | 351 |
| Jane vs. Jane! by Keith Hutchison                | 352 |
| Blackmur as Poet by Oscar Williams               | 353 |
| Post-War Economics by Harold Strauss             | 355 |
| Drama: Play and No Playby Joseph Wood Krutch | 357 |
| Music by B. H. Haggin                            | 357 |

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

359

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Assistant Editor

RICHARD H. ROVERE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL • JONATHAN DANIELS • LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR • J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1942, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 856 National Press Building.

The Shape of Things

THE MOST IMPORTANT THING ABOUT Stalin's letter to the A. P. correspondent in Moscow is the fact that he wrote it. In this unprecedented and unceremonious form he demanded bluntly that the Allied powers live up to their obligations "fully and on time." If, as Willkie said in his second-front statement from Moscow, the Allied military leaders "need some prodding," Stalin has administered a prod which carries the force of a charge of dynamite. Where a diplomatic note would have caused no more than a diplomatic ripple, this outspoken letter has produced an explosion. For it amounts to an ultimatum from Stalin to the Allied leaders. He does not say that Russia will collapse if a second front is not opened this year. On the contrary, he insists that "the Soviet capacity of resisting the German brigands is in strength not less, if not greater, than the capacity of fascist Germany . . . to secure for itself world domination." But he charges that the Allies have failed to give Russia effective aid "as compared with the aid which the Soviet Union is giving to the Allies by drawing on itself the main force of the German fascists." No statesman, least of all the discreet Stalin, uses such language in a public communication unless he has reached a point where he hopes rather than fears to affront the governments he criticizes. In short, Stalin's letter indicates that relations between the Soviet Union and its Western allies are dangerously strained and that suspicion has taken the place of confidence.

✱

WHAT THIS STATE OF AFFAIRS MIGHT LEAD to, we prefer not to imagine. The chief thing to insist upon is that it must not be allowed to develop. For months Russia has been fighting alone but in full expectation of relief through the opening of a second front in the west. Even supplies from the Allies have fallen far short of the amounts promised. Now with winter at hand and Stalingrad still bearing the weight of attack on the long line, Russian patience and endurance are near an end. We don't pretend that the British and Americans are solely at fault. Russia has proved a prickly ally and has withheld much information important in making major military decisions. But the final blame lies on those who promised and failed to fulfil their obligations rather than on those who have carried the full burden of the fight. If the Western allies fail Russia now, the alliance itself is in danger; Russia cannot and will not fight indefinitely alone. This is clear, even though Stalin did not say so. What he did say is enough to show that the Allied generals cannot afford to sit back in their chairs calculating how long the Russians can hold out without help. It is sufficient warning that the second front is the price the Allies will have to pay to keep the weakened Russian armies in the field and the Soviet Union in the United Nations.

★

THE WAR IN THE PACIFIC HAS TAKEN A decided turn for the better as a result of the Australian victory north of Port Moresby and American occupation of the Andreanof Islands in the Aleutians. The New Guinea triumph is particularly encouraging because it is the first time in this war that a Japanese army offensive has been defeated and turned back by a United Nations ground force. It is possible that the Japanese may be forced to abandon their six-months-long effort to seize Port Moresby as a base for operations against Australia, and will concentrate on the struggle for the Solomon Islands. Only meager information has been received from the Solomons during the past week, but it is apparent that the Japanese are continuing to harass the American positions at Tulagi and Guadalcanal from newly established bases at Gizo and Rekata. Although no hint of a further American offensive has appeared in official communiqués, our positions at Tulagi can be considered safe only when the Japanese are driven completely out of the Solomons. Occupation of the Andreanof Islands may be taken as an indication that the United States is preparing to expel the enemy from Kiska, Attu, and Agattu. In order to keep our perspective, we must bear in mind that all of these operations are minor ones. They are significant only if they are followed up by attacks on important Japanese positions.

★

THE ARREST OF EDOUARD HERRIOT PUTS AN end to Laval's policy of trying on the one hand to satisfy Germany and on the other to avoid antagonizing French opposition leaders. That he had to sacrifice Jews by the thousands and carry his traffic in slaves to the extreme of his new compulsory-labor law never fazed him. But his old parliamentary habits make it unpleasant for him to have to proceed against a man whose prestige was already established when he himself first entered the Chamber of Deputies as a passionate Jacobin of the left. He tried to placate Herriot by sending him all kinds of private messages. They were received with the disdain that could be expected from the ironical old Mayor of Lyons. Herriot's arrest proves that the Pétain regime cannot handle the present internal situation. Every delay or hesitation on the part of Vichy to meet the demands of Berlin is met by a tightening of the screws upon the French Gauleiters. And this in turn leads to greater repressive measures against the French people, who show their irritation at every new concession to the invader. It is a dialectical process whose outcome can only be one of two things—a revolutionary shake-up or the total occupation of France. The arguments employed in the last few days by the Radio Legion, mouthpiece of Pierre Laval's clique, show the desperate position of a government whose only appeal to the nation is an attempt to convince French employers that by sending as many French workers to Germany as possible they are contributing France's share toward the "overthrow of Bolshevism." The arrest of Herriot has given the French people their national leader in the struggle for liberation from within. If De Gaulle symbolizes the armed fight against the invader, Herriot expresses the internal opposition. Nor could the French people find a better leader. He represents all that is finest in the French tradition.

★

THE DEPORTATION FROM FRANCE OF SIXTY or seventy thousand Jews is a mass demonstration of Laval's impotence. The story of this vast human tragedy is told on another page of this issue. Mr. Mandellaub, himself a refugee fortunate enough to have reached this country, exposes the futility of hoping that help for these victims can come from any source inside France or Europe. For most of them hope has vanished; the thousands who have found the end of their weary trek toward freedom in cattle cars headed for the east can now be saved, if at all, only through the final defeat of Hitler. But many thousands are still in France, awaiting their fate. If America had the courage of its professions it would have rescued all the refugees in France before Hitler sprung the trap. But such a program was not even considered. What our government did was to admit within the quota limits such ordinary refugees as met all the regular requirements. And in addition it issued a limited number of visas to particularly endangered individuals. Grudgingly, slowly, the visas were dealt out to a few carefully selected anti-fascists. Those rescued were the few; those left behind the many. Of the political fighters against Hitler for whom visas were requested, about 5,000 are left stranded in France, awaiting deportation and almost certain death. Some of these could still be saved if, for once, in the face of an atrocity against which Secretary Hull himself has bitterly protested, the State Department were willing to slice through the red tape and get these men and women out. With visas for America they could still reach Lisbon. With money from America they could still get passage.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S INDORSEMENT OF John J. Bennett for governor of New York should give the Attorney General's cause hardly more nourishment than Mark Twain's soup made from the shadow of a starved chicken. The gesture was inevitable and anticipated. Besides being the father of a political philosophy, the President, as the American Labor Party points out, is the head of the Democratic Party. His silence on the New York campaign would have damaged the party's position elsewhere in the country at a moment when the threat of a Republican Congress is not to be taken lightly. His promise to vote for Bennett as "the best qualified" of the three candidates was the faintest indication of support that he could decently get away with. He did not urge the Farley candidate's election, he carefully avoided associating him with the New Deal, and he said nothing to offset his pre-convention prophecy that Bennett could not win. Had the Labor Party taken the President's indorsement at face value and withdrawn Dean Alfange from the running, Bennett's stock would assuredly have skyrocketed. The Labor Party, with its own existence at stake, knew better than that, and as a result there is no cheering in the Farley camp. The net effect of the President's statement is likely to be the withdrawal from the Bennett fold of some bitter anti-Roosevelt Democrats and even of those diehard Republican isolationists who had flocked to Bennett in preference to a Dewey gone suddenly pro-Willkie. Probably these minor defections will be offset by New Deal voters who will follow the President's lead, but Mayor LaGuardia's timely support of Dean Alfange indicates that there will be no stampede in that direction.

★

ALTHOUGH STRIKES IN WAR INDUSTRIES have been comparatively rare since Pearl Harbor, the press has recently given a considerable amount of space to a statement issued by the National Association of Manufacturers charging that such strikes are on the increase. To support its charge the N. A. M. cites War Labor Board figures showing that strikes in war industries increased from 27 in January to 222 in July. Apart from the fact that the time lost by strikes in July represented less than one-tenth of 1 per cent of the total man-hours worked, the N. A. M. neglects to point out that the WLB has steadily broadened the base of its strike statistics in such a way as to make month-to-month comparisons meaningless. The association even goes so far as to charge that the WLB figures are "unquestionably incomplete" because they do not take into account strikes of less than twenty-four hours. Actually, since April the WLB has been including strikes that lasted as long as one shift. Denials of the N. A. M. charges by William H. Davis, chairman of the War Labor Board, and even by the President himself have received far less newspaper space than was given to the original charges. Figures on "strikes" by management—that is, insistence on business-as-usual practices—are, of course, never reported in the press. We do not wish to condone irresponsible strikes in war time, but the very fact that the National Association of Manufacturers, regardless of the war, insists on carrying its grudge against labor to the point of falsifying the record is a far more serious breach of the management-labor truce than a few wildcat strikes.

★

J. DAVID STERN'S PHILADELPHIA RECORD IS to be commended for its forthright handling of the rubber problem and the Baruch committee. Few newspapers had the courage to tackle the powerful interests connected with the synthetic-rubber program. The Washington correspondence and editorials of the Record and its affiliated Camden Courier-Post do them honor. It was the Record which first disclosed that Dr. Ernst A. Hauser, associate professor of chemical engineering at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and coauthor of the book "Rationed Rubber," was employed as an expert by the Baruch committee. Dr. Hauser's book sneered at the Truman and Gillette committees, called rubber from alcohol "rabbit's whisker rubber," and did a little expert knifing of Thurman Arnold. Dr. Hauser testified before the Gillette committee last week that he was not compensated by Standard Oil of New Jersey for writing it. In a prepared statement he said further that the German chemical firm for which he worked from 1922 to 1932 was "not a subsidiary of I. G. Farben. As a matter of fact the two companies were competitors in several fields of the chemical industry." But under questioning by Paul E. Hadlick, counsel for the committee, Dr. Hauser admitted that the concern for which he worked and I. G. Farben had directors in common and that they pooled certain of their processes.

★

THE TEST OF THE EFFECTIVENESS OF THE new rubber administrator, William M. Jeffers, will be his handling of another run-around on aid to Russia which was uncovered by our Washington editor. It seems that the President ordered that a rubber-tire plant be given to the Russians in July, 1941. First the program was whittled down, then in large part countermanded, and finally it was decided to substitute used equipment for new. Six months have passed, and Jeffers is now on the verge of asking the rubber companies if they can please spare some of their equipment for the Russians. The fact is that huge quantities of tire-making machinery are available, that the Russian request is for but a tiny fraction of our manufacturing capacity of 65,000,000 tires a year, and that this equipment could have been shipped to the Russians months ago. The principal obstacle, aside from the patent rights involved, is that the companies are determined to hold on to their equipment in order to be ready for quick resumption of production when the war is over.

Toward Total Economic Mobilization

WE HAD better resist the temptation to consider the President's order "providing for the stabilization of the national economy" a final solution of the inflation problem. Drastic as it is in some respects, it is really no more than a springboard from which we must make up our minds to dive into the rough and chilly waters of total economic mobilization. The controls instituted by the order will not operate by themselves; to be effective they will have to be supplemented by measures subjecting industry, labor, and agriculture to a high degree of regimentation.

The section of the order affecting wages and salaries is being criticized in some quarters as letting labor off too lightly. Actually it has plenty of teeth. For if on the one hand it specifically continues to encourage collective bargaining, on the other hand it subjects the results of that bargaining, so far as wages are concerned, to the veto of the War Labor Board and, in the case of a wage increase necessitating a change in a price ceiling, to that of the Price Administrator. There are, it is true, a number of "escape clauses" making possible a rise in wage rates above the September 15 level in order to correct "inequities" or "to aid in the effective prosecution of the war." Some such provision was necessary to check the drift of men from essential but comparatively poorly paid occupations such as copper mining to those offering greater attractions.

It is doubtful, however, that the man-power problems caused by the natural tendency of workers to seek the most remunerative employment can be cured simply by tinkering with wage differentials. In the very near future we shall probably be forced to freeze men to their jobs in the most vital industries, including agriculture, in order to avoid a hopeless lack of balance in war production. This is one of the problems that will confront the new Economic Stabilization Board, and in view of this, the omission from its membership of the head of the War Manpower Commission seems a strange oversight.

Since the President's order follows the compromise on the limitation of farm prices reached by Congress last week, it may seem more lenient toward agriculture than the circumstances warrant. Farm interests, however, received a shock when they read the provision directing the deduction from parity prices of various government cash payments to farmers. This tends to offset the effect of the addition of farm labor costs as a factor in calculating parity prices.

It would be dangerous to assume that merely fixing farm prices will insure stabilization of the cost of living, together with an adequate supply of food for ourselves and our allies. The sunshine speeches about the certainty of abundance that were fashionable a few months back have now been replaced by ominous talk of food shortages. Secretary of Agriculture Wickard warned the other day that we must conserve this year's abundant harvest or face hunger later on. Scarcity of farm equipment, fertilizer, and above all of labor may decrease production of some vital crops. The President's order will permit, in such cases, the raising of the ceiling price or the use of subsidies to stimulate output.

These measures, however, may prove to be insufficient. Mr. Wickard and other Administration spokesmen have hinted strongly in recent weeks that war-time regimentation of agriculture is inevitable. This means that farm production will have to be planned in accordance with national needs rather than in accordance with the individual farmer's notion of what are the most profitable and convenient crops to grow. With the resources that can be devoted to food production restricted, it would be absurd to add to superabundant wheat stocks when the same acreage might be turned to soy beans. Speaking in Mississippi on October 3, Mr. Wickard told an audience of farmers that "our only hope" of meeting our food budget lies "in harnessing all of our resources to the task of producing only the farm products which are absolutely essential. It is a hard way—you cannot fight a global war by taking it easy."

Victory demands concentration on vital needs and the surrender of superfluities, and that means that the element of choice has to be restricted for business man, farmer, worker, and consumer just as it is for the soldier or sailor. We have a long way still to go before we are slimmed down to the austere standards of British war economy, but the President's stabilization order is a step forward in that direction.

Murray of Montana

ONE of the paradoxes of the current Congressional campaign is the attack being made by the Republican State Committee of Montana upon Senator James E. Murray. Although Senator Murray, as chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee and father of the Smaller War Plants Act, has done more for small business than any other man in the Senate, he is being attacked for failure to help it. The piquant detail is that in Montana the Republican State Committee is synonymous with that stalwart friend of small enterprise, the Anaconda Copper Company.

The Senator himself is something of a paradox. A millionaire lawyer and business man, he has distinguished himself during his first term in the Senate as a consistent and active champion of both labor and little business. He is both a Catholic and a progressive. He has been a steadfast supporter of the New Deal, and he was one of the first men in the Senate to go on record for a second front. He is supported by both the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. He entered the Senate in 1934 by appointment to the seat left vacant by the death of Thomas Walsh, and he has proved himself a worthy successor. He was elected to a full term in 1936.

In the Democratic primaries Senator Murray drew a vote twice as large as that of the leading candidate in the Republican primaries. Unfortunately, the low wages in the mining industry and the high wages in the new war industries of the Pacific Coast have been draining labor out of Montana, and with it has gone some of Senator Murray's support. The chances are that he will be re-elected, but he needs the energetic support of all progressives in Montana. There are too few good liberals left in the Senate to permit the loss of James E. Murray.

This is as good a time as any to note that Senator Murray's Small Business Committee has resumed its hearings, this time to focus attention not only on the continued failure to utilize small manufacturing establishments to the fullest capacity but also on the plight of the small retailer and distributor in the war. Thousands of these may soon have to shut up shop. Several plans have been proposed to provide them with emergency financing and the means of reentering business after the war is over; some provision of this kind is necessary if we are not to emerge from the war with our economic life—and that also means our political life—more than ever before under the domination of giant monopolies.

The Chinese Cooperatives

THIS month marks the fourth anniversary of the organization of the Chinese Industrial Cooperatives. These cooperatives, which have been widely publicized in this country through the writings of Edgar Snow, were largely the creation of one man, Rewi Alley, a New Zealander who was a factory inspector in Shanghai before the war. When the Japanese occupied all the main industrial sections of the country, thus apparently depriving China of the basic supplies needed for carrying on the war, Alley conceived the idea of starting small industries throughout the interior of China, utilizing the skilled labor of the refugees who had fled the coastal cities. In the absence of capital these industries were organized on a cooperative basis, and they have been extraordinarily successful. In a short time they were numbered in the thousands. They make everything: small arms, grenades, blankets, uniforms, surgical instruments, some medicines, farm implements, and electrical equipment. Although most of the equipment as well as the labor has necessarily been contributed locally, an increasing amount of assistance has been provided recently by thousands of friends in the United States and Britain.

These friends will regret to learn that within the past fortnight Alley has been dismissed from his post as field secretary. This development was the culmination of a long struggle over the fundamental policies of the cooperatives—a struggle which had ramifications in both Chinese and American politics. In China the issue was relatively clear-cut. With profound faith in the possibilities of a nascent democracy in China, Alley had devoted his efforts, with outstanding success, to the building up of a decentralized movement. He considered decentralization to be the most practicable means of meeting the problems faced by the local cooperatives under Chinese war-time conditions. Inadequate transport facilities, frequent bombing, the scarcity of ink, paper, typewriters, and other means of communication made it necessary for the C. I. C. units to stand on their own feet. So a system was set up under which the International Committee of the C. I. C. distributed the money collected abroad directly to local industrial cooperatives.

Certain Chungking officials have long opposed Alley's policies on the ground that the entire Chinese economy should be centralized under government control. But since centralization is impracticable under Chinese conditions, there has always been a suspicion that at least some of these individuals were seeking to gain control of the cooperative organization for political reasons. Alley's dismissal was not an isolated incident. More than a month ago a veteran Chinese politician, Chou Hsiangshien, formerly mayor of Hangchow, was installed as secretary-general of the C. I. C., and a standing committee was established of men who have had little, if anything, to do with the C. I. C. in the past. This committee has ruled that all funds should be sent to it in the future instead of being distributed through the long-established International Committee.

This development is particularly disquieting because we, along with many other Americans, had come to regard the C. I. C. as a symbol of growing democracy in China. We have tended to overlook the fact that the Chinese government, owing to the stresses of the war, was not itself particularly democratic in structure. And we have hoped that the experience in practical democracy gained in the cooperatives would lay the foundation for broader popular rule after the war.

Not all of the politics or the passion for centralization which harasses the C. I. C. is Chinese. For months the United China Relief, which acts as a coordinated agency for the collection of relief funds for China, has been seeking to gain control of the distribution as well as the collection of the funds for the industrial cooperatives. It is possible that this effort may have influenced Chungking in its decision to reorganize the C. I. C. We prefer to think that no ulterior political motives, either here or in China, are involved, but the best proof of their absence would be the cessation of all efforts by outsiders to control a movement which has been outstandingly successful under its established local leadership.

Hitler Prepares to Dig In

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

IN A world of war even the words of a conqueror are quickly buried by events. Hitler's speech was made, discussed, and almost forgotten before the week-end. Too generally, in my opinion, it was dismissed as an admission of weakness: Mr. Hull, for instance, referred to the speech as "quite a comedown," and said Hitler was evidently "desperately preparing his people for still greater hardships." Editorial writers found in it an admission that Germany was stopped, that the great offensive was over, at least on important fronts. Hitler, they pointed out, had recognized the fact that another horrifying Russian winter must be endured, and they contrasted this with his boast a year ago that Russia was already defeated; at last on the defensive, he was forced to look for words to make a prospective stalemate sound like an imminent victory.

This interpretation is almost true. But it conceals an important and disconcerting fact which we dare not pass over. Hitler is not merely on the defensive. He is a conqueror on the defensive. What he must defend is his territorial gains, his successful aggressions. When he sneers at Allied propagandists who belittle a thousand kilometers of soil overrun by the German army while making victories out of minor successes on their own side, he scores a legitimate point. Hitler has conquered Europe from the Atlantic to the Volga. He must obviously defend his spoils, from both inside and outside attack. He must consolidate his gains before he grabs for more. And so he prepares to resist blows and to suppress revolt and to exploit conquered land and mines and factories. This Göring promised, as well as Hitler.

I don't deny that it is better to have Hitler on the defensive than to watch his armies roll across the face of Europe. But none of us should fool ourselves with the idea that his role is comparable with the defensive role played so far by the Allies. Our side has fought with nothing to lose but its own possessions, no place to retreat but across its own soil. And we have lost and retreated.

Hitler's announcement that the Nazi regime will now begin to organize its conquests should be taken as a challenge rather than a consolation. His army needs to halt. So it must be forced to keep on marching or die where it stands. He plans to exploit the territory he has conquered, "to link it with the nutrition of our people and the obtaining of raw materials for the maintenance of all Europe." So he must be robbed of the fruits of his victory by intensified guerrilla fighting and sabotage. He needs to end resistance. So resistance must be quickened into full revolt. And implicit in his whole position is Hitler's need for peace, since peace is the one real defense for a conqueror gorged with the spoils of war; only with peace can he really concentrate on the major job of digestion. So he must be given war; and we must be forearmed against his coming peace offensive.

This is all evident enough. But it remains to be accomplished. The Russians will certainly do their best to prevent Hitler's army from digging in for the winter, but whether they can find the strength to succeed will largely depend on the help they get from the west. Without a second front in Europe, Russia may be forced to accept what Hitler wants—a stalemate in the east.

Even more certainly they will resist any attempt to exploit and carry off the resources of their lost lands. No matter what happens on the front, Russian workers and peasants can be counted upon to fight on savagely. But Hitler's plans for organizing Europe as a whole can only be blocked if opposition is intensified throughout the occupied countries. Again this may depend upon the opening of a western front. The resistance of men and women who would rather fight alone than accept slavery will not suffice to wreck Hitler's plans. An Allied invasion of Europe is a prerequisite of successful revolt.

As for peace, it may present itself in many guises. Already the Poles report that Hitler has twice attempted to make overtures to them. The next effort may be directed to Russia, especially if Hitler succeeds in stabilizing the eastern front. That the possibility of a peace move has been considered in Berlin is indicated in the commentary in the Political War section of this issue on one of Goebbels's more striking recent articles. The "pawn theory" is a strategy designed for just such peacemaking as Hitler obviously has in mind. His conquests become pawns in the maneuvers for a negotiated peace. As our writer says, the theory is a substitute for total victory. But it must also be recognized that it is incompatible with defeat. A defeated power must disgorge its conquests. Only a power that still has strength to fight can use them as trading pieces.

Hitler on the defensive is merely Hitler using new tactics to accomplish the purposes his victories have forced upon him. Only a powerful offensive—political as well as military—timed to hit before his defensive aims have been achieved, can break Hitler's hold on Europe. It may be our only chance.

Prisoner of the Japanese

BY J. B. POWELL

[Mr. Powell was repatriated two months ago and brought home on the Gripsholm suffering from gangrene which has cost him the greater part of both feet. He is now recovering in a New York hospital, where he wrote the following close-up of the methods and mentality of his Japanese jailers.]

ON THE morning of December 20, 1941, almost two weeks after Pearl Harbor, half a dozen Japanese plain-clothes men came to my room in Shanghai's Hotel Metropole. This was no surprise, as the office of the China Weekly Review and the China Press, which I had edited for years, had already been sealed by the Japanese, and I knew they had old scores to settle with me.

